DAVID in this Psalm gives a testimony to his personal experience. "I waited patiently for the Lord." What is it to wait patiently for the Lord? "Be silent to the Lord, and wait patiently for Him" (Ps. 37 : 7, margin). It is certainty which makes us still in waiting. At a railway station it is easy to see which of the passengers are acquainted with the line, and which are not. Some come on to the platform, sit down, and take a paper. Two or three trains may pass, but they do not stir. When, however, their own train comes, they ask no question, but quietly get into it. They are silent, they "wait patiently," because experience of the line has given them

CONFIDENCE.

Others there are who scarcely sit down at all; they ask first one official, then another, which is the right train, and when told, they look and listen suspiciously, as though, perhaps, it might be a mistake. These are not silent, they do not wait patiently. Unacquainted with the line, and having lost their way before through being misdirected, they lack confidence.

It is just so with God's children in their dealings with Him. Some who know Him well put their request into His hands, and then are silent to Him. They do not go on pleading with and, as it were, worrying God; they do not suspect Him of inattention, but give Him credit for hearing them all the time, without anything in themselves to prove they are heard. Others pray, and then expect from themselves some feeling or assurance that their prayer has prevailed with God; and they are quite ready to repeat it, or to urge it in different words, if that will answer better. Their expectation is from themselves and their prayer, more than from God and His faithfulness.

When David was silent, God could speak. "He inclined unto me and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet and established my goings." Thank God, with Him to hear is to answer and to undertake, however terrible may be our position. As lost sinners, many of us have known the horrible pit and the miry clay. But when a child of God falls under the power of temptation—when envy, jealousy, hard thoughts, unkind words, uncleanness, self-indulgence get hold of him, oh, how horrible is the pit in which he finds himself! His feet have no hold, he slips all ways, and cannot keep his balance. Struggling only makes him sink deeper, like Bunyan's pilgrim. Only one hand—the hand of Jesus—can bring us out; and when a man learns to be silent to God, to leave off urging and urging his petition, and learns to accept the answer of God, he is quickly set upon a rock. He finds the "Rock of Ages" beneath his feet. It is strange how long it takes to empty us of all our self-help. God's Word is full of the nothingness of man, yet often in our very prayers there is a great mixture of self-reliance.

David found that it was not enough to be saved from the horrible pit and the miry clay, and to find a standing place; he had learned that and his cry was heard in this thing also. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps" (Jer. 10 : 23). And yet how persistently we take the direction into our own hands! There is an immense amount of work for God among most earnest, hard-working, self-denying, devoted Christians, where man is really at the head. God's counsel is sought, and then the committee, instead of being silent to God until He has declared His mind, do the best according to their own judgment. But this would never have answered for the bringing of the children of Israel out of Egypt. What wisdom of man would have devised a way in the sea? Who could have made the heavens rain bread, or brought water out of the rock? Men would have chosen another way, much fighting would have been the result, and the commissariat department would probably have run the nation heavily in debt.

SANCTIFIED COMMON-SENSE

is a very favorite expression; but Moses, David, Paul, and the holy man of faith speak nothing of this—they were "silent to God," and God made their intellectual powers receptive for His thoughts, which are higher than ours. Thus, instead of being agents for God, they became willing, intelligent, loving instruments, through whom God worked as He could not through such as are self-reliant. The advocate of sanctified common-sense is God's ally; the man of faith is consciously God's habitation.

Was it too humbling to David that the reins were thus taken out of his hands, and that he was treated as a child? Far from it; he says, "And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." A man does not grieve over what he sings about. The Word of God often speaks about a new song; new experiences make new songs. David says, "Many shall see and fear and turn to the Lord." See what? A man who was in the mire, sour, ill-tempered, dissatisfied with himself, now shining with joy, and liberty, and peace! Men see new songs in the face, manner—everything of those who have "been with Jesus." And it is the new song which leads them to trust in the Lord. A few are converted through fear; but by far the greater number of conversions are traceable to the new song of some one whose changed life speaks the reality of Christ.

"Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies." None are so independent as those who really make the Lord their trust. Men may seek to defame them, injure them, slander them, but they know that their reputation is safe with Him, and that He cannot betray the trust. If our object at all times is to be right with God, and the care of all we are and have, and also of His work in our hands, is left with Him—why "have respect," or take any notice of those who would injure us? God may have permitted them to say hard and untrue things, just on purpose to remind us that they need our prayers; thus we can lovingly bear them before Him.

David was filled with wonder at the wonderful works and the thoughts of God toward us, His unworthy creatures; he declares that "they are more than can be numbered." No wonder David had a new song to sing. The wonder is we are not singing all day long, for we never really commit anything to God, but we find He has been thinking about it beforehand, just as a parent has food ready provided against the time the children shall be hungry.

Fairly overcome with the love of God, David's thought was, "How reward such love?" what acknowledgment can I make? "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire," alluding perhaps to the word spoken regarding Saul. "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. 15 : 22). "Mine ears hast Thou opened" [margin "digged"]. The Hebrew slave who would not go out free, but so loved his master as to be had his ears bored through (Ex. 21 : 5, 6). David's heart said, "I love Thee, I will not go out free;" "Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart." It was no hardship to Jesus to do His Father's will; He lived to do it, for His own will was entirely renounced. David was in the same spirit when he wrote this Psalm; and this is the blessed privilege of all who will live a life yielded entirely up to God, and trusting implicitly in Him. Those who hold out tenaciously on any point of will are just keeping themselves in misery, and making it impossible for God to assume control over them; for He will have no divided throne, nor share the government with them.

Our blessed Lord said, "I can of mine own self do nothing." It was His glory to be led by His Father, and to carry out His plans and purposes. He is our Example, that we should follow in His steps (1 Pet. 2 : 21). God never created us to take the lead, but to do as our Lord did, "always those things which please Him" (John 8 : 29). As long as the question is unanswered, "How far shall I go in God's service? how much of my time shall I give Him? what proportion of my money shall I set apart for Him? it is clear that there is still the idea that we belong to ourselves, and there is something like putting God under an obligation to us by our devotion. When we see our true relative position with regard to Him, and He breaks our hearts with His love in saying,

"ALL THAT I HAVE IS THINE"

(Luke 15 : 31), there is no other reply possible than one—all that I have and am is Thine. In the light of His love we see the obligation on the other side; it is a wonder of wonders that our loving God will own us and ours, or be willing to use such instruments in His service. All becomes easy to a soul which is "silent to God," which gives God His true place. Life becomes one glad song, for the will which is in harmony with God's cannot be crossed; the child who is willingly led by Him cannot go out of the way; it is one sweet experience that He careth for us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Reports from the Cholera-Infected Districts last week showed that the plague is spreading in Italy and in the mountainous districts of France. The villages of the Pyrenees are now the worst sufferers. Fifteen villages were added during the week to the infected district. In Marseilles and Toulon the improvement continues. The total number of deaths in France from the disease since its first appearance to the close of last week was 4376. The correspondent of the Times cables that in Italy the situation is alarming, and it is made doubly so by the brutal ignorance of the peasantry, who stone the doctors in the streets and refuse to go to the hospitals. It seems probable that the epidemic will make terrible havoc in Italy before the year closes.

The Work of Destroying the Fortifications of Foo Chow was completed last week by the French fleet. The torpedoes in the river, upon which the Chinese based their hopes, were fished up, and the guns in the batteries were exploded with gun-cotton. The loss to China is serious, Foo Chow being the chief arsenal of the country. The government buildings, arms, and ammunition destroyed cost forty million dollars. The next step in the French programme has not yet been indicated. It is, however, thought probable that negotiations for the payment of the indemnity of sixteen million dollars, demanded by France, will be resumed, and that China will pay, to avoid further disasters. War has not yet been formally declared by either party.

The Angry Attitude of France Toward England is maintained. It manifests itself in the press, but there are indications that it is not shared by the government. The resentment about the Egyptian business has been increased by the unfavorable criticisms which the English papers have published on the bombardment of Foo Chow. The French are indignant because the London Times published a detailed report from its correspondent of the bombardment and its attendant horrors. The French admiral was probably not aware that his proceedings were being watched by a trained newspaper correspondent, who published to the whole world the story of the firing on the sinking vessels and the defenceless villages. The French newspapers reply to the English strictures by retorts on the bombardment of Alexandria. Public opinion in Europe, especially in Germany, Austria, and Russia is on the side of France in the quarrel. That there is justice in the English view of the war is, however, manifest, for General Millot, the commander of the French forces in Tonquin, admits the attack on Lang-son ought not to have been made. He states, in his official report, that the French colonel in command acted precipitately, and that China was probably under a misapprehension as to the date on which the treaty went into operation. That, too, is the Chinese version of the difficulty, which has involved the war.

The Expedition for the Relief of General Gordon will be led by General Lord Wolseley. It is understood that the change of commanders is caused by the opposition of the generals in Egypt to the plan of the campaign sketched by Lord Wolseley. Acting under his advice, the government ordered the expedition to proceed by the Nile route. General Stephenson, who is in Egypt, declared that the route was impracticable, and advised that the expedition go by way of Suakim and Berber. Under those circumstances General Wolseley expressed his readiness to lead the expedition by the Nile route, and the government, realizing the necessity for prompt and decisive action, promptly seized the opportunity of sending England's best general to the scene of action. The failure of the Conference and the animosity displayed toward England throughout Europe has aroused the Gladstone administration to unwonted vigor. Ten thousand English soldiers are already in Egypt, and five thousand more are on their way there.

The Agitation against the British House of Lords is being vigorously pressed. Mr. Gladstone has gone to Scotland to address his constituents. His tour there is expected to equal in its effects his famous campaign before his present advent to power. Edinburgh gave him an ovation on August 30th of a most enthusiastic character. The city was lavishly decorated for his reception, and a meeting of five thousand citizens gathered to welcome him. Mr. Gladstone there defined his attitude on the Constitutional question now prominent. He said he hoped the House of Lords would listen to reason and end the conflict. He was reluctant to enter upon the question of reform in the House of Lords until it was found to be absolutely necessary. The Franchise bill sufficed to engross his whole attention. He was not averse to the admixture of hereditary principle in the constitution, but those placing it in direct conflict with the elected Chamber were its worse enemies. He strongly denied the right of the House of Lords to decide when to appeal to the country. The admittance of such a principle was treason to British liberty. He would rather abandon his share in the Franchise bill and with it his share in political life than to sanction such an innovation.

An Important Proposal is Awakening Much interest in England. It is advocated by several prominent statesmen, and is received with favor by politicians not usually friendly to radical changes. Lord Rosebery, who is an intimate friend of Mr. Gladstone, has recently returned from Australia, where he was impressed with the necessity of closer relations being formed between England and her colonies. He gave expression to his views, and suggested the scheme of granting the colonies representatives in the Imperial Parliament. A meeting was held in London recently to consider the question, when prominent members of both the political parties spoke favorably of the scheme. A resolution was passed declaring that federation was "indispensable to avert disintegration and secure the unity of the empire."

Christian Tourists Intending to Visit Europe may be interested in learning how much good is being done by the distribution of the Bible and religious literature there by visitors. A clergyman writes that a friend of his while at a fair in France fell in with a giddy and dissipated young man, in whose hand he placed a Bible. The young fellow not only read his Bible, but studied it and became a new creature. Now he has opened a mission hall, where such a thing was formerly unheard of; and who knows where the results of this simple action of presenting a Bible will end? A farmer, who had become a convert through the same humble means, had his house burned down. In building a new dwelling, he went to the expense of adding to it a hall wherein his neighbors may assemble to listen to the truths he himself has found so precious.

CAPTAIN CYRUS STURDIVANT, THE TEMPERANCE PRISON PHILANTHROPIST.

CAPTAIN CYRUS STURDIVANT.

THE PRISONERS' FRIEND.

His Favorite Work—Not a Financial Success—Rescue of Eminent People — Early Life—A Drunkard's Staying-Place—First Temperance Prayer-Meetings—First Jail Service—A Violent Prisoner—A Convict Father—A Dishonest Lover—Mighty Glad to Die—A Kiss in Payment — A Temperance Marriage — Still at Work.

CAPTAIN CYRUS STURDIVANT, whose portrait appears on the first page, is a man who has taken literally the injunction to go into the prisons with the message of the Gospel. Much of his Gospel temperance work has been done in churches and halls and schoolhouses, for he is ready to speak anywhere and everywhere the glad tidings of the Gospel, and the hope that total abstinence brings to the slaves of liquor. But the prison is his favorite sphere. He has spoken in the corridors, the chapels, or the separate cells as he could gain permission, and many a man now living a godly, socially respectable life, working for Christ and leading others to Him, dates the turning-point of his career to a day when Captain Sturdivant, entering the jail where he was confined, grasped his hand, called him brother, and told him there was hope before him. Many and many a time, before some large audience, some man, well-dressed and intelligent, has walked to the platform, and, seizing the captain's hand, has said, in a voice broken with tears, "I was in prison and you visited me."

is not an inviting one. It is not a sphere in which fortunes can be made; the converts have no cottages to give away; the worker in that sphere has no opportunity of making lucrative contracts of so many dollars for so many speeches, and it is no use taking up a collection at the close of the meeting; but it is the sphere, above all others, in which Gospel temperance is needed. There may be found not only "the burnt children who dread the fire," but those who are thankful to be taught how to avoid the fire for the future. It is a work rich in spiritual results, but a very barren field for all who make the dollar an important object of their labors. Dollars are scarce in the prisons, but Captain Sturdivant and his friends have found jewels there, which through their pleading and prayers will one day glisten in the Saviour's crown. Captain Sturdivant, at sixty-five, is still comparatively a poor man; men who do the kind of work he has done, are generally poor; but he is rich in the gratitude of the rescued and in the blessings of those who were ready to perish when he found them, and pointed them to the Friend of sinners, whose example he has tried to follow.

Captain Sturdivant has been the means of rescuing many slaves of liquor who have since become famous in temperance work, and who have been very successful. Among the most prominent of these is Mr. Francis Murphy, the prosperous temperance lecturer, who is well known in New York and other States, and who made a successful campaign on the other side the Atlantic. Mr. Murphy was in a prison in Maine when Captain Sturdivant visited him and taught him the value of total abstinence. His portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 7th, this year.

EARLY YEARS.

Cyrus Sturdivant was born at Cumberland, Me., in 1819, sixty-five years ago. His father was captain of a small cutter in the United States service, and was a man of that kind, frank, generous disposition which frequently characterizes sailors. The boy was fifteen years of age when, attending a revival service, he was converted, and joined the church under the pastorate of the late Rev. Joshua Taylor. His father was anxious that he should have a good education, and sent him to Kent's Hill Seminary, where tuition was at that time of the best in New England. But the boy was pining for a seafaring life, and how could a sailor's heart refuse him the boon he craved? After two terms at Kent's Hill, Cyrus hadhisway; he entere don the life of a sailor as in the vessel his father commanded. His experience of the sea is best told in his own simple, unaffected words: "Serving as cabin-boy on board this small vessel for several years increased my desire for a sailor's life. After my father resigned his position as master of the cutter I went on board a packet schooner, plying between Portland and Boston, and continued for a few years, serving in the position of deck-hand and mate. My father, seeing my bent of mind, purchased for me a vessel suitable for the packeting and coasting business, and put me in command, procuring for me the services of an experienced man for mate.

"I continued in command of several sailing vessels and packets until I was invited by a new steamboat company to take charge of a propeller steamer; and I continued in command of this propeller, the Commodore Preble, for seven years, plying between the cities of Portland and Boston. When the California gold fever first broke out, the Commodore Preble was sold to parties in New York to take passengers to that new country, and our steamboat company purchased a side-wheel steamer, the John Marshall, and put me in command of her. In the summer season, on the coasts of Maine and Massachusetts, we have considerable foggy, although moderate, weather; but in the fall and winter and spring we often have severe gales and rough weather. I have been in trying and critical positions several times, when it would seem almost impossible to ride out the gale in safety. But He who holds the winds in His fists was our friend and deliverer, and we were brought out of trouble and danger.

"I continued as master of different steamers belonging to the Portland Steam Packet Company for several years; but, finding the life was producing unhealthy symptoms in my constitution, I was advised by my physician to engage in some other kind of business; and as soon as a good opportunity presented itself for business on shore, I availed myself of it."

Being now in business in the city of Portland, Me., CaptainSturdivant joined aChristian church and sought opportunities of usefulness. The one to which he now looks back with the greatest pleasure was

THE ALLEN MISSION.

The church with which he was connected took the work in hand of starting a mission Sunday-school of their own. Having at this time a pastor named Charles F. Allen, who favored the work, they named the new organization the Allen Mission. The first service was held in a small hall on Franklin Street, which was furnished and fitted up by the Sunday-school, and dedicated to the home mission work. After the expiration of only a few weeks from the dedication, the terrible fire of 1866 occurred at Portland, commencing July 4th, in which the Allen Mission Hall was burned. But the work was not abandoned. A tent was erected for the services, and afterward, when winter came on, the chapel of the jail was placed at the disposal of the workers, and service was held for two hours on each Sabbath afternoon.

"After occupying the chapel of the jail for a few months," says Captain Sturdivant, "the school increased in numbers so rapidly that it was thought advisable to purchase or lease a lot of land, and to erect thereon a suitable chapel for our mission services and work. In a short time these plans were carried into effect, and a chapel was erected, which would seat comfortably about five hundred persons, and it was dedicated and called the Allen Mission. I was made superintendent and treasurer. God has made the Allen Mission the birthplace of many souls; and poor and hungry and ragged children, and also men and women have been here clothed and fed, and started on the way to sobriety and religion. My heart beats with gratitude to God when I look back and see all the way He has led us in our work at the Allen Mission. To Him be all the glory and honor.

"Among the many children who were there helped was eleven years of age, who had a father cursed by intoxicating drinks, who said himself that he had seen but few days for nine years when he was free from the power of strong drink. This daughter of his seemed delighted with the Sunday-school and her teacher; but in a few weeks she was taken ill (not dangerously), and I learning the fact, called one stormy Sunday to see her. She was sitting in a chair as we entered the staying-place of this drunkard's family. We had taken with us some fruit and other articles suitable for the invalid girl, and made known the purpose of our visit to the father, who was then under the influence of strong drink. After a little conversation we asked for the privilege of praying before we left. The father replied: 'You can pray, if you like; we are not used to that business here.' We bowed before God, and earnestly besought His blessing upon the sick girl, and upon the other children, and upon the mother and father also, and, before we left, the father and mother both promised to start in a new and better life; and ere the week closed, the heretofore inebriate father signed the Allen Mission total abstinence pledge, and he, with his wife, came to the altar, and by true repentance sought and found the pardon of their sins, and commenced a life of sobriety and religion. This brother for several years has taken care of the mission chapel, and has also been an active member in the Portland Reform Club, and its chaplain for several terms.

"The conversion of these parents, and their increasing happiness consequent thereon, gave us new courage in our home mission work—and from that time forward we had very much to cheer us—the numbers of attendants to our Sunday-school and other religious services constantly increasing, so it was thought best to have more frequent services; and in our work and visits among the poor and the outcasts, we were convinced more than ever before that the curse and evil of intemperance was producing more poverty and distress, degradation and sinfulness, than all other evils; and that God alone could give the needed wisdom and strength to help us in our efforts in 'rescuing the perishing and lifting up the fallen.' We arranged a temperance pledge, to which in a few months we procured about four thousand signatures. The pledge was introduced into all our religious services as an important part. This temperance interest increasing, we deemed it best to appoint a Gospel temperance meeting, this being the first one of the kind we had ever heard of. At our first Gospel we had only eight persons in attendance. Those meetings in a few weeks became quite notorious in the community, and scores and hundreds came to them to sign the pledge, and many of them were found at the altar seeking the pardon and blessing of God.

"In September, 1870, the sheriff or warden who had the oversight of situated not far from our mission chapel, came to me and desired to know if I was willing to conduct some religious services at the jail on the afternoon of each Sabbath, he being convinced that such services might result in good to the inmates; he desiring me, also, to choose such associate brethren and sisters as I might deem best. After a little time for reflection and consultation with those earnest co-workers, I agreed to assume the responsibility, and trust in God for results. During the intervening week we took from our mission chapel a number of settees, to be placed in the corridors of the jail for the accommodation of the prisoners as they came out of their cells to join with us in our worship; and on the following Sabbath we were at the jail at the hour appointed, 5 P.M. Our services were social—reading of the Scriptures, prayer, and song, with short relations of Christian experience, and earnest and warm-hearted appeals to the prisoners to seek after the pardon and love of Christ. Near the close we presented the total abstinence pledge, and then gave the opportunity for any who desired to be prayed for, to manifest it by rising up. At this first service about one third of the prisoners present (all the prisoners in the jail did not attend this service) arose and stood upon their feet, after which we all bowed in prayer, and the services were closed. It was during these services and in this prison that Francis Murphy was induced to quit his drunken habits.

A VIOLENT PRISONER.

"While the services were in progress in this prison we found a man among the inmates of the jail by name of Plunkett, who had been committed for abusing his wife while under the influence of intoxicating drink, and he having become so violent, it was thought best, for the real safety of his wife and children, thus to commit him for the term of sixty days. He came into our religious services on Sabbath afternoon, and was struck under conviction, on account of his sins, bowed his will to the will of Christ, and was truly converted to God. He remained in jail for several weeks after his conversion, and took part in the religious exercises, and gave good evidence of a real change of heart. After having served out his time in the jail he returned to his home, erected at once a family altar, and took his children to Sunday-school and to church, and soon became a member of the church, taking active part in all church work. He put glass in the window frames, where old hats and rags had poorly supplied its place; put new hinges on the doors of the barn and other buildings; and the yard in front of his house was re-fenced, and the general appearance of his house was wonderfully improved, the former staying-place of the drunkard became the happy home of the Christian, and the fearful wife and children became the happy inmates of a God-renovated house.

A CONVICT FATHER.

"Among the prisoners at the county jail who found his way there through the terrible effects of intemperance, was a young man of more than ordinary ability. He had a beautiful and accomplished wife and a sweet little daughter, four years of age. But the habit of using strong drink had fastened upon him its terrible grasp, and made him abusive and cruel to her he promised to love, cherish, and protect. So cruel he became, that his wife's father took her and her little daughter to his own home; but while this young man was paying his penalty for transgressing the law, he was induced to sign the total abstinence pledge, and became a better man; and after coming out from his prison, he lived such a correct life that his wife consented to live with him again. Our Mission helped them to start anew in housekeeping; and, accordingly, one evening, made them a surprise call, and took with us articles of furniture and other things useful in housekeeping; and the occasion was one of real pleasure to the givers as well as the recipients.

A CONVICT LOVER.

"One other young man was in the jail for the theft of a yoke of oxen. He was only a moderate drinker, but it took all his spare money to maintain this habit. He had fallen in love with a young lady, and wished to makes her some valuable present. But having no money, and with brain turned bad by strong drink, he took a neighbor's yoke of oxen and sold them to obtain money to purchase the desired present. He was arrested and put into jail. After being in prison a while, as his father thought long enough to punish him sufficiently, he was released by his father paying the bill for the stolen oxen and other expenses. This young man, while in jail, signed the total abstinence pledge and became a converted man.

'MIGHTY GLAD TO DIE!'

"One day I was riding near the suburbs of the city, and when near to a cross-road that led to a shipyard, I discovered two small girls coming toward me, each with a basket of chips which they had gathered for fuel. One of the girls belonged to our Mission, a very bright and intelligent Scotch girl, whose father was a drunkard. I offered the children a ride to the city. The little Scotch girl's mother had been ill for a long time; consequently, my first inquiry of Rosa was:

"'How is your mother to-day?'

"Looking me sorrowfully in the face, she quickly replied:

"'Mother is dead, and was buried yesterday.'

"I said: 'You surprise me; how did she feel about dying, Rosa?'

"She replied. 'Oh, she was mighty glad to die!'

"'Well, what did she say about leaving you, Rosa?'

"'Mother said the Lord would take care of me.'

"What a world of misery was revealed to my mind in that pregnant reply, 'She was mighty glad to die!'"

The year 1877 was a year of many business changes in all the States. Those who had been rich became poor, and many who were struggling for a bare living became dependents on charity. Even the most prosperous were crippled in their financial resources. Captain Sturdivant early in the year found that all his savings were gone and it was necessary to begin life anew. While he was looking around for an opportunity, he thought he might be doing some work for Christ and the cause he loved. Temperance meetings were in progress in Philadelphia, and he went there to render what assistance he could. Francis Murphy was there, and his connection with Captain Sturdivant made the latter an object of interest at once, and he soon took a prominent part in the meetings.

A KISS IN PAYMENT.

A touching incident occurred in Philadelphia, which the captain thus relates: "One morning a drinking man left his home in Camden, N. J., to come to Philadelphia to seek employment. His wife had been dead for some years, his daughter living at home; and as her father left the house she said to him:

"'Pa, I hope you won't come home intoxicated to-night.'

"The father came across the ferry. The appeal of his daughter touched him. He called at several places, asking for employment, and was unsuccessful. He thought he would try for employment in a drinking saloon, as in former years he had been a bartender. Here he received an offer, the man giving him ten dollars in advance, and he was to commence his services the next day. He had a friend and old comrade in the Post-office, whom he called to see, to ask advice about accepting the offer to tend bar. That friend had gone to the temperance meeting at the Annex. The Camden man went to the Annex meeting, and hearing Francis Murphy and others talking about the joys of total abstinence, and the power of God's grace to save and to keep, went forward with others and took the pledge.

"That evening the man returned to his home, and on his way called at the saloon and told the barkeeper he had signed the total abstinence pledge, and could not serve him, handing him at the same time the ten dollars which was advanced to him in the morning. Arriving at his home, he was met by his affectionate daughter, who asked him if he had procured any employment, and answered, 'No, daughter; but I have got something better—I have the pledge, and have signed it, and by God's help I will never break it.' The motherless girl expressed her joy as best she could, while her father told her of his eventful visit to the temperance meeting, and said, 'I saw Mr. Murphy and shook hands with him, and I also saw the man who, under God, encouraged Mr. Murphy to start in his new life.' The little daughter replied: 'I would like to see Mr. Murphy and the man who befriended him.' Her father was at the Annex meeting the next day, and said to me: 'My little daughter would like very much to see Brother Murphy and yourself (she has no clothes suitable to come over here to meeting at present); she wants to give you a kiss.' Mr. Murphy's duties kept him so closely at the Annex meetings he could not leave; but as it had been already announced for me to speak at Camden, I told the father I would be at the church early, and would be glad to see his little daughter and receive the proffered kiss.

"Arriving at the church in good season, I found the father, with his little daughter by his side, ready for an introduction to me, and before the introduction was fairly finished, I received a warm kiss upon my lips, not from a little girl of six years, as I supposed her previously to be, but from a young lady of eighteen summers, who thus expressed her gratitude to God for having made me the means of helping Francis Murphy to a better life under God, and he influencing her dear father to become a good man. This reformed man at once entered the Gospel Temperance field as a speaker and laborer, and is still doing good service for poor fallen humanity."

A TEMPERANCE MARRIAGE.

From Philadelphia Captain Sturdivant went to Pittsburg and Allegheny City. "During these series of meetings," says Captain Sturdivant, "a man, who had been separated from his wife for several years—they both being in the habit of drinking to excess—came forward and signed the total abstinence pledge. He soon began to realize that he had some manhood left, and became more strong in his will to keep the pledge and also convinced his help must come from God. He thought of his wife, and told me a few days after his conversion that he would find her, if possible, and persuade her to come to the meetings and sign the pledge. One evening soon after, as I was about among the audience, inviting persons to come forward and sign the pledge, I discovered this man, and speaking to him, asked if his wife was present. He replied, 'Yes, this is her.' I being introduced, asked her if she would sign the pledge. After hesitating a moment, she with her husband and myself, standing in front of the table on which lay the pledges, tremblingly took the pen and affixed her name to the pledge. I then said to them: 'Is it your desire and determination, each of you, by God's help, to keep these vows as long as you live; and do you also desire to live together again as man and wife? If so, please join hands.' I will assure you they were not long in joining hands, and I hope hearts also, and we bowed at once before Almighty God and asked Him to seal these vows thus made in the presence of His people, and to keep them both unto the end of life free from the curse of strong drink. During that novel renewal of marriage vows hundreds of handkerchiefs in the congregation were in use, arresting the falling tears."

Captain Sturdivant in this work, with characteristic self-forgetfulness, overlooked his primary object in travelling to Pennsylvania. He went there to find an opportunity of engaging in business; but in the work of saving souls and in rescuing and raising the fallen, his own interests were forgotten. They do not appear to have ever been remembered since. From that time to this, applications for his services have flowed in upon him, and he has been continually engaged in his beloved work. It may be well to state, for the benefit of temperance societies, that as he is travelling from place to place, he is not easily found by people seeking him. He has therefore arranged to have his letters sent to 805 Broadway, New York, whence they are forwarded to him wherever he may be.

ORDINARY PEOPLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, September 7, 1884.

[Dr. Talmage preached in the Brooklyn Tabernacle on Sunday morning last for the first time after his summer vacation. Although many of the members of the congregation have not yet returned from the country, the usual immense throng filled the church, numbers of strangers making up for the lack of regular attendants. The building has been undergoing repairs, and some important mechanical improvements have been made in the great organ, which increase its volume of sound. Dr. Talmage looked as well and vigorous as ever.]

Matthew Henry, Albert Barnes, Adam Clark, Thomas Scott, and all the commentators pass by these verses without any especial remark. The other twenty people mentioned in the chapter were distinguished for something, and were therefore discussed by the illustrious expositors; but nothing is said about Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, Philologus and Julia. Where were they born? No one knows. When did they die? There is no record of their decease. For what were they distinguished? Absolutely for nothing, or the trait of character would have been brought out by the apostle. If they had been very intrepid, or opulent, or hirsute, or musical of cadence, or crass of style, or in any wise anomalous, that feature would have been caught by the apostolic camera. But they were because Paul sends to them his high Christian regards. They were ordinary people, moving in ordinary sphere, attending to ordinary duty, and meeting ordinary responsibilities.

What the world wants is a religion for ordinary people. If there be in the United States 55,000,000 people, there are certainly not more than 1,000,000 extraordinary; and then there are 54,000,000 ordinary, and we do well to turn our backs for a little while upon the distinguished and conspicuous people of the Bible and consider in our text the seven ordinary. We spend too much of our time in twisting garlands for remarkables, and building thrones for magnates, and sculpturing warriors, and apotheosizing philanthropists. The rank and file of the Lord's soldiery need especial help.

The vast majority of people to whom this sermon comes, either by voice or type, will never lead an army, will never write a State constitution, will never electrify a Senate, will never make an important invention, will never introduce a new philosophy, will never decide the fate of a nation. You do not expect to; you do not want to. You will not be a Moses to lead a nation out of bondage. You will not be a Joshua to prolong the daylight until you can shut five kings in a cavern. You will not be a St. John to unroll an Apocalypse. You will not be a Paul to preside over an apostolic college. You will not be a Mary to mother a Christ. You will more probably be Asyncritus, or Phlegon, or Hermas, or Patrobas, or Hermes, or Philologus, or Julia.

Many of you are women at

THE HEAD OF HOUSEHOLDS.

This morning you launched the family for Sabbath observance. Your brain decided the apparel, and your judgment was final in all questions of personal attire. Every morning you plan for the day. The culinary department of the household is in your dominion. You decide all questions of diet. All the sanitary regulations of your house are under your supervision. To regulate the food, and the apparel, and the habits, and decide the thousand questions of home life is a tax upon brain and nerve and general health absolutely appalling, if there be no divine alleviation.

It does not help you much to be told that Elizabeth Fry did wonderful things amid the criminals of Newgate. It does not help you much to be told that Mrs. Judson was very brave among the Bornesian cannibals. It does not help you very much to be told that Florence Nightingale was very kind to the wounded in the Crimea. It would be better for me to tell you that the divine friend of Mary and Martha is your friend, and that He sees all the annoyances and disappointments and abrasions and exasperations of an ordinary housekeeper from morn till night and from the first day of the year to the last day of the year, and at your call He is ready with help and re-enforcement.

They who provide the food of the world decide the health of the world. One of the greatest battles of this century was lost because the commander that morning had a fit of indigestion. You have only to go on some errand amid the taverns and the hotels of the United States and Great Britain to appreciate the fact that a vast multitude of the human race are slaughtered by incompetent cookery. Though a young woman may have taken lessons in music, and may have taken lessons in painting, and lessons in astronomy, she is not well educated unless she has taken lessons in dough! They who decide the apparel of the world and the food of the world decide the endurance of the world.

An unthinking man may consider it a matter of little importance—the cares of the household and the economies of domestic life—but I tell you the earth is strewn with and nursery. The health-shattered womanhood of America cries out for a God who can help ordinary women in the ordinary duties of housekeeping. The wearing, grinding, unappreciated work goes on, but the same Christ who stood on the bank of Galilee in the early morning and kindled the fire and had the fish already cleaned and broiling when the sportsmen stepped ashore chilled and hungry, will help every woman to prepare breakfast, whether by her own hand, or the hand of her hired help. The God who made indestructible eulogy of Hannah, who made a coat for Samuel, her son, and carried it to the temple every year, will help every woman in preparing the family wardrobe. The God who opens the Bible with the story of Abraham's entertainment of the three angels on the plains of Mamre will help every woman to provide hospitality, however rare and embarrassing. It is high time that some of the attention we have been giving to the remarkable women of the Bible—remarkable for their virtue, or their want of it, or remarkable for their deeds—Deborah and Jezebel, and Herodias and Athalia, and Dorcas and the Marys, excellent and abandoned—it is high time some of the attention we have been giving to these conspicuous women of the Bible be given to Julia of the text, an ordinary woman, amid ordinary circumstances, attending to ordinary duties, and meeting ordinary responsibilities.

Then there are all the

ORDINARY BUSINESS MEN.

They need divine and Christian help. When we begin to talk about business life we shoot right off and talk about men who did business on a large scale, and who sold millions of dollars of goods a year; and the vast majority of business men do not sell a million dollars of goods, nor half a million, nor quarter of a million, nor the eighth part of a million. Put all the business men of our cities, towns, villages, and neighborhoods side by side, and you will find that they sell less than fifty thousand dollars worth of goods. All these men in ordinary business life want divine help. You see how the wrinkles are printing on the countenance the story of worriment and care. You cannot tell how old a business man is by looking at him. Gray hairs at thirty. A man at forty-five with the stoop of a nonogenarian. No time to attend to improved dentistry, the grinders cease because they are few. Actually dying of or fifty, when they ought to be at the meridian. Many of these business men have bodies like a neglected clock to which you come, and you wind it up, and it begins to buzz and roar, and then the hands start around very rapidly, and then the clock strikes five, or ten, or forty, and strikes without any sense, and then suddenly stops. So is the body of that worn-out business man. It is a neglected clock, and though by some summer recreation it may be wound up still the machinery is all out of gear. The hand turn around with a velocity that excites the astonishment of the world. Man cannot understand the wonderful activity, and there is a roar and a buzz, and a rattle about these disordered lives, and they strike ten when they ought to strike five, and they strike twelve when they ought to strike six, and they strke forty when they ought to strike nothing, and suddenly they stop. Post-mortem examination reveals the fact that all the springs, and pivots, and weights and balance-wheels of health are completely deranged. The human clock has simply run down. And at the time when the steady hand ought to be pointing to the industrious hour on a clear and sunlit dial the whole machinery of body, mind, and earthly capacity stops forever. Greenwood has thousands of New York and Brooklyn business men who died of old age at thirty, thirty-five, forty, forty-five.

Now, what is wanted is grace—divine grace for ordinary business men, men who are harnessed from morn till night and all the days of their life—harnessed in business. Not grace to lose a hundred thousand, but grace to lose ten dollars. Not grace to supervise two hundred and fifty employés in a factory, but grace to supervise the book-keeper, and two salesmen, and the small boy that sweeps out the store. Grace to invest not the eighty thousand dollars of net profit, but the twenty-five hundred of clear gain. Grace not to endure the loss of a whole shiploa of spices from the Indies, but grace to endure the loss of a paper of collars from the leakage of a displaced shingle on a poor roof. Grace not to endure the tardiness of the American Congress in passing a necessary law, but grace to endure the tardiness of an errand boy stopping to play marbles when he ought to deliver the goods. Such a grace as thousands of business men have to-day—keeping them tranquil whether goods sell or do not sell, whether customers pay or do not pay, whether tariff is up or tariff is down, whether the crops are luxuriant or a dead failure—calm in all circumstance and amid all vicissitudes. That is the kind of grace we want. Millions of men want it, and they may have it for the asking. Some comes to town, and as the procession passes through the street the business men come out and stand on tiptoe on their store step and look at some one who in Arctic clime, or in ocean storm, or in day of battle, or in hospital agonies did the brave thing, not realizing that they, the enthusiastic spectators, have gone through trials in business life that are just as great before God. There are men who have gone through freezing Arctics, and burning torrids, and awful Marengoes of experiences without moving five miles from their doorstep. Now, what ordinary business men need is to realize that they have the friendship of that Christ who looked after the religious interests of Matthew, the custom-house clerk, and helped Lydia, of Thyatira, to sell the dry goods, and who opened a bakery and fish-market in the wilderness of Asia Minor to feed the seven thousand who had come out on a religious picnic, and who counts the hairs of your head with as much particularity as though they were the plumes of a coronation, and who took the trouble to stoop down with His finger writing on the ground, although the first shuffle of feet obliterated the divine caligraphy, and who knows just how many locusts there were in the Egyptian plague, and knew just how many ravens were necessary to supply Elijah's pantry by the brook Cherith, and who, as floral commander, leads forth all the regiments of primroses, foxgloves, daffodils, hyacinths, and lilies which pitch their tents of beauty and kindle their camp-fires of color all around the hemisphere—that that Christ and that God knows the most minute affairs of your business life and however inconsiderable, understanding all the affairs of that woman who keeps a thread-and-needle store as well as all the affairs of a Rothschild and a Baring.

Then there are all the

ORDINARY FARMERS.

We talk about agricultural life, and we immediately shoot off to talk about Cincinnatus, the patrician, who went from the plough to a high position, and after he got through the dictatorship in twenty-one days went back again to the plough. What encouragement is that to ordinary farmers? The vast majority of them—none of them will be patricians. Perhaps none of them will be Senators. If any of them have dictatorships it will be over forty, or fifty, or a hundred acres of the old homestead. What those men want is grace to keep their patience while ploughing with balky oxen, and to keep cheerful amid the drought that destroys the corn crop, and that enables them to restore the garden the day after the neighbor's cattle have broken in and trampled out the strawberry bed, and gone through the Lima-bean patch, and eaten up the sweet corn in such large quantities that they must be kept from the water lest they swell up and die.

GRACE IN CATCHING WEATHER

that enables them, without imprecation, to spread out the hay the third time, although again and again and again it has been almost ready for the mow. A grace to doctor the cow with a hollow horn, and the sheep with the foot rot, and the horse with the distemper, and to compel the unwilling acres to yield a livelihood for the family, and schooling for the children, and little extras to help the older boy in business, and something for the daughter's wedding outfit, and a little surplus for the time when the ankles will get stiff with age, and the breath will be a little short, and the swinging of the cradle through the hot harvest-field will bring on the old man's vertigo. Better close up about Cincinnatus. I know five hundred farmers just as noble as he was.

What they want is to know that they have the friendship of that Christ who often drew His similes from the farmer's life, as when He said: "A sower went forth to sow;" as when He built His best parable out of the scene of a farmer's boy coming back from his wanderings, and the old farmhouse shook that night with rural jubilee; and who compared Himself to a lamb in the pasture field, and who said that the eternal God is a farmer, declaring: "My Father is the husbandman."

Those stone masons do not want to hear about Christopher Wren, the architect, who built St. Paul's Cathedral. It would be better to tell them how to carry the hod of brick up the ladder without slipping, and how on a cold morning with the trowel to smooth off the mortar and keep cheerful, and how to be thankful to God for the plain food taken from the pail by the roadside. Carpenters standing amid the adze, and the bit, and the plane, and the broad axe need to be told that Christ was a carpenter, with His own hand wielding saw and hammer. Oh, this is and it is an overworked world, and it is an underfed world, and it is a wrung-out world, and men and women need to know that there is rest and recuperation in God and in that religion which was not so much intended for extraordinary people as for ordinary people, because there are more of them.

The healing profession has had its Abercrombies, and its Abernethys, and its Valentine Motts, and its Willard Parkers; but the

do the most of the world's medicining, and they need to understand that while taking diagnosis or prognosis, or writing prescription, or compounding medicament, or holding the delicate pulse of a dying child they may have the presence and the dictation of the Almighty Doctor who took the case of the madman, and, after he had torn off his garments in foaming dementia, clothed him again, body and mind, and who lifted up the woman who for eighteen years had been bent almost double with the rheumatism into graceful stature, and who turned the scabs of leprosy into rubicund complexion, and who rubbed the numbness out of paralysis, and who swung wide open the closed windows of hereditary or accidental blindness, until the morning light came streaming through the fleshly casements, and who knows all the diseases, and all the remedies, and all the herbs, and all the catholicons, and is monarch of pharmacy and therapeutics, and who has sent out ten thousand doctors of whom the world makes no record; but to prove that they are angels of mercy, I invoke the thousands of men whose ailments they have assuaged and the thousands of women to whom in crises of pain they have been next to God in benefaction.

Come, now, let us have a religion for ordinary people in professions, in occupations, in agriculture, in the household, in merchandise, in everything. I salute across the centuries Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, Philologus, and Julia.

First of all, if you feel that you are ordinary, that you are not extraordinary. I am tired, and sick, and bored almost to death with extraordinary people. They take all their time to tell us how very extraordinary they really are. You know as well as I do, my brother and sister, that the most of the useful work of the world is done by unpretentious people who toil right on—by people who do not get much approval, and no one seems to say, "that is well done.' Phenomena are of but little use. Things that are exceptional cannot be depended on. Better trust the smallest planet that swings in its orbit than ten comets shooting this way and that, imperilling the longevity of worlds attending to their own business. For steady illumination better is a lamp than a rocket. Then, if you feel that you are ordinary, remember that your position invites the less attack.

THANK GOD

CONSPICUOUS PEOPLE

—how they have to take it! How they are misrepresented, and abused, and shot at! The higher the horns of a roebuck the easier to track him down. What a delicious thing it must be to be a candidate for President of the United States! It must be so soothing to the nerves! It must pour into the souls of a candidate such a sense of serenity when he reads the blessed newspapers!

I came last week into the possession of the abusive cartoons in the time of Napoleon I., printed while he was yet alive. The retreat of the army from Moscow, that army buried in the snows of Russia, one of the most awful tragedies of the centuries, represented under the figure of a monster called General Frost shaving the French Emperor with a razor of icicle. As Satyr and Beelzebub he is represented, page after page, page after page. England cursing him, Spain cursing him, Germany cursing him, Russia cursing him, Europe cursing him, North and South America cursing him. The most remarkable man of his day, and the most abused. All those men in history who now have a halo around their name, on earth wore a crown of thorns. Take the few of our time, and see what abuse comes upon them, while thousands of stockholders escape. New York Central Railroad has 9265 stockholders. If anything in that railroad affronts the people all the abuse comes down on one man, and the 9264 escape. All the world took after Thomas Scott, President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, abused him until he got under the ground. Over 17,000 stockholders in that company. All the blame on one man! The Central Pacific Railroad—two or three men get all the blame if anything goes wrong. There are 10,000 in that company.

I mention these things to prove it is extraordinary people who get abused while the ordinary escape. The weather of life is not so severe on the plain as it is on the high peaks. The world never forgives a man who knows, or gains, or does more than it can know, or gain, or do. Parents sometimes give confectionery to their children as an inducement to take bitter medicine, and the world's sugar-plum precedes the world's aqua-fortis. The mob cried in regard to Christ, "Crucify Him, crucify Him!" and they had to say it twice to be understood, for they were so hoarse, and they got their hoarseness by crying a little while before at the top of their voice, "Hosanna!" The river Rhone is foul when it enters Lake Leman, but crystalline when it comes out on the other side. But there are men who have entered the bright lake of worldly prosperity crystalline and came out terribly riled. If, therefore, you feel that you are ordinary, thank God for the defences and the tranquillity of your position.

Then remember, if you have only what is called that the great deliverers of the world have all come from such a home. And there may be seated, reading at your evening stand, a child who shall be potent for the ages. Just unroll the scroll of men mighty in church and state, and you will find they nearly all came from log cabin or poor homes. Genius almost always runs out in the third or fourth generation. You cannot find in all history an instance where the fourth generation of extraordinary people amount to anything. In this country we had two great men, father and son, both Presidents of the United States; but from present prospects there never will be in that genealogical line another President for a thousand years. Columbus from a weaver's hut, Demosthenes from a cutler's celler, Bloomfield and Missionary Carey from a shoemaker's bench, Arkwright from a barber's shop, and He, whose name is high over all in earth, and air, and sky, from a manger.

Let us all

with such things as we have. God is just as good in what He keeps away from us as in what He gives us. Even a knot may be useful if it is at the end of a thread.

A DEAF MUTE'S ANSWER.

At an anniversary of a deaf and dumb asylum one of the children wrote upon the blackboard words as sublime as the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the "Divina Comedia" all compressed in one paragraph. The examiner, in the signs of the mute language, asked her: "Who made the world?" The deaf and dumb girl wrote upon the blackboard, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." The examiner asked her, "For what purpose did Christ come into the world?" The deaf and dumb girl wrote upon the blackboard: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." The examiner said to her, "Why were you born deaf and dumb, while I hear and speak?" She wrote upon the blackboard: "Even so, Father; for so it seemeth good in thy sight." Oh, that we might be baptized with a contented spirit! The spider draws poison out of a flower, the bee gets honey out of a thistle; but happiness is a heavenly elixir, and the contented spirit extracts it not from the rhododendron of the hills, but from the lily of the valley,

THE GOSPEL AMONG AUSTRALIAN NATIVES.

THE Rev. J. R. Gribble has just told the story of the Warangesela Mission to the aborigines of New South Wales, in which heroic and successful work God has abundantly blessed him. The following are interesting incidents which he gives referring to those who are "fallen asleep in Jesus."

was, when I found her in the camp, a most pitiable object; but under Christian training she soon exhibited some most attractive traits of character. First of all she was led to see herself a lost sinner. She showed every sign of a true repentance, and then there followed a simple trust in Christ, which she never again lost. I saw from the first that she was very delicate. Consumption, the dread enemy of our blacks, claimed her, and she rapidly declined. A few days before she died her sister came to me to say that Eliza was very ill, and would like to see me. I found her surrounded by weeping friends. She was having a hard struggle for breath. I said: "You are very weak, Eliza. Have you any fear of death?" She replied: "No, because Jesus is with me."

"The Lord Jesus," I said, "is always near those who put their trust in Him, and especially those who, like you, are passing through the dark valley." Clasping her hands, and with a look full of meaning, she said: "I know that, sir, I know that." On the night of her death she sent for me. I hastened to her bedside, and found that she was indeed passing away. She was unable to speak, but enjoyed perfect calm and peace. Her little boy stood by her side, and to him she had just said before I arrived: "Harry, I am going away from you to Jesus; I want you to be a good boy. Give Jesus your heart, serve Him, and then when you die you will meet me in heaven."

THE STORY OF ROWLEY.

He was one of the young men whom I had brought to the station from the distant Namoi River. He had been a most wicked young fellow, drunkenness being his chief failing; but from the time he joined the mission an entire reformation set in. He freely gave up the use of all intoxicating drink, and it was soon seen that the preaching and teaching of God's truth was working powerfully on his mind and heart. He was most regular at the various religious services, and appeared to drink in the water of life greedily. By and by he expressed an earnest desire for Christian baptism. He humbly and sincerely professed his faith in the Son of God, and then followed a beautiful request to be admitted to the Lord's table. Not long after this he was laid low by consumption, but all through his period of weakness and pain there was cheerfulness and resignation. When at length he felt that he must die, instead of sorrow and dread, he manifested quite a spirit of gladness at the prospect of being so soon with Jesus. His end was perect peace—"peace in believing."

JOHANNA, A LITTLE BLACK GIRL, about twelve years of age, came with me to the mission station from a place called Cootamundra, about one hundred and fifty miles away. Though her skin was very black, her heart seemed pure and tender, and soon yielded to the touch of the Saviour's love. Very earnestly she listened to "the old, old story," until the love of Jesus became to her a great reality. She opened her heart to Him; He entered, and dwelt there. One evening, after service, I was walking to the mission-house, when I heard the familiar pattering of bare feet behind me. Looking round I saw the little girl. "Well, Johanna, what is it?" With a great deal of native shyness she replied: "I would like you to baptize me, sir." "Why would you like me to baptize you?" I said.

"BECAUSE I LOVE THE LORD JESUS,

sir, and I want to show my love to Him before my friends." Tears came to my eyes at these touching words, and I said, "All right, Johanna, I will baptize you;" and one Sunday shortly afterward the dear girl came forward, in the presence of the whole of our mission community, and in the rite of Christian baptism made her profession of faith and love. Only a few weeks afterward Johanna's pure and loving spirit passed away from "our home of mercy" to join that "great multitude" before the throne.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

By the Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B.

Expected by the Apostles—And by the Early Church—Mistakes about it—He will Come to Reign—What the Gospel will not Accomplish—Unfounded Expectation that the Millennium will Precede the Advent.

MANY Christians who rejoice in the First Advent are little influenced by the Second, which is often the creed of the intellect rather than of the heart. They look backward rather than forward. But the apostles and early believers, accepting the First Advent as an accomplished fact, looked forward, longing for what was yet future—the return of their Lord in glory.

The Second Advent of Christ to us is sometimes confounded with our going to Him at death. His promise to the disciples: "I will come again and receive you unto myself," has hitherto been fulfilled only at their decease. All believers may rejoice that it is not the last enemy, but their divine Friend, who bids them leave this life, and that "to depart" is to "be with Christ," which is "far better" than remaining in a world of sin. But this is not identical with the other truth that the Lord will come again to dwell with His people on the earth.

The Second Advent is also confounded with the general Resurrection and the final Judgment, which are supposed to occupy a very short space of time. In this case the Advent would not be a coming of Christ to a kingdom on earth, but a brief visit for the purpose of removing His saints to the kingdom in heaven.

The entrance of the soul at death to the presence of Jesus is one article of faith; the general Judgment is another; but these should not absorb and take the place of another revealed fact, that with His saints, to perfect His Church, to cause His kingdom to come and His will to be done on earth even as in heaven; and thus to accomplish all the predictions with which the Bible teems respecting the universal triumph of truth and righteousness in this long distracted and sin-polluted world.

The early Church did eagerly and lovingly anticipate such an Advent. They were "looking for that blessed hope;" not the hope of going to heaven, but of Christ coming to earth. They were patient in tribulation, believing that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." They were "looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God." They were characterized as those who "love His appearing." In this confident expectation they were encouraged by apostles filled with the Spirit of the Lord.

The lack of practical belief in the Second Advent as an event to be in our day hoped and prepared for, has arisen from the opinion that the Millennium is to precede the Advent, and be preparatory to it. If by present instrumentalities the Gospel is to triumph over all error and wickedness, seems so small that our hope of the Advent must be indefinitely postponed, at least beyond our own term of life.

The Gospel has been preached during more than eighteen centuries; yet the great majority of mankind are still ignorant of it. Hundreds of millions are still sunk in heathenism; hundreds of millions more are devotees of the False Prophet. In regions professedly Christian tens of millions divide their homage of Christ with that of the Virgin and saints; while the human priest is to them practically more than the one Mediator, the one High Priest of the Church. Among Protestants there are multitudes who ignore the supernatural element in Christianity; and others who, if they are right in worshipping Christ as God, are wrong in fundamental doctrine. Among nominal Christians many are so little under the influence of the truth that they habitually neglect public worship; while, of those who are found regularly at church, many, it is to be feared, have not yielded their hearts in loving obedience to the Saviour.

If we glance at the conduct of professedly Christian nations, we see little difference between them and others. Ambition, tyranny, selfishness, anger, revenge, seem too frequently to be considered necessary, and therefore right, in politics. Millions of men are always being trained in the arts of wholesale slaughter, preparing for war while professing peace; and many a battlefield has been reddened in our own day by the blood of thousands who have invoked the Prince of Peace to aid them in mutual destruction.

If the millennial reign is simply spiritual and to be brought about by present agencies, its very commencement seems to be hidden in the haze of the dim distance; and if it is to last during any period long enough to justify the figure of a thousand years, and if it is only at the completion of such period that Christ will personally come, it is not surprising that an event so distant should, as a motive, be practically powerless.

It is important to inquire whether Scripture warrants us in placing prior to the Advent. Does it represent our earth as becoming the abode of righteousness in order to be prepared to welcome its King? Or does it represent its King as coming to establish the reign of righteousness by His personal influence?

Can Bible-students find any passage describing the millennial age as preceding judgments on the wicked? On the contrary, are not such descriptions constantly connected with those judgments as precedent, and executed by the Lord Himself at His coming?

We often quote, in relation to the Millennium, the promise in Ps. 2: 8, "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." But the very next verse declares, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." From this it seems plain that to take possession of the uttermost parts of the earth, there will be daring rebels whose overthrow must clear the way for the Kingdom. If so, we are not to postpone our hopes for the coming of the Kingdom until such rebellion is subdued by the preaching of the Gospel.

In another millennial Psalm, the seventy-second, we have a lovely picture of the time when "the mountains will bring peace to the people," under the sway of Him who will "come down like rain on the mown grass; in whose days the righteous will flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth;" when "all kings shall fall down before Him, and all nations shall serve Him." But this will not be without judgment on the wicked, for in this sweet idyll of peace we are told that "He shall break in pieces the oppressor" (verse 4). We are not, therefore, to postpone our hope of His coming till all oppression is first put down. He will come to "vindicate the poor of the people, and to save the children of the needy," because He will come to "break in pieces" their enemies.

The New Testament confirms the earlier revelation. St. Jude gives apostolic authority for the fact that Enoch linked the Advent with judgments on the wicked then living. Thus we are to expect that there will be outrageously compared to "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame;" the silencing of whose blasphemies will not precede but follow, the coming of the Lord with "ten thousands of His saints" (Jude 13-15).

St. Paul warns the Thessalonians that "a falling away," and a revelation of the Man of Sin will precede the day of Christ; who, when He comes, will be "revealed from heaven in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ;" when "He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe" (II Thess. 1 : 6-9; 2 : 1-3). Here again we are led to expect, not that all disobedience is first to be overcome by the preaching of the Gospel, but that He will find many still living, guilty of such hardened rebellion as to deserve fiery vengeance.

We read in the book of Revelation: "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" (Rev. 1 : 7). There will be many living on the earth to whom His Advent will be a terror. This is in harmony with His own words in the parable of the tares (Matt. 13 : 41-43).

Nothing can be clearer than the command to preach the Gospel to all mankind throughout the world, indiscriminately; to every creature, to all ranks and all conditions; but it is nowhere said that every individual will embrace it prior to the Advent. Our Lord said, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come:" not when all nations have obeyed the summons, but when in every region the trumpet has been blown.

If this is the testimony of Scripture, we are not to regard the great hope of the Church as so distant that it cannot possibly take place in our own day, and therefore cannot exercise any motive power on heart and life. The coming of the Lord draweth nigh! In all regions of the earth the Gospel has been proclaimed.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Passing Away in the Dark.—At a recent meeting Mr. Reid related: "In a house not far from this hall, a young man lay dying. When in health and vigor he laughed at death and the future, and despised the offers of Christ's salvation; but on his death-bed he could have told you what darkness really is. To all words of comfort or direction given him, his only reply was, 'It is dark! It is dark! It is dark!' In this condition he passed away into the outer darkness. Take warning to-night, and get into the light of Christ's countenance, which will lead you into the glory of eternal day."

A Good Staff to Lean Upon.—The Rev. Mr. McLachlan said: "I went to visit a young girl who was dying of consumption. I said to her, 'You are very weak.' 'Yes,' she replied, 'my body is very weak, but my soul is not. I am leaning on the sure staff that will not fail me.' I spoke to her for a little about the unfailing love of God in Jesus Christ, and then she repeated those precious words from Isaiah 41 : 10, 'Fear not, for I am with thee: be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee.' When I was taking my leave of her, she put her thin white hand into mine, and said, 'I shall never see you again in this world, sir, but I will look for you in the next.'"

A Drunkard's Conscience Aroused.—At a Mizpah Temperance meeting recently, an aged man said: "It is two years ago since I went to the evangelistic meeting after the new year's holidays. During that carnival I had taken all the drink I could buy for money, and when that was spent I got as much as possible on credit. My family was sitting at home doing the best they could, singing God's praises, and praying for me, while I, an old man, their father, was lying in bed, suffering the horrors of hell from the effects of the liquor I had drunk. For a long time my wife prayed for me, and when it seemed as though God had given me up, He answered her prayer; for when I rose from my bed I went to the meeting, but was still so stupid that I do not know anything in particular that was said or done; but when I left the hall, I felt sure that 'no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven.' As I walked home I made up my mind to turn to the Lord for help to get power over my besetting sin, for I could not conquer it nor keep it under, unless He came to my help. The Lord, with much sweetness and grace, has now taken from me all desire for drink. As a lost sinner I found mercy and forgiveness through the precious blood of Christ, my Saviour, and I believe He will keep me to the end."

An Urgent Demand of a King.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "In the days when Rome ruled the greater part of the world, one of the Cæsars sent an ambassador to the King of Egypt to obtain a declaration of peace or war. At an audience with the Egyptian king, the messenger delivered his message, and demanded an answer at once. In the Eastern way, the king desired to put him off for a time, but the ambassador sternly replied, 'No, I must have an immediate answer.' Then drawing a circle round the throne, he continued, 'Before you pass that line you must say whether it is to be peace or war.' He was a faithful messenger, representing a mighty power, which would, he knew, support him if he fulfilled his duty faithfully. In a similar manner every Christian worker should remember that God, for whom he works, will keep His promises to those who serve Him, and uphold and guide them in times of difficulty, if only they are faithful in the discharge of the duty committed to them."

Rebuking a Blasphemer.—Mr. McLachlan, speaking to young men from the parable of the prodigal son, of their faithfulness to Christ, said: "I was travelling at one time on the Continent of Europe, and had to put up at a hotel for a few days. Going into the public room, where a good many gentlemen were assembled, talking on different subjects, I observed a rough-looking Englishman sitting at the fireside, taking part in the conversation, while every sentence was prefaced by an oath. Looking at him for a minute, and putting my hand on the bell at the same time, I said, 'Now, you or I will have to leave this hotel to-night; I will ring and ask the proprietor to expel you, or I will leave.' The gentleman at once apologized, and refrained from using any more profane oaths, at least while I was in the room. The company present thanked me for putting an end to the great annoyance which had been inflicted upon them. 'A word in season, how good is it!'"

Snatched from a Suicide's Doom.—Mr. Robert Simpson related: "In one of Mr. Moody's meetings at Stratford, one of the Christian workers spoke to a man, whose appearance proclaimed him to have fallen from a higher social level than he then occupied. He was in deep distress about his soul, and it was long before peace calmed his breast. At one time this man was in a large way of business, employing many hundred hands, but gradually he lost control of himself, and then his business fell off through his own indulgence in drinking. He became so miserable in body and wretched in mind, that he determined to destroy himself, and thus, as he thought, put an end to his hopeless condition, forgetting that he had to appear before God, and give an account of the deeds done in the body. Standing on the brink of the pond, where he had intended to drown himself, he remembered that there was nothing on his person to identify his body when it was found. Searching his pockets for a bit of paper to write his wife's name and address on, he pulled out a small bit of paper which some person had given him in the street. As he unfolded it to write the address his eye caught the words, 'Where will you spend eternity?' For the first time he began to think on this phase of life, and he went off to spend the night behind a hedge, where he was found in the morning by a member of a newly-formed Mizpah Band, who spoke to him of Christ; but not then, nor for days afterward, did the light of salvation illumine his dark soul; but at the meeting I have spoken of it flashed in upon him, and he is now rejoicing in the midst of his poverty, because Jesus has saved him from the guilt, pollution, and power of his sins."

A Father Robbing His Daughter.—"I Never knew a liquor-seller's money to stay in his family a generation, however much the man may have made by his trade. I once knew a publican who had a large fortune made through selling whiskey. He became a confirmed drunkard, and his fortune soon vanished, and he was glad to get an allowance of a pound a week from his friends. He had one daughter, an invalid, who, through the kindness of some friends, was living at the coast, and was supported by some Christian ladies. After it came to her father's knowledge that she received money from these ladies, his visits were very frequent. He would go over to her bedside on pretence of speaking to her, and put his hand under her pillow where he knew the money was kept, and always succeeded in carrying her little store away with him. When drink gets the mastery over any one, it makes its slave regardless of doing any dishonorable and heartless act."

Half for God and Half for the World.—"While sitting in my room one day, I heard some of my children coming down-stairs, and a little girl of three or four years of age said, 'I shan't and I won't do it.' As she passed my door I called her to come in. She stood nervously near the door to hear what I had to say. I asked her what she would not do, and upon hearing, I told her she would have to do it. She folded both her little arms, and, putting her head on one side, said, 'I suppose I must.' I pointed out to her that her father's will was that she should be first good and then happy, and told her there was nothing I liked better than to see my little girl quite happy. I am afraid there are many half-hearted Christians who look up into their Father's face, and say, 'I suppose I must,' instead of finding it their highest pleasure to do His will. It is better not to be half-hearted, giving only half ourselves to God, and having a longing after the pleasures of the world, saying, 'May a Christian do that?' or, 'Can a Christian go there?' If you want to be miserable, be half for God and half for the world."

A Marriage which Ended in Murder.—Mr. Jack relates: "I once knew a young girl who was a very bright Christian. She became acquainted with an engineer who was in very sad circumstances through indulgence in strong drink. His friends were very anxious that he should marry this girl, for they thought her influence would do him good; and in an evil day she consented to become his wife. Instead of getting better he grew worse. His poor wife became very downhearted; she felt she had no power at all over him. Her father, who held a good position in Edinburgh, pleaded with his daughter to return to her comfortable home, and leave her husband in Glasgow. She refused his offer, always living in the hope that her husband would turn from his evil ways. But he sank lower and lower, until at last he murdered that patient, loving wife, that had tended and prayed for him so long. One night she had gone out for the purpose of seeking and bringing him home, and found him in a state of intoxication. That night he took her life away. With her last breath she testified of Jesus, and commended her husband to His love. This hard-hearted man only escaped from being hanged through some of his friends interposing in his behalf. He is now in penal servitude for life. This is another illustration of the need to obey the divine injunction, 'Not to be yoked together with unbelievers.' Children of God should never think of marrying with the children of the devil. 'Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Startling Decrease in the Value of our exports during the last fiscal year has set economists studying and analyzing the details of the reports. The shrinkage was $83,000,000 as compared with 1882–83, and of $162,000,000 as compared with 1880. The Financial Chronicle, after a minute examination of the items, says that it was well known that breadstuffs went abroad less freely, but it is startling to compare exports of them, amounting to $157,000,000, against $283,000,000 four years previously. And it is also surprising to find cotton marking as large a decrease ($50,000,000) as breadstuffs when the comparison is between last year and its predecessor. Among breadstuffs corn has held its own, and rye has grown from under 1,000,000 bushels to over 6,000,000. In other words, the decrease in breadstuffs is almost wholly in wheat, which reached its greatest export, at $190,000,000, in 1879–80, and fell to $73,000,000 in 1883–84. Since 1877–78 there has been no smaller total. A comparison extending over a series of years shows that the amount of exports is determined not by the yield in America, but by the European demand.

Secretary Folger's Death on Thursday, September 4th, caused general regret throughout the country. The Secretary was a man whose honesty and conscientious devotion to duty won for him the respect of all whose business brought them in contact with the Treasury, while citizens of this State, who have known him in other capacities, held him in high esteem. The news of his death was unexpected; it was known that he was unwell, but it was stated that he was only suffering from prostration, caused by overwork, and the popular idea of that ailment is, that a few days' rest will cure it. Secretary Folger continued his work at Washington after he had clear intimation that his powers were overstrained, and finally, when he was no longer able to attend to his duties and retired to his home in Geneva, N. Y., to recuperate, his symptoms had already become alarming. He continued, however, to attend to his mail and dictate letters to his secretary until the day of his death. His mind continued clear to the last. His children were not summoned to his dying-room, but several personal friends were with him when he died. His physicians state that his death was wholly due to his conscientious devotion to his public duties, some of which a less careful man would have left to be performed by subordinates. Judge Folger was in his sixty-seventh year, having been born April 16th, 1818. Before President Arthur invited him to enter his Cabinet as Secretary of the Treasury he had filled successively the offices of Judge of the Ontario Court of Common Pleas, Master and Examiner in Chancery, State Senator four terms, United States Sub-Treasurer in New York, and Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals. The President has ordered the Treasury to be draped in mourning, to be closed on the day of the funeral, and all the sub-treasuries throughout the Union to be draped as a sign of respect to his memory.

The Election in Vermont on Tuesday, September 2d, had this year unusual interest as being the first practical indication, since the national conventions, of the state of political feeling and the extent to which the Independent bolt was affecting the people. The result is not very gratifying to either party. The Republicans were victorious, but the plurality did not reach the line of past elections. It was 21,413 over the Democratic ticket, while in 1880 it was 26,569, and in 1876 it was 23,735. The Republican vote sank from 47,814, in 1880, to 41,917. At the same time the Democratic vote was 19,838, while in 1880 it was 21,245. Various reasons are assigned for the shrinkage in the vote on both sides, which, to a considerable extent reduced its significance. It is, however, stated by impartial observers that there is little enthusiasm for Mr. Blaine in Vermont, and that there has been a sore feeling produced in the State by the attacks of the Blaine newspapers on Senator Edmunds, whose influence there is very powerful.

The Attempt to Indirectly Assess the Office-holders by asking for voluntary contributions for the Presidential campaign is being closely watched by the Committee of the Civil Service Reform League. The committee is sending out a circular letter to the Federal office-holders, in which it explains by citation of the statute of January 16th, 1883, how they will become liable to fine or imprisonment, or both, if they pay these assessments "directly or indirectly." "The National Civil Service Reform League," says the circular, "proposes to bring the matter to the attention of the Attorney-General and other prosecuting officers of the United States," and federal office-holders are warned that the circular inviting them to contribute is an attempt to inveigle them into a criminal liability punishable by law.

A Long Letter from Frederick Douglass on the Presidential election was published September 6th. It is mainly devoted to an effort to prove that the Prohibitionists ought to vote for Mr. Blaine rather than Mr. St. John. He describes the Prohibition party as one of "the political forces of the hour, characterized by irrational individualism and a rampant tendency to faction which threatens not only the stability of political parties, but popular government itself, reducing society to a condition of chaos." The party, he contends, is making "a mistake full of mischief and possible disaster," its course being "based on the assumption that there is no longer a Southern question, and that the mission of the Republican party is ended." He holds that the Prohibitionists ought not to vote a separate ticket because "a party to succeed must not only have ideas, but numbers. A few men, combined together, may work mischief by depriving a good party of power and putting a bad party in power." Such a statement was not expected from Frederick Douglass. The letter has produced an unpleasant impression in the North by its violent language and by its denunciation of the Prohibitionists and the Independent Republicans, who, he says, are "masquerading in the sham of independence." The sentiment called forth is that Mr. Douglass was perfectly justified in urging his race to vote the ticket he supports, but he should have done so without condemning, with an offensive assumption of superiority, men of character and intelligence who on this question differ from him in opinion.

The American Association for the Advance-ment of Science held its sessions this year at Philadelphia. It assembled on September 4th, and its concluding session is to be held to-day. It derived special interest from the fact that many of the well-known Englishmen of science, who have attended the Montreal meeting, were present. In this respect, therefore, it was one of the most important assemblages of scientists that has ever gathered in this country. The project of founding an international association has long been favored by eminent scientists on both sides the Atlantic, and it is thought that this united conference may tend to the realization of the scheme. Captain Bedford Pim, the English Arctic explorer, caused much amusement by declaring that, as it had been shown that the West Indian Islands were at one time a part of the American continent, the United States were welcome to them, and he thought they might have Ireland too if they wanted it.

The Death of Bishop George F. Pierce, Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, occurred at Sparta, Ga., on September 2d. Dr. Pierce had been suffering from illness for several weeks, but had been able to attend Culverton Camp-Meeting, where he preached with more than his usual vigor and unction on August 13th. Soon after his return he was stricken with fever, and gradually sank. His weakness was extreme, but his faith was unshaken. Shortly before his death, turning to his physician, he said, "How long shall I have to wait?" "Not long," was the answer, and he smiled his avowal that the intelligence was welcome, and quietly turned away to wait for the end. He was seventy-three years of age, having been born in Greene County, Ga., on February 3d, 1811. His father was Bishop Lovick Pierce, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 1st, 1880.

A Disastrous Fire Broke Out in Cleveland, Ohio, on Sunday night last, and for some hours threatened the city with utter destruction. The fire started about seven o'clock in a lumber yard. Whether it was the work of incendiaries, of boys playing with matches, or was caused by the sparks from a tugboat is not determined. All three theories are broached. The locality of the fire is known as the Cuyahoga Flats, and is one particularly exposed. It is hemmed in by the windings of the Cuyahoga River, and is difficult of access. The entire tract is covered to the water's edge with lumber. As soon as the flames spread beyond the lumber tract, across the river, there was left no means of fighting the fire. The destruction of the lower part of the city became only a question of the direction of the wind. An extensive candle factory stood on the other side of the river, and when the flames caught that they derived new strength. The intense heat drove back the firemen, and three engines, becoming surrounded, had to be thrown into the river to save them. A whirlwind, induced by the heated air, swept over the burned district, throwing large timbers two hundred feet into the air. Telegrams were sent to other cities for assistance, and special trains soon arrived with four engines from Toledo and two from Youngstown and Painesville. At one o'clock on Monday morning the fire was still burning fiercely, but it was believed to be under control. As most of the telegraph wires had been destroyed, reliable intelligence was difficult to obtain. It was estimated that at midnight on Sunday the loss of property exceeded two millions. Five firemen are reported killed, but in the confusion existing it is hoped that there may be an error in the statement.

Gambling on the High Seas will, it may be hoped, receive a check from the protest handed to the Anchor Line. About one hundred ladies and gentlemen who came from Europe in the steamship City of Rome, which arrived here last week, signed a protest complaining that during the voyage one room was incessantly used for gambling purposes, and that sometimes two rooms were so used. The library was one of those rooms, and ladies were also practically excluded from it by its being used as a second smoking-room. The prevalence of gambling caused much dissatisfaction from the commencement of the voyage, but for prudential reasons no complaint was made to the captain. When, however, quarantine was reached a protest was passed around and signed, one copy of which was handed to the captain and the other to the managers of the line. It will be a good thing if the action of these passengers leads to a reform of this nuisance. Many a young man has been ruined during an ocean voyage by skilful players, who invited him to while away the tedium of the journey with a game at cards. On this voyage a professional gambler won $1000. The steamship companies should take measures to protect their passengers.

An International Dispute has been Developed at Pittsburg, Pa., by the conduct of the chief of police in that city. On the birthday of the Emperor of Austria-Hungary the consul from that country in Pittsburg hoisted his national flag to do honor to the day. He was waited upon by the chief of police, who peremptorily ordered him to take the flag down. The consul declined, and the flag remained untouched all day; but a suit has been commenced against him by the policeman for violating the city ordinances. The Austrian minister having received a report of the affair appealed to the Secretary of State, who requested Governor Pattison to have the prosecution stopped and an explanation made to the consul, he having a right, under treaty, to hoist his flag. After some delay Mr. Frelinghuysen's request has been complied with.

The Strength of the Prohibition Amendment in Iowa is to be tested in the courts. On September 4th petitions in equity were filed at Dubuque, praying for injunctions to restrain seventeen saloon-keepers of the city from maintaining and continuing nuisances in the form of saloons. The complainant is the Law and Order League. The attempt is a new phase, being a civil and criminal suit. The cases are brought under the section of the law passed last winter providing that any citizen of a county where a saloon is situated may maintain an action in equity to abate and perpetually enjoin the keeping of a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to law. The cases will be tried at the coming term of the District Court, which meets the 15th inst. It is said that petitions against twenty more saloon-keepers will be filed in a few days.

A Scene of Lawless Violence was Witnessed on Sunday, August 31st, on board an excursion barge in the bay of New York. The employés of the Empire Steam Laundry Company planned an excursion, and hired the barge and a tug to tow them to Linden Grove, S. I. There were nearly five hundred people on the barge, and just as it was about to start, fifty roughs, who infest the Ninth Ward, boarded the boat and announced their intention of going to the picnic, though they had no tickets. No sooner had the barge put off than the roughs commenced stealing liquor from the bar on board. Having emptied three kegs of beer they became violent, attacked the keeper of the bar, and killed him, and then commenced fighting and maltreating all on board. The fight was furious, and the roughs being madly drunk many serious injuries were inflicted. The fight continued all down the bay, and the captain, being afraid to land, turned his flag union down, and returned to New York. Efforts were made to have a platoon of police ready at the pier to arrest the rioters, but the police did not arrive until the party had dispersed, after having a free fight on the pier. The scene on the barge during the fight is described as appalling, and when it was cleared of people the decks were littered with broken plates, fragments of clothing, blood-stained sticks, and other evidences of the struggle. The employés of the laundry say it was their first Sunday picnic, and will be their last. To be confined to a barge on which a gang of men mad with liquor were fighting desperately and committing murder was an experience not likely to be forgotten. "It was a perfect hell," was the declaration of one of the spectators, and he was probably more nearly right than he supposed. One of the most appalling conceptions of the abode of the lost is that it implies unavoidable companionship with beings utterly abandoned (Rev. 22 : 15).

A Novel Service at the Opening of a Saloon is reported by The Christian Woman. A drinking and gambling saloon, splendidly fitted up, was to be opened with liberal hospitality and merriment. Several hundred people were present, and drinking, gaming, and music were at their height when a clergyman and a few friends presented themselves. The proprietor courteously received them, and granted their request to hold a short service of fifteen minutes in his new place. They sang a hymn or two, offered a short prayer, then the clergyman, lightly springing on the keno-table, said, in a clear, distinct manner: "We are praying for, and our faith claims, that this business shall not prosper; that the owner of the building shall not make any money out of the investment when the premises are used for such purposes; that the trade at the bar shall be unprofitable, and that intoxicating liquors shall not be sold; that ruin of men shall be averted, and that all parties concerned will be redeemed with an everlasting salvation, or be removed, so that good may be done, and not evil." The fifteen minutes having expired the little party retired, singing, while the saloon-keeper and his guests looked at each other in amazement. This scene occurred two months ago at Carson, Nev.

An Extensive Cave-in Near Wilkesbarre, Pa. occurred on September 5th. The Enterprise Colliery has been for some time in a dangerous condition, and on Friday morning the watchman of the mine noticed that "the roof was working," showing symptoms of coming down. He at once gave an alarm, and a few minutes afterward the roof fell and the air was expelled from underneath with terrific violence. It rushed along the works and up the shaft with the violence of an explosion. Loaded cars were hurled from the track like showers. Bracing work and ventilating doors were broken into kindling wood. Happily the men in the mine took warning and escaped before the crash came, but the mules had to be abandoned, and all of them perished. The magnitude of the cave-in is shown by the fact that over one hundred acres of surface was affected. A strip about three hundred yards wide by half a mile long, directly over the cave-in, sank from three to five feet. The whole of this surface is seamed with fissures and cracks from two to eight and ten inches wide. This strip is crossed by the main line of the Lehigh Valley Road, and all traffic was stopped until near noon. The rails were twisted and wrenched out of place, and the telegraph poles thrown out of perpendicular. The cave-in was caused by the pillars of coal left to support the roof having been cut away. It is strange that the miners whose lives are imperilled by a cave-in should themselves destroy the pillars supporting the roof; but miners are notoriously careless of danger, and do not think much of the consequences of their actions. The same excuse does not avail for certain philosophers who are trying to eliminate faith and religion from the structure of society, an effort which, if it could succeed, would involve general catastrophe (II Pet. 2 : 1).

PLEADING AND ENCOURAGEMENT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God: and not that he should return from his ways, and live?"—EZEKIEL 18 : 23.

"For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye."—EZEKIEL 18 : 32.

"As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?"—EZEKIEL 33 : 11.

A False Idea of God—The Conception of Him as Implacable—One of Satan's Devices—Leads to Unrestrained Sin—God's Declaration of Readiness to Pardon—As a Question—As an Assertion—By Solemn Oath—I. The Assertion—A Libel on God—His Judgments Rare—Averse to Punishment—II. No Alternative but Repentance or Death—Else there would be Injustice—The Innocent Suffer in Lawless Times—III. God has Pleasure in Men Turning—IV. His Exhortation and Argument.

SIN having a thorough possession of the human heart, intrenches itself within the soul, as one who has taken a stronghold speedily attends to the repairing of the breaches, and the strengthening of the walls, lest haply he should be dislodged. Among the most subtle devices of sin to keep the soul under its power and prevent the man's turning to God, is the slandering of the Most High by misrepresenting His character. As dust blinds the eye, so does sin prevent the sinner from seeing God aright. "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God;" but the wicked only see what they think to be God, and that, alas, is an image as unlike to God as possible! They say, for instance, that God is unmerciful, whereas He delighteth in mercy. The unfaithful servant in the parable was quite sure about it, and said most positively, "I knew that thou wast an austere man;" whereas the nature of God is as opposite to overbearing and exaction as light is from darkness.

When men once get

into their minds they become hardened in heart; believing that it is useless to turn to God, they go on in their sins with greater determination. Either they conceive that God is implacable, or that He is indifferent to human prayers, or that if He should hear them yet He is not in the least likely to grant a favorable answer. This is one of Satan's most mischievous devices to prevent repentance. As in the old times of plague they fastened up the house-door, and marked a red cross upon it, and thus the inhabitants of that dwelling were sealed unto death, even so the devil writes upon the man's door the words, "no hope," and then the sick soul determines to die, and refuses admission to the Physician.

No man sins more unreservedly than he who sins in desperation, believing that there is no pardon for him from God. When a man believes that there is no hope for him in the right way, he determines that he will get what he can out of the wrong way; and if he cannot please God, he will, at least, please himself. If he must go to hell, he will be as merry as he can on the road, and, as he puts it, he will "die game." All this comes of a mistaken view of God. He is a God ready to pardon, and by no means hard to be moved to forgiveness; why do men stand off from confessing their wrong, and finding mercy? He is not a God who taketh pleasure in the miseries of men; why do they think so ill of Him? His ear is not dull to the cry of sorrow, His heart is not slow to compassionate distress; on the contrary, He waiteth to be gracious, "His mercy endureth forever." He delighteth in mercy; why will men run from Him? Part of our business as ministers of Christ is to bear witness to the lovingkindness of the Lord against the falsehood with which sin dishonors His goodness. I desire to do so this morning, and to do it in right down earnest, in the hope that those of you who are convinced of sin may this day be able to rest in the mercy of God—even that exceeding mercy which He has revealed in Jesus Christ, His Son.

I have been very much struck with several letters which I have this week received from deeply-wounded souls. God is at work among us with the sword of conviction. I have felt a great degree of joy in receiving these letters; painful as they are to their writers, they are very hopeful to me. I am sorry that any persons should be near despair, and should continue in that condition; but anything is better than indifference. I am not sorry to see in the prison of the law, for I hope they will soon come out of the prison-house into the full liberty of faith in Christ.

I can see in several who have written to me that their main idea is erroneous; that they have fallen into a wrong notion about God; they do not conceive of Him as the good and gracious God which He really is. This error I am eager to correct. Listen to me, ye mourners. I desire to tell you nothing but sober truth. God forbid that I should misrepresent God for your comfort! Job asked his friends, "Will ye talk deceitfully for God?" and my answer to that question is, "Never." I would not utter what I believed to be falsehood concerning the Lord, even though the evil one offered me the bait of saving all mankind thereby. I have noticed in certain revival meetings a wretched lowering of the truth upon many points in order to afford encouragement to men; but all such sophistry ends in utter failure. Comfort based upon the suppression of truth is worse than useless. Lasting consolation must come to sinners from the sure truth of God, or else in the day when they most want it their hopes will depart from them, as the giving up of the ghost. I will therefore speak to you the truth in its simplicity concerning the blessed God, whose servant I am.

Notice, that in each one of my texts the Lord declares that He has no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but in each following passage is stronger. The Lord puts it first as a matter of question. As if He were surprised that such a thing should be laid to His door, He appeals to man's own reason, and asks, "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; and not that he should return from his ways, and live?" Oh, souls, can you really think that God desires your damnation? Can you be so demented as soberly to believe such a calumny? Will such a theory hold water for a single minute? After all the goodness of God to multitudes of rebellious men, can you allow such a dark thought to linger near your mind, that God can have pleasure in men's being sinners, and ultimately destroying themselves by their iniquities? Your own commonsense must teach you that the good God is grieved to see men sin, that He would be glad to see men of a better mind, and that it is sad work to Him to punish the finally obstinate and impenitent.

But then, in the next place, in our second text, God makes a positive assertion. Knowing the human heart, He foresaw that a question would not be enough to end this matter, for man would say, "He only asked the question, but He did not give a plain and positive statement to the contrary." He gives us that clear assurance in our second text: "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, said the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye." When the Lord speaks He is to be believed, for He is God that cannot lie.

But still, as if to end forever the strange and ghastly supposition that God takes delight in human destruction, my third text seals the truth with the solemn oath of the Eternal. He lifts His hand to heaven, and swears; and because He can swear by no greater He swears by Himself—not by His temple, nor by His throne therein, nor by His angels, nor by anything outside of Himself; but He sweareth by His own life. Jehovah that liveth forever and ever saith, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." The man who dares to doubt the oath of God will be guilty of an arrogant presumption which I would not like to impute to one of you.

I invite your earnest consideration of this utterance thus given in the form of a question, an assertion, and a solemn oath.

I. And I notice, first, the assertion that God finds no pleasure in a sinner's death. Really, I feel ashamed to have to answer which is here suggested; yet it is the English of many a man's doubts. He dares not come to God and trust Him because he darkly dreams that God is a terrible Being who does not wish to save him, who is unwilling to forgive him, unwilling to receive him into His favor. He suspects that God finds some kind of terrible delight in a soul's damnation. That cannot be. I need not disprove the falsehood. God swears to the contrary, and the falsehood vanishes like smoke. I will only bring forward certain evidence by which you who are still under the deadly influence of the falsehood may be delivered.

First, consider the great paucity of God's judgments among the sons of men. There are people who are always talking of judgments, but they are in error. If a theatre is burned down, or if a boat is upset on the Sabbath, they cry, "Behold, a judgment!" Yet churches and meeting-houses are burned, and missionaries are drowned when upon the Lord's own business. It is wrong to set down everything that happens as a judgment, for in so doing you will fall into and condemn the innocent. The fact is there are but few acts of divine providence to individuals which can definitely be declared to be judgments. There are such things, but they are wonderfully rare in this life, considering the way in which the Lord is daily provoked by presumption and blasphemy. If judgments for Sabbath-breaking had been commonly dealt out, this city of London would have been destroyed like Sodom and Gomorrah. But God reserveth His wrath till the day of wrath; for a while He winketh at man's obstinacy, for this is not the place of judgment, but of forbearance and hope. The fewness of visible deeds of judgment upon ungodly men in this life proves that God takes no delight in them.

And then, secondly, the length of God's long-suffering before the Day of Judgment itself comes proves how He wills not the death of men. The Lord spares many guilty men throughout three-score years and ten, bearing with their ill-manners in a way which ought to excite our loving gratitude. Youthful folly is succeeded by manhood's deliberate fault, and that, by the persistence of mature years, and yet the Lord remains patient! Some of you have rejected Christ after having heard the Gospel for many years; you have stifled your conscience when it has cried against you, and you have done despite to the Spirit of God. You have rebelled against the light, and have committed greater and yet greater sin, but God has not cut you down. If He had found pleasure in your death, would He have suffered you to live so long?

Furthermore, remember the perfection of the character of God as the moral Ruler of the Universe. He is the Judge of all, and He must do right. Now, if a judge upon the bench were known to take delight in the punishment of offenders, he ought to be removed at once, for it would be clear that he was thoroughly unfit for his office. A man who would take pleasure in hanging, or imprisoning, would be of the foul breed of Judge Jeffreys, and other monsters, from whom I trust our bench is forever purged. But if I heard it said that a judge never pronounced the sentence of death without tears, that when he came home from the court, and remembered that some had been banished for life by the sentences which he had been bound to deliver, he sat in a moody, unhappy state all the evening, I should say, "Yes, that is the kind of person to be a judge."

is necessary to justice in a judge. Such an one is God, who taketh no pleasure either in sin, or in the punishment which is the consequence of sin; He hates both sin and its consequence, and only comes at last to heavy blows with men when everything else has failed. When the sinner must be condemned, or else the foundations of society would be out of course, then He delivers the terrible sentence, but even then it is with unfeigned reluctance, and He cries, "How can I give thee up?" The Great Judge of all seems to descend from the glory of His judgment-seat, and show His more familiar face to you in the text, as in effect He cries, "I have judged, and I have condemned, and I have punished; but, as I live, I find no pleasure in all this, my pleasure comes when men turn unto me and live."

If any further thoughts were necessary to correct your misbelief, I would mention the graciousness of His work in saving those who turn from their evil ways. The care which the Most High has taken to produce repentance, the alacrity with which He accepts it, and the abounding love manifested to returning prodigals, are all evidences indisputable that God finds no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but in their salvation. To prevent the death of the wicked the Lord devised a plan of salvation before all worlds; and those who find that the Lord has provided for them a Substitute in the person of His own dear Son, who is indeed His own self; and that in His person God Himself has borne the penalty due to sin, that thus the law might be solemnly honored, and the divine justice vindicated. God has proved Himself in multitudes of ways to be not the Destroyer, but the Preserver of men. "He that is our God is the God of salvation." "Salvation belongeth unto the Lord."

Thus would I try to vindicate the ways of God to men. When men are to be tried for their lives, if their friends are able to do so, they come to them in prison, and say, "It is a very hopeful thing for you that it is not Judge So-and-So, who is terribly severe; you are to be tried before the kindest man on the bench." Many a prisoner has plucked up courage at such news; and oh, poor sinner, you who dare not trust God, let me chide you into hope by reminding you that Love sits embodied on the throne of judgment this day; and that He who must and will condemn you, if you turn not from your sins, nevertheless will find no pleasure in that condemnation, but will be loath to make bare the axe of execution. Will you not turn to Him and live? Do not His compassions beckon you to make a full surrender, and find grace in His sight?

II. But now, secondly, God finds but that men must turn from their wicked ways, or die. "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." It is one or the other: turn or burn. God, with all His love to men, cannot discover any third course: men cannot keep their sins and yet be saved. The sin must die or the sinner must die.

Be it known to you, first, that when God proclaims mercy to men upon this condition, that they turn from their ways, this proclamation is issued out of pure grace. As a matter of bare right, repentance does not bring mercy with it. Does a murderer receive pardon because he regrets his deed? Does a thief escape from prison because at last he comes to be sorry that he was not honest? Repentance makes no available amends for the evil which is done; the evil still remains, and the punishment must be executed. It is of grace, then, that I am permitted to say, "Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways." It is because at the back of it there is a great sacrifice; it is through an all-sufficient atonement that repentance becomes acceptable.

Note, next, that if there be no repentance men must be punished, for on any other theory there is an end of moral government. The worst thing that could happen to a world of men would be for God to say, "I retract my law; I will neither reward virtue, nor punish iniquity; do as you like." Then the earth would be a hell indeed. The greatest enemy to civil government among men is the man who preaches universal salvation—salvation apart from a change of heart and life. Such teachers are a danger to national order, they remove the foundation of the commonwealth. They practically say, "Do just as you like; it may make a slight difference to you for a little while, but it will soon be over, and villains and saints will share an equal heaven." Such talk is damnable! I can say no less.

Yes, my hearers, sin must be punished; you must turn from it or die, because

SIN IS ITS OWN PUNISHMENT.

When we talk to you of the fire that never can be quenched, and the worm that dieth not, we are supposed to mean those literal things; but indeed these are figures—figures representing something more terrible than themselves; the fire is the burning of a furious rebellion in the soul, and the worm is the torture of a never-dying conscience. Sin is hell. Within the bowels of disobedience there lieth a world of misery. God has so constituted us, and rightly so, that we cannot long be evil and happy; we must, if we go wrong, ultimately become wretched; and the more wrong we are, and the longer we continue in that wrong, the more assuredly are we heaping up sorrow for ourselves throughout eternity.

I believe that every man's conscience bears witness to this if it be at all honest. There are consciences of a very curious kind about at this time—abortions, and not true consciences at all. I find men deliberately acting upon crooked policy, and yet they talk of truth and holiness. Yet every conscience that is not drunken with the mixed wine of pride and unbelief, will tell a man that when he does evil he cannot expect to be approved; that if he neglects to do good he cannot expect to have the same reward as if he had done the good—that, in fact, there must be, in the nature of things, a penalty attached to crime. Do you hear this? Oh, that you would let it sink into your heart, and work repentance in you!

III. This leads me on to the third point, which is a joyful one: God finds from sin. Read the passage again: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." Among the highest of the divine joys is the pleasure of seeing a sinner turn from evil. God delights in those first thoughts which men have toward Himself, when being careless heretofore they on a sudden begin to reflect upon their ways, and consider their condition before God. When yet the good work is only in the twilight, God is as pleased with it as watchmen are pleased with the first beams of morning light, ay, He is more glad than they that watch for the morning. When at last you come to prayer, and begin to cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner," God is well pleased; for here He sees clear signs that you are coming to yourself and to Him. His Spirit saith, "Behold, he prayeth!" and He takes this as a token for good. When you unfeignedly forsake sin God sees you do it, and He is so glad that His holy angels spy out His joy.

I am sure that God watches the struggles of those who endeavor to escape from old habits and evil ways. When you try to conquer vile thoughts, when at the end of the day you sit down and cry over the day's failures because you did not get as well through the day as you hoped to do, the Lord observes your desires and your lamentations. Just as a mother tenderly watches her child when it begins to walk, and smiles as she sees it toddling from chair to chair, and puts out her finger to help it, so doth God take pleasure in your early attempts after holiness, your longings to overcome sin, your sighings and cryings to be delivered from the bondage of corruption. God saith, "I taught Ephraim to go, taking them by their arms," and in the same way He is teaching you.

I will tell you what pleases Him most of all, and that is when you come to His dear Son, and say, "Lord, something tells me that there is no hope for me, but I do not believe that voice. I read in thy word that Thou wilt cast out none that come unto Thee, and lo, I come! I am the biggest sinner that ever did come, but, Lord, I believe thy promise; I am as unworthy as the devil himself, but, Lord, Thou dost not ask for worthiness, but only for childlike confidence. Cast me not away—I rest in Thee."

IV. Lastly, since He hath pleasure in men's turning to Him, God therefore exhorts to it, and adds

AN ARGUMENT.

"Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" He perceives His poor creature standing with his back to Him, looking to idols, looking to sinful pleasures, looking toward the city of destruction, and what does God say to him? He says, "Turn!" It is a very plain direction; is it not? "Turn," or "Right about face!" That is all. "I thought," saith one, "I was to feel so much anguish and so much agony." I should not wonder if you do feel it, but all that God says is, "Turn." You now face the wrong way; "Turn," and face the right way. That turning is true repentance. A changed life is of the essence of repentance; and that must spring from a changed heart, from a changed desire, from a changed will. God saith, "Turn ye." Oh, that you would hear and obey!

Notice how He puts it in the present tense—"Turn ye, turn ye," not to-morrow, but now. Nobody will be saved to-morrow; all who are saved, are saved to-day. "Now is the accepted time." "Turn ye." Oh, by the infinite mercy of God, who will enable you to turn, I do pray you to turn from every evil, from every self-confidence, unto God. No turning but turning to God is worth having. If the Lord turn you, you will turn to Himself, and to confidence alone in Him, and to His service and His fear.

"Turn ye, turn ye." See, the Lord puts it twice. He must mean your good by these repeated directions. Suppose my man-servant was crossing yonder river, and I saw that he would soon be out of his depth, and so in great danger; suppose I cried out to him, "Stop! stop! If you go another inch you will be drowned. Turn back!

TURN BACK!"

Will anybody dare to say, "Mr. Spurgeon would feel pleasure if that man were drowned"? It would be a cruel cut. What a liar the man must be who would hint such a thing when I am urging my servant to turn and save his life! Would God plead with us to escape unless He honestly desired that we should escape? I trow not. Every sinner may be sure that God takes no pleasure in his death when He pleads with him in these unrivalled words, "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?"

Then He finishes up with asking men to find a reason why they should die. There ought to be a weighty reason to induce a man to die. "Why will ye die?" This is an unanswerable question in reference to death eternal. Is there anything to be desired in eternal destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of His power? Can there be any gain in losing your own soul? Can there be any profit in going away into everlasting punishment? Can there possibly be anything to be wished for and desired in being cast into hell, where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched? Oh souls, be not unreasonable! Do not neglect this great salvation. It must be the most awful thing in all the world to die in your sins; why do you choose it? Do you desire shipwreck? Why hug that rocky shore, and tempt destruction? Will you eat the poisoned dainties of sin because they are sugared with a little present pleasure? In the end, the gall of bitterness will fill your bowels.

Oh, that you would trust in the Lord Jesus! Repose in Him and in His finished work, and all is well. Did I hear you say, "I will pray about it"? Better TRUST AT ONCE.

Pray as much as you like after you have trusted, but what is the good of unbelieving prayers? "I will talk with a godly man after the service." I charge you first trust in Jesus. Go home alone, trusting in Jesus. "I should like to go into the inquiry-room." I dare say you would, but we are not willing to pander to popular superstition. We fear that in those rooms men are warmed into a fictitious confidence. Very few of the supposed converts of inquiry-rooms turn out well. Go to your God at once, even where you now are. Cast yourself on Christ, now, at once; ere you stir an inch! In God's name I charge you, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, for "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

THE arrival in New York last week of this eminent clergyman, whose portrait appears on the next page, is not like the advent of a stranger. Mr. Hall has made several visits before this to the United States, and holds a high place in the respect and esteem of his Christian brethren here. He was born at Maidstone, England, on May 22d, 1816. His early education was received at Totteridge School, but having been early converted to Christ, he decided, with the approval of his parents, to devote himself to the ministry of the Congregational denomination, and therefore entered Highbury College for the appropriate training.

His college career was brilliant, and terminated in his taking the B. A. degree at the London University. Thirteen years later, and when he was one of the most busy and popular men in London, he took the higher degree of LL.B., and won a valuable law scholarship at the same time.

In the year 1842 he was called to the important pastorate of Albion Congregational Chapel, Hull, as his first ministerial appointment. His career there was eminently successful, but it had painful associations for him. He became acquainted at Hull with a lady whom he married. The marriage proved an unhappy one, and ultimately the lady sinned so deeply that Mr. Hall, finding her incorrigible, and having scriptural sanction for his course, procured a divorce from her.

After twelve years of successful ministration at Hull, he removed to London in 1854, where he occupied the pulpit of Surrey Chapel, a building famous throughout the world as the centre of the evangelistic and pastoral labors of the Rev. Rowland Hill. For twenty-one years Mr. Hall labored so assiduously that Surrey Chapel became the focus of Gospel and philanthropic work, which extended its beneficent operations over a large and populous district of the British metropolis.

He has made two extensive tours in the United States. On both occasions he was well received, and on the latter of the two visits, when in Washington, he was invited to open the business of Congress with prayer. He also preached before the House of Representatives, and the next day he delivered an address on "International Relations," when President Grant and many members of both Houses of Congress were present.

Christ Church, the name by which Mr. Hall preferred to designate the cathedral-like edifice in which he preaches, was opened on July 4th, 1876. It is a magnificent structure, and will hold three thousand persons. The total cost, including lecture-hall, schools, and site, was $310,000. The service is that of the Episcopal Church, with some slight modifications.

Mr. Hall, who is a most eloquent evangelical preacher, has acquired some fame as a writer of devotional treatises, one of which, entitled "Come to Jesus," has reached a circulation of upward of three millions, and has been translated into more than twenty foreign languages.

Mr. Hall is a firm believer in the doctrine of our Lord's personal reign on the earth, and he is among those who are looking for His Coming as an event near at hand. An article on the subject from his pen is printed on page 582.

THE LATE SENATOR ANTHONY.

Henry B. Anthony, the "father" of the United States Senate, died at his home in Providence, R. I., on September 2d. Senator Anthony had been in failing health for a long time. Several years ago he was unfortunate enough to be afflicted with blood poisoning, caused by partaking at Baltimore of partridges which had fed on the poisonous berries of the kalmia, or American laurel. This brought on a severe illness, and the evil effects lingered long in his system. He often complained, in fact, that he never made a thorough recovery. For the past few days, however, he had been unusually well, and his death was sudden and unexpected.

Henry Bowen Anthony was born at Coventry, R. I., on April 1st, 1815; he was, therefore, in his seventieth year when he died. He commenced public life as a newspaper man. He first became favorably known to his fellow-citizens as the editor of the Providence Journal.

In 1849 he received the nomination for Governor, and was elected. At the end of his term he was again nominated and elected, and the nomination was pressed upon him for a third term. This, however, he felt it his duty to decline. But his fellow-citizens had no intention of allowing him to retire into private life or to return to editorial labor. He was chosen to succeed Philip Allen, the Democratic Senator from the State, and took his seat in 1859. Since that time he has been regularly re-elected In 1864, in 1870, in 1876, and again in 1882 he received the honor of re-election. Twice he occupied the honorable position of President, pro tempore, of the Senate, and but for the fact that not being at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress technically a Senator, his term having expired, he would have been then elected to the position. When, however, he had taken the oath and his seat, Senator Edmunds resigned, and on January 13th he was again elected President, pro tem. He felt, however, that his ill health would prevent his fulfilment of the duties of the position, and Senator Edmunds was re-elected, that being the first time in its history that the Senate elected two Presidents in half an hour.

Senator Anthony was a tall man, of dignified carriage, with ruddy face and luxuriant white whiskers. He was popular with both parties, though always voting steadily with the Republicans. He spoke rarely, but when he did, especially during the exciting times of 1860-61, his words were uniformly in the interest of peace and a pacific settlement of pending questions. He was careful to express his convictions clearly and forcibly; but when he had to speak of his opponents, or to give utterance to sentiments which must give pain to some of his hearers, he endeavored, with the instinct of a true gentleman, to give as little pain as possible. So few people have that disposition that it is right that the memory of one who had, should be honored on that account.

THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

This nobleman was the elder of the two sons of the Duke of Wellington, who vanquished Napoleon at Waterloo. He died suddenly, while waiting at a railroad depot for his train, on August 13th last. He was born on February 3d, 1807, eight years before the famous battle. At that time his father was plain Sir Arthur Wellesley. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and entered the army, where he rose, by favor, not by merit, to the rank of Lieutenant-General. On the death of his father, in 1852, he succeeded to the hero's titles, pensions, estates, and his seat in the House of Lords. But his career was undistinguished; he was an inconspicuous figure in politics, and, in spite of his great place and name, exercised no influence on public affairs.

As the portrait accompanying this sketch shows, he inherited some of the characteristics of his father's countenance. The great Roman nose is notably there, and the same forehead; but when we look for the Iron Duke's square, massive jaw, we see instead, in the son, a weak, indecisive, receding chin, expressive of effeminacy of character. That feature exactly indicated the Duke's nature. He had none of his father's ability, vigor, and firmness. He was a nonentity, and all that can be said in his favor is that he did not disgrace the name which Europe honored. Even that merit is something in an age when great names are dragged in the mud by degenerate sons.

The agitation against the House of Lords now in progress in England is a reasonable one, and the recently deceased Duke of Wellington was a conspicuous illustration of the anomalies against which the agitation is directed. Under our more enlightened system we do not give the members of the Upper House of our Legislature a longer term than six years; but in England they are not only chosen for life, but their seats descend of right to their heirs. Thus, as in the case of the great Duke of Wellington, there is always the risk of a distinguished statesman passing on the rights he won by his splendid abilities to a son utterly unfit to use them. Under such a system the private and personal evil that oppressed the spirit of Coheleth becomes a national evil, and the nation has reason to lament that a legislator in the House of Lords leaves his right to make laws for the people "to the man that shall be after him. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? Yet shall he have rule" (Eccles. 2 : 18, 19).

MR. LYON'S VISIT TO THE MILLER.

"Look there, sir," said Deacon Fletcher to the young clergyman who was walking by his side to the church, on the Sunday morning which commenced his pastorate, "I call that a disgrace and an outrage in a Christian community." The deacon pointed to a large mill which, in spite of the sacred day, was in full swing. The Rev. Timothy Lyon looked at the offending mill with an expression of surprise, and asked who was its owner.

"His name is Robert Weston, and he is one of the richest men in the county," said the deacon. "He has no need to keep his mill going on Sunday nor, for the matter of that, on any other day. He has plenty of money, and he has only one son. He came here as a laborer, and worked in this very mill. The owner then was a good Christian man, but he had no capacity for business. Everything went wrong with him, and he lost money every year. He always sold at the wrong time, and a rising market always found him with no stock and a falling market with the place crammed to the roof. He never ought to have been in business. He was too fond of books. He had a fine library, with some very rare and old volumes that he was always studying. He was a high Calvinist, and sometimes when he and the minister got into discussion he would talk by the hour, and then you could see how he had studied and read. But that did not help him in the mill, and he got poorer every year, until at last the mill was sold, and all the library and everything, and the poor fellow died of a broken heart. Weston got some one to buy the mill who made him manager, with a part interest in the business, and in a few years he managed so well for himself that he owned the whole place. He is a coarse, irreligious fellow, and he said that praying and preaching had ruined the old mill once, so he meant to have none of it. He commenced by running the mill every day of the week, and he works now, as he did at first, whenever the mill is going. As I say, he has made a pile of money, and it often puzzles me. Providence seems to favor him in the very place where a good man was bankrupt."

"That is a strange notion to me, Mr. Lyon. What do you mean?"

"I do not see anything mysterious in it," said the minister. "Christ never promised prosperity to His followers. Indeed, He distinctly warned those who came to Him that in this world they would have tribulation. We often speak vaguely of Providence, and when we come to sift our ideas about it to the bottom, we find that it is a hazy idea that God will save a good man from the consequences of folly. But it is a mistake. A man who does a foolish thing in business or who neglects his business must suffer, whether he be a good or a bad man. The probabilities of business success are all in favor of the irreligious man, because he makes success his object in life, and works for it with no other thought. That kind of work generally succeeds; but a godly man does not make money his principal object, and therefore it often happens that he is distanced in the race for wealth. But his life is not a failure. At its close he enters on an inheritance which he esteems better than wealth. He gains his object, and a man who does that does not fail."

"That's so," assented the deacon; "but Weston's success does harm. Young men see it and say that's the way to get on. I wish we could stop this open defiance of God's law."

"I will call on Weston to-morrow,' said the minister, quietly, "and hear what he has to say."

"You!" the deacon exclaimed, with wide-open eyes. "You don't know him, Mr. Lyon. He'll swear at you, and he has threatened to set his dog on any man who goes to talk religion to him."

"Oh," said Mr. Lyon, smiling, "I'm not afraid! These men are not so terrible as they seem. I shall not be hurt."

The next day Mr. Lyon quietly strolled into the mill, and with easy self-possession shook hands with the miller. He said he was the new minister at the church over there—a new-comer into the county, and being a sociable man liked to know the people. It seemed a remarkably well-managed mill, and he would like to look over it and know the miller and his family. It would have amazed Deacon Fletcher to have seen how well the miller received the young minister and showed him around, answering his sensible questions fully. The minister went all over the mill, and Weston talked glibly about the improvements he had made and his plans. Finally, he invited Mr. Lyon into his house to see his wife and stay supper. After which, the miller having occasion to go again to the mill, Mr. Lyon accompanied him. They were about to part in the lower room when Weston said:

"I am glad to see you, sir. I have enjoyed your visit. You have more sense than your cloth generally has. I would ask you to come again, only I expect you won't like to come when you hear what your church people say about me."

"I have heard all that, Mr. Weston," said Mr. Lyon, smiling, "but I will come again as you invite me. There is no compulsion on you to be a religious man, you know, because you know a minister. We clergymen are commissioned to offer men the greatest and best treasure in life, but they are free to refuse it if they are so minded. There need be no quarrel on that account."

"That is an independent way of putting it," said the miller. "Clergymen generally threaten men like me with hell fire."

"No, we do not threaten. It is our duty to tell them that rejecting God's offer involves that. That is kindness, Mr. Weston. If I saw that you had left a kerosene can where it might explode and set fire to your mill I should run to your house and tell you of it, and I'm sure you would thank me. You would not abuse me for looking after your interest. I see a time coming when you will wish you had accepted God's offer of eternal happiness, when you will be indescribably wretched, and my business is to tell you of it and show you the way to happiness. You do not blame me for that, do you?"

"That's a strange notion to me, Mr. Lyon," said the miller. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that you must die and leave all this, and after death God will judge you. I want to show you how the punishment you deserve has been already suffered by One who loves you, and that you may escape if you will only believe it."

"Well, that is the strangest idea of religion I ever heard," said Weston. "I'll come and hear you preach. I am not a happy man in spite of my success. I should like to know more about this. I'll shut up the mill next Sunday and come to your church."

But the miller did not come. His day of grace was past. Two days after Mr. Lyon's visit he lay, crushed beyond all recognition, under the wheels of one of his own wagons, where he had stumbled and fallen, and the heavy wheels had ground his life out of him. He had gone to the judgment-seat of Him who calls all men to account for the deeds done in the body.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Avowal.

BEFORE long, Annie had recovered her composure, and sat, feeling very much subdued, on the settle in the lodge, while her husband and Robert Waldron waited for her complete recovery.

"I was going to see Miss Waldron," repeated Annie, at last, as soon as she could command her voice.

"But in these rags!" said Grant; "my dear Annie, do control yourself, and satisfy me that you are in a sound mind."

"You will never believe me," cried Annie, all her indignation reviving; "but she positively sent these old things this morning as a gift to Hester Morley."

"Hester Morley!" echoed Grant, while Robert's face grew dark.

"Hester!" he said; "I can scarcely believe what you say. Why, Hester is to be my wife, if I can win her by any means; and you tell me these things were sent to her by my sister!"

"Your wife!" exclaimed Annie.

"Yes," he answered, curbing a little his passion. "You know her, both of you; what is there to surprise you in the fact that I love her?"

"Oh, nothing!" they both answered in one breath; and then all three were silent, none of them looking at the others. Annie was quite calm now, and ready to submit to any of her husband's directions. He said, gravely, she must give up her intended visit to Miss Waldron, and that she could wait where she was, while he fetched her one of her own hats and cloaks.

Robert stayed behind with her, but Annie did not enter into conversation with him; and he felt embarrassed by her silence. Very few words passed between them before Grant's return, but he shook hands heartily with her before she left.

"I like you, and I thank you very much for what you had intended to do," he said, and he turned his steps homeward, while Grant accompanied Annie back safely to her own house.

Carl listened in silence to the story of Annie's escapade, but it touched and made to vibrate painfully many cords in his nature. His friend Miss Waldron had been gradually losing some of the brightness of the halo with which she had crowned herself; but this impertinence toward Hester appeared to show him the shallowness of her heart. Those who demand little homage for themselves, require the whole world to acknowledge the superiority of those they love. He was too deeply wounded by her conduct to speak of it, even to his sister, but he could ask a question about Hester.

"Are they so very poor, then?" he said.

"So poor," answered Annie, "that she asked Miss Waldron and me if we could give her any work to do."

"Yet Hester has just taken in a poor woman," observed Grant, "and fitted up a little out-building at the back of the house for her. She asked me to go to see her yesterday. A poor creature. I found her almost frightened to death by some London fellow, who told her her lungs were almost gone. I don't believe it. I dare say it is she who wants the sewing, for she must live."

"But why should not Hester tell us so?" asked Annie.

"There is some mystery about it," he replied; "the woman has evidently been an educated woman. I asked her age particularly, and she said she was thirty-four. She seemed oppressed by a peculiar kind of fear which I could not account for. I have my suspicions."

"What are they?" asked Carl, looking up eagerly.

Grant leaned over the table toward him, and lowered his voice to a whisper which would have been inaudible to the keenest ear outside the room.

"That this woman is no other than John Morley's lost wife," he said. "Mark you, it is no more than a suspicion, and it must be sacred with us. But if it be so—"

"Then God bless and help Hester!" cried Carl, rising suddenly, and making his escape to his study.

Miss Waldron heard no more of her gift to Hester. By one common consent, arrived at by different processes, all those who had become acquainted with the circumstance permitted it to drop into apparent oblivion. Hester knew nothing of Annie's plan of revenge which had been prematurely nipped; and as she never mentioned Miss Waldron's present again, Annie did not care to speak of it. She could not but acknowledge that her husband and Carl were right when they said that the whole thing must be suffered to pass, and that it would be dangerous to make an enemy of Miss Waldron. But she was glad Robert knew—exceedingly glad. She had no doubt it would come out some day or other from his lips, and cover his sister with confusion. In the mean time it was very difficult to maintain a pleasant and cordial demeanor toward her, when she came to see Carl so often.

This action of Miss Waldron had thrown difficulties into the paths of all. To Hester it made it a far from easy task to go to Aston Court, as she felt herself compelled to, in order to finish the business arrangements with Mr. Waldron, who had insisted upon advancing a sum of £500 instead of £200, which would set John Morley clear from his liabilities for about twelve months to come. Robert, on his part, found it so hard to keep this secret, and restrain his wrath, that he was not sorry when some pressing business demanded his presence in London; though it prevented him seeing Hester upon her rare visits to his father.

But for Carl the difficulty was tenfold. He had now been pastor of the church at Little Aston for more than six months, and Miss Waldron began to be impatient at the slowness of his comprehension with respect to the marks of preference she showered upon him. She had become at last aware of a growing coldness in Annie Grant's manner, which was at once unaccountable and unpardonable, seeing that both Grant and Carl were under the patronage of her family. She could not brook any caprices in her inferiors, but it was necessary to overlook those of Annie Grant, on account of Carl, whose study she could not invade if she had any serious disagreement with his sister. Her attachment for the young, handsome, and eloquent minister was growing into a folly, for the sake of which she was ready to sacrifice any pique, or endure any coolness from Annie. She fostered a hope, gathering strength every day, that Carl would at length take courage to woo the wealthy and eminent daughter of his patron.

On his part, Carl, without Annie's aid, perhaps, would have been no slower than any other young man to understand her tokens of preference; but they were no pleasure to him. How to act he did not know. He was most anxious to put an end to them; but he did not at all see how it could be done. His delicate reverence for womanhood, and his dignified sense of duty as a pastor, imposed upon him the task of setting her to rights as soon as possible. He felt that their present intercourse hampered and fettered him in many of his duties; and he waited with impatience some opportunity for gently and considerately dispelling her illusion. The opportunity arrived at last.

"You regard me as a sister, Carl," she said to him one evening as they crossed the park together in the dusk, after she had stayed so long at Grant's house as to be afraid to return home alone. She had of late relinquished her strong-mindedness.

'Certainly," answered Carl, somewhat absently.

"Then you ought to tell me of my faults," she said, plaintively; "I know I have so many faults, and by this time you must have discovered them. Poor dear Mr. Watson used to say he could not see any; but you have keener sight than he had, Carl."

She dropped her eyes, and half turned away her face, lest Carl's keen sight should read her thoughts too plainly.

"How I would conquer any fault you pointed out!" she continued, with effusion. "Oh, this would be true friendship! I should like you to tell me all you think of me. Could you not tell me all you think of me, dear Carl?"

"I am afraid I should offend you," said Carl, in a low voice, the tone of which she misunderstood.

"Oh, no, you could not offend me," she replied; "it would be impossible! O Carl, you don't know how I should love the truth from your lips. Sometimes while you are preaching I wonder if anybody can attain to the standard you set before us. Do you know anybody who is even striving after it, Carl?"

"Yes, one," he answered.

"And who is that one?" she asked, with a beating heart; "is it yourself, dear Carl?"

"Not even myself," he said, gravely; "I think my standard is simply this: 'If any man will come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.' I dare not say that I have attained to this forgetfulness of self, this daily cross."

"But who, then, is the one that does?" demanded Miss Waldron.

"Hester Morley," answered Carl, with a secret exultation and great gladness of spirit.

Miss Waldron felt herself pierced through with this poignant shaft. She half withdrew her hand from Carl's arm; but he, with an involuntary sympathy for the pain he had inflicted, pressed it closer to his side; and with a fresh hope she laid it again more firmly and heavily upon its resting-place.

"I can tell you," he said, rapidly, "what I can say to no one else, with what delight I have watched Hester. She is more than what I once dreamed of women in my college days. My dreams were poor and vague. I did not know then what a woman's heart is."

"And you love her?" murmured Miss Waldron.

"Yes," he answered, lifting his hat from his head, with an instinctive gesture of reverence, "I love Hester as I love all that is good and true and lovely. I should be blind and foolish if I could do otherwise."

"And you have proposed to her!" she exclaimed. "You are engaged to her?"

"No," he replied; "I do not know that I shall ever tell her that I love her. She has another suitor, far above me, who has perhaps won her love. If Hester is not tempted by your brother's riches, I shall ask her to share my poverty."

"My brother!" ejaculated Miss Waldron.

"Yes," he said; "you told me yourself that he met her clandestinely. I know that he formed an attachment for her many months ago."

"Do you suppose that Robert Waldron, of Aston Court, could ever marry John Morley's daughter?" she asked, bitterly.

Carl did not answer, and she walked beside him for some minutes in silence, striving to keep down the passion which would fain have found vent. She could not conceal from herself the reason of this confidence reposed in her before he had owned his love to Hester herself. He had detected the sentiments which she had cherished for him. He, the unknown, penniless, friendless student, chosen by herself put into his pulpit by her hand, had discovered that she loved him—and rejected her! She knew very well that she had not attempted to hide her affection for him; but her mortification was none the less bitter.

"I do not ask you to keep my secret," said Carl, gently. "I do not know that I wish it to be a secret. If it were not that I have promised to leave Hester unbiassed; if my honor was not pledged to do so, I should have asked John Morley for his daughter before this. Not that we could marry at present; we are both young. But that I might have the right to help her, that we might help each other, to bear the sorrows of life."

His voice, which had been calm at first, faltered as he uttered the last sentence, and fell into such a tone of tenderness that Miss Waldron felt as if she could not bear to hear him speak another word.

"You have taken me a little by surprise," she said; "yet now I come to think of it, nothing could be more natural. You recollect I predicted something like this. Hester is of your own age, and your own rank in life; you could not look much higher. She is the only girl in our congregation who is your equal by birth and education; the others, no doubt, are somewhat beneath you. I wish, for your sake, that John Morley was not so greatly involved in difficulties."

"I know they are poor," said Carl.

"Worse than that," continued Miss Waldron. "After your confidence, I feel justified in telling you all I know. John Morley is in imminent danger of bankruptcy and disgrace. In fact, but for my father he would have been a bankrupt already."

It was Carl's turn to feel a painful contraction of the heart. If John Morley had surrendered his ancient resentment so far as to suffer himself to be saved from bankruptcy by the Waldrons, could it be anything but a sign of what must be in the end?

"Miss Waldron," he said, after a long pause, "I do not suppose I shall ever tell Hester of my love. It seems to me as if she will never belong to me. But I shall never love any other woman as I love her. If John Morley were branded for the vilest of crimes in the face of the whole world, she would still be the woman I love."

"It is an infatuation!" muttered Miss Waldron, between her teeth.

"Perhaps so," he answered, calmly; "but it is an infatuation sweeter than any pleasure I ever tasted."

"You are not the devoted servant of God I thought you," she said, austerely.

"I trust I am His servant," replied Carl, with increasing calmness; "and I hope that every day will find me more devoted to His service. But He does not require me to be b'ind. If He should give Hester to me, I will take her as His truly precious gift. But if not, what else can I do but submit myself to His will?"

Miss Waldron did not answer, but she withdrew her hand finally from his arm. Carl understood the significant action, and felt sorry for it; but he fancied that her good sense, if not her religion, could at least restore peace between them in the course of a few days. It was most desirable that he should continue to be on friendly terms with the most influential woman belonging to his church. He believed firmly in her goodness still, though he had sounded the shallowness of her mind; and it did not occur to him that she might nurse her jealousy and disappointment into revenge. In silence they completed their walk; and when Miss Waldron dismissed him coldly, without asking him to go in, he turned away a little sorrowful for her, but not in the least apprehensive for himself.

A SONG OF PRAISE.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 21, Ps. 103. Golden Text, ver. 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Appeal Implies Purity—The Benefits to be Remembered—Physical and Spiritual—Confession Necessary to Forgiveness—Joy and Peace Produced—A Steamer Providentially Missed—Deliverance Assured—A Precious Promise.

"BLESS the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless His holy name." David must have been sure that all within him was right with God, or he could not have made such an appeal to his soul. A man living in sin could never say, "All that is within me, bless God's holy name." Who could say, "Temper, bless God's holy name; impurity, lying, self-indulgence, vanity, envy, evil-speaking, ye inhabitants of my heart, bless God's holy name?" No; David had gone to the Lord for cleansing and for keeping; the Lord had answered his prayer, and in the depth of joy which belongs to a heart right with God, he could say, "All that is within me, bless His holy name." He was not conscious of a thought or feeling which did not praise the Lord. David was not dwelling on his own faithfulness to God, all his joy sprang out of what God was to him, and thus he cried, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and FORGET NOT ALL HIS BENEFITS!"

What benefits were they which demanded praise from the man's entire soul? "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases." David praised his God for healing of soul and body. In Ps. 32: 1–5 he tells of his spiritual healing, and cannot but sing, "Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile." In Ps. 30: 2 he sings of bodily healing, "O Lord my God, I cried, and thou hast healed me. O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave: thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit." Again and again in the Word of God we find spiritual and physical healing side by side. "And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick; and the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity" (Isa. 33: 24). "Behold, I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure them, and will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth" (Jer. 33: 6). "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him" (James 5: 15). Before David's sins could be forgiven them. "I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sins" (Ps. 32: 5). Before he could be healed he must hearken to God and obey Him. "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 15: 26). David had freely confessed when he was wrong, and received conscious pardon; he had listened to the voice which called him to attention through his sickness, and now, like a bird set free, he rejoiced in the glorious consciousness of liberty, and his happy soul could not but praise God. He had no longer any anxiety about soul or body; both were in the hands of his loving, faithful God, who would not fail to do all for him. David was satisfied, not with himself, but with his God; and thus he sung His praises, not from a sense of duty, but because he could not help it; his only fear was lest he should forget any of the numberless benefits he had received and was always receiving from his God. Some people they are always on the lookout for them; they always see them on ahead, and go more than half way to meet them, and so entertain them by anticipation, make the most of them while they last, and then tell about them so often that they grow larger, even after they are past, so that in memory they are greater and heavier than when they were present. These are the people to whom it never comes easy to praise God; to them He is a God far off.

HE MUST CONFESS

David does not speak a word of his troubles in all this Psalm, but he speaks of God's benefits as continual things. He does not say, "Who once forgave me" or "once healed me," but "who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." There is a repose of joy in this Psalm; it is like a lifeboat in the midst of the waves, a fortress in the midst of a besieging host. "Who redeemeth thy life from destruction." How could David fear accident or injury; how fear pestilence or sickness? At hand was the God who redeemed him from all these things; his God was a Shield placed between him and evil. "Who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mercies." Not one word of merit can David plead; he does not attempt it, but he sees himself crowned, loaded with lovingkindness and tender mercies. Was he better off than others? Some might think that Saul, the chosen of the nation, the handsome man of stature, was crowned with mercy and lovingkindness more than David, whose life was full of such vicissitudes. But David's eyes were open to see the loving hand of his God; and while Saul was full of complaints, David saw lovingkindness and mercy all around him, so that he could say, "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth unto such as keep His covenant and His testimonies" (Ps. 25: 10). Whatever we take from the hand of God He makes blessed to us; the same hand which made five loaves and two fishes food enough for five thousand men can also change the most trying and impossible circumstances which are yielded up to Him into loving kindness and tender mercy. A Christian man going out to America at Liverpool by a delay of the train. At first he could not understand it, for time and money were lost; but he committed the matter to God. He went by the next steamer, and the one he wanted to catch was lost, and all hands on board The delay was loving kindness and tender mercy.

The Lord cares for His children's food, "who satisfieth thy mouth with good things so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's." Can the hand of love do more? Yes. "He executeth righteousness and judgment for all them that are oppressed." How senseless, then, is it for any of God's children to attempt for a moment to fight their own battles! "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." Could a loving father see his own children oppressed and not right them? And will not our Father, who has all the resources of the universe at His command, right His own beloved ones? Yes, it is so to do, except we hinder Him by taking the matter into our own hands. Joseph was oppressed by his brethren, and later on by Potiphar. The Lord executed judgment for His child, and made him ruler over Egypt. Job was oppressed by Satan; the Lord executed judgment, and when Job had learned the needed lesson He made Job the intercessor for his friends, and gave him double what Satan had taken from him. Peter was oppressed by Herod; the Lord executed judgment. He sent His angel to waken Peter, strike off his chains, and lead him out of the prison gates, leaving the soldiers to whom he was chained asleep behind him, while soon after Herod, his persecutor, "was eaten of worms and died" (Acts 12).

It is a safe thing and a glorious thing to have our cause in the hands of God. He is merciful, gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy, but never weak, never unjust, never making light of sin. Truly "He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is His mercy toward them that fear Him." How is it shown? "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us." How? Where to? To "His own body on the tree" (1 Pet. 2: 24), and thence "into the depths of the sea" (Micah 7: 20). Praise God for the complete separation between us and our sins, if we are the Lord's own believing and obedient children! They are an immeasurable distance from us.

Here again we have

HIS CARE FOR SOUL AND BODY.

Not only hath He so removed our transgressions from us, but "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are dust." Just as an earthly parent knows how to measure exactly his child's capacity of endurance, both physically and morally, so is it with God. Trusting Him, we need never fear to be overdriven. He will never give work for which He does not provide the strength, wisdom, and time necessary. All our overwork comes from taking responsibilities which God does not lay upon us, or from self-will in letting our zeal lay upon us what the will of God has never called us to. His yoke is easy, not difficult; His burden is light, not heavy. So often we think that we know our frame, and we attempt to manage our own bodies, but we always miss it somewhere. He wants Himself to be our great study while He makes us His.

Man is but as a flower of the field, over which the wind passes and it is gone. "But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear Him, and His righteousness unto children's children, unto such as keep His covenant, and remember His commandments to do them." Praise God for this promise! Man cannot hold his own soul in life, but, taking his true position of dependence on the Lord, his own life of soul and body and his children's also, is guaranteed. And He who made known His ways unto Moses, makes them known unto those who willingly learn of Him and keep His covenant. Oh, the wondrous, unspeakable mercy and love of our God! Even here in the Old Testament it is inconceivable. But if we add that He gives Jesus to dwell in us as our Life, Health, Righteousness, Sanctification, Wisdom, Redemption, oh, how beyond all language does it become! "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name!"

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Second Bombardment of Kelung by the French fleet is reported from Hong Kong. It is reported that the attack on Kelung was prompted by the desire to obtain possession of the coal mines, which would prove extremely useful to the French in case war was declared and the neutral ports closed. The Chinese frustrated this scheme by flooding the mines and destroying the pumping machinery. The Chinese Government has become more warlike in its attitude. Tien-Tsin advices state that six members of the Chinese Foreign office who advised the government to make peace with France have been dismissed, and that persons who advise the payment of the indemnity demanded by France are threatened with punishment. Rumors that American mediation had been invited were again circulated last week, but were not confirmed.

The Cholera is Working Terrible Havoc in Italy, and its fatality is increased by the panic into which the people have been thrown by its approach. A correspondent says a veritable panic prevails among the populace in some of the districts infected with the cholera. In many instances physicians in attempting to minister to cholera patients have been brutally maltreated, and in some cases wounded with knives. The persons making these assaults labor under the delusion that the doctors are engaged in poisoning the people. The desire of the populace to prevent the spread of the infection has led them in some instances to offer armed opposition to railway traffic. As was intimated at the first outbreak of the disease in Marseilles, it would be extremely fatal if it reached Naples, that city being in a worse sanitary condition than any other in Europe. It was so bad that it invited the cholera. Two deaths occurred in Naples on Monday, September 1st; the next day there were sixty, and by Friday the deaths from the disease reached ninety-eight. Twelve other cities are affected, the highest death rate next to Naples being that of Genoa, in which city on Friday, thirty deaths were registered. The Times correspondent, whose intrepidity during this cholera epidemic has won him world-wide fame, reports that so far the disease in Naples, as in Marseilles, has been confined to the most wretched and dirty sections of the city. The sudden outbreak was doubtless due to a state of general intemperance on the 31st of August, which was a fête day. It has been especially noted in Italy that there has been a great increase in this disease after each heavy rainfall, favoring Dr. Koch's moisture theory. Fortunately, at Naples live some of the finest physicians and men of science in the world, and discoveries in treatment are therefore likely—such, in fact, as will be of vast benefit.

The Expedition under Lord Wolseley for the relief of General Gordon is the subject of anxiety. The gradual subsidence of the Nile is one of the chief causes, as it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the vessels to pass the cataracts if the river continues falling. The Herald's London correspondent reports that Lord Wolseley was so impressed by an interview with Mr. Henry M. Stanley that he immediately offered the famous explorer an appointment in connection with his staff. Mr. Stanley asked if such an appointment implied employment in the Queen's service, and General Wolesley assured him that it did. Mr. Stanley thereupon obtained permission from the King of the Belgians, the president of the African International Association, to accept this new honor, and will start immediately for Egypt.

Lieutenant Greely's Reception at Montreal, on September 2d, by the British Association for the Advancement of Science, was of a most enthusiastic character. The distinguished scientists manifested no jealousy at being outstripped by the American explorer. Lieutenant Greely, in a brief speech, put the question whether the furthest northern point attained by his assistant, Lieutenant Lockwood, was nearer the pole than the most northerly point reached by the English Captain Markham, at once beyond all doubt, by stating positively that Lieutenant Lockwood reached the parallel of 83° 24′ north latitude, being several miles nearer the pole than the English went. To make the matter doubly sure, he described the astronomical observations by which the fact was determined, and, moreover, showed that Cape Britannia was some miles further south than the British maps had placed it. Nearly a hundred miles of coast line, he said, had been added to the maps beyond the furthest point ever seen before. A striking contrast of opinion was developed between Lieutenant Ray and Lieutenant Greely upon the problem of the existence of an open polar sea. Lieutenant Ray, basing his conclusions on his experience at Point Barrow, expressed his decided belief that there is no such sea. Lieutenant Greely, on the other hand, looking at the results he obtained from his explorations, reached the conclusion that there is such a sea. Several of the members of the Royal Geographical Society, who spoke after Lieutenant Greely was through, coincided in his opinion that there is an open polar sea. Captain Bedford Pim, of the Royal Navy, who rescued McClintock in his search for Sir John Franklin, in 1853, and who himself came near dying of starvation in the Arctic regions, spoke in warm praise of the American lieutenant's work, and declared, amid applause, that it should be pushed on until man had reached the pole. A letter, signed on behalf of the British Association by Lord Rayleigh, Sir William Thomson, Professor James Glaisher, Sir James Douglas, Captain Bedford Pim, Sir J. H. Lefroy, and the Bishop of Toronto, was handed to Lieutenant Greely as a memento of the occasion. They expressed, on behalf of many warm friends and admirers, their appreciation of the courage and devotion which had characterized Lieutenant Greely's conduct during the trying circumstances of his late services. They united in the hope that his health might soon be restored, and that he would long be spared to render valuable and devoted services to his great country which had already placed him among the foremost of the scientific explorers of the age.

The Red Cross Congress, in which America is represented by Miss Clara Barton, the heroine of the civil war, opened at Geneva on September 2d. Only four French delegates were present. The number of German delegates was thirty-six. Three speakers addressed the Congress and spoke in German. The French delegates complained of this, as the rules of the Congress prescribed French. The German delegates, however, continued the discussion in German. The Empress Augusta, of Germany, sent a donation of $1000.

Mr. R. T. Booth, the American Temperance orator, contemplates spending a lengthened period in Temperance work in the Australian colonies. "A sufficient sum has been subscribed," says the Southern Cross, "to warrant Mr. Booth in sending for his wife and family from America. We are founding a new nation, and now is the time to grapple earnestly and effectively with the curse of strong drink."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

IN compliance with the wishes of its friends THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week reproduces the portraits of the two devoted servants of God who have come to our shores in the interests of His cause. The presence of Mr. and Mrs. Guinness in our midst has quickened anew the interest in them and their work, and those who have had the privilege of listening to them during the past few days, especially, desire to know all that is to be known about them. An apology for the reproduction is due to our old subscribers, but they will doubtless pardon it for the sake of the large number whose names have been added to our list since the portraits appeared, two and a half years ago.

The Rev. H. Grattan and Mrs. Guinness have gained a world-wide reputation for their concentrated enterprise and untiring zeal in the service of Christ. Mr. Guinness is a man who puts his work forward rather than himself; so it happens that very little is known of him otherwise than as a public man, except the fact that he is a cousin of Sir Arthur Guinness, the well-known Dublin brewer. He became first known to the Christian public about twenty-five years ago, at the time of the first appearance of Mr. Spurgeon in London. Mr. Guinness preached to great crowds in London, and in the North of Ireland. Afterward, in 1859, he made an evangelistic tour in Canada and the United States, and attracted large audiences. He also turned to profitable account a tour of study and observation which he made in Egypt, Syria, and Turkey.

THE BIBLE CARRIAGE.

To Mr. Guinness the honor belongs of being one of the first to overcome the difficulty of proclaiming the Gospel in the chief cities of France, when, under the Empire, the sale of Bibles at bookstalls and open-air preaching were both forbidden. With characteristic ingenuity and energy he procured a cart and horse, and travelled the streets with a stock of Bibles for sale. Large crowds were attracted by that novel way of doing business, and as the Bibles were accompanied with a few words of earnest exhortation, the way of salvation was communicated to multitudes who were shut out from it by the laws of the country. Subsequently he made Bath, in England, his headquarters, where Mrs. Guinness wrote a most interesting biography of Mrs. Henry Dening (Miss Geraldine Hooper), the well-known and successful lady preacher.

Mr. Guinness has prepared an enduring monument to his name in his great book, "The Approaching End of the Age," which in four years passed through two editions in England and has been published in this country. It is one of the most elaborate works on the subject of prophetic Scripture that has ever been written, and has attracted a larger measure of attention than an uninterested public usually accords to that vast and important branch of Bible knowledge. The author shows in that book an exceptional power of taking a comprehensive view of a subject as well as an exact view, and deals exhaustively with facts and figures, the least fascinating of all descriptions of literary work. Page after page commands the reader's admiration for the clear head and unwearying industry that have produced the book, which, moreover, was written during no period of leisure, but when Mr. Guinness was daily occupied with the trying and varied responsibilities of his Missionary Institute, a picture of which forms part of the frontispiece in this number.

Mr. Guinness received efficient help in the preparation of "The Approaching End of the Age," from his accomplished and faithful wife, to whom he pays this tribute in the preface: "There remains to the author the grateful task of acknowledging the very considerable help he has had in writing and revising this volume from the practised pen of his beloved wife, for many years the sharer of his toils in various efforts to spread in different lands the knowledge of saving or of sanctifying truth. The part which, in spite of much wearying labor by day, and often by night, as Honorary Secretary of the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, she has cheerfully taken in the task of preparing this work, however others may regard the result, will endear it to him while memory endures."

Mention has been made in the preceding paragraphs of

THE MISSIONARY INSTITUTE.

This College has a history replete with interest, whether regard be had to its inception, its mode of work, or its grand success. Its origin took place in February, 1873, at No. 29 Stepney Green, London, England, and its originators and first Directors were Mr. H. Grattan Guinness and Dr. Barnardo, who prayerfully conferred upon the subject, and in their energetic hands the scheme soon assumed a practical shape. But, the question may be asked, "What made these two brethren think of training and helping forth missionaries?" In the first place it may be answered, that they both originally themselves contemplated becoming missionaries; Mr. Guinness intended to join the mission begun by Captain Gardiner in Terra del Fuego, and Dr. Barnardo had dedicated himself as a medical missionary to China.

MAN PROPOSES BUT GOD DISPOSES.

The Lord had other work in store for His servants, and by His Providence unmistakably indicated to each that he was to take a different path. Both were to be missionaries, they had not mistaken their vocation, but both were to be Home missionaries; one itinerant, the other local. Dr. Barnardo founded, and has for many years conducted, the important East End Juvenile Mission and Homes, which now contain more than one thousand boys and girls, at a cost of $2500 a week.

Mr. Guinness's and Dr. Barnardo's experience of mission work, and their interest in the foreign field not having in anywise cooled by the fact that they were personally unable to labor in it, the desire very naturally arose in their hearts, to help in the same direction younger and freer men, who might do what they themselves had longed and intended to do—preach Christ among the heathen.

Mr. Guinness's frequent evangelistic tours brought him in contact with many such young men, and Dr. Barnardo's varied missionary operations in Stepney seemed to afford a most suitable sphere for a Training Home. Believing the thought to be of God, they resolved, after prayerful consideration, to do what they could. The Home was opened in 1873 and, at once, applications were made by one hundred young men who wished to consecrate themselves to the service of Christ among the heathen; and, after the most careful selection had been exercised, thirty-two were received, and entered on a suitable course of training. They were from different denominations.

was installed in the post of honorary secretary, which she has filled since the origin of the Missionary Institute, and has endeared herself to all who love the Master, by her lofty conscientiousness, noble self-abnegation for the good of others, and untiring industry in furthering the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. She is a very able speaker and writer.

THE AIM IN THE STUDIES,

to which, from the very first, the attention of the young men has been directed, is rather to ground them well in general knowledge than to perfect them in any one branch. It is felt that a missionary should know something of everything, geography, astronomy, navigation, botany, medicine, physiology and surgery, and should also be enough of a practical mechanic to know how to supplement physical power by the use of the mechanical forces. He may, if he be a pioneer missionary, have to build his house, to make his furniture, to till his garden, to cook his food, to make his clothes and mend them, as well as to work the printing-press, etc.

But, above all it is with the truth of the Word of God that a missionary's mind should be thoroughly furnished, and in the Biblical studies pursued at Mr. Guinness's Institute, a special effort is made to teach the students to understand the Bible as a whole, and its doctrines in their variety and harmony; equipping the young men at the same time to silence the foolish objections of adversaries and to answer the questions of sincere inquirers as to the grounds on which it is concluded that the Bible is authentic and divine.

The measure of culture which the students receive varies in each individual case, according to his abilities, previous training, and the length of the period he can devote to study. As to the last point, Mr. Guinness does not require any particular time, but looks for special guidance from God as regards each of His servants. They are mostly young men without means, and are therefore maintained and educated gratuitously.

occupies much of the time of the students, and this is found to be attended with many solid advantages. It tests and develops their fitness for missionary labors, and benefits the ignorant and ungodly in whose midst they reside. They, therefore, visit from house to house, teach the young in Sunday and week-night schools, engage in open-air preaching, and hold frequent meetings in halls and chapels both in and around London. In their visiting they have been brought into contact with multitudes of the wretched and depraved of various classes, with street vendors, beggars, tramps, outcasts; with infidels, Romanists, Jews; with French, Germans, Hindoos, and Asiatics of all races; and have gained access to low lodging-houses and to more respectable dwellings in the miles of narrow, ill-ventilated streets which stretch around London in every direction. In this way they have engaged in conversation on the things of God, with people plunged in ignorance and vice, and pointed them with the happiest results, to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world.

THE FINANCES.

This great work was begun without any funds in hand, or any promises of support, but with the conviction that if it were of God, and for His glory, He would send the needful funds. And God has been the Helper of the Institute, and inclined the hearts of His stewards to aid generously with their substance. Yet the faith of God's servants has often been exercised, and the treasury often empty. On one occasion, after the payment of some heavy expenses, nothing was left in hand; and prayer for daily bread for the large household went up more earnestly than usual, for not only had the current outlay to be met, but some needed additions in prospect required at least $500. This was in the first year of the Institute's existence. One of the two directors had to leave London for a week's special services in a distant city; he carried the burden with him, and laid it daily before the Lord. Going down one evening to the hall where he was to preach, a telegram from his colleague awaited him. "Good news! I have received $1000 for the Institute; praise the Lord!" He did praise Him; and preached His faithfulness all the more fervently from this fresh illustration of it.

HARLEY HOUSE, EAST LONDON, was taken for the work of the second year, the house at Stepney Green having been altogether outgrown by the necessities and demands which had arisen. The extension of Dr. Bernardo's work rendered it impossible for him to continue his practical co-operation, and so he withdrew and we are unanimously of opinion that the only thing to do is to supply certain villages with police carbines and ammunition, and endeavor to persuade the villagers to attempt to kill these beasts themselves, giving the usual reward of one hundred rupees (a rupee is worth thirty-eight cents) for an ordinary tiger, and a special reward of two hundred rupees for the well established death of a man-eater. I think it likely that this unprecedented human slaughter may arise from an unusual dearth of firearms in the country.

It is clear to me that if something is not done to stop these ravages the country side will be gradually depopulated. I should say that at least six villages have been abandoned quite recently from this cause, and this means that lands have fallen out of cultivation, that the people try to live on jungle produce, and failing that, go off elsewhere. It is horrible to contemplate the feelings of a poor laborer going out for his day's work to a field a few hundred yards from his house, with the knowledge about him that there is an even chance of his being carried away from the side of his plough, or that his wife may be seized when she is bringing him his mid-day meal.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Veteran's Testimony.—Mr. McCarthy, of the China Inland Mission, speaking at a recent meeting, said: "I am glad to give my testimony that according as I have been faithful in preaching the Gospel, not only in Christian lands, but also in heathen countries, where there was no other Christian among thousands of heathen, I have had my own soul refreshed and made strong. Many think that we get closer to Christ when we are in the midst of a meeting of Christians; but my experience is, that when alone in the heart of China, surrounded with worshippers of idols, I have had greater joy in Christ, and closer communion with Him, than I ever had in a meeting of Christians."

The First Arrival at the Meeting.—"I was much impressed by a word of Mr. Moody's once at a very crowded meeting. There were thousands present, and there was perfect stillness in the vast concourse when Mr. Moody said, 'Do you know who was the first person to enter this building to night?' If one's eyes had been shut one would have thought the place was empty so intense was the silence during the slight pause ere Mr. Moody answered his own question. He then said, 'It was the devil!' In every meeting the devil has an emissary trying to destroy the work of the Holy Spirit, and endeavoring to hurry men down to perdition."

A Mill Girl's Trophies for Christ.—Mr. Porter said: "It is not only in mission halls, churches, or at open-air meetings, that the work of the Holy Ghost in saving men is seen. Some time ago I met a young woman who works in a mill for her daily bread. She had been blessed in the after-meeting in a hall, and set to work to win souls for the Master in the mill. Going on in faith, she got twelve souls gathered in, and they are now banded together to win others during meal hours; and so the work of the Lord goes on quietly, little streams filling up the big rivers, and the rivers flowing to the ocean of His love, which will one day sweep over the wide world, till all men shall know and serve Him."

The Good That Came of a Broken Arm.—Mr. Simpson related, at a recent Mizpah meeting, an instance of the good work being done in London through the power of sacred song. In one of the lower districts there lived a husband and wife who were hard drinkers, and reckless of their home. In fact, they were thoroughly debauched by drink and sin. One day the woman fell down-stairs, breaking one of her arms in three places. She was carried to the hospital, where her arm was amputated. While she lay there she got time to become sober, and with sobriety came reflection. As she pondered over her past sinful life, she thought, 'If this is all the devil can do for me it is time I changed masters.' The first thing she did on leaving the hospital was to go to a meeting, where she was converted to Christ. She immediately told her husband, who was enraged and refused to let her go again. One night, her husband said, 'I am going to the meeting to-night; I don't care for Moody and his rubbish of talk; but I am told that Sankey sings a good song, and I want to hear him.' He went to the meeting, and was converted that same night, and one can easily imagine the joy of that household when he went home and told them that now he was a changed man, saved through faith in the atoning blood of Christ."

Daft Meggie's Song.—An Interesting Incident is related by Mr Pittendreigh: "A half-crazy woman in Dundee was converted to Christ, and as she went about the streets she was always singing 'Jesus Loves Me.' One day a gentleman stopped her, saying, 'Meggie, you are aye singing "Jesus Loves Me."' 'Aye, sir, I am aye singing because I have a light heart.' 'Why don't you sing "I Love Jesus" sometimes?' 'Ah, sir, my love is no worth singing about.' It would be a good thing for us all if we just took as lowly a place as poor daft Meggie, losing sight of ourselves, and totally enraptured with the love and beauty of the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Scotch Whiskey-Seller's Conversion.—Mr. Clyde said that in some meetings recently held in James Morrison Street, Glasgow, he met a young man who was in charge of a whiskey shop, where he got good wages for filling people with drink. "The Holy Spirit of God works in strange places sometimes, and He was working in that man's breast behind that counter. The man's wife was also much troubled about her soul, and they were both induced to come to the meetings, where they were converted to Christ, and decided there and then to cast themselves upon the Lord for bread, and to give up the trade of ruining the souls and bodies of men. The man is now working hard for half the sum he earned before, and he tells me that there are many men in the trade who would gladly give it up if they could only trust in God for food. Pray, for them, dear friends."

A Timid Woman's Mistake.—The Rev. Mr. Edgar said: "Confession of our faith in Christ is an absolute necessity, if we would grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord. I remember the case of a very timid woman who was truly converted, but refrained from making a public or even a private confession of Christ, because she thought that she should wait until her husband was converted. The quiet joy of knowing and having intimate fellowship with Jesus left her, and many gloomy thoughts disturbed her soul. She consulted her minister, who said, 'I think you are acting wrongly; come right out for Christ, and sit down at His table; it may be the means of your husband's conversion.' 'I did not think of that. I will do it now,' the woman answered. The husband was converted almost immediately, and so encouraged was his timid wife that she invited a party of all her friends, and boldly told them of her conversion to the Saviour. There and then they began to praise God and pray for a revival in their midst."

A Lighted Candle in a Quart Bottle.—The Rev. Mr. Somerville related: "A question was put by a youngster of ten years, which, I think, many children of older growth have often been puzzled with. It was, 'What is the difference between a light to our path, and a lamp to our feet?' I think I can answer it. When I was in California, I had to travel from one mining camp to another. The way was difficult and the night was dark, so my friends directed me to keep a certain light in my eye all the time. Now that direction was very good, but then there were many hard bits on the road, and besides, I did not want to fall in a disused mine shaft, so I got a 'cariboo' lamp, which consisted of a quart bottle, empty, with the bottom cleverly knocked out, and a candle fixed in the neck, inside the bottle, and holding the bottle by the neck, I got light for my feet. The main light of our path is the Lord Jesus, toward whom we keep our faces; but we require a lamp for daily guidance. That we get in Scripture; and by daily, nay, momentarily placing ourselves in the hand of God, to lead us even in the dark."

A STOLEN BIBLE

SCEPTICS have frequently ridiculed the narrative of the idol Dagon falling down before the ark of the Lord (1 Samuel 5). That in common with other miracles recorded in God's Word has been placed by the learned men who in our day are revising and expurgating the Bible in the category of "the legends of the child race." It is no part of our duty to defend the literal truth of the Bible records. They have stood unmoved against the assaults of men and devils through the ages, and will stand impregnable though attacked by open enemies, and subject to the treachery of men who wear the garb of their defenders. It may, however, strengthen the faith of some wavering ones to know that in our own day miracles more wonderful are being performed. As Christ speaking of the man sick of the palsy (Matt. 9 : 5) intimated, the spiritual is greater than the material miracle. That in the presence of the captured ark, a stone image should fall down, is not so wonderful as that the idols of a man's soul should be overthrown by the truth contained in a stolen Bible. Such an incident is related by the Rev. J. L. Lyons who received the narrative from the subject of the miracle.

"I know a man," says Mr. Lyons, "who was converted to the Christian faith by means of a Bible which he had stolen. I met him living in a little Arab village on Mount Lebanon, where, alas! the light that once shone there is now extinguished amid errors and superstition of false religion.

"'How was it,' I inquired of this converted Arab, 'that you became a Christian while all your neighbors still remain in ignorance and degradation?' 'I will tell you my experience in a few words,' he replied; 'I was a conscript in the Turkish army. On one occasion my company made a raid into an adjoining district and plundered the houses of the inhabitants. On returning to camp I found in my share of the booty an old soiled volume, which on examination proved to be a Bible. I afterward took it home, and though I could read but little, I was bent on studying it and I did so alone for some time. I learned much, though there was much I could not understand, I prayed to the God of the Bible for light and after a time obtained instruction. I found that I was a poor lost sinner, and that there was no help for me but in Jesus. I had the happiness at last of knowing that my sins were forgiven for the sake of Jesus and that I might rely on Him for strength to live a new life.'

"Then the good man related to me how severely his neighbors persecuted him on account of his religion. They denounced him as a heretic and a renegade; they insulted him by day and harassed him by night; they cut down his fruit trees and destroyed his vineyard, and drove him, at length, an exile from his home. He returned, however, and to encourage him I took up my abode for a short time in his house, and employed him for several weeks as my teacher in the Arabic tongue. His kind Christian deportment so won upon those who had been his enemies that it produced a marked change in their conduct toward him. Two years or more have passed away since I last saw that man, but were you to go there today, you would find in that remote Syrian village, on one of the lofty heights of Lebanon, an evangelical Christian church, of which that persecuted convert is the pastor, and those who persecuted him are the church members; and all this the result of one single Bible, providentially thrown into the hands of a poor half-civilized peasant."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Inquiries have been received respecting the terms on which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be supplied to persons desiring to introduce it to their friends. In response to this kindly project of our subscribers, we will mail the paper every week from October 3 to the end of the year to any address in the United States or Canada on receipt of twenty-five cents. The same offer made in former years has been singularly blessed. The paper sent by Christian people to unconverted acquaintances has, in a large number of cases, been the means of blessing. The low price at which it is offered for the three months will, we hope, encourage many to avail themselves of the opportunity of introducing the paper to families in which Christian literature is needed.

CURRENT EVENTS.

As the Returns in Maine Come in, it is Evident that the Republicans have carried the State by a plurality of over twenty thousand. At the close of last week only seventeen towns remained to be heard from. The 479 towns which had sent in their returns gave Governor Robie a plurality over Redman, the Democratic candidate, of 20,151, and an absolute majority of 17,253 over all. The total vote cast exceeds 142,000. There has been much disputing as to the election, with which this ought to be compared. It would be manifestly unfair to compare it with the year of the last Presidential election, because then there was a fusion ticket in the field, and the Republicans were beaten. It will, however, sufficiently show the progress made, if this year's figures are placed beside those of the last election in a Presidential year when there was no fusion between the Democratic and Greenback tickets. That was in 1876. Then the total vote was 136,290 and the Republican majority 15,444. The Republican vote was 75,867 ; this year it is 79,013. Allowing for accessions of Greenback votes, it would appear that the Republicans have gained since 1876 some two or three thousand votes, which the Democrats have lost. The population of the State has not materially increased. The Prohibitory Amendment was carried by a large majority, which, when all the returns are in, is expected to reach forty thousand. Mr. Blaine voted the Republican ticket, but cast no vote either for or against the amendment.

Tammany Hall has Formally Decided to accept the candidacy of Governor Cleveland. A general meeting of the Tammany Committee of thirteen hundred was held on September 12th to consider the invitation of the New York County Democracy to unite in a ratification meeting. There was plenty of the usual Tammany excitement and vituperation, but ultimately it was decided, by an overwhelming majority, to accept the invitation and work for Cleveland. John Kelly himself, in spite of his often-expressed determination to oppose the Democratic candidate, voted with the majority. Grady and one or two others, who have personal reasons for disliking the governor, announced that they should vote for Butler. The general feeling, however, was that there was a prospect of Cleveland being elected, and if he should be, it would be a bad thing for Tammany if its members had voted against him. The significance of this decision consists in the fact that the vote of New York will probably determine the success of one of the candidates, and the Tammany voters are no inconsiderable part of the New York constituency. There has, however, been so much Tammany treachery in the past, notably in 1880, that it is possible the tickets may be bunched again this year, as they were last Presidential election. All that is certain about it is, that Tammany has given a public pledge to vote the regular Democratic ticket.

The Funeral of the Late Secretary Folger took place at the First Presbyterian Church, Geneva, N. Y., on Tuesday, September 9th. There was a large number of representative men present, and people poured into Geneva from every part. The railroad trains came loaded with people, and at noon more than ten thousand people were in the village hotels. During the afternoon all business was suspended. The national colors were hung at half mast on the buildings, while the fronts of stores and private houses were heavily draped with black. President Arthur and all the members of the Cabinet, Governor Cleveland and staff, the judges of the Court of Appeals, the officials of the Treasury Department, a large number of Congressmen, the bar, and citizens attended the ceremony. Citizens of both political parties united in showing respect for the memory of the dead statesman. The Cleveland and Hendricks banner was heavily draped. The subtreasuries throughout the States were closed, and the federal offices also, wherever it could be done without causing public inconvenience.

A Tragical Prominence in the Long List of this year's financial calamities has been given to the suspended National Bank of New Jersey, at New Brunswick, by the suicide of its chief officials. It appears that the usual mode of conducting the regular examination of the bank's affairs was for the examiner to call over the list of assets, and the cashier would hold up a package, which was passed without an examination of its contents. One of the directors became dissatisfied, and declared that at the next examination he would insist on every package being opened and its indorsement verified. The cashier heard of this determination, and committed suicide the day before that appointed for the examination. A panic ensued, and when the directors went to the safe for the securities, they found that many of the packages were made up of blank paper. Over $200,000 was missing. The president of the bank was so unnerved by the discovery and by the suspension of the bank, which was rendered necessary by the defalcation, that on September 8th he also committed suicide. It is believed that the capital of the bank is but slightly impaired, and that it will resume. The cashier was a heavy loser by the panic of May last, and it is supposed that, in the hope of retrieving his position, he speculated in Wall Street with disastrous results. The overmastering eagerness to get rich, which is the curse of the country in our day, is responsible for the death of these two victims. Young men who are making riches the supreme object in life will do well to consider such warnings as these.

The Long-Pending Dispute between the Government officers and the steamship lines respecting the pauper immigrants ought to be settled by the instructions given last week by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury. He directs the Collector of the Port to place on each steamer an officer, whose duty it shall be to prevent immigrants from landing until their condition under the law shall have been determined by examination. The steamship companies may, however, avoid the delay and annoyance of the examination on shipboard by giving an undertaking to receive back any immigrants whom the Commissioners examine at Castle Garden and decide to reject. The recent sad spectacles witnessed at Castle Garden and at the slips ought not to recur under this arrangement.

A Destructive Tornado Passed through Wisconsin and Minnesota on September 10th. Clear Lake, Wis., was left almost in ruins, and three persons were killed. Houses and barns were torn bodily from their foundations and carried like straws before the storm. At White Bear Lake, Minn., the buildings suffered severely ; windows were blown in and trees blown down. Several persons were injured at Stillwater, Minn., by branches of trees, fragments of buildings, and other missiles which the tornado bore on its way. Cattle and horses, too, were hurt by being driven against the wire fences, which cut deeply into their flesh. The loss of property is estimated at more than a quarter of a million. On the following day there was a flood in Wisconsin, which swept away two hundred buildings and six bridges. The bridges alone cannot be replaced for $300,000. The Chippewa River rose thirty feet, which is five feet higher than any previous flood. There is widespread destitution and suffering. Relief committees have been organized, and hundreds of people are being fed in the Court House and Gospel tent of the Young Men's Christian Association, while the most destitute are being taken care of in private houses.

Enthusiastic Temperance Meetings were held at Madison, Wis., on September 4th and 5th. A subscriber in that city writes that at the State Convention, when an address was given by Mr. William Daniel, the Prohibition candidate for the Vice-Presidency, there was a display of zeal altogether surpassing any previous manifestation. It took practical form in a subscription to found a Prohibition journal to be printed at the State capital. The Good Templar's Grand Lodge has also been holding sessions in Madison, and passed resolutions recommending "total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State." Wisconsin, our correspondent predicts, will make a good showing for Prohibition in November.

Advice to Prohibitionists is Tendered by the Methodists of Iowa. They believe that the true way to success is to keep the liquor question clear of politics, and work for a constitutional amendment, as they have done in Iowa. A resolution recently adopted by the Conference in that State closes with these words : "We earnestly recommend the friends of Prohibition everywhere to adopt the Iowa method—that is, work to have the question submitted to a non-partisan vote ; thereby we may expect votes from men of all political parties ; that, believing our methods in Iowa have been wise and successful, and as the formation of a separate political party founded on the one idea of prohibition is in conflict with our successful methods, therefore we deprecate the formation of such a party, and hereby express our fear that it may set prohibition back many years."

A Significant Change in the Attitude of Religion and science is noted by the New York Tribune in connection with the recent conventions. "One of the most remarkable features," it says, "of the scientific conferences at Montreal and Philadelphia is the marked change of feeling respecting religion. The leaders of these associations are, with few exceptions, men of profound religious convictions, and the prevailing sentiment at each meeting is in sympathy with the broadest and most progressive utterances of the Christian pulpit." That is a gratifying fact, which shows that the scientists recognize the essential truth of the Bible; but another remark in the same article may well cause uneasiness. The Tribune says: "Ten years have witnessed a remarkable change both in the relations of science to religion and of religion to science." It will be a very serious matter if preachers modify or explain away Bible utterances to make them fit in with scientific hypotheses.

The Twenty-Seventh Anniversary of the Fulton Street daily prayer-meeting will be observed by special services in the Middle Reformed Church at the junction of Lafayette Place and Fourth Street, on September 23d, from 12 to 1 o'clock. Mr. Lanphier, who conducts the meeting, recently celebrated his own seventy-sixth birthday. He states that during the whole twenty-seven years the meeting for prayer has been held without omission on every week day since September 23d, 1857. Christmas, New Year's, Fourth of July, Evacuation Day, etc., do not prevent the meeting being held from noon to one o'clock in the Fulton Street chapel.

Patients Rendered Insane by Liquor are Increasing in number at the hospitals. A visitor to Bellevue Hospital recently was astonished by the record there. He says: "So large is the number of persons taken to Bellevue Hospital who have been made insane through intemperance, that the insane pavilion may well be named after this class of patients. From five to ten persons are taken to the hospital every day for examination, and of these the majority are the outcome of intemperate habits. So far as appears, the insanity so produced is not a form of delirium tremens, which is more or less temporary in its nature, but a loss of reason, which may be as permanent as from any cause whatever. What is still more serious, this class of sufferers has doubled within a year, and is five times as great as it was five years ago. No wonder that one of the officials at the hospital remarked that it was the strongest and most practical kind of temperance lesson that he knew of."

Practical Evidence of Sincerity was Recently given by a converted man and his wife. They resided in Canada, but purposed settling in the United States. They were engaged in an occupation inconsistent with the Christian profession, but on arriving in New York they visited Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission. There they were led by the Holy Spirit to give themselves to the Lord. Their first act on reaching home after the service was to break up and destroy all the apparatus and paraphernalia they used in their business, and to seek a new opening in a different line. It is gratifying to learn, from a statement made by the converted man, that they soon found such an opening.

The Christian Convention held last Week in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, New York, was largely attended. Mr. and Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness were unable to be present, the former having been prostrated by the heat just as he was starting from Boston to New York. The proceedings commenced on Tuesday, September 9th, and were continued until Friday, three sessions being held each day. On Tuesday the subject of consideration was "Spiritual Power," when Dr. Wilson, of St. George's Protestant-Episcopal Church, opened the discussion. On Wednesday the subject was "Christian Life," led by Dr. Clift, of Washington, D. C. On Thursday the Convention considered the subject of "Christian Work, with Special Reference to Neglected Fields and Classes at Home." On Friday addresses were delivered by Mr. William E. Blackstone, of Chicago, and Rev. George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, on the Lord's coming. A brief report of these we hope to publish next week. The afternoon session was devoted to the testimonies of those who have received healing from Christ. Several of these testimonies are printed on page 604 of this number. It is hoped that the success which has attended this Convention will encourage the friends to make it an annual gathering.

A New Tract-Room has been Opened at the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle for the sale of pamphlets and books on the subject of faith-healing. The works of the Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Tabernacle, on the subject, are placed there on sale with other literature, including Miss Carrie F. Judd's Triumphs of Faith. A few works on prophecy, such as "The Appproaching End of the Age," by Mr. H. Grattan Guinness, are also kept in stock. Catalogues and further information may be obtained by addressing Mrs. Henry Naylor, who has kindly undertaken the supervision of the room.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman Sailed for England in the Egypt on August 30th. She hopes to have three months for rest and recuperation, returning to America at the end of November. Large fields of labor are open before her, and already invitations to labor here have been extended to her which, if accepted, will cover many months. In a note received from Mrs. Shipman on the day of her sailing the editor is asked to tender to the readers her thanks for the courtesy and Christian kindness with which she has been received.

A Family Starving in the Midst of Plenty was discovered recently in Ohio. The head of the family was once a popular and wealthy citizen of the State, but he met with reverses, and finally died of starvation. He had a wife and a large family of little children, but they were too proud to beg or ask for help, and bore their distresses in silence. Although sickly, the husband attempted to work, and for the last week of his life gathered boulders from the river. But being without food for several days he finally sank to the ground from exhaustion, and was taken home to die. To those who visited them at his death the wife and children told a sad tale of want and misery, having had but one loaf of bread to eat within a week. There are few men who have so much pride that they would lose their lives rather than confess their poverty; but all Christian workers know that multitudes lose their souls because they are too proud to accept salvation as a free gift.

A Disgusted Immigrant Returned to Europe last week. An old man with gray hair and whiskers and a weather-beaten countenance was among the immigrants who arrived on the Inman steamship City of Montreal. His face wore a gloomy expression when he first caught sight of America. When quarantine was reached he sniffed the air with a look of disgust, and when the Montreal reached her dock the old man announced that he thought America was a disgusting country. "What's wrong about it?" he was asked. "Oh, the air don't agree with me. It's not what I looked for. I'm going right back to the old country." The old man was duly inspected by representatives of the Commissioners of Emigration, and was obliged to go to Castle Garden. But he stubbornly refused to penetrate the country any further. He went to Clerk Glynn and stated that he was anxious to return home by the City of Montreal, and gave him money for a return passage ticket. The old man decided to live in the Garden during his stay in America, and he stated that he would not venture outside the Castle walls. The immigrant, as we know, was too hasty in forming an opinion of the air of America from the air of New York, but the same tendency is often exhibited in matters still more serious CONCERNING SAINTS.

"All thy works shall praise thee, O LORD; and thy saints shall bless thee."—PSALM 145: 10.

Praise from All Creatures—Special Praise from Saints—A Clear Distinction between the Two—I. God has a People—Called Saints—Not Dead—The Continuous Life—To be Met at Home—What it is to be a Saint—Not Perfect People—Self Satisfaction a State of Death—A Painter's Despair—How Saints May be Known—By their Holy Life—Holiness Never Imputed—II. Saints in the First Rank—What will Become of Gen. Gordon—III. They Render Special Homage.

DO not throw yourselves back in your seats, and say, "This will be a sermon for saints, and therefore we may be excused from attending to it." Do you not see that the first clause gives you a fair word and a kindly hint? "All thy works shall praise thee, O Jehovah." Through this you may enter, as by an open door, for if you are not Jehovah's saints you are His works, and are bound to praise His name. In these days of harvest and full summer-tide, every created thing appears to praise God by its very existence. Insect and fern, pebble and rippling brook, star and cloud, wind and dew—all reflect the wisdom and goodness of the Most High.

Many a man's works are no credit to him, and even in cases wherein men have wrought well, and produced much which is to their honor, yet certain of their works are not to their credit, but deserve to be plunged in darkness. It is never so with a single work of the Eternal; all His works are perfect. He puts into them, He uses no base material, He never makes up with paint and varnish for grievous deficiencies. Set all His works in the sunlight, ay, put them all under the strongest magnifier, and they tell no tale against Him, but they all publish Him as the best of workers, the grandest of thinkers, the most complete of designers.

All God's works also praise Him by a sort of intent, they make praise His glory as of set purpose. We are speaking of the inanimate creation—we say inanimate, but in this matter they seem to be all alive to the glory of the Lord. The worlds that roll through space, and the motes that dance in the sunshine, the firebolt that levels the tower, and the snow-flakes that dance in His wintry courts, the yeast of the foaming sea, the pollen of the ripening flower, and the cleavage of the crystal, all vie with one another in proclaiming the greatness of the wisdom and the goodness of the Lord. Not alone are the heavens telling the glory of God, and the firmament showing his handiwork, but the earth and the air, the sea and all deep places, the hill-side and the cottage garden, are all emulating each other in the blessed work of praising Jehovah.

Arouse thee, then, my friend! Thou art a creature, if not a new creature in Christ Jesus. Adore thy Benefactor if thou dost not know thy Saviour. Hast thou nothing for which to praise the Lord? Is not thy body a specimen of His handiwork? Are not the organs of nutrition, and the supplies which are given to them, proofs of His goodness? Thy deliverance from fever, and a hundred other deaths, is something worthy of a song. All thy domestic hopes, and joys, and longings, though they reach not to eternal things, and are but draughts from the nether springs, yet do they come from the same Hand as the higher boons; and they may lead thee home, for the prodigal, who came back to his father, was sweetly tempted thither by the remembrance of the bread in his father's house, of which there was enough and to spare.

Yet I confess that there is in the text much that is special for a chosen people; it speaks to those who dwell within the inner circle, who by position, character, and privilege are elevated to the highest form of service. Praise is high as heaven, and lasting as eternity, and yet there is something that is better, for it is written—"Thy saints shall bless Thee."

Everywhere throughout the word of God you see kept up a very between those that fear God and those that fear Him not—between the two seeds, the seed of the serpent and the seed of the woman—between those that are living in sin, and those that have been delivered from it, and so are made saints unto God. Two peoples there are, and ever will be while the present dispensation lasts, and the difference between them is great and vital. At the very beginning we shall have to remind you that the text suggests this. We are all God's works. "It is He that hath made us, and not we ourselves"; but we are not all "His people, and the sheep of His pasture." Divide yourselves by a scriptural judgment. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves." Rest in no neutrality. Dream not of communion between Christ and Belial. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." You are either with God or against Him, and the sooner you know your true position the better. I shall never preach to you as if you were all alike, for I know you are not.

I shall want you carefully to notice three things. The first is, that God has a people whom He calls His saints: of these we read in the text. Secondly, these are placed in the first rank; for while it is said, "All Thy works shall praise Thee, O Lord," the saints occupy a special position, and they are spoken of by themselves, and put before all others—"and Thy saints shall bless Thee." Thirdly, these people render a special homage.

I. Come, then, to our work. May the Holy Ghost help us! First, whom he calls His saints. Who are they? Are they all dead? It is supposed so; for the usage of the Popery around us is to call men saints who have been long in their graves, but living men are not regarded in that light. I notice, even among those who call themselves Protestants, a great many relics of the old harlot of the seven hills, and among the rest this nonsense of dead saintship. Somebody wrote me the other day about his "sainted mother." What did he mean? Had the Pope canonized her? Or did she become a saint by dying? Does death, which came in through sin, bring sainthood with it? Assuredly not. If men are not saints before death, they certainly cannot be made saints after death.

When the apostle Paul wrote letters to the churches, he called the members of them saints. They were living men and women of whom he thus spake. They were ordinary men and women like ourselves; poor in rank, greatly deficient in education, and often without house or home. In some respects they were even inferior to ourselves; for their former conversation had been so exceedingly lax that they ignorantly tolerated sins which in these days would not be endured for a moment. I believe that the church of God at this day, taken as a whole, is better than the Church at Corinth was. For instance, there is no church that I know of, worthy to be called a church of Christ, that would tolerate in its membership one who had been guilty of incest. We should be quite sure to deal with such an open and crying crime as that. We have many faults to-day, and they had a great many faults then, for the apostle had to write to some churches twice over to warn them of certain very apparent evils; and yet, for all that, there were saints in those churches, and Paul was accustomed to address those who were joined together in any one place as those who were called to be saints. These saints in our own country. Many persons have a high esteem for ministers whom they have never seen, who labor in exceedingly remote districts. Of course these good men and their churches must be absolutely perfect: a race of saints. Distance lends enchantment to the view. For my part, I love to believe in the holiness of those who are round about me, in the sanctity of my fellow-laborers, and in the fervent devotion of those who hold up my hands, from day to day, in my work of faith and labor of love. There are as many saints in England as there are in America. I am not inclined to look to the Plymouth Church, or the Romish Church, or the Greek Church, or any other church, for my saints: I find them in the Tabernacle.

WHAT IS IT TO BE A SAINT?

Some people do not want to know, for with them it is a term of contempt. They say, "Oh, he is one of your saints!" They lay the emphasis on the word "saints," as if it were something very disgraceful; or, at least, despicable and hypocritical. Whenever I have that said to me—and it has happened more than once—I take off my hat out of respect to the title. I had rather be a saint than a Knight of the Garter. Sometimes I have said, "I wish you could prove your words"; for surely nobody need be ashamed of being called a saint unless he is afraid that he cannot maintain the name; but if you really are saintly, and men apply the title to you in scorn, wear it upon your sleeve as your honor, and make no attempt whatever to conceal the soft impeachment. I have sometimes heard of the "Latter Day Saints." I do not know much about them, but I greatly prefer the "Every Day Saints." Those people who are saints anywhere and everywhere are truly saints; and he that is not a saint everywhere is not a saint anywhere, for this is a thing that cannot be put off and on like our Sunday dress. Holiness must be a part of ourselves; it must be our nature to be saintly.

Who, then, are saints? Some will tell us that they are persons who are totally free from sin in thought, and word, and deed; but where will you find these marvellous beings? I have never met with such. I have seen a few who said that they were perfect, but you had only to watch them for a single day to discover their defects; but a man absolutely free from all tendency to sin I have never seen on earth, nor have you: I thought we were all sinners, and I have not altered the opinion. I should not think he was much of a saint who did not confess that he was somewhat of a sinner still. I should be afraid that he did not know himself, and that his standard of saintship was not as high as it ought to be. When a man is so good that he cannot be better, I perceive that in some respects he is so bad that he could hardly be worse; for instance, in the matter of pride, he has gone some few degrees beyond Lucifer himself. When a soul is thoroughly saturated with the belief that it can be no better, it will be no better. That holy restlessness which makes a man lament his imperfections, and pine after something more Christlike, is part of the force by which we move upward toward higher degrees of spirituality and grace. Self-satisfaction is the death of progress, and at the same time the discovery of falsehood. The very power to become sanctified has departed from the man who boasts that he is so.

A certain great painter had been accustomed to perform great feats with his brush, but one day, having finished a picture, he laid down his palette, and said to his wife, "My power to paint is gone!" "Oh," said she, "how is that?" "Well," he answered, "up to this day I have always been dissatisfied with my productions; but the last picture I have painted perfectly satisfies me, and therefore I am certain that I shall never be able to paint anything worth looking at again." As long as ever a man is dissatisfied with himself, he will be capable of great things; but when he feels that he has attained, and is perfectly satisfied, depend upon it nothing will come of him during the rest of his life. He has lost the very faculty of progress.

Oh, brothers, if we know ourselves and our God, every idea of our being absolutely perfect will make us sick to the death; we know we are nothing of the sort. Still, we also know that sin has not dominion over us, and that we are holiness unto the Lord; and in this we do and will rejoice, and bless the Lord our God. Taking all that into consideration, we again ask the question, who are saints?

Saints, in the first place, are those whom God has set apart for Himself. He chose them to be his own portion from before the foundations of the world. He gave them, as men whom He had set apart for Himself, into the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ. They are the people whom Christ speaks of when He mentions "those whom thou hast given Me." These are the saints. These people being thus God's own, by His electing love, are in due time called effectually by His grace. Having been redeemed by blood, they are in due time redeemed by power.

But who are the saints, again?

HOW SHALL WE KNOW THEM?

Well, they are known, next, by their holy life. They are not only dedicated to God, but they are made meet for God's use by the sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit. Forget not all I have said about our imperfections; but, for all that, God's people are a holy people. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." A man is described in Scripture, not by his infirmities, but by the general run and current of his life. We say of a river that it runs to the south, although there may be eddies along the banks which run in an opposite direction to the main stream. Still, these are an inconsiderable matter. The main stream of the Thames is running constantly toward the sea, and we speak not amiss or untruthfully when we say that it is so. And the main stream and set of the current of the life of a child of God runs toward that which is right, true, and holy, both toward God and toward man. If it is not so with you, dear friend, I make very short work of it: you do not know the Lord. You have need to be born again, and to be delivered from the power of sin. "His servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness."

"Holiness is imputed," says one. It cannot be imputed, say I. The righteousness of Christ is imputed to us; but holiness is quite another term, and you never find in the word of God mention made of an imputation of holiness. That cannot be. David says, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in His holy place? He that hath and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully." These are actual qualities, not imputations. God's saints are not drunkards. God's saints are not liars. God's saints are not dishonest. God's saints are not ungenerous and unloving. God's saints are not a people that take delight in iniquity, and follow after the wages of evil, like Balaam of old. God's people are a people that follow after holiness, and will never be satisfied till sin is exterminated from their hearts, root and branch. In fact, they will never get to heaven till they get that holiness, and when they get that they will be in heaven, for they will awake in the likeness of the Lord. These, then, are the distinguishing marks of the saints of God.

"Where shall we find these saints?" says one. Slander says, "Nowhere," but truthfulness affirms that there are many of them to be found. They are the ornaments of our households, the pillars of our churches, the delights of our communion, and the glory of Christ. Oh, that we might be numbered among them!

II. Well, now, secondly, I want you to notice that these are placed and the reason is of God's grace and mercy, because he has done the most for them. "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord," but "thy saints shall bless thee," because they are in a very peculiar and remarkable manner God's works. God has created all things; but He has twice created His saints. He brought the world out of chaos, but He brought His people out of the land of darkness and of the shadow of death, from under the power and domination of every evil thing; yea, even from death, and from hell itself. For them He wrought

A CREATION AND A RESURRECTION.

But, again, God's works of grace are not only created by His own power, but in great favor they stand, in a covenant relation with Himself. Behold, He has made the covenant of day and night, which shall not be broken, and He has made the covenant with the earth that He will no more destroy it with a flood, and He has covenanted that while the earth endureth seed-time and harvest, and summer and winter, shall not cease. After the same fashion has He made covenant with His own redeemed, that He will not be wroth with them, nor rebuke them, world without end.

Further than this, God's tenderest consideration is given to His saints. He cares for all the works of His hands. Not a sparrow falleth to the ground without being noticed by our Father. God cares for every fish of the sea; and even such fish as never see the light, but dwell in black pools, in the monster caverns of the earth, are not forgotten of Him. But as for His children, what care He gives to them! No farmer has as much care for his barn-door chickens as he has for his own little chicks indoors. The Lord cares for all those countless multitudes that wait upon Him; but there is the tenderer care of the Father for all those who are allied to Him by nature, and are heirs with Him by grace.

Let us look back, and think how God has loved us long before we thought of Him, and how He has thought of us when we have forgotten Him. One said to me, the other day,

"WHAT WILL BECOME OF GORDON?"

I answered, "He is safe enough, I believe; for he has given himself into the hand of God, and He will take care of him." To this the questioner replied, somewhat flippantly, "It may be so; but, you see, he is so dashing that he gives God a great deal to think of and to do." I did not like the expression, but still it is exceedingly applicable to many of us; for the office of "Preserver of men" is no sinecure in the case of the Most High. Even a quiet life at home is crowded with the most spiritual, minute, and tender thoughts of God. The Lord's guardian care extends to everything, and to every particle of everything, so that nothing in the whole of life is left to chance, or regarded as a trifle.

And what a position you have as to GOD'S VISITS!

"Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water." But the visits of God to creation—what are they compared with his visits to us, his own redeemed! When He came to Bethlehem, He did so visit us that He took our nature, and became bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. And He wears that nature still. God is still incarnate.

"He is at the Father's side,
The Man of love, the Crucified."

To none of His other creatures has He paid such a visit as that. Even now, to-day, you who are humble and contrite are nearer to God than kings and princes. God in His visitations of men astounds us. "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" Yet He will come to your cottage, come to your chamber, come to your sick bed. "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." "Thou hast granted me life and favor, and Thy visitation hath preserved my spirit."

You see, the saints have the first seats all along, and they hold them to the end of the chapter, for they shall be crowned with glory and honor. The earth hath its coronation; but what is the coronation of the saints? "Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season;" or, if it be not so with thee, thou shalt behold thy Lord coming here to receive thee, for He hath said it, "I will come again, and receive you unto Myself."

There is a glory yet to come to the whole of creation; for its groans and travail will lead up to its new birth. What a zodiac of glory will flame from the new heavens above the new earth at the latter day! But what of that? The greatest glory is for us to be fashioned, as we soon shall be, in the image of the Son of God, and then to dwell at His right hand forever. Between God and man there seems to be an infinite distance; yet when you see the God-man, Christ Jesus, you perceive that God has made His creature, man, near of kin unto Himself.

III. So I finish by noticing, dear friends, that as God has a people called saints, and as He has put them in the front rank, they render to Him. This homage is true praise, and yet it has a certain difference of principle in it, so that it is instructive to say, "All thy works shall praise Thee, O Lord," but "thy saints shall bless thee."

Praise is a very proper thing to render to God; and in common with all His works we do render it. But praise has not in it those elements of warmth which belong to blessing God. For instance, you can praise a man, and yet have no kind of regard for him. I suppose that when Wellington defeated the French at Waterloo, there could hardly be found in all the ranks of Napoleon's army men who did not praise Wellington. They said, "He must, indeed, be a marvellous warrior to have annihilated such an army as ours." They could not help praising him, but they could have no love for him, and would no doubt have been heartily glad if he had never existed.

Cold-blooded philosophers have written of God as if He were some far-off abstraction, and they have allowed words to fall from their pens, like masses of ice, which, when we have dissolved them, have been fragrant with reverence. Such men stand like the Israelites outside the bounds, and gaze at the fire and smoke of Sinai, awe-struck and trembling. As for us, it is our delight to come up unto God, even within the thick darkness, and to commune with Him as a man communeth with his friend. Others may praise God, but it is ours, with our whole hearts, to bless His name. "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless His holy name."

Praise is a form of worship in which we cannot attain to communion with God of the highest order; for that we must ascend and learn to bless Him. I never read that God praises men. It may be true that in some sense He does so when He says, "Well done, good and faithful servant!" but I do not find the expression used in Scripture. God blesses men. Everybody knows that; and therefore when we bless God we enter upon a singularly happy fellowship with Him. He blesses us, and we bless Him; and herein is communion. I grant you, that between the two blessings there is a very great disproportion; but it is the same word, with much of the same meaning.

We cannot reach half way to our desire, and so we have to wind up by saying, "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" Go in, dear hearts, and sit like David before the Lord, and cry, "Whence is this to me?" Then go out, and talk about Him to your friends, and say great things and choice things concerning Him. Make Him a glorious God in their ears. Tell them there never was such a friend, or helper, or Saviour, or father, or brother, or husband, as your God has been to you. Make them hear it—that you are the happiest of men because you have found the blessed God. Make all to know it—that you are the most contented of men because you have chosen the good part, which is to sit at the feet of Jesus.

Do bless Him in secret: and then bless Him with the few that are your daily companions, and if God has given you the tongue of eloquence, bless His name before the crowds, and never be ashamed. Tell them that there is no life like life for God; there is no joy like joy in Christ, no riches like the riches of God's grace, no heaven like the heaven of dwelling forever with Him. Oh, speak well of Him, and when you have spoken your best of Him, then wish to begin again, and speak better; and when you have reached to that, and said your best things, then say, "These are nothing compared with what He deserves. I will try again, and yet rise beyond the loftiest conceptions of the present."

AMONG the most interesting cases of conversion in the records of missionary labor is that of Mr. Sing, the native preacher at Shing-hien. He had been an astrologer and fortune-teller, and held a good and conspicuous position in the city temple of that place, where he daily plied his art. He had purchased a copy of St. Luke's Gospel from a colporteur, but the cares and anxieties of life choked whatever good impressions he received from it. At last he was instructed by Mr. Yen, a native helper, in charge of the Gospel work at Shing-hien, that in order to understand the Scriptures aright he must pray to be enlightened by the Holy Spirit. He did so, and soon began to have some sense of the divine meaning of Luke 15. With increasing light he saw that his profession was unlawful, and that he was in fact, fast in the snare of the devil. Resolving to tamper with evil no longer, he pulled down his sign, made a fire, and burned his books.

He was now consciously washed from his pollutions and made a new man in Christ. He immediately followed Mr. Yen, preaching the doctrine of the Cross. "Some fancied," he says, "that I had grown suddenly richer by preaching Jesus than by telling fortunes, and so had given it up. Some friends tried to provoke me and to induce me to make good speed to quit that way. Some grossly slandered me and tried to frighten me, and some threatened to take my life and stamp the Gospel of Jesus out of Shing-hien City. The adversaries were very much divided in opinions and guesses about me; but by God's grace I was enabled boldly to preach Jesus, the Lord. I was not afraid of their faces, and I held fast to the peace which I was unwilling to lose."

TEMPLE OF FIVE HUNDRED IDOLS.

THE idol temples of Canton, in China, contain an immense number of idols. The one illustrated on page 604 is called "The temple of five hundred idols." The Kuângheaou-tse, or temple of "Resplendent filial duty," is one of the largest, and stands within the walls, near the north-west corner of the city. It is endowed with a large extent of land for the support of its priests or inmates, who number two hundred. It is said to have been built as long ago as the period of "The Three Kingdoms," A.D. 250. The Buddhist establishment at Canton is about three quarters of a mile north of the Foreign Factories, in the suburb beyond the city walls. It contains about one hundred priests. The temple, with its grounds, occupies some acres of land, and has several spacious halls. In one part of the temple is a large image of Buddha, and in another an idol of Kuan-yin, "the goddess of Mercy," who is said to "regard the cries of mortals," and to assist them. She is worshipped chiefly by women.

A visitor, Mr. Bennett, says: "The entrance to the temple or temples, and extensive grounds about them, is close to the landing place. Passing some miserable fruit-and eating-stalls, we noticed a clean, open place planted with trees, and having in the centre a broad pavement of granite kept very clean. The quietness that reigned within, formed a pleasing retreat from the noise and bustle without. This paved way brought us to the first portico ; here we beheld, on huge granite pedestals, a colossal figure on each side, placed there as guards of the entrance to the temple of Buddha ; the one on the right in entering is the Warrior Chin-Ky, and on the left is Chinloong.

"After passing these colossal guards, we entered another court, also planted with trees, with a continuation of the granite footpath, which led through several gateways to one of the temples. At this time the priesthood were assembled, worshipping, chanting, striking gongs, arranged in rows and frequently performing the Ko-tow, in adoration of their gilded, senseless deities."

UNCLE ANTHONY AND HIS NEPHEW.

"UNCLE ANTHONY, do you know the minister is dead?" said a lad of some sixteen years of age, as he entered the garden of a laborer's cottage, where an old man sat reading the Bible.

"No, Tom ; I knew he was ill, but I had not heard he was dead. Who told you?"

"Deacon Brown ; he said the dominie died this morning, and it was the peacefulest death he ever saw. It was like a going to sleep."

"Ah! my boy," said Uncle Anthony, "the minister was not likely to be afraid to die. It was like going home to him. He preached Christ, and he trusted in Him for himself."

Tom had received a religious education, and liking to stand well with his uncle, thought a Bible quotation would be in point here, so he said, solemnly, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

But the quotation had not the desired effect. Uncle Anthony turned on him almost fiercely. "Never let me hear you say that again, Tom," he said.

"Why not, uncle? It's in the Bible," said Tom.

"Ay! ay! I know that, but there's a deal in the Bible it is not proper for us to say. 'Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice' is in the Bible, but we should never say such a thing ourselves. The wicked King of Egypt said it to Moses and Aaron."

"But ain't it right to wish to die like a good man, uncle?"

"Not if you are not living a good man's life, Tom. It was Balaam who said that first. He was so anxious to stand well at court and please the king that he tried to curse the people of God. A man who is willing to do wrong to get on in the world ought not to want to die the death of the righteous. He is a mean man who wants to have all the good of this life and then to repent just in time to get all the good of the next life. If you want to die the death of the righteous, Tom, when your time comes, you must give your heart to Christ while you are young, and work for your Saviour afterward. Don't forget that, Tom."

Tom said he would not ; but, in truth, he stood in need of the lecture. The good old man who had so earnestly admonished him had noticed the bent of the boy's mind—his readiness to adapt himself to his company and to talk glibly of religious things to religious people and appear worldly-wise to worldly people, trying to stand well with both—and he was glad to have the opportunity of giving him a reproof and a warning.

Tom left school soon afterward and entered into business, so his pleasant visits to his uncle's cottage were interrupted. That was not a good thing for him, for the old man's bluntness would have been a good discipline for him. He soon forgot his uncle's lecture, and as he lived in that most dangerous of all circles of society—the worldly-religious—the natural tendency of his mind developed with terrible effect.

Two years after Uncle Anthony's lecture, Tom paid him another flying visit. It was the last time Tom ever saw the old man alive. As he stood in the lane outside the familiar cottage, himself unseen, he saw his uncle, as he had seen him scores of times, sitting on the low settle outside his door, reading his Bible. The old man was intent on the Word of Life, and his face showed how absorbed he was. He had not changed his working dress, and Tom, who was well dressed, rather looked down on Uncle Anthony in his poverty.

The visit was paid, good advice given, and Tom said the last "good-by" he would ever say to his kind, faithful old friend. He went his way, and lived on in the same life. He heard of his uncle's death, and almost involuntarily uttered the same wish he had used years before, but his uncle's lecture recurred to his memory, and he could not but acknowledge that he had practically forgotten it. He thought, however, of the old man as he saw him last, and congratulated himself on his prospect of having a better provision for his old age than his uncle had.

Tom's self-congratulations were a little premature. He trifled so long with religious principles that they ceased to govern his life altogether. Such a man is the easy prey of Satan, and when temptation came to him it was a very short and feeble struggle he made before taking his employer's money for a speculation that promised well, but ended disastrously. His uncle's warning seemed to Tom like a prophecy when he was wearing stripes in the penitentiary and when his way back to respectable society seemed hopelessly barred against him. Uncle Anthony s position as he sat, in his poverty, in his old age, reading his Bible, unaccused by his conscience, seemed to him then a position most enviable.

TESTIMONIES AT THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION IN NEW YORK.

THE afternoon session of the Christian Convention, held in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle on Friday last, was devoted to the subject of faith-healing.

Dr. Simpson, the pastor of the church, invited any who had experienced the Lord's healing power to testify, limiting each testimony to three minutes. One after another, for over an hour, without a moment's interval, ladies and gentlemen in different parts of the building rose spontaneously to describe their healing. They were persons of education and intelligence, and not one had the appearance, or manner, or mode of expression which indicates fanaticism. Each spoke clearly and briefly of the disease and the recovery, and in each case ascribed the cure to Christ alone. When the time allotted to the purpose had expired, and others were still desiring to speak, Dr. Simpson asked for a silent testimony, and immediately over a hundred persons rose to acknowledge that God had, in their individual cases, been to them a God "who healeth all our diseases." Among the many testimonies given, we select a few of the most remarkable.

An old lady, who told the Convention she was eighty-four, and whose face, lined and marked by time, confirmed her words, was the first to testify. She related how, through the power of Jesus, she had been raised from a bed she did not expect to leave until death came to her relief. From being a bedridden old woman He had changed her into a woman whose activity was beyond her years. The old lady actually leaped an inch or two from the floor, as if she were a school-girl, as she declared what her Saviour had done for her.

Another lady, whose beautiful features, glowing with perfect health, confirmed her statement, said she was now quite well. She had been suffering for eight years from a febroid tumor, and had vainly sought relief from the best physicians in this country and in Europe. No hope was given her, except that if she would submit to a painful operation her life might be saved. Even that was doubtful, for there was lung trouble and an affection of the heart. Having an abundance of means she travelled from one European capital to another, consulting specialists and trying "the cures" for which the various watering-places are noted. Finally, at Lucerne, in Switzerland, an eminent surgeon gave it as his deliberate opinion that her life could not be prolonged beyond three months at the furthest, and that an operation would be of no avail. She returned home to die, but in studying God's Word and in reading the testimonies of those who have been healed through faith, she was enabled to cast her burden on Christ, and, abandoning all medicine and medical advice, went to Dr. Cullis, and asked him to pray for her and with her. She slowly but surely recovered. Since then, at various times, she has experienced other manifestations of Christ's healing power—once in diphtheria and once in congestion of the lungs.

Uncle Anthony's Study.

The case of a child about nine years of age was mentioned by the same lady. She was an orphan, whom the lady has recently adopted. The child was suffering with a catarrhal affection, and minute directions were given by her former attendant, at the time of her adoption, for the cleansing of the ear. Mrs. Naylor, the lady who adopted her, did not purpose carrying out the instructions, but submitted her case to the Great Physician who had healed herself. The cloths were removed from the child's head, and she was treated as if well. To the amazement of the child, though not of Mrs. Naylor—her own experience having prepared her for the result—the loathsome discharge wholly ceased, and her recovery was assured.

Dr. J. W. Clift, of Washington, said that thirty years ago he became a Christian. He did not commence preaching the Gospel, as he should have done, but devoted himself to the study of medicine. The Lord suffered him to graduate with honor at Harvard and to obtain a position of honor and responsibility as a surgeon in the army. Afterward he settled at Savannah, Ga., and prospered. But there God cried "halt." He laid His hand upon him. His beloved wife of seven months was taken away by death. He suffered the loss of office and property, and lastly, by a sunstroke, he lost the use of the brain of which he was proud. Ten years he suffered, knowing well, as a surgeon, by the symptoms he observed in himself, that softening of the brain was in progress. His senses of hearing, sight, smell, and touch were failing him, and often having commenced a sentence, his mind failed him, and he was unable to complete it. In this state, the horrors of which only a man of education and intelligence can fully realize, a friend went to him at his home, 1117 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C., and urged him to give his case into the hands of Christ. As a surgeon, Dr. Clift was startled at the thought; but as a Christian, his faith prompted him to comply. He went to Christ, and besought Him to heal him, and in three days he was well mentally and physically. That was June 18th, 1882. He is now able to read fine print without spectacles, to hear distinctly, and can lift a hundred pound weight in each hand. The doctor said he had asked the Lord to renew his youth, and he believed that he was in all physical respects a younger man than his age by eighteen years.

Miss Carrie F. Judd testified that since her cure [with the circumstances of which our readers are familiar], five years ago, she has been working without cessation in the Lord's service, and it has been all done in the power of the Lord. She said that the Lord's keeping power was as remarkable as His healing power, and during the five years of renewed health and vigor she had fully tested it.

Mr. Oliver, the noted evangelist of South Carolina, rose as Miss Judd sat down to add his testimony to those already given. For seventeen years he had been afflicted with a chronic malady, the pain of which was so excruciating that he had often prayed that God would take his soul out of his body. One year ago he made the discovery that provision had been made by God for the body as well as for the soul. He prayed, and was healed. Since then he had had sicknesses, but he treated them as he did temptations. He took them to the Saviour, and was delivered. He testified also that the physical healing had in his case been accompanied by a marked spiritual blessing.

Mrs. Brodie, the young wife of a wealthy merchant in British Honduras, briefly described her healing of a painful malady which had been pronounced incurable. She had been for some time a helpless invalid, able to live only in cold climates, and there only in great suffering. She had been an opponent of the doctrine of faith healing, and both in England and America had expressed emphatically her incredulity of the professions of those who were healed. She was, however, led to trust in Christ for healing, and was cured. Since that time she has labored for her Saviour in British Honduras, and has testified to His power in America and England.

Testimony was also given by a gentleman who had been completely cured of deafness and of a rupture, being now able to walk about and work without a truss, though had he attempted to do so before his cure through faith and prayer, he would have fallen helpless to the ground. A lady who was going around on crutches a few weeks ago told how thankfully she took them home one day recently and left them there as useless incumbrances. Another lady held up her hand, opening and closing it in sight of the audience, and told how a short time ago it hung helpless at her side, paralyzed, but had been restored on the day she placed her trust in Christ. Another lady described how she had agreed to submit to a painful surgical operation in order to save her life, and the preparations were all made for it to be performed. But the night before, as she lay awake, thinking of the next day's ordeal, she prayed. Instead of asking for strength under the surgeon's knife she said to the Lord that she could trust in His power better than in the surgeon's, and would give herself into His hands. When, the next day, the surgeons came to perform the operation they found their work unnecessary. The cure was perfect and complete.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Retribution Begun.

MISS WALDRON was doomed to receive a second blow the same night, almost as severe as the first. Before she had time to yield to the passion which Carl's confession had awakened, her father entered the room, where she was still sitting, with her bonnet and shawl on, in an apathetic state of bewilderment.

"My dear," he said, "it is probable that Robert will at last consent to marry. It is what we have both desired for years. You have never given me a moment's uneasiness; but for him I am still anxious. To marry a religious woman might be the means of salvation to his soul. "Robert," he continued, "is in love with Hester Morley; and he has my full approbation and consent. It will heal old wounds, and make atonement for the past. You know Hester well; she has been almost like your own child. You will give her a sister's welcome, Sophia."

"Never!" she exclaimed; "if you are become a fool, and Robert an idiot, I shall retain my sense of what is fitting and right. Never will I consent to look upon Hester Morley as my sister."

She shuddered at the bare mention of such a thing; and casting a frown upon her father which filled him with dismay, she sailed out of the room with an air of dignity that concealed how crushed and wounded her spirit had been that day.

Opposition had always been congenial to Mr. Waldron. But his daughter's positive and active antagonism to his scheme made him feel vexed and unhappy. He did not think for a moment of giving it up; but he had reckoned upon Miss Waldron's feminine penetration, and upon the interest and affection of long-standing which he supposed to exist between her and Hester. He was very far indeed from divining the mixed motives which were at war in his daughter's mind.

Miss Waldron herself, with all her long practice in analyzing her own inner life, could not dissect her present feelings, but for a time gave herself up to uncontrolled passion. Her closet, that night and the next day, could have told of a very different scene to the usually calm and self-complacent devotions of its inmate. The whole circle, Hester, Carl, Grant and his wife, were her dependents and inferiors, yet she had no power to punish them. Had she no power? She would think about it.

Miss Waldron's naturally proud spirit had not been wholly eradicated by her conversion, and being fed by the homage she received from friends of a lower station than herself, it grew. She committed the perilous fault of unwatchfulness. Toward Hester, it had especially developed, owing to the loan advanced to Mr. Morley by Mr. Waldron.

John Morley had received this loan from Mr. Waldron upon a mortgage, and had spent a portion of it at once in paying the most pressing of his creditors; but the tide of debt was still mounting, and would soon overflow this feeble breakwater. Secretly it was upon John Morley's poverty that both Mr. Waldron and Robert built their hopes: a more sandy foundation than either of them expected. The future to be offered to Hester was so dazzling compared to her present lot, so far beyond anything her most daring girlish fancies could have dreamed, that they counted upon awakening her ambition. It was incredible that a position which would be eagerly snatched at by many a well-born and wealthy family could be rejected by the daughter of a man hopelessly involved in buisness embarrassments. Looking at it in this light, Mr. Waldron felt satisfied that Hester would gladly become Robert's wife. Going round to the other side, and regarding the projected marriage with the purged and enlightened eyes of a Christian man who knows this world to be no more than a training-school for eternity, a chilly doubt crept over him that she could not be tempted by all the grandeur and ease they could offer her.

Robert Waldron was growing hungry for a sight of Hester. Strange to say, though he had haunted old Madame's garret, to his own imminent danger and her uncontrollable terror, for Lawson had begun to dart in home at all sorts of unexpected moments, he had never happened to come across Hester. He had found it impossible to stay long away from Little Aston, and since his return not a day had passed without his paying a visit to Madame. But the little one did not come to see her so often, said Madame; on the contrary, she sent to invite her to visit her in her own home, which was much more triste than her little garret.

But the chance came at last; the hour so long waited for. The very morning after Miss Waldron's defiance of her father's wishes, Hester felt obliged to pay her last visit to Aston Court—a visit of gratitude rather than of business. She had still no special desire to avoid meeting Robert. Her large, girlish heart embraced him, as it did her father and Rose, in a warmth of pity and sorrow which could never make her feel indifferent to him. They were all three lost in a labyrinth, where they wandered solitarily and in toilsome paths; and she, looking on with tearful eyes longed to lead them back to a resting-place.

She found Mr. Waldron, as she had hoped, alone, and she uttered her thanks in few but expressive words. She told him that the sum he had advanced would meet their expenses for the next half-year.

"And what after that?" asked Mr. Waldron, in a tone of anxiety.

"I can scarcely tell," answered Hester, with a smile faltering between fear and courage, "I am not afraid, not very much afraid, at least. Something may happen before then."

"You would do anything for your father's sake, Hester?" he said.

"Anything," she repeated, fervently; "only show me what I can do, and I will do it."

Mr. Waldron took both her hands into his, and looked with a marvellous gentleness for him into her pale face with its faint smile.

"My dear child," he said, "I have a plan in my mind for you which would set your father free from his difficulties, and place you both in a position above care of any kind. You are a brave good girl, and I love you like a daughter. You could trust yourself in my hands, Hester?"

"Yes," she answered, lifting her eyes to his, inquiringly.

"Stay here a few minutes," he added; "I am not quite ready to tell you my plan yet."

He went away, leaving her in the room which she rememberd to have first entered with Rose. The great life-size portraits of Luther and Melanchthon gazed down steadily upon her from the wall, as they had done when she looked up wonderingly to them as a little child. The recollection was more vivid and sad than usual, for she had left Rose in a paroxysm of vain remorse in her poor refuge. She recalled their meeting with Robert in the park the first time she had ever seen him; and the light, gay, air of happiness which to her eyes had surrounded both him and Rose. Hester's face had assumed again the pallor and care which had almost vanished from it for a little while; and she looked once more like a blanched and frail flower which has grown up without sunshine. When Mr. Waldron left her, she leaned back in her chair, and closed her eyes with a languor to which she would not yield in any one's presence; and so absorbed did she grow in her melancholy thoughts, that she did not hear the opening of the door, as it turned almost noiselessly upon its hinges.

It was Robert who entered, having been found by his father, and sent to learn his fate. He was disquieted and troubled, and he stole forward with the quietness of a mother who fears to disturb the slumber of her child, or with the caution of a naturalist who snatches a glance at some rare wild denizen of the woods, which will take flight at his approach. He had not seen Hester since the evening she had spent at Aston Court—that happy evening which had seemed to him an omen of good both to himself and John Morley. But how changed she was in her attitude of sorrowful languor! What lines of new care and anxiety were upon her beautiful face! He would give the whole world to comfort her and to shield her from every breath of adversity in the future. How should he let her know how much he loved her?

"Hester!" he whispered after a while, in a low tone, but one which aroused her from her reverie and sent the color flushing swiftly to her cheeks and forehead. She had not known that he was at home; and this was the first time she had met him since she had found her father's wife, a wretched and broken-hearted woman, in the streets. A peculiar tempest of emotion swept across her. She had pitied him with a very true, a very deep, a very tender compassion; and this pity still lived in her heart. But the sense of his sin had increased tenfold since Rose also had been cast directly upon her compassion and mercy. She supposed he had repented of it, and his repentance had bound her to cover it with the same charity which she extended to Rose. But there was an expression upon his grave face which made her eyelids quiver, though she would not lower them, and sent a chilly dread of him shivering through her. He felt that it would be best to cast himself precipitately upon her agitation and tremor. He did not know what adverse shadow stood between them.

"Hester," he said, drawing near to her, but not daring to touch her hand, which hung motionless at her side, "my father has sent me to you; I come here by his wish to tell you now what I have longed to tell you a thousand times. I love you, and have loved you from the first moment I saw you. Hush! Let me speak first, I beseech you. If you would only believe me, I have loved you from the moment when I first saw you as a little child, from the time you first let me hold you in my arms. It is very long ago; but, if it had not been for one false step, I should have asked you long before this to be my wife. My father loves you already as his daughter. You have power over me, Hester; you can mould me to your will. With you beside me, I shall become whatever you wish to make me. It is my soul I commit to you; I implore you to lead me to all that is good and Christian. I love you most of all because I believe you will help me to work out my salvation."

He had spoken with profound earnestness, and with long pauses between the sentences, as if waiting for some token from her. He knew that it was better to appeal to her religious sympathies that to expatiate on his own passion. He saw the color fade away from her face, and be followed by a deadly paleness; but this was the only change. He did not know whether this immobility augured good or ill; but he resumed his broken speech with a more pathetic passion.

"Do you hear me, Hester?" he asked. "I tell you it is my soul I commit to you to do what you will with it. I know myself well. If I loved any other woman, as I love you, she might ruin me body and soul, if she chose. But you would save me. Is there anything I can say which would prevail with you more than this? If you consent to be my wife, I can be a real Christian. I shall be sure that God has pardoned my sin; cast it, as you would say, like a stone, into the depths of the sea, to be remembered against me no more forever. I have asked this of Him, as a sign of His forgiveness. For God's sake, Hester, do not drive me to despair. Let me have God's love and yours."

He knew well that he must not kneel at her feet, or take her hand into his; but he drew so near to her that he could almost whisper the words into her ear. Still she did not move or speak or raise her eyelids, which had sunk at last. He only felt more than saw, that she was trembling a little.

"Ah!" he cried, with a ring of bitterness and self-reproach in his voice, "I know what keeps you silent. But even she, if she were living, would bid you forgive and listen to me."

"Is she then not living?" asked Hester, her lips white and quivering, so that she could scarcely utter the question.

"I believe not," he answered hurriedly. "I have many reasons to believe it. The past can die now and be buried. Think what we could do for your father; how I could make atonement to the utmost. How rich we could make him—how happy yet among his books! In a little time he must come in contact with fresh troubles, perhaps disgrace. I would shield him from every care; and he is growing old. What will become of you when he is old and very poor, my darling? Let me make this atonement for his sake. Think of him."

"I do think of him," murmured Hester; "and for his sake I should say, No, even if I loved you as you wish—if I loved you as much as you say you love me. You have never fairly looked at what you have done. You have never repented of your sin."

"Not repented!" echoed Robert.

"You do not know what repentance is," cried Hester, her gray eyes flashing with a light he had never seen in them. "Oh, if you had repented, you could never ask me to be your wife! Me! Is it possible that you, or your father, could ever think of me? No. You have borne no punishment for your sin; and it is not in your nature to repent without punishment."

"Borne no punishment!" he repeated. "What then do you call the ten years of exile which banished me from my home?"

"They were years of pleasant travel in foreign lands," she answered. Have you not told me of them? You had everything you could wish, and you enjoyed the time fully. When you began to yearn for home again, you returned to it. I will tell you who has borne the punishment: My father, who has never smiled since you sinned; and she who has no home and no friends, who has been an outcast in the world, despised and broken-hearted. If you could see her now, would you dare to ask me to be your wife?"

To Hester the image of Rose was very present; but to Robert it was a memory of so many years past, and so unwelcome an intruder, that he could not summon it readily to his mind. As he had told Hester, he felt assured that she was dead, for such lost ones seldom live without giving some sign of their existence. But there was something in Hester's tone and face which made his heart die within him. It was not that she was indignant or impassioned. There was rather a tranquil yet intense pity for him, which placed her at an immeasurable height above him.

"O Hetty," he cried, "little Hetty, is it quite impossible for me to win your love?"

"Why do you ask me?" she said, in a troubled voice. "It is impossible; you must know it to be impossible. Oh, why did you ever think of such a thing? How could you ever think of it?"

GOD'S THOUGHTS AND OURS.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 28, Isa. 55 : 8-9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

What Are God's Thoughts? — To have Men Come to Him—Man's Thought of Ingratiating Himself—Mistakes of Seekers—Seven Years Praying—The Means Failing—God will Undertake—Satan's Device to Prevent Consecration Causes of Failure in Healing—An Unlimited Invitation.

"FOR my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

A DEAR BOY,

religiously brought up, and having true conception of what a Christian should be, said the other day, "How can I be a Christian? I don't like meetings, I don't enjoy reading my Bible as much as story books, I don't find God answers my prayers, I know I ought to be a Christian and like good things, but I can't." His real thought was "God is hard, He exacts impossibilities, He asks me to love what I have no taste for. He is not really love, but He is harsh and unjust." Such are man's thoughts about God, whether they are spoken out as frankly or not.

WHAT IS GOD'S THOUGHT?

"Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; (Matt. 11 : 28). I will undertake and make all the wrong things right." It is just the cherishing of hard thoughts about God which hinders so many from coming to Him. Satan makes the suggestion, "Hath God said?" (Gen. 3), and he it is who sows in man's heart the seed of unbelief. But in the Lord's "Come unto Me" we have a perfect refuge from all his malice. Once entertaining God's thought to come with Him and put the whole matter into His hands, to let Him explain Himself, and reveal Jesus the Saviour, then, the poor distressed soul is at rest. "But," said a young girl one day, "I don't know how to feel my sins, I can't feel sorry for them as I ought." The idea was to work herself up to an intense emotion about her past sins as a kind of propitiation to God for them. What is His thought? "Come unto Me." He wants to have us face to face with Him; one look at the heart of God, one conception of His wondrous love who took on Him our very flesh, and suffered the penalty for the breaking of His own law, and all thoughts of His harshness and exacting are gone at once. Man's thought, suggested by Satan, is to propitiate God by bringing Him a heart and life changed by self-effort, constraint and force. God's thought is to have personal intercourse with His erring child, and to break his heart by a love which provides instant and perfect pardon, instant and perfect remedy for every evil. Man's thoughts are impossible; God's perfectly easy. Man's way is toilsome and burdensome, God's way is instant, glorious relief and freedom.

"I do want to work for God," said

A YOUNG CHRISTIAN,

"but I don't feel that constraining love to souls which I want to feel, I don't know anything which holds me back, but it seems as though I could not speak, and as though I were not half in earnest." Her thought was to be filled in herself with a kind of impetus which should carry her forward involuntarily, and which would at all times sweep souls into the Kingdom of God before her. She little knew her own heart. If such an idea had been realized, she would have felt independent of God, and would have thought she was something in herself. Probably she would have been as puffed up as Paul was in danger of being, when God permitted a messenger of Satan to buffet him, that he might learn to live only by the faith of the Son of God, instead of by the power of a self made holy. What was God's thought about this girl? He led her to present her body a living sacrifice, to be wholly and absolutely at the disposal of her God, moment by moment. Then He filled her with the Holy Ghost, and called for her work as He needed it. By the Spirit of God, she was taught to know His voice, and taught to work for Him—not haphazard, not putting facts upon methods which had answered before—but receiving from the Spirit herself what she gave to others afterward.

"I have been seven years praying for a baptism of the Holy Ghost," said

AN EARNEST CHRISTIAN WORKER.

What was his thought? To receive a power, subject to him, which should enable him to do the work for God which he devised and initiated. Thus, in point of fact, the Holy Ghost was to work under his direction, of course, only for God. Unconsciously to himself he wanted to be the Holy Ghost's master. What was God's thought? That instead of being the master, he should become the servant of the Holy Ghost, yielding his members as "instruments of righteousness" under the direction of the Spirit. (Rom. 6 : 13); becoming himself the "habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2 : 22), the temple of the Holy Ghost, who should be Lord in His temple.

"I do wish I could be sure I was truly sanctified," says one, I got a blessing at a convention, but it did not last, I got it again at another convention, but again it did not last, I have been down to the penitent form at the Salvation Army Holiness Meeting, and I thought I got a clean heart; but still there is something that I want; I don't come up to my ideas of what a Christian should be; what shall I do?" "I have done this and that, I have been here and there," but what has God done all this time? His thought is to undertake the whole case if you will let him have it. If instead of holding the reins in your own hands, you will really let the government be upon His shoulder, and let Him be responsible to make you holy, and believe He takes the responsibility, it will be unto you according to your faith. If you are real in your consecration, He will surely be equally real in accepting that consecration, for the Altar sanctifies the gift. And if there has been anything deficient in your consecration, and you honestly trust Him to show it you, He will do so, if in very deed, you commit the matter to Him. Give God credit for being as true to His side of the transaction as you are to yours. By this means you give God the opportunity of educating your conscience, showing you as you are able to bear it, those things which grieve Him, and cleansing you not only from all known and recognized sin, but also from all your sins of ignorance. While you are occupied with your thoughts of sanctification, you are continually dwelling on your own side of the question, whether you have done your part, whether your consecration is perfect, and all the time Satan is tricking you out of the joy and power which comes from having the matter fully settled with God. Satan knows that a Christian who is fully sanctified, and living in the power of the Holy Ghost, damages his kingdom more than five hundred ordinary Christians and thus he endeavors to keep devoted Christians occupied with their own thoughts about these questions rather than God's thoughts. Real sanctification should produce full because it should lead us out of ourselves and our own life into it, and His life, out of our thoughts into His, out of our plans and devices, into His, so that our life becomes one long reckoning upon His faithfulness. It is impossible for us to retain any anxiety about anything while we are counting upon God's faithfulness about it. What causes anxiety about Christian work? It cannot be where a Christian has given up his thoughts. When Moses, the future deliverer of Israel, was in his own thoughts, while he bore the responsibility himself, he accomplished the murder of one Egyptian, drew on himself contempt from his own people, and made himself a fugitive. When however, he came into God's thoughts, and instead of undertaking to manage God's work, he became a simple instrument in His hands. Moses had but to lift up his rod at God's command, and all Egypt was forced to feel the power of the hand of his God, and that again and again until the Egyptians cried that Egypt was destroyed. He had but to lift his hand at God's command, and the very sea opened and made a way for God's redeemed ones to pass over. In answer to his prayer, when he prayed as an instrument in God's hand, the heaven gave bread and the rock gave water. But in all this, it was not God who carried out the thoughts of Moses, but Moses who carried out the thoughts of God.

"I have tried

and it does not answer for me," say some who have come with their own thoughts about it, and then have brought God in guilty of failure to answer their expectations. "I have prayed," they say, "and been annointed, and left off medicine, and even accepted healing by faith, but I am not healed." Without knowing it, they have been in their own thoughts. They have expected something from their faith, their prayer, etc. and they have not entered into the thought of God who can only deal with us in soul or body through Christ. They have not seen their sins and sickness laid on Jesus, and themselves free from condemnation to sin and sickness in Him. Their hearts are not knit to Him in loving gratitude for what He has already done, and thus they are not healed. They are on the human side; and it is only as we drop over from the human to the divine that we get to the place of power, of liberty, and of joy. Disappointment is impossible while we are in God's thoughts. Patience may be exercised, faith may be tried, but nothing is doubtful or uncertain because our God is true. It takes us from second to first causes when we yield our thoughts to God. Things, circumstances, people may bring us into impossible positions, we may see no exit, but there is one, and God knows it; why then be troubled? God is on our side (Ps. 118 : 6). The one simple path for us is to look on the God side of everything and refer all things to Him at once. "Come unto Me" is an unlimited invitation. He means us to accept it under every circumstance and then puts almightiness at our disposal.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Ravages of the Cholera in Italy, and especially in the city of Naples last week, surpassed the worst reports from France when the epidemic was at its worst. Last Friday there were four hundred and thirty deaths from the disease registered in twenty-four hours in Naples alone. There were eight hundred and nine fresh seizures. In other parts of Italy, on the same day, there were only sixty-seven deaths from cholera. The European correspondent of the New York Times, whose intrepidity at Marseilles won him distinction, has gone to Naples. He cables that many of the poorer streets of Naples are as silent as death. Even the cafés are closed, and the only sign of life is the joiners hammering the rough coffins together. In some of these streets absolutely everybody is either dead or is sick. In one street—the Via Duchessa — thirty cases occurred in a single house. The smell of burned sulphur is everywhere, and the wretched people of the poorer classes are either stupefied or frantic. The King of Italy has displayed heroism of an extraordinary character for a king. He has not betaken himself to a safe place and sent the sufferers copies of his "life in the mountains" to assuage their woe, as the monarch of another country did recently, but he has gone to Naples and lived in the midst of the danger, setting an example to the other kings and queens of Europe. He visits the sick and supervises the efforts to check the spread of the disease. He is accompanied always by his brother Amadeus. He has visited all the hospitals and the afflicted quarters, scattering money and kind words right and left. He was with difficulty dissuaded from exploring the Fondaici, containing probably the most hideous human habitations in Christendom, with its narrow courtyards, its houses eighty feet high, the sunlight and air excluded, and the filthiest rooms, each with a dozen or fifteen inmates of both sexes. There is no water there to wash with; the place is alive with vermin; it is a literal sink of pestilence, and contains fully one fourth of the whole population of Naples. In Spain, where the disease has also appeared, there have really been over one hundred and fifty deaths from cholera, and these in the Province of Alicante. There are no means of telling how many deaths have occurred in the northern Province of Lerida. The people of Madrid have been scared out of their wits by the few cases that have appeared in that city. The disease will probably break out there during this week. Madrid is in a bad sanitary condition, and certainly its people can be trusted to furnish the other important requisite of fear.

A Vigorous Prosecution of the French War in China was ordered on Saturday by the Council of Ministers. Prime Minister Ferry telegraphed to the French admiral to resume operations at once, and promising him large re-enforcements. The Chinese Government last week published its reply to the French ultimatum. It "deplores the refusal of France to accept America's offer of mediation, and says China is willing to submit her case to any friendly Power." China is contemplating fitting out privateers to prey on French commerce. A French newspaper, noticing the fact, remarks that if China enters upon privateering, France, also with the right of search of neutrals, warns both European and American nations that a privateer vessel, not under the command of or manned by the subjects of China, will be treated as a pirate, and the crews, if captured, will be hanged to the yardarm. That is probably an idle threat. France is not yet so reckless as to exasperate friendly Powers by such an outrage.

The Visit of the Czar of Russia to Warsaw has been paid without any attack being made upon him. Extraordinary precautions were taken to insure his safety. Arrests were made freely; every one who was suspected of disaffection was locked up. Over one thousand persons were arrested in connection with the visit. The shop-keepers were ordered to decorate their places of business, and a dismal attempt to get up some show of enthusiasm was made with small results. The Polish nobility showed their disaffection by absenting themselves from the entertainments given in honor of the Czar's visit.

An Enthusiastic Reception to Lord Wolseley and Lord Northbrook was tendered them on their arrival in Egypt on September 8th. Lord Wolseley was to start on his journey to Khartoum on September 15th. Orders have been issued in Cairo which point toward an intention to use the desert route from Debbeh to Khartoum in case the Nile route fails. Agents are scouring Upper Egypt, buying camels. Over thirty thousand of these animals will accompany the expedition. General Wolseley declares that he has as yet perfected no plan of operations, and will require a couple of days to look about and consider the situation before definitely deciding upon a course of action. Lord Northbrook, British High Commissioner to Egypt, had an audience with the Khedive. The Khedive was very cordial, and expressed himself as highly satisfied with the declarations of Lord Northbrook.

THE FRANCO-CHINESE WAR.

Events from 1802—French Aggressive Expeditions from 1862—The Last Three Years—What the French Want—"The Langson Treachery"—Capture of Keelung—Bombardment of Foochow on August 23d.

So prominent a place has been given in the daily press to the events now taking place in China, that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will doubtless welcome a brief résumé of the circumstances which have led to so much bloodshed and threaten to bring about serious peril to our missionaries and fellow-citizens in that land. We therefore briefly recapitulate those events, and on our first page present a curious picture of a group of Chinese artillerymen, and the portraits of the two men who, under God, have done much to spread abroad in China the knowledge of the Prince of Peace.

No less than one thousand Chinese soldiers and sailors are said to have been killed in the French attack upon the Foochow Arsenal and forts. The bombardment of Foochow which took place, on August 23d, is the outcome of a long series of complicated events. In 1802 the country of Tonquin—or Ton-King—was subjugated by King Nguyen, of Cochin China, with the aid of four French officers sent by Louis XVI., at the instance of Bishop Adran, since which time Tonquin has been called, "The Kingdom of the North" by the Annamese. In 1862 Cochin China was occupied by the French, and in 1868–9 and 1873 further aggressive expeditions were undertaken, in which General Garnier lost his life in the last-named year, and a treaty of peace was signed in 1874.

In 1881 twelve and a half million dollars were voted by the French Government for on the river Songkoi. Under this quickening influence events moved rapidly. In May, 1882, the Hanoi citadel was bombarded by the French. Consequently the Chinese Governor of Saigon sent seven gun-vessels, with a small force fully equipped, to Tonquin. The French were defeated, and Commander Rivière was killed. A vote was then passed by the French Chamber for an expedition, and troops were dispatched as quickly as possible. Several towns were taken, Hué submitted, and the King of Annam executed a treaty, resulting in a temporary and delusive cessation of hostilities.

It was soon understood, however, that the difficulty lay not with Annam, but with China. Without going into the subject of French ambition in Indo-China, of which Tonquin is a part, it may be stated that the object of the French occupation of Tonquin is to secure and Laos for France. The contour of Tonquin is very irregular, and the frontier, especially next China, is not well defined. A belt of territory, debatable land, exists between the two countries, narrow in the north, but widening out to 115 miles in the north-west. It is this neutral zone which China regards with the most jealous eyes. Though the Chinese are willing to allow the French to retain Annam, yet for the security of their frontier they require that the whole of Tonquin, including the river Songkoi, shall constitute neutral territory. This claim the French pronounce impracticable. This was the state of things in October, 1883, and a desultory warfare was carried on in which the French were victorious, but in which they were taught the need of caution by two severe repulses.

THE LANGSON TREACHERY,

as it is termed, which has led to the breaking out of the present phase of the war between France and China, and the storming of Foochow, came about in this way:

On the opening of the French Parliament in May last M. Jules Ferry set forth the negotiations culminating in the Treaty of Tientsin, made at the beginning of 1884, and after referring to the exploits of the troops, said: "Our winter Session had hardly terminated when the capture of Hong Hoa, crowning the brilliant efforts of our Expeditionary Corps, marked the term of this fine campaign, which had been illustrated by the capture of Sontay and Bac-Ninh. The military operations were over. But from a diplomatic point of view the situation still continued dark. Our relations with the Court of China were infrequent, and marked by considerable tension. The Treaty of Tientsin stipulated that the Chinese should immediately evacuate Tonquin within the whole extent of its natural frontiers. Moreover, China promised to cause to be respected, in the present and in the future, all treaties existing and that might be subsequently concluded between France and the Court of Annam, solemnly undertook to open to free traffic with France and Annam, the whole of the southern frontier of China bordering upon Tonquin."

There was a considerable party, however, in the Chinese Court at Pekin, who were by no means satisfied with the terms of the Treaty of Tientsin, and as a consequence no hurry was shown to carry them out. When, therefore, the French commander appeared before the citadel of Langson and demanded its surrender, the Chinese general said that he had no orders to surrender it, and must therefore hold it until such orders arrived. Thereupon the French general stormed the fort, and the Chinese poured upon the attacking force a well directed fire under which many fell. This resistance was regarded by the French as a violation of the Treaty of Tientsin, and therefore they demanded from the Chinese an indemnity of 250,000 millions of francs, which was reported to have been reduced to 80,000,000 francs, i.e., $16,000,000.

The French bombarded the town of Keelung on the island of Formosa, which island is 250 miles long and 80 miles wide, and is, next to Java, the gem of the Eastern Seas. Keelung is in the immediate neighborhood of the only coal mines which are worked in the Chinese Empire. These mines supply the Chinese war vessels, as also the great Arsenal of Foochow on the Chinese mainland, less than a hundred miles from Keelung. The seizure of Keelung by the French Admiral was very promptly effected. As the Chinese even then still refused to pay the indemnity, the French proceeded to bombard on August 23d. Admiral Courbet opening fire, the Chinese returned it promptly from the Arsenal. But it soon became evident that the duel was a very unequal affair. For about fifteen minutes, indeed, several of the Chinese gunboats kept up a desultory fire, after which the survivors of the crews leaped overboard. But the combat, according to the London Times correspondent, was virtually over in seven minutes. The superior artillery of the French made the contest simply a massacre. Out of the eleven ships forming the Chinese fleet, only two, it is believed, escaped. No surrender was allowed to the sinking and disabled vessels, and even when their guns were silenced, they were shelled for hours. The shore batteries ceased firing about an hour after the French commenced the attack, but the ruthless bombardment of not only the Arsenal, forts, and barracks, but even of villages, was continued for two hours longer. The Chinese loss is estimated at one thousand killed, and three thousand wounded; while the French loss was given out by the French authorities, who are notoriously untrustworthy, as only seven killed and fourteen wounded.

THE SCENES ON THE RIVER

as the dead and wounded men floated by, are said to have been terrible. Many of the wounded were rescued by the English ships in the river, the crews of which were also busily engaged in fending off the burning gunboats and fire-junks. On the following day the French recommenced firing upon the barracks and camps, although no resistance was offered. The bombardment of the forts on the Min River was continued on Tuesday. Nothing but the capture of Pekin, the Chinese capital, will, it is believed, now end the war.

It is now generally acknowledged that the Chinese form excellent material for soldiers, but that they are a mere mob without European drill and officers. Since the time of the Taeping rebellion, when "Chinese Gordon" and other officers were employed in their forces, the Chinese have recognized the value of European leaders, but they do not appear to have secured them. They are able to put in the field at very short notice, an army of 200,000 men.

THE REV. GRIFFITH JOHN,

The Apostle of Hankow, China.

Born at Swansea in 1832—His Conversion—Begins to Preach—Enters Brecon College in 1850—Removal to Bedford—Equipment for Foreign Missionary Work—Set Apart for the Preaching of the Gospel in China in 1855—His Arrival at Shanghai—Transferred to Hankow in 1861—Gambling and Opium-Smoking—Visiting the Dens.

THE Rev. Griffith John, of the London Missionary Society, whose portrait appears on the first page, was born at Swansea, in Wales, on December 14th, 1832, and is therefore now in the fifty-second year of his age. At a very early period he appears to have been the subject of the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit, owing, doubtless, to the godly life and example of his parents, who, though in humble circumstances, were people of unassuming and exemplary piety, and highly respected by their neighbors.

BEGINS TO PREACH.

While still a boy he began to preach the Gospel which he had embraced. From the very first he gave unmistakable evidence of possessing oratorical gifts of the highest order; and, without being ostentatiously dramatic, he could touch the secret springs of the deepest emotion, and retire from the platform or pulpit, leaving his audience overwhelmed with the majesty of his theme, and subdued to tears by the penetrating and irresistible power of his pathos.

HIS ACADEMICAL CAREER.

It having been pointed out to him that his future usefulness might be more extended and abiding if he received the educational advantages of a college curriculum, he began to prepare himself for an academical course by a diligent study of the English language, and in 1850 in the eighteenth year of his age, he entered Brecon College. After studying with unqualified success in this institution for rather more than three years, he removed to Bedford, where, under the supervision of an experienced minister, nominated by the London Missionary Society, he devoted his attention more fully to Biblical and theological themes, and concentrated all his efforts upon efficiently preparing himself for foreign missionary work.

SET APART FOR WORK IN CHINA.

At last in April, 1855, when he was twenty-three years old, Mr. John was solemnly set apart and dedicated to the work he ardently loves, in the Congregational Church at Swansea, where he first made a profession of faith, and of which the Rev. Dr. Rees is now the pastor. A month after his consecration to missionary work in China, Mr. John set sail, and after a voyage extending over several months, he arrived at Shanghai. Here he remained until 1861, studying the language and learning the Mandarin dialect—the dialect of educated men, courtly ceremony, and official life, and exceedingly difficult to acquire—as well as the patois or dialect of the province—the language of the illiterate and commonest people—and in this way laid a firm and solid foundation for future work among all classes of the natives. At the same time he preached frequently in the city itself, and in various parts of the province. The Rev. W. R. Thompson, foreign secretary of the London Missionary Society, asserts that so earnestly did Mr. John study, and with so rare an aptitude for the acquisition of the language had God endowed him, that "when he had only been en or eighteen months in the country, he ld preach in Chinese so well as to command unqualified admiration of an English Con- r officer who was well acquainted with the guage."

ut all this was preparatory discipline, school- and equipping him for the wider and more cult sphere of Christian enterprise at Han- , with which Mr. John's name is now indis- bly associated. Hankow is one of the est inland cities of China, and is linked to great Yellow Sea by the river Wangpoo or sung, which is navigable for the largest mers all along the six hundred miles, by ch Hankow is distant from the sea. Mr. n was the first missionary employed in Cen- China, and so well had he utilized the od of his stay at Shanghai, that he was able ommence the work of preaching Christ on very day on which he arrived at his new ion.

rom this point as a centre, he has caused to ate on every hand the light and knowledge alvation. His labors have been indefati- e, and the spiritual results are among the t valuable in the history of Christian mis- s. He has travelled, chiefly on foot, over e portions of nine out of the eighteen prov- s of the Empire, and was the first to preach Gospel in four of them. The records of the ety show that in 1868 he spent four months n extended missionary campaign, in the se of which he travelled over three thou- l miles, and penetrated into regions where glad tidings of salvation had never been d before. In 1880 a similar expedition was ertaken by him through the provinces of eh, Kiangsi, and Hunen. His first visit e was in 1870, after an absence of fifteen s, and he paid a second visit in February, , rendered necessary by the illness of his , whose devotion is only second to his own.

THE REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR,

Founder of the China Inland Mission.

n in 1832—Conversion—Early Interest in ina—Dangers Encountered on His Travels—turns to England—Founds China Inland ission—Serious Illness and Manifold Labors.

HN HUDSON TAYLOR was born at Barnsley, orkshire, England, in the year 1832, and is fifty-two years old. He was consecrated od from his birth, and at a very early age it evident that a work of grace was begun in eart. When but a boy the spiritual needs claims of China took hold of his mind, and ar never to have left him.

hen, at the age of fifteen, after a period of tual declension, he regained a sense of the e favor, the need of that vast empire erfully affected him, and from that time he began to direct his attention and studies to the subjects which would best fit him for missionary work in that land. So decided was he upon going to China, that he said he would go if he had to work his passage out as a common sailor. He gained some knowledge of medicine in the shop of his father, who was a chemist and druggist, and afterward, prosecuted medical studies in Hull and London, during which time he also availed himself of opportunities for Christian work.

In September, 1853, he

as a missionary in connection with the Chinese Evangelization Society. After three or four years' residence in China, he was led by a combination of circumstances to resign his connection with this society, and to pursue that life of faith in God for temporal supplies which he has since continued. In 1858 he was married at Ningpo to a lady of remarkable devotedness to mission work, and of uncommon mental ability, Maria Jane, second daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Dyer, of the London Missionary Society.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY IN CHINA.

Most interesting details of his mission work during these early years in China are given in his pamphlet on "China: its Spiritual Need and Claims."

In April, 1855, in company with the Rev. J. S. Burdon, of the Church Missionary Society, now Bishop Burdon, he visited the island of Tsung-ming, and the north bank of the Yang-tse-Kiang, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel and distributing copies of the New Testament. As narrated in that pamphlet, they both narrowly escaped with their lives, being arrested by the Chinese police and followed by a howling mob, and at last only released through the friendliness of a Mandarin. But this was only one of the many perils encountered by Mr. Taylor.

In 1860, broken down in health by incessant labors, he was compelled to return to England. Oppressed by the spiritual destitution of China, which at that time had not an average of one missionary to three millions of its people, he was anxious for more laborers to go out. The following extract from a letter written in January, 1860, when read in the light of subsequent experiences, has a special interest. He wrote to a friend in England thus:

"Do you know of any earnest, devoted young men, desirous of serving the Lord in China, who, not wishing for more than their expenses, would be willing to come out and labor here? Oh, for four or five such helpers! They would probably preach in Chinese in six months. In answer to prayer the means would be found."

"Throughout our voyage," he says, in the pamphlet already referred to, "our earnest prayer to God was that He would overrule our return to this country for good to China, and make it instrumental in raising up at least five helpers to labor in Ning-po and the province of Cheh-kiang." These simple extracts reveal to us though the mission was not formally inaugurated till 1865. What was the result of these prayers? Several young men offered and were sent out. Let Mr. Taylor tell the story in his own words:

"Coming home to England, with little hope of ever returning—being told that it was improbable that I should ever be able to return there—I was occupied for some time in the preparation of an edition of the New Testament for the British and Foreign Bible Society in the vernacular of that part of China in which I have latterly labored—Ning-po. And while engaged in that work, spending day after day with a beloved and honored friend of the Church Missionary Society in the work of revision and translation, the Lord laid more heavily upon my heart than ever before the need of the whole Chinese Empire.

"At the end of the year 1864 and the beginning of 1865 I found that there were only 97 missionaries in China. There had been as many as 115, but they had gone down to 97; and surely there could be no question that there was a needs-be for some further effort on behalf of China. I found that in eleven of the eighteen provinces there was and I felt that, without interfering with the work of those existing agencies which God was then and is still largely blessing, there was abundant room for additional effort, and not only abundant room, but a loud call for it. And recognizing that God means what He says—that He loves to hear and answer prayer—I was led, after a good deal of prayerful conference with some friends interested in China, to sketch out the plan of the China Inland Mission, and to attempt its formation, and not without success.

"There was a little difficulty attending it. I was very anxious that what we did should not appear for a moment to conflict with the work of any of the older societies, and still more that it should not actually divert any help of any kind from channels already existing, because that would have been no gain to China or to the cause of God; but that we should have such a method of working given to us as should draw out fresh laborers, who probably would not otherwise go, and should open fresh channels of pecuniary aid which otherwise, perhaps, would not be touched.

"After a good deal of thought and prayer, I was led, in addresses on China to lay its needs before the hearts of God's children as I was able, in England and Scotland and Ireland, and to make it known that I should be glad to enter into correspondence with any persons desirous to go out to labor in an mission in China, and who were prepared to go out without guaranteed support. For having no single denomination at our back, and being anxious not to interfere with existing channels of communication, I felt it best just to leave one's self open to receive such remittances through the mail as God might lay on the hearts of His children to send; in this way interfering with no collections in places of worship, nor with any collections made in other ways.

"Well, forty or fifty persons entered into correspondence with us, and fifteen or sixteen were selected and came up to London from various parts of the United Kingdom, and had a short period of preliminary testing—testing rather than training—training in some measure, but rather testing than training. In the May of 1866 we found ourselves in this position, that we had full confidence that there were men and women who desired to go and leaning on Him for grace and strength and support, and prepared to trust to Him indeed, in whatever circumstances they might find themselves.

"But, of course, their going out involved a considerable outlay. There were matters of outfits and passage-money to be met, and we saw that not less than a couple of thousand pounds ($10,000) would be needed to launch the mission." Mr. Taylor then tells how in answer to prayer, the sum of £2000 was sent in without appeals for money, and before the paper stating that so many persons were ready to go, which he had prepared, was received from the printer.

In February, 1879, Mr. Taylor returned to China where, in the mysterious dispensations of Providence, he was destined to undergo a prolonged and painful illness. Through the mercy of God, he ultimately rallied, and has been enabled to render invaluable service in the supervision of the work of the mission, and in the encouragement of laborers beset with difficulties. He is now, in the present month of September, 1884, seeking additional missionaries to go out to China.

INCREASE OF SUICIDE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 21, 1884.

"He drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm."—ACTS 16 : 27, 28.

HERE is a would-be suicide arrested in his deadly attempt. He was a sheriff, and according to the Roman law a bailiff himself must suffer the punishment due an escaped prisoner; and if the prisoner breaking jail was sentenced to be endungeoned for three or four years, then the sheriff must be endungeoned for three or four years; and if the prisoner breaking jail was to have suffered capital punishment, then the sheriff must suffer capital punishment.

had received especial charge to keep a sharp lookout for Paul and Silas. The government had not had confidence in bolts and bars to keep safe these two clergymen, about whom there seemed to be something strange and supernatural.

Sure enough, by miraculous power, they are free, and the sheriff, waking out of a sound sleep, and supposing these ministers have run away, and knowing that they were to die for preaching Christ, and realizing that he must therefore die, rather than go under the executioner's axe on the morrow and suffer public disgrace, resolves to precipitate his own decease. But before the sharp, keen, glittering dagger of the sheriff could strike his heart, one of the unloosened prisoners arrests the blade by the command, "Do thyself no harm."

IN OLDEN TIME,

and where Christianity had not interfered with it, suicide was considered honorable and a sign of courage. Demosthenes poisoned himself when told that Alexander's ambassador had demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators. Isocrates killed himself rather than surrender to Philip of Macedon. Cato, rather than submit to Julius Cæsar, took his own life, and after three times his wounds had been dressed tore them open and perished. Mithridates killed himself rather than submit to Pompey, the conqueror. Hannibal destroyed his life by poison from his ring, considering life unbearable. Lycurgus a suicide, Brutus a suicide. After the disaster of Moscow, Napoleon always carried with him a preparation of opium, and one night his servant heard the ex-emperor arise, put something in a glass and drink it, and soon after the groans aroused all the attendants, and it was only through utmost medical skill he was resuscitated from the stupor of the opiate.

Times have changed, and yet the American

CONSCIENCE NEEDS TO BE TONED UP

on the subject of suicide. Have you seen a paper in the last month that did not announce the passage out of life by one's own behest? Defaulters, alarmed at the idea of exposure, quit life precipitately. Men losing large fortunes go out of the world because they cannot endure earthly existence. Frustrated affection, domestic infelicity, dyspeptic impatience, anger, remorse, envy, jealousy, destitution, misanthropy are considered sufficient causes for absconding from this life by Paris green, by laudanum, by belladonna, by Otheilo's dagger, by halter, by leap from the abutment of a bridge, by firearms. More cases of felo de se in the last two years than any two years of the world's existence, and more in the last month than in any twelve months. The evil is more and more spreading.

A pulpit not long ago expressed some doubt as to whether there was really anything wrong about quitting this life when it became disagreeable, and there are found in respectable circles people apologetic for the crime which Paul in the text arrested. I shall show you before I get through that suicide is and I shall lift a warning unmistakable. But in the early part of this sermon I wish to admit that some of the best Christians that have ever lived have committed self-destruction, but always in dementia, and not responsible. I have no more doubt about their eternal felicity than I have of the Christian who dies in his bed in the delirium of typhoid fever. While the shock of the catastrophe is very great, I charge all those who have had Christian friends under cerebral aberration step off the boundaries of this life, to have no doubt about their happiness. The dear Lord took them right out of their dazed and frenzied state into perfect safety. How Christ feels toward the insane you may know from the kind way He treated the demoniac of Gadara and the child lunatic, and the potency with which he hushed the tempests either of sea or brain.

Scotland, the land prolific of intellectual giants, had none grander than Hugh Miller. Great for science and great for God. He came of the best Highland blood, and was a descendant of Donald Roy, a man eminent for piety and the rare gift of second-sight. His attainments, climbing up as he did from the quarry and the wall of the stonemason, drew forth the astonished admiration of Buckland and Murchison, the scientists, and Dr. Chalmers, the theologian, and held universities spellbound while he told them the story of what he had seen of God in the old red sandstone.

That man did more than any being that ever lived to show that the God of the hills is the God of the Bible, and he struck his tuning-fork on the rocks of Cromarty until he brought geology and theology accordant in divine worship. His two books, entitled "Footprints of the Creator" and the "Testimony of the Rocks" proclaimed the banns of an everlasting marriage between genuine science and revelation. On this latter book he toiled day and night through love of nature and love of God, until he could not sleep, and his brain gave way, and he was found dead with a revolver by his side, the cruel instrument having had two bullets—one for him and the other for the gunsmith who for the coroner's inquest was examining it and fell dead. Have you any doubt of the beatification of Hugh Miller, after his hot brain had ceased throbbing that winter night in his study at Portobello? Among the mightiest of earth, among the mightiest of heaven.

No one ever doubted the piety of the author of those three great hymns, "Oh, for a closer walk with God," "What various hindrances we meet," "There is a fountain filled with blood." William Cowper, who shares with Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley the chief honors of Christian hymnology. In hypochondria he resolved to take his own life, and rode to the river Thames, but found a man seated on some goods at the very point from which he expected to spring, and rode back to his home, and that night threw himself upon his own knife, but the blade broke; and then he hanged himself to the ceiling, but the rope parted. No wonder that when God mercifully delivered him from that awful dementia he sat down and wrote that other hymn just as memorable:

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants His footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err
And scan His work in vain;
God is His own interpreter,
And He will make it plain."

While we make this merciful and righteous allowance in regard to those who were plunge into mental incoherence, I declare that tha man who in the use of his reason, by his ow act, snaps the bond between his body and hi soul goes STRAIGHT INTO PERDITION.

Shall I prove it? Revelation 21 : 8 : "Mu derers shall have their part in the lake whic burneth with fire and brimstone." Revelatio 22 : 15 : "Without are dogs, and sorcerers, an whoremongers, and murderers." You do nc believe the New Testament? Then, perhaps you believe the Ten Commandments: "Tho shalt not kill." Do you say all these passage refer to the taking of the life of others? The I ask you if you are not as responsible for you own life as for the life of others? God gav you a special trust in your life. He made you as He made you the custodian of no other life He gave you as weapons with which to defen it two arms to strike back assailants, two eye to watch for invasion, and a natural love of lif which ought ever to be on the alert. Assass nation of others is a mild crime compared wit the assassination of yourself, because in the la ter case it is treachery to an especial trust, it i the surrender of a castle you were especially ap pointed to keep, it is treason to a natural la and it is treason to God added to ordinar murder.

THE CUSTODIAN OF YOUR LIFE

To show how God in the Bible looked upo this crime, I point you to

in some parts of the Bible, the pictures of th people who have committed this unnatura crime. Here is the headless trunk of Saul o the walls of Bathshan. Here is the man wh chased little David—ten feet in stature chasin four. Here is the man who consulted a clai voyant, Witch of Endor. Here is a man wh whipped in battle, instead of surrendering hi sword with dignity, as many a man has done asks his servant to slay him; and when the se vant declines, then the giant plants the hilt of th sword in the earth, the sharp point sticking up ward, and he throws his body on it and expires the coward, the suicide. Here is Ahithophe the Machiavelli of olden times, betraying hi best friend David in order that he may becom prime minister of Absalom, and joining that fe low in his attempt at parricide. Not gettin what he wanted by change of politics, he take a short cut out of a disgraced life into the su cide's eternity. There he is, the ingrate!

Here is Abimelech, practically a suicide. H is with an army, bombarding a tower, when woman in the tower takes a grindstone from it place and drops it upon his head, and with wha life he has left in his cracked skull he command his armor-bearer, "Draw thy sword and sla me, lest men say a woman slew me." There i his post-mortem photograph in the Book c Samuel. But the hero of this group is Juda Iscariot. Dr. Donne says he was a martyr, an we have in our day apologists for him. An what wonder, in this day when we have a boo revealing Aaron Burr as a pattern of virtue, an in this day when we uncover a statue to Georg Sand as the benefactress of literature, and i this day when there are betrayals of Christ o the part of some of His pretended apostles— betrayal so black it makes the infamy of Juda Iscariot white! Yet this man by his own han hung up for the execration of all the ages Judas Iscariot.

All the good men and women of the Bible le to God the decision of their earthly terminus and they could have said with Job, who had right to commit suicide if any man ever had— what with his destroyed property, and his bod all aflame with insufferable carbuncles, an everything gone from his home except the chie curse of it, a pestiferous wife, and four garru lous people pelting him with comfortless tal while he sits on a heap of ashes scratching h scabs with a piece of broken pottery, yet cryin out in triumph, "All the days of my appointe time will I wait till my change come."

Notwithstanding the Bible is against this il, and the aversion which it creates by the thsome and ghastly spectacle of those who ve hurled themselves out of life, and notwithnding Christianity is against it, and the argunts and the useful lives and the illustrious aths of its disciples, it is a fact alarmingly tent that suicide is on the increase.

WHAT IS THE CAUSE?

I charge upon Infidelity and Agnosticism this hole thing. If there be no hereafter, or if that reafter be blissful without reference to how live and how we die, why not move back the lding doors between this world and the next? nd when our existence here becomes troubleme, why not pass right over into Elysium? ut this down among your most solemn reflecons, and consider it after you go to your omes; there has never been a case of suicide here the operator was not either demented, and erefore irresponsible, or an infidel. I challnge all the ages, and I challenge the whole niverse. There never has been a case of selfstruction while in full appreciation of his imortality and of the fact that that immortality ould be glorious or wretched according as he cepted Jesus Christ or rejected Him.

You say it is business trouble, or you say it is ectrical currents, or it is this, or it is that, or is the other thing. Why not go clear back, y friend, and acknowledge that in every case it the abdication of reason or the hich practically says, "If you don't like this e get out of it, and you will land either in nihilation, where there are no notes to pay, o persecutions to suffer, no gout to torment, you will land where there will be everything orious and nothing to pay for it. Infidelity ways has been apologetic for self-immolation. fter Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" was ublished and widely read there was a marked ncrease of self-slaughter.

A man in London heard Mr. Owen deliver his nfidel lecture on Socialism, and went home, t down, and wrote these words: "Jesus hrist is one of the weakest characters in hisory, and the Bible is the greatest possible eception," and then shot himself. David lume wrote these words: "It would be no rime for me to divert the Nile or the Danube om its natural bed. Where, then, can be the rime in my diverting a few drops of blood from heir ordinary channel?" And having written he essay he loaned it to a friend, the friend ead it, wrote a letter of thanks and admiration, nd shot himself. Appendix to the same book. Rousseau, Voltaire, Gibbon, Montaigne, under ertain circumstances, were apologetic for selfmmolation. Infidelity puts up no bar to peole's rushing out from this world into the next. hey teach us it does not make any difference ow you live here or go out of this world, you ill land either in an oblivious nowhere or a lorious somewhere. And Infidelity holds the pper end of the rope for the suicide, and aims he pistol with which a man blows his brains ut, and mixes the strychnine for the last swalow. If Infidelity could carry the day and peruade the majority of people in this country hat it does not make any difference how you go ut of the world you will land safely, the Hudon and the East rivers would be so full of orpses the ferry-boats would be impeded in heir progress, and the crack of a suicide's pisol would be no more alarming than the rumble f a street car.

I have sometimes heard it discussed whether vas a Christian or not. I do not know, but I now that he considered appreciation of a uture existence the mightiest hindrance to elf-destruction:

For who could bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despis'd love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
No traveller returns—puzzles the will.

Would God that the coroners would be brave in rendering the right verdict, and when in a case of irresponsibility they say, "While this man was demented he took his life," in the other case say, "Having read infidel books and attended infidel lectures, which obliterated from this man's mind all appreciation of anything like future retribution, he committed self-slaughter!"

Ah! Infidelity, stand up and take thy sentence! In the presence of God and angels and men, stand up, thou monster, thy lip blasted with blasphemy, thy cheek scarred with lust, thy breath foul with the corruption of the ages! Stand up, Satyr, filthy goat, buzzard of the nations, leper of the centuries! Stand up, thou monster Infidelity! Part man, part panther, part reptile, part dragon, stand up and take thy sentence! Thy hands red with the blood in which thou hast washed, thy feet crimson with the human gore through which thou hast waded, stand up and take thy sentence! Down with thee to the pit and sup on the sobs and groans of families thou hast blasted, and roll on the bed of knives which thou has sharpened for others, and let thy music be the everlasting miserere of those whom thou hast damned! I brand the forehead of Infidelity with all the crimes of self-immolation for the last century on the part of those who had their reason.

My friends, if ever your life through its abrasions and its molestations should seem to be unbearable, and you are it by your own behest, do not consider yourselves as worse than others. Christ Himself was tempted to cast Himself from the roof of the temple; but as He resisted, so resist ye. Christ came to medicine all our wounds. In your trouble I prescribe life instead of death. People who have had it worse than you will ever have it have gone songful on the way. Remember that God keeps the chronology of your life with as much precision as He keeps the chronology of nations, your death as well as your birth, your grave as well as your cradle.

Why was it that at midnight, just at midnight, the destroying angel struck the blow that set the Israelites free from bondage? The four hundred and thirty years were up at twelve o'clock that night. The four hundred and thirty years were not up at eleven, and one o'clock would have been tardy and too late. The four hundred and thirty years were up at twelve o'clock, and the destroying angel struck the blow, and Israel was free. And God knows just the hour when it is time to lead you up from earthly bondage. By His grace make not the worst of things, but the best of them. If you must take the pills, do not chew them. Your everlasting rewards will accord with your earthly perturbations, just as Caius gave to Agrippa a chain of gold as heavy as had been his chain of iron. For the asking—and I do not know to whom I speak in this august assemblage, but the word may be especially appropriate—for your asking you may have the same grace that was given to the Italian martyr, Algerius, who, down in the darkest of dungeons, dated his letter from "the delectable orchard of the Leonine prison."

And remember that this brief life of ours is surrounded by a rim, a very thin but very important rim, and close up to that rim is a great eternity, and you had better keep out of it until God breaks that rim and separates this from that. To get rid of the sorrows of earth, do not rush into greater sorrows. To get rid of a swarm of summer insects, leap not into a jungle of Bengal tigers.

There is

and it is so radiant that the noonday sun is only the lowest doorstep and the aurora that lights up our northern heavens, confounding astronomers as to what it can be, is the waving of the banners of the procession come to take the conquerors home from church militant to church triumphant, and you and I have ten thousand reasons for wanting to go there, but we will never get there either by self-immolation or impenitency All our sins slain by the Christ who came to do that thing, we want to go in at just the time divinely arranged, and from a couch divinely spread, and then the clang of the sepulchral gates behind us will be overpowered by the clang of the opening of the solid pearl before us. O God, whatever others may choose, give me a Christian's life, a Christian's death, a Christian's burial, a Christian's immortality!

A TYPICAL FRIEND.

A REPORTER of the New York Herald, who attended Jerry McAuley's funeral on Sunday, September 21st, was approached by a shabby old fellow, who had been lounging on the outskirts of the crowd and furtively watching the ingoers.

"'Beg pardin, gents,' he said, 'but seein' as you were kinnected here and seein' as how I ain't posted on ways and things, I thought I'd ask you for a favor.'

"Both of the listeners were turning away expecting an untimely appeal for alms. But the other said: 'I've heard it's the right thing to send flowers and sich to put on the coffin of any one who's bin good to you. Well, I don't know, gents, whether I've got the rights of it or not. But there's somethin' here for Jerry.'

"He took off his tall, battered hat as he spoke, and felt in it with trembling fingers. 'It ain't any great shakes,' he said, and he took out a little bunch of white flowers. Then looking up, as though to read in the faces of the listeners approval or disapproval, he went on, apologetically: 'They're no great shakes, I allow, and I 'spect they mayn't set off the roses and things rich people send. I'm a poor man, you know, but when I heard Jerry was gone I gets up and says to myself, "Go on and do what's fash'nable, that's the way folks do when they want to show a dead man's done a heap for 'em." So there they are.'

"The usher took them.

"'And when you drop 'em with the rest, though they ain't no great shakes,' he added, with the old apologetic look, 'Jerry, who was my friend, 'll know,' and his voice trembled. 'he'll know they come from old Joe Chappy.'

"'What did he do for you?' the reporter ventured.

"'A great deal,' the old man replied. 'But it's long ago now. My gal had gone to the bad, and was dyin' without ever a bite for her to eat. I got around drunk, but it sobered me, and I hustled about to hunt up some good man. N. G. They asked if she went to Sunday-school and all that. O' course she didn't. How cud the poor gal? Well, they called her names, sed she wus a child o' wrath, and I went away broken-hearted, when I come across Jerry, and he went home with me and comforted me, and he sed that Almighty God wouldn't be rough on a poor gal what didn't know no better. She died then, but I ain't forgot Jerry.'"

"The poor old wreck could not be prevailed upon to enter, and the crowd was so great that the little bunch of flowers could not reach the casket. But the reporter thought, as he saw the floral emblems there, that none of them would be sweeter to the dead than that simple offering."

Mr. H. M. Stanley Declares himself Satisfied with his African work. He expresses his belief that the Congo Free State would soon be recognized by the whole world. The State proposes to give open commerce to all nations, and expects to become a great federation of native chiefs under the control of a European and American commission. Mr. Stanley states that he will shortly visit London and convert the English to his projects.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Text that Stuck to a Sailor.—A man said at a recent noon prayer-meeting: "'Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength' (Isaiah 26 : 4), was the only verse of the Bible I ever read before I opened that precious Book to read it regularly for myself on my conversion to Christ. Six years ago, when I was at sea, I got a little bit of paper with this text printed on it, and read it without thinking much about it, but it stuck to me, and I became anxious to read the rest of the chapter. Finding a Bible, I read and read till I saw that Jesus had died for me, and I just laid myself down at His feet, and He has kept me ever since then in safety and peace.

"A Very Timid Sailor was on his First voyage. When well out of sight of land, he saw a great, heavy cloud in the sky, and went up to the captain, and said, 'Do you think we are going to have a thunder-storm, sir?' 'Oh!' replied the captain, 'are you afraid?' 'I am rather afraid,' he answered. 'Well,' said the captain, 'don't you see the storm is behind us; it cannot touch us now, because we are before it.' So it is with the Christian; there may be clouds both of great and bitter grief and divine anger, but they are all behind our back. We may now exclaim, 'Oh Lord, I will praise thee, for though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away from me, and now thou comfortest me.'"

A Sceptic Led into Light.—A Christian gentleman relates: "God is blessing the work in James Morrison Street Hall, Glasgow. There was one case I was wonderfully struck with. A man who professed to be a sceptic came night after night to the meeting. I often spoke to him of the love of Jesus, but he always went away unmoved. Last Thursday night, as he was going out, I said to him, 'How is it to-night with you, my friend?' 'Oh, the road is bright and clear; I see the way now,' he answered, and continued: 'For twenty years I have been under a thick cloud, but God has removed it, and I am fully trusting in Him now, and accept Jesus as my Saviour.' I heartily thanked God for that man's wonderful deliverance out of darkness into His marvellous light."

Silly Jamie's Capture of a Man.—Mr. Ferry relates: "When the Rev. Mr. Riddell was at Dundee, holding evangelistic meetings, he said, 'It is necessary that we have larger meetings. Now, if every one here would bring another person it is clear they would be doubled.' This appeal had a powerful effect upon the mind of one in the audience. On Sunday evening the church was crowded with people, and Mr. Riddell was alarmed to see two men just inside the door struggling violently together. Before anyone could interfere, the stronger of the two, 'Silly Jamie,' ran the other down the aisle by main force to the foot of the pulpit stairs, and looking up to Mr. Riddell, he said, 'Here's my ane, at ony rate!' Silly Jamie was so determined to bring his 'ane' that he brought him by force, as he could do no other. There is no need for sane people to use force but if they were as earnest as Silly Jamie our houses for worship and prayer would soon be crowded."

Led to Christ on Board Ship.—Mr. W. Millar relates: "On one occasion while on my way to Ireland, in the boat near to me I heard two people, an old man and a young one, conversing together upon religious matters. The old man was talking very earnestly to the other, and, as I listened, it struck me that what the old man said was very hurtful to any young person. Stepping forward, I joined in the conversation, and spoke of Jesus, and Him crucified, as the only hope of salvation. After a little the old man went away, and I then strove to lead that young man to Christ. To show him what faith was I gave him the familiar illustration of a house on fire and a person in the top story with no means of escape, to whom a ladder is put up, and he is requested to trust himself to the only means of safety. I endeavored to show him that the act of faith was in trusting to that ladder. Then I said, 'Throw your arms about Christ, and never let Him go; keep clinging to Him, and He will never put you away from Him; keep hold of Him through life and still hold to Him in your dying hour.' When I had finished, looking up with a beaming face, he said, 'I see it now; you have made it so plain,' and then he rose and went away. I never saw that young man again, nor do I believe I ever shall see him in this world; but I know I shall see him at Christ's right hand in the judgment day."

The Best Doctor in Belgium.—M. Poinsot, the devoted Protestant Scripture Reader at Charleroi, has been much blessed in his arduous and heroic work for Christ. He says in his journal: "I visited a poor woman of seventy-six years of age, alone, poor, and ill. I said to her, 'The nights must seem very long to you, being always alone?' 'If I were alone,' she replied, 'I should have been dead long ago, but I have a Friend who never leaves me day nor night; I commune always with Him, and His Word comforts me.' 'But,' I said, 'if you became worse in the night?' 'He would take care of me,' was the reply; 'He is the best Doctor in Belgium.'" Even in bigoted Belgium, the seed of God's Word, where faithfully sown, is springing up, and bearing fruit to His glory. Many of the people are tired of the priests, and of the formalities of the Church of Rome, and are thirsting for the Bread of Life, which alone can satisfy the craving of their souls.

A Man's Fatal Craze.—Mr. Pittendreigh says: "I once heard of a man who took a craze to have all the old iron and pieces of cloth he became possessed of hung round him, until he was scarcely able to go about. One night in winter he was travelling over a moor with his heavy burden. Arriving at the door of a poor shepherd's house, he begged shelter for the night. 'Come in, and welcome,' was the reply. But the door was small, and the man could not get in with his bulky load. The shepherd asked him to put off some of the iron, and leave it outside till next morning; but he would not be persuaded; he only turned away from the offered shelter, lonely and weary. Three days afterward his lifeless body was found lying on the moor. So it is with a great many sinners; they will not give up their easily besetting sins and pet sins for the shelter, and warmth, and refreshment of the love of Christ; they turn away from Him, and continue to walk the wide, wild moorlands of sin, until death overtakes them, and they sink into hell."

A Lady Artist's Search for Rest.—The Rev. Mr. Ross says: "A young lady went to Rome to study art. Having a great liking for it she soon became one of the first modellers in the city. While she was busy at work one day, a companion called to see her, and began to give a long description of a ball to which she had recently been, and talked of dresses, jewelry, flowers, etc. The young lady turned, and looking at her friend, said, 'Be done; I am sick and tired of it. I have gone through and experienced it all myself.' And then she added, 'Oh, if you could only tell me where I might get rest.' Her companion, a little taken by surprise, hastily left. The young artist sat there wondering where she might find rest. She had secured the praise of man, but that did not satisfy her, she was looking for something higher; and shutting herself into her room that night, she began to think, and as she was thinking a bright thought entered her mind. She rose and brought forth a little Testament which had been lying untouched since a kind friend had given it to her, with these words, 'Now, mind, if ever you are in trouble, or weary, just open this little book and read, and you will find rest.' And now she thought: 'I will see if I can find the rest she promised.' After she had looked a little her eyes fell on these words in Rom. 5 : 1, 'Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' Her eyes rested long on th verse, until at last she found Christ as her Sa our, and obtained rest in Him."

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

Addresses Delivered at the Christian Conventi in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, N York, on September 12th.

THE Rev. George F. Pentecost, of Brookly delivered a lengthy speech in opening the pr ceedings. In the course of it he said: "T doctrine of the Lord's Second Coming as t hope of the Church needs to be taken out of t sentimental and put into the practical depa ment. If the Church measured its importan by the frequency with which it is mentioned Scripture, it would be in the forefront of a A doctrine that stimulates to watchfulness a faithfulness must be practical.

"It is the stimulating effect of this doctri which produces enthusiasm heated to the poi that the world calls fanaticism that Sat dreads, and which he seeks to defeat.' He h succeeded in getting the Church almost abandon the doctrine, first by caricaturing and then by diverting attention from it errors as to time and circumstance. He has l men to believe that the descent of the Spirit Pentecost was the Second Coming, thou nearly all the promises of the New Testame save those of Christ Himself were written aft Pentecost; then he has represented the event at an immense distance, and therefore out of t range of present expectation; and he has l people to regard death as the Second Comir although it would seem impossible to associa the idea of death with an event that in all aspects is one of life-giving power. The Lor coming is like an overdue train, that may be e pected at any moment; not that the Lord slack in keeping His promise, but that a tra already due is probably near at hand."

Mr. William E. Blackstone, of Chicago, re Titus 2 : 11–13: "Teaching us that, denyi ungodliness and worldly lusts we should li soberly, righteously, and godly in this prese world; looking for that blessed hope, and t glorious appearing of the great God and o Saviour Jesus Christ." He said: "This is or one text out of very many in the Scriptures which reference to the Lord's coming is ma as

A MOTIVE FOR RIGHT LIVING.

Do you not see how practical this makes t doctrine? If you take a new Bible and with pencil mark all such passages, you would surprised to see what a marked Bible you wou have. But in spite of these frequent referenc the expectation of the Lord's coming does n exercise the influence in the Church, whi properly belongs to it.

"To some Christians the Lord's comi means simply their own death, others, who thi that He will come in person, believe that H coming will not be for a long time, until t whole world is converted and the thousand yea of the Millennium have passed away. Thus t event fails to exercise the influence over them would exercise if they realized that it may ta place at any moment. One of the causes this prevalent indifference is that they fail see there is between the Lord's coming for H waiting people and His coming in glory to a si burdened world. There is a vast difference the two, not only in purpose, but in time. Th is evident from the frequent injunctions watchfulness. Can you be watching for event which is separated from you by an inte val of more than a thousand years? The Lo would never have enjoined watchfulness in su circumstances. Nor must we expect that t world will be converted before He comes. W are simply told that the Gospel must preached in all nations before the end come, not that th Gospel will be accepted. The process is ever where described as a taking out of a people from among the nations. Oh that the Church had been faithful to that command! the work would soon have been done. The Church has been expecting that the whole world would be converted and the Millennium brought about by the preaching of the Gospel. But it is an error. I wonder that Satan has been able to blind so many eyes with such an idea. We have to realize that at any moment the Lord may come. The proper attitude for us to hold is that we may turn away from what we may be doing, whatever it may be and say, "Yes, this is the Lord whom I have been waiting and watching for," and look up gladly to receive Him.

"This doctrine of the Lord's speedy coming sheds such

A LIGHT ON ALL PROPHECY.

From a child I have loved the prophecies of God's Word, but they were enveloped in a mist to me, I could not get order out of them. I have often sat down pondering over them and mourning at the

the Gospel is making in the world, and grieving that we must wait so long for the end of strife and sin and intemperance and all the world's woes, which I supposed must come before the Lord could return to the earth. For days and days I sought the blessing of the Spirit to show me the meaning of these things. It was in showing me the nearness of the Lord's coming that He came to me. He simply took of the things of God and showed them unto me. I saw that the Gospel was to be preached as a witness and for the taking out of the people; and I think that after the Church has been taken out of the world the Gospel will still be a witness, for we read that John saw an angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth (Rev. 14 : 6). With the acceptance of this truth and expectation of the coming of the Lord as for which I must look, the prophecies became clear to me as when a light shines into a dark place. Now as I rise in the night, as I often do and look from my window at the stars that gem the sky, I think of my Lord's coming there. And as I see the morning star shining as the herald of the approaching day, I think of His Word, "I am the bright and the Morning Star," and know that when He comes the day of Millennial glory will be at hand.

"It is of the utmost importance that you keep distinctly separate in your minds these of the Lord's coming. His coming in judgment and in the glory of heaven may be far away, but His coming for His people to take them to Himself may be very near. It is this difference that makes the thought so weighty and so comforting to us. He will come for His own and will take them away and the world will wonder where we are gone. That may be soon, oh that He may find us ready, all our affairs with the world fixed, and we ready to go as those who have received the word of warning and are prepared and waiting for the summons. If we have that expectation we shall not recoil with horror from the thought of Christ's coming as some Christians do. As we sometimes see them start back when we speak of that day we can but think that they are not ready for the summons.

"Then what an influence this should exercise on our lives. At the commencement of my Christian life I found that it was as easy for me to get rich as for other men if I would given my mind to it. And I gave my mind to it until it pleased the Lord, by His Spirit to take hold of me, and show me that 'every man that hath this hope in him

PURIFIETH HIMSELF'

(1 John 3 : 3). This precious hope has enabled me to become a sealed vessel in His service. I signed a deed before Him as when we convey a landed estate to another we describe the property, and say that in consideration of so much money paid we give the property away forever, so in consideration of the love wherewith He loved me and that He died for me I give myself, my wife, my family and all that I have to Him signed and sealed. I never could have done it by myself, but I just trust Him that He has taken possession of the property, and that He is doing business there. I pray God there may never be on my part any retraction of that conveyance.

A LITTLE BOY

was placed by his father in rather a hard place where he was kept continually on foot, from morning to night. He had to go here and go there, carrying heavy bundles, and work with all his might. It was very dull for him and he often thought of his home and his father. He wrote home that the work was too heavy for him and that he was weary, but his father thought it was best that he should remain and work on. But at last his father wrote him that he would come himself soon and fetch him home. In the meantime he must be patient and work well. The boy took new heart then, and though his work was no less hard he did it with a will, thinking it would soon be over. And every day he was looking out for his father and saying to himself, 'Perhaps father will come to-day.' As he swept out the store in the morning he would take a peep down the road to see if his father was coming. So he watched day after day and day after day, until one morning looking out as usual, sure that some day his father would come, he saw his father's buggy coming, and he dropped his broom and ran out to meet him, saying, 'I am so glad you have come.' So the Christian, looking up to his Father's abode, cries, 'Even so Lord Jesus, come quickly.'"

SITTING IN A DRAFT.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.

WE must all have noticed a certain difference in the physical capabilities of our acquaintances. One man can take his seat at any time, anywhere, regardless of any current of air. He never "takes cold," as we say. Another man is so apt to be affected by a draft that he cannot sit in any current without beginning very soon to exhibit catarrhal symptoms. The person in the first case may have real or only apparent immunity. It may be so that it never does him any harm to have the air blow on his back or on any part of his person. But this may only be apparent safety. He may be receiving physical injury without exhibiting the usual signs thereof. But our other acquaintance presents a plain case. He is never so well after sitting in the draft.

If these cases involve any question of morals, and if it be really a man's duty to have concern for the welfare of his fellow-men, the proprieties in this case are manifest. The susceptible man must not sit in drafts. He must not put himself voluntarily in a perilous position, nor must he yield to the solicitation of his more fortunately constituted friend.

In the other case, it may be that the man may sit where it pleases him, draft or no draft. He certainly may, if he be assured that he can have no more real than apparent injury. But one thing is perfectly plain—it would be both foolish and wicked in him to insist upon his friend imperilling his health and life in order to keep the robust man company. There would be something exceedingly foolish in his saying. "Why, come sit down here. Don't be childish. Don't mind this draft. It never hurts me. I sit here every day, and don't you see what health I have?"

His weaker friend would be a foolish coward to sit in that draft every day when he knew that every moment it was injuring him. To him it would be no question what the effect was upon the other man. He would know that it was peril to him, and that it is a sin in any man to put himself under any circumstances in peril unnecessarily.

We have cited a case in which we suppose that there can be no difference of opinion among intelligent people. Indeed, the unanimity is so universal that it were a waste of time to make the above statements without an ulterior object.

There is a case whose ethical standing is precisely that which is stated above, but the peril is immeasurably greater. Wider results follow, and certain social customs are connected, and for these and perhaps other reasons there is such an obfuscation on a plain moral question as has destroyed the health and the happiness of hundreds and thousands, not only of individuals but of families. The case involves the social custom of "treating."

In many polite circles it is considered indicative of cordial regard to offer wine and other drinks to one's friends and even casual acquaintances. In this way what is called the custom of treating has sprung up. When gentlemen meet in places of business or pleasure, in Wall Street or Newport, a drink is tendered. We leave it to others to discuss other phases of this question. We confine ourselves in this article to the line laid down in the preceding paragraphs. Whether I shall drink wine or not is a question which I must settle with my own conscience. But whether I am to offer wines to others involves consideration of their welfare.

Suppose I could satisfy myself that both I and a certain friend could take wine at the daily meal or casually upon meeting, and I felt no scruple in offering it to him, ought I not to make myself perfectly sure in regard to all others to whom I may offer wine? Now, because it is utterly impracticable for me to have such assurance, is it not safer that I should not offer wine at all? If my own comfort is promoted by sitting in a draft, and I may be willing to have another friend sit with me who has a constitution like mine, ought I not to consider the danger is generally to people of ordinary constitutions in such exposure to a sudden change of temperature? And if a hundred friends of mine, in the course of years, with impunity sat with me in my place of comfort, and my insisting upon receiving all my friends there should issue in the death of one of them by pleurisy, and another by pulmonary consumption, would not the remorse I should naturally feel for my sin against them more than counterbalance all the pleasure I could have in the society of all my other friends?

This is the point which seems to me ought to be made in regard to the custom of treating. If any reader of this article is accustomed to ask his friends at times to take a drink, let him remember that he cannot know what the ultimate effect of that one drink is to have upon any of his associates. Let him remember that the worst effects will come to the best of them; that among them are men his superior in every high particular of intellect, of heart, and of social power, and that these men may be destroyed by yielding to the invitation to drink. The foolish idea that it is impolite to refuse a drink leads many a lovable man into absolute ruin.

If such men would only put this case on the ground of the case of sitting in a draft, their difficulties might immediately vanish. If it be injurious to me to sit in a draft, I will simply tell my friend so, and if he insist upon sitting there, he must do so without my company, for he is a man whose principles as well as whose manners ought to be repugnant to me. Every gentleman in such case would immediately change his position, and say, "Certainly I will come out of the draft and sit where it will be best for you." It is so in the social custom of drinking. Every gentleman, as soon as he finds one of the gentlemen imperilled, will say, "No, we will close the window. No, we will put aside the wine."

We submit to all those who are accustomed to offer or take wine in company, whether what is said above is not in accordance with commonsense and the plainest principles of ethics.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the previous Sunday morning.

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Inquiries have been received respecting the terms on which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be supplied to persons desiring to introduce it to their friends. In response to this kindly project of our subscribers, we will mail the paper every week from October 3 to the end of the year to any address in the United States or Canada on receipt of twenty-five cents. The same offer made in former years has been singularly blessed. The paper sent by Christian people to unconverted acquaintances has, in a large number of cases, been the means of blessing. The low price at which it is offered for the three months will, we hope, encourage many to avail themselves of the opportunity of introducing the paper to families in which Christian literature is needed.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Another Series of the Mulligan Letters Appeared in the daily journals on September 15th. Ten of the letters were written by Mr. Blaine to Warren Fisher, one was written by him to Mr. J. Caldwell, and the others were Fisher's replies to Mr. Blaine. They belong to the period 1869–72, to which also belonged the series with which the public is already familiar. They were given to the press without comment by Warren Fisher and James Mulligan. Very little fresh information is contained in the letters, but the evident object in publishing them now is to discredit the effort being made by the advocates of Mr. Blaine to prove that his connection with Fisher and Caldwell was an innocent one, and also to show that Mr. Blaine prevaricated respecting his dealings with Colonel Scott, in his testimony before the House during the investigation eight years ago. In addition to those matters there is a statement by Mr. Blaine that if the Little Rock people wished to start a bank at Little Rock, it would be in his power to "cast an anchor to windward" in their behalf, if they so desired. Mr. Blaine does not deny that the letters are genuine, but contends that they do not prove him to have been guilty of corruptly using his office as Speaker of the House. He expressed his desire that every voter in the United States might read the letters for himself and not form his judgment from editorial misrepresentation in partisan journals. "There was not a word in the letters," Mr. Blaine added, "which was not entirely consistent with the most scrupulous integrity and honor." He hoped that every Republican paper in the United States would publish the letters in full. It is evident, however, that the publication of the letters has tended to alienate wavering voters from the Republican ticket, especially in New York. One influential journal, usually Republican, now urges its readers to vote and work for ex-Governor St. John.

The Action for Libel Instituted by Mr. Blaine against the journal which accused him of immorality will not, it appears, be tried in time to prevent the charge being used against him during the critical weeks immediately preceding the election. He has, therefore, published a statement of facts in the shape of a letter to Mr. William Walter Phelps, of New Jersey. He states therein that he was secretly married to his present wife on June 30th, 1850, in Kentucky. Subsequently he had misgivings that the marriage, which would have been legal in Pennsylvania, was not so in Kentucky, where the law rendered the certificate of the County Clerk necessary to a valid union. Mr. and Mrs. Blaine therefore travelled to Pittsburg, Penn., in March, 1851, and there had another marriage service performed. Mr. Blaine has doubtless acted wisely in publishing these facts, as the charges made against him might have operated against his election; but the charges which are really dangerous to him, and on which the Independent Republican movement is based, did not include this, but are founded only on the transactions to which the Mulligan letters refer. Thousands of Republicans who have reluctantly decided to vote against him in November would gladly give him their votes if he published a similar statement effectually disposing of those charges.

A Full Prohibition Ticket is to be put in the field in Maryland. At a conference held at Baltimore on September 16th it was resolved to nominate prohibition candidates for all vacant offices and to recommend the various Congressional districts to at once put in nomination candidates for Congress. The Hon. William Daniel, the Prohibition candidate for the Vice-Presidency, was present, and took an active part in the proceedings. A vigorous temperance movement has been prosecuted in Maryland during the past few years by Major George A. Hilton and a few other devoted workers.

The Chances of Women Obtaining Employment in the civil service are said to have been reduced by the new reform rules. As a matter of fact, out of 331 appointments made under the rules, only thirty-two have been of women. A letter by the Hon. John M. Gregory, of the Civil Service Commission, was published last week with the object of vindicating the Commissioners and the new law from the charge that there was any unfriendliness toward the appointment of females. Mr. Gregory says: "It is already generally known that the civil service examinations for clerkships are open alike to men and women; that all applicants are examined alike, marked by the same rules, and placed, if they pass, on common registers for certification to the appointing officers, the heads of departments. When notices of vacancies are received by the commission, the four names graded highest are sent without regard to sex." Thus the paucity of appointments of females is not due to prejudice on the part of the Commissioners. As to the future, Mr. Gregory predicts that "the new civil service system must inevitably favor the future employment of women—first, by bringing to the notice of appointing officers the high qualifications shown by female applicants in the examinations, and, second, by introducing to the offices a class of women whose capacity, industry, and good conduct will prove to any doubting chief of a bureau or division the sterling value of a true woman's service."

Jerry McAuley Died Suddenly on Thursday last, September 18th, of hemorrhage of the lungs. He has suffered for many years from this trouble, and recently was ordered to Florida, in the hope of obtaining relief. After his return he seemed much better, and a few days before his death he told the editor of this journal that he was feeling strong and well. He was full of energy, and was looking forward with sanguine hope to the realization of his cherished design, of opening a home for fallen women. On Wednesday he was actively engaged at his mission, and when he had completed his work he went with his wife for a walk in Central Park, to invigorate himself for the evening meeting. He returned about five o'clock, and was almost immediately attacked with hemorrhage. His physician was called and remedies administered, but he did not rally. He lingered until the following day, when he died peacefully. A few minutes before he passed away, he raised his hand toward heaven, and with a quiet smile said: "It's all right." He never spoke afterward. He was forty-five years of age; his portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 5th, 1883. Few men so circumstanced as he, have been so widely blessed. Since he was discharged from prison a converted man he has labored unceasingly for the rescue of the depraved, and now there are men in every State of the Union and in almost every country of the world who owe their conversion to God's blessing on his work. The Water Street Mission has a world-wide fame, and Cremorne, to which he removed two years ago, has been the spiritual birthplace of many men and women who have been rescued from vicious lives.

A Slight Earthquake Shock was Experienced in several States on September 19th. The telegrams reporting it showed that the tremor extended from West Virginia to Iowa, and from Kentucky to Canada. There were three shocks in a little less than a minute. They were distinctly perceptible, and caused general alarm, but did no actual damage. The tremor was accompanied at all points by a noise resembling thunder. Tall buildings were perceptibly shaken, and plaster shaken from the walls. College students, school children, and prisoners were frantic with alarm at many places, and people rushed out of their houses and stores. At Cleveland, Ohio, many large buildings swayed slightly to and fro, and hundreds of people rushed into the streets anxiously inquiring the cause of the sudden vibration. At the large freight station of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railroad chairs were displaced and gas fixtures swayed violently from west to east. Three attachés at the Signal Service station felt the shock—three short and distinct vibrations of the earth's surface. The first one was timed at 2.47, local time, and the other two followed in quick succession. At Cecil goods were thrown from shelves in the depot, and the employés rushed out, thinking a train had struck the building. It was also violent at Defiance, Ohio, where the swaying of buildings created much consternation. The people hastily abandoned their houses, and the Methodist Conference, in session at one of the churches, immediately adjourned, and the people rushed to the streets. A meeting of the Ladies' Missionary Society, in progress at the time, was also quickly dismissed. Glass was broken in a number of buildings, but no serious damage was done. There was much alarm at Columbus, Ohio. In high and large buildings the shock was felt the worst. In the upper stories of the State House, City Hall, and asylums the occupants got out as quickly as possible. At the Insane Asylum one chandelier was swung so much as to cause it to fall and break in pieces. An arch in a church in course of construction was jarred so that it fell.

Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Famous Scotch evangelist and lecturer, whose meetings in Great Britain and the Islands of Jersey and Guernsey have attracted immense audiences and have resulted in an incalculable amount of good, is on her way to America. An English journal states that she contemplates an extensive tour through this country. Miss McLatchie is a singularly gifted speaker and preacher of rare eloquence and spiritual power. God has widely blessed her efforts on the other side the Atlantic, and we earnestly pray that her visit here may be productive of much good. Letters for her may be sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

All the Jewish Congregations in New York will hold special services on October 25th, at four in the afternoon, to celebrate the hundredth birthday of Sir Moses Montefiore, the eminent Jewish philanthropist. At the meeting held in this city last week to arrange these services an invitation to Christians to co-operate in them was cordially extended. "The Old Man Benevolent" has not confined his benefactions to members of his own faith, and Christians who know what he has accomplished and how nobly he has labored would, it was naturally supposed, feel a pleasure in rendering honor to the occasion.

Dishonesty, the Abuse of Trust, and Defalcation, as the sins of the times, were pressed on the attention of an assembly of clergymen at Saratoga, N. Y., recently by several clergymen and laymen, who urged the preachers to deal earnestly with those in danger of falling into those sins. Dr. G. H. Smyth, of New York, in considering the question why this epidemic of dishonesty prevails, said the chief cause was loss of faith in the old doctrines of the Gospel as they were preached by the Puritans and believed by the people. The pulpit has largely ceased to preach them. Scepticism has spread over the land, and with it men have ceased to have fear of God and a sense of the evil nature of sin. Moses is disbelieved in and Darwin is the prophet. Men who cannot understand Isaiah believe in Spencer. Thus the conscience is annihilated, and the law of God has lost its power over the life and conduct of men.

A Notorious "Rum Hole" in Portland, Me., is probably the only rum-hole in the country that total abstainers delight to frequent. Dr. Mulchmore, of Philadelphia, who visited Portland recently and made inquiries as to the working of the Maine law, was conducted to the basement of the City Hall, in the rear of which is the orifice in the pavement into which are always poured the liquors of all sorts which are seized and condemned under the prohibitory law. "This," said his friend, "is Portland's most noted rum-hole. In another part of the basement was a vast assortment of barrels, jugs, bottles, pails, tin cans, and nondescript vessels of every imaginable kind, all held in custody, and soon to be sent to the aforesaid all-receiving hole. In the past nineteen months 48,225 gallons of distilled liquors were so seized and destroyed, and the venders, beside losing the liquor, paid fines aggregating $11,900.

At the Faith Convention Held at Intervale Park, N. H., under the presidency of Dr. Cullis last month, there were many remarkable testimonies given of healing through faith and prayer. One who attended the Convention writes: "No record was kept of such testimonies; but it was to be observed that two ear-trumpets disappeared from use during the meetings, and that one man left his crutches behind him when he departed. One individual told of being cured after forty-five years' endurance of a nervous affection. Another had been healed of diabetes when given up by physicians. Another had a badly sprained ankle suddenly restored." In the course of one of his addresses Dr. Cullis remarked that he had seen cases of every kind of disease healed, except, possibly, small-pox, which he had not come in contact with. A question was often asked with regard to broken bones. A minister was off at a convention, when his little girl fell and broke her arm. The mother wrote to Dr. Cullis to know what to do, and he said, "Send for a surgeon at once." Mechanical injury is not disease; the bones should be set right, and the Lord trusted to heal the injury. Teeth should be properly filled. The promise is for the sick. Here people fall into fanaticism. No person ever walked the earth so full of common-sense as the Lord Jesus. He rested when He was tired, and it is not right to work on and never rest. Do be sensible. Do not say of a man, "He performs miracles," but, "He believes God's Word." The cures are simply answers to prayer. James does not say it is a miracle. David says, "He healeth diseases." Keep it there, and there will be no confusion.

The Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Association for 1884–5 has been issued. It is a pamphlet of 187 pages. It contains reports of ten international secretaries, of forty corresponding members, a list of 388 paid agents of American and Canadian associations, tabulated reports of 834 associations on this continent, a list of association buildings valued at over $3,400,000, and other matters of interest, including some particulars of 1800 foreign associations. The book is a manual for association workers, who can obtain it from the International Committee, Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City.

The Revised Version of the Old Testament is to be published, if possible, early next year. The Rev. Dr. Chambers, one of the members of the American Committee, recently said to a reporter that while nothing has been authoritatively communicated as to the character of the changes made, it is tacitly understood among all parties that the revisers have been much more conservative than their colleagues were in preparing the New Testament, in the main confining themselves to such changes as were deemed indispensable, rather than extending them to all cases where they might seem desirable."

The Mormon Boast that Utah is the only place in the United States where there is no unchastity is explicitly contradicted. Kate Field, in the course of a long letter to the New York Tribune, publishes an appalling indictment of Mormonism. Among other facts cited by her in proof of her charges is the statement that sixteen Mormon girls, being educated in the Brigham Young Academy, have been ruined there, and they were recently removed from the Academy without completing their education. It is well known that Christian visitors to Utah have returned less strongly opposed to Mormonism, their opposition having been weakened by the argument which Miss Field thus shows is a false one.

A Remarkable Discovery at an Autopsy was made recently at Hartford, Conn. A boy only twelve years old, the son of a physician, died suddenly in excruciating pain on September 6th. As it was the first illness the boy had ever experienced, and as his death followed so suddenly, it was decided to hold an autopsy. This was done by four surgeons. They found an immense cancer surrounding the heart. It had its formation in the thymus gland. The heart had been compressed into one half its normal size, and the left lung was badly crushed. It is believed that the action of the cancer was the severest toward the end. Hence the pain the boy suffered. The physicians were greatly surprised at the result of their autopsy, as the presence of a cancer was wholly unexpected. On consulting the highest medical authority no similar case could be found. The cause for surprise is that the cancer should have grown to so large a size without its existence being suspected. Usually a disease so terrible makes its presence felt by the sufferer, and the physician is informed of it. Clergymen and Christian workers who deal with spiritual malady often meet with similar cases. They learn that some secret sin is crushing the life of an inquirer and keeping him back from salvation (Ps. 19 : 12).

HOW TO MEET THE DOCTRINE OF ELECTION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But He answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, help me."—MATTHEW 15 : 24, 25.

YOU that know the loving heart of our Lord Jesus are quite sure that He would never needlessly discourage a soul in coming to Him. Yet in this case "He answered her not a word." Is Jesus dumb when misery entreats a word from Him? The Friend of Man is usually all attraction, encouragement, drawing, and welcoming, and yet the eager woman cries in vain to Him for her tormented daughter! We are not disquieted about this. We know our Lord too well to suspect Him of a want of love. He is not sporting with a wounded bird. He is in

NO FIT OF BITTERNESS.

He would not even seem to discourage any heart that beat within a human bosom, unless there had been some great necessity for it, some gracious end to be served thereby.

Nobody will have the impudence to accuse our divine Lord of undue harshness to a soul that sought His help. The world might suspect some of His ministers of being hard and cold, like yon pulpits of marble which have in these chill times been exalted among the people. They might think some of us more touchy than tender; for are not some of us, great stone creatures, almost without feeling, and not easily to be approached? You may suppose hard things of us, who are His servants; the supposition may be true, it may be slanderous; but you cannot suppose anything of the kind concerning the Lord Jesus Christ; He is so evidently loving, gracious, cordial, that you could not have the heart to suspect Him. If Jesus has ever received you, you have had in that fact unquestionable proof of His tenderness, and you are, and will be henceforth, confident in His compassion. Yet He did discourage this woman. Not only the disciples did so, but the Master did so, too. Therefore, I say that there must have been for so doing; there must have been a motive for her good which moved the tender Lord to answer her with words so hard, and with speeches so dispiriting.

I believe that we, dear friends, the humble imitators of the Lord Jesus Christ, are bound to encourage all in whom there is any hopefulness. Whenever we see a wandering soul turning its face homeward, we should be ready to lend a hand to direct its tottering footsteps. Still, if we imitate our Lord, we may be led to say sore things which, like the faithful wounds of a friend, are as sharp as they are salutary. Love's lips do not always drop honey. Flattery charms with her dulcet periods, but a wise affection full often uses tones most harsh and cutting. There is a tendency among certain goody-goody people to comfort too much, and to keep back important truths for fear they should be misunderstood. Glorious doctrines which made our fathers strong are left in the shade, for fear they should become stumbling-blocks to unsettled minds. We are coming to be rather overdone with

they are putting the flour through so many sieves that there will not be an ounce of bone-making material left in it. If it were always wise to comfort and encourage, the Master would have kept to that line of things; and, since He did not do so, I assume—and I think that none will dare to contradict me—that men require something else beside encouragement. We have not only to console, but to correct; ours is the edification which deals frequently with pulling down dilapidated bits of wall, in order to the security of the whole fabric; and hence we occasionally seem to be destroyers where we are really builders together with God. Our Lord knew that plain speech upon a certain truth would weed out His disciples. Did He therefore preserve a discreet silence? Not He. In due time He delivered His soul, and we read "from that time many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him."

Come we now to consider why the Saviour spake to this woman in this way. Why did He announce to her a fact which could not possibly assist or strengthen her faith? We may learn the answer as we proceed.

Our Lord Jesus virtually discouraged the Syrophenician woman with the doctrine of election. I grant you that there is a difference between the election of the nation of Israel and the election of individuals; but into that we are not going to-night. The point is this: it was the doctrine of election which the Saviour threw in this poor woman's way. He said to her, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." This was surely, and yet the Saviour put it before her there and then.

Why? I think He did so, first, at that time, that it might come from Him rather than from the disciples. If you feel it needful that a person should be somewhat sharply rebuked, you conclude to do it yourself. You say to yourself, "If I send that message by the best friend I have he will inflict more pain than I intended; therefore, I will communicate the unacceptable statement myself." The Saviour knew that by and by this woman would hear that the mission of the Christ was only to Israel; and she might hear it in such a way as would much more depress her spirit than if He personally told it to her himself. So He Himself said to her, "I am not sent to Tyre and Sidon. I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." That is to say, Christ's mission as a prophet while He was here in the flesh was to Israel; and to Israel He usually restricted His labors throughout His life. He told her that Himself, I think, lest she should hear it at second hand.

It will be wise for us, when we find poor souls hopefully coming to Christ, to manifest thought and prudence, and introduce them to the deeper truths of our theology; because they will hear of them one way or another; and they had better hear of them first from loving, tender-hearted Christians, than from hard, careless, loveless spirits, whose delight is found in mere terms and phrases. You cannot keep these young people in a conservatory; why should you wish to do so? It is poor policy to try and conceal truth. It has a little of a Jesuitical look about it. Why should this particular truth be concealed? Are we ashamed of it? If so, let us revise our creed; but in the name of common honesty let us

HIDE NOTHING WHICH WE BELIEVE.

Again, I think that He brought that truth before her mind just then because she might hear of it otherwise, when she was in a worse condition for the receiving of it. Now, this woman was desperately set on getting a blessing from Christ. Her whole heart was awake; her spirit was on fire; her whole nature was eager for the blessing. If she could stand repression at any time in her life, it was just then. His mission to the house of Israel was one of the truths which the Saviour saw this poor Canaanitish woman would have to learn, and therefore He communicated it to her when she had faith enough to press over all discouragement, and obtain the blessing upon which her heart was set. These two things should prove instructive. Now I go on to deal with souls who are somewhat in this woman's case.

I. First, then,

that came to this woman. It was, as I have said, a certain form of the doctrine of election; the unquestioned truth that God designed to bless the seed of Israel by the personal labors and testimonies of His Son Jesus, and that these blessings were not at that time sent to the people of Tyre and Sidon.

The doctrine of election has been made into a great bugbear by its unscrupulous opponents and its injudicious friends. I have read some very wonderful sermons against this doctrine, in which the first thing that was evident was that the person speaking was totally ignorant of his subject.

Nobody ever believed the doctrine of election as I have heard it stated by Arminian controversialists. I venture to say that nobody out of Bedlam ever did believe that which has been imputed to us. Is it remarkable that we are as eager to denounce the dogmas imputed to us as ever our opponents can be? Why do they earnestly set themselves to confute what no one defends? They might as well spare themselves the trouble. Our friends abhor the doctrine as it is stated by themselves, and we are much of their mind; though the doctrine itself, as we would state it, is dear to us as life itself. They suppose that we never preach the Gospel freely to sinners, which thing we never fail to do with a freeness which none can excel. If we will keep simply to what the Word of God says, we shall find in it but always in agreement. On every subject there is a truth which is set over against another truth; the one is as true as the other; the one does not take away from the other, nor raise a question upon the other; but the one ought to be stated as well as the other, and the two set side by side.

Did a sinner really know the doctrine of the choice of grace he would not run away from it, but he would be inclined to run into its arms. Yet to many it does seem to be as that black side of the cloud which the Lord turned upon the Egyptians; and therefore I am going to notice the discouragement as Christ put it before this woman. He said to her, first, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." "I am sent," he seemed to say, "to the Jews. I am sent to the house of Israel, but I am not sent to you." Jesus lets her know this hard truth at once, so that it may not worry her afterward. When she did obtain the cure of her daughter, he would have her know that it was given openly and aboveboard, and not by a blunder of pity, or an oversight of charity. She was to be once for all assured that the Lord Jesus had not forgotten Himself—that He knew all about the limitation of His commission during His mortal life, and that in overstepping it He and had not been wafted beyond Himself by the impetuosity of His spirit.

Now, there is such a thing as the choice of God. The Lord has a people who are redeemed from among men. The Lord Jesus has a people of whom He has said, "Thine they were, and thou gavest them me." Some are ordained unto eternal life, and therefore believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Does this fact discourage you? I do not see why it should. Why should not you be among that number? "But suppose that I am not?" says one. Why do you not suppose that you are? You do not know anything about it; therefore why suppose at all? The Lord has chosen a people to be saved, and I feel glad to think that He has done so, for none can prove that I am not of the number. If there are some whom God will save, then I know also who they are, for He tells me that they are such as repent of sin, confess it, forsake it, and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. These same things would my soul desire to do, and when I do so, I know that I am of the chosen number, and shall be saved. What is there in this to discourage a soul? Yet it does discourage some. When people are in the dark they are afraid of anything, everything! nothing!!

Our Lord put before this woman something worse than the positive fact of the choice of Israel. He declared the negative side of the sacred choice. He said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." It is very little that you and I who are ministers of the Gospel have to do with preaching about what Christ is not sent to do. Poor penitent hearts, there is nothing in the divine decree to shut out one of you from hope. "The Lord hath not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth; He hath not said unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain." Nevertheless, the Saviour did distinctly turn the blackest side of the doctrine to the woman, and say, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

What was worse in her case was that she knew that this election, as far as Christ had stated it, must exclude her; for He told her that He was not sent save to the house of Israel, and she well knew that she did not belong to that house. The poor Canaanitish woman might very logically have ended her pleadings, saying, "What more can be done? I cannot go against the word from Christ's own lip." Yet she did not so; but like a true heroine she pressed her suit even to the joyful end. You see her cause for discouragement was much can ever be, for you do not know that you are shut out; there is nothing in your race or city which excludes you. Moreover, Christ has never told you that you are shut out. I do not think that any minister has ever told you so; and if you have ever gathered from any ministry under heaven that there is no hope for you, you have no right to come to such a conclusion. But if you have copied out bitter words, and have come to wretched conclusions, then I would urge you to be as sensible and as brave as this woman was, who, when she had not gathered it from ministers, but had received it from Christ Himself that He was not sent to such as she was, yet nevertheless persevered, and pressed forward, and came to Him and worshipped Him saying, "Lord, help me."

Some may say to me—"Why talk about this difficulty at all?" I talk about it because it exists.

IT FRETS AND WORRIES

many minds. Many are troubled, and the servants of God must deal with their trouble. Gladly enough would I let these fears alone if they would let my people alone. The stern fact of predestination meets most men somewhere or other; even in the paths of philosophy it is not escaped; and when it comes darkly over truly gracious souls, much of its power for mischief will lie in the ignorance of the person assailed. If we were better instructed we should probably find no mystery where all is mystery now. Men forget that the ordination of God deals with everything; not only with the spiritual, but quite as certainly with the natural world. Yet they never allow it to interfere with their labor for bread, their struggle for wealth, or their race for fame. They cannot understand that divine plan which interferes with no will of man, and yet secures the will of God; nor can they see how everything proceeds by the free agency of the creatures as much as if there were no God, and yet God ruleth over all.

I wish that this subject did not vex men, but it is idle to wish. It has vexed them from the beginning, and will vex them even to the end. As we cannot alter facts we must deal with them. Dear troubled souls, Jesus would have you come to Him without fear. He invites you to trust in Him; yea, more, He commands you to believe on His name. Nothing he has thought, or ordained, or purposed, or predestinated has any tendency to drive you from him. Whatever predestination may or may not be, this one thing is sure—"Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Everything beckons toward His cross, and Himself. Come, and let nothing hinder you even for a single hour.

II. Now, observe

of this woman. In considering what she did, we shall come to the practical part of the subject. And I notice that she did not attempt for a single moment to deny what Jesus had said. She did not assert, as some have shamelessly done, that God should deal with one as with another, or else He would be a respecter of persons. All that kind of thing, which we have heard so often, was far from her mind. She was silent and submissive as to the Saviour's speech. She did not even argue that surely, in her solitary instance, she might be permitted to break through the regulation. She did not argue at all. She left the truth, which to her was dark, in the keeping of Him whose name is light. She sees the black cloud, but she passes through it, feeling that it cannot be anything more than a cloud, and so she comes to the Saviour's feet, and cries "Lord, help me. I do not understand this. I am all in a fog, and all in a muddle. Lord, help me. Lord, I do not ask to understand, but I do cry for help. Enable me to believe, and to receive the blessing, let the dark truth say what it may."

and did not go round about. She came not to Peter, or James, or John, but she came to Jesus. She did not stand still and cry, as she had done before from a distance, crying unto Him; but she came to Jesus, drew nigh to Him, grasped Him, I do not doubt fell at His feet as though she would have held Him. She came to Jesus. Now, from everything beneath the heavens, poor soul, fly you to the living, personal Christ. In Him your hope lies. "Which way shall I go?" say you. If it were a matter of physical coming, I know that if the road were long and dreary, you would start upon it to-night without delay. But it is a mental coming. You are to come to Jesus, not with feet and legs, but with mind and heart. Remember that there is such a Person. Consider Him. Think of Him. Believe Him. Reverence Him, for He is the Son of the Highest. Trust Him, for He is "mighty to save." This is coming to Him.

The woman came to Jesus immediately that He uttered this word of discouragement. We read in the text, "Then came she." "Then came she and worshipped Him." What then? When He seemed to drive her away? Then? Why, He had just told her that He was not sent to her. "Then came she." He had just uttered a most mysterious and discouraging truth, but "Then came she." Our poor friend who was buffeted by our Lord's Word was secretly upheld by the sight of His person. What can a word be compared with a person—compared with such a person as that of Jesus, the Sinner's Friend? She believes Him rather than His way of speaking. He says that He is not sent, but there He is. He says that He is not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; and yet there He is. He has come here where there are none of the house of Israel. She seems to say to herself, "Whether He was sent or not, here He is. I am sure that He has all power given to Him to heal my daughter; and here He is. I do not know about His commission, but I do know Himself, and I shall still plead with Him." So she came to Jesus there and then, and why should not you?

But now notice

HOW SHE CAME.

"Then came she and worshipped Him." I wish I could picture the scene. She did not stop to work out the difficult question with which He posed her; but she looked at Him, and she came to Him, and when she got near to Him she did the best thing she could—she worshipped Him. Down she went on her face before Him, and when she did look up it was with a look of reverent awe and childlike confidence. Blessed be His name, if we cannot understand Him we can worship Him.

Now, you have been thinking about yourself, and the more you do this the more you will despond and despair. No possible comfort can come to you by that road. If I were you, I would give up that task, and now begin to think about Jesus, the Son of God, the Saviour of men. "Oh, but I am such a sinner!" Yes, and He is such a Saviour. "Sir, I am so black!" But He is able to make us whiter than snow. Behold Him then upon the cross removing human sin, and see if you cannot copy the woman's example—"Then came she and worshipped Him."

Then, notice

HER PRAYER.

"Lord," she says, "help me." My dear hearer, do that, and do it now. No doctrine will trouble you long: I am sure it will not. On the contrary, you will inquire why you did ever let it trouble you. Do you ever let predestination trouble you in the matter of your daily business? To-morrow you hope to make a few shillings at your daily calling, but it may be that you will not, you may lose it. Why do you not say to yourself, "It may be that the providence of God has arranged that I shall not earn anything to-morrow; therefore I shall stop at home and do nothing?" Why, you are not such a fool. Let the providence of God do what it may, your business is to do what you can. So is it with a poor seeking soul; that soul's business is to let the Lord do what He wills, but meanwhile to cry, "Lord, help me." Wholly submissive, but heartily adoring, lie at Jesus' feet and believe that this divine Saviour must and will save every soul that hangs upon Him. This is the way of wisdom; follow it. God help you to do so, and to do so at once.

I do not think that I need to say anything more by way of comforting you, for that may well suffice, if the Lord shall incline your heart to seek His face at once. Remember this, however, that there never was a soul yet that came to Christ and Christ did cast it away. Remember, again, that there never can be such a soul, for He has said, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Remember, again, that every soul that ever did come to Christ came because the Father drew him, and that every soul that came found out afterward that there was an election of grace that encompassed Him, and that He was in it. Even this poor woman turned out to be one that Christ was sent to bless.

Although, as a general matter of fact, in His lifetime He came to the seed of Israel, just as the prophets came to Israel, yet there always appeared an exception about the prophets, and therefore it was no marvel that there should be exceptions in the case of their Lord. Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, but unto none of them was the prophet sent save to a woman of Sarepta, who belonged to the very city out of which this woman came. Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Elisha; yet none of them were healed save Naaman the Syrian. Naaman did not belong to the favored race at all, but was a far-off stranger, and yet he received the blessing of healing from the Lord God of Israel. The election of God as to these temporal things did seem to exclude all but the seed of Israel, but it was only in seeming; there were always some and so that particular form of election which consisted in our Lord s personal ministry being only to the Jews did not cause the exclusion of this poor believing woman. To her Jesus Christ had manifestly come in the chosen line, for there He was! He was outside His own boundary! He had come to her! Now, at this moment, whatever you may think about this doctrine or that, Jesus Christ has come to you. I have preached to you His truth, and you have heard it. Ay, and you have felt something of its power. Yield to it, I beseech you. If you yield to it, and come to Him and trust Him, then rejoice that the lines of electing love have encompassed you. You are His. You could not and would not have come to Him in prayer and simple faith, if it had not been so. Your coming to Him proves that His eternal love of old went after you. Go home, O woman of a sorrowful spirit, and be no more sad. The Lord bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MISSIONARIES MOBBED IN CHINA.

As we read of the courage and heroism of the early Christian converts, and of the intrepidity of the Protestant martyrs who gave their bodies to be burned rather than abjure their faith, and then look around at the character of Christians in our own land, serious and distressing thoughts are aroused. We naturally ask ourselves, is this the same faith for which men have died. Would these church members who are of the world worldly, who will not deny themselves for the sake of Christ and their perishing fellowmen, any pleasure, who join in worldly sports and amusements, drink wine, and attend theatres and balls—would such men if confronted with the alternative of abandoning their religion or suffering death, prove true to their faith? Is Christian heroism extinct in the world?

It gives some encouragement when beset with apprehensions like these to turn to the narratives of missionaries in heathen lands, and from them to learn that the faith in Christ is somewhere held dearer than life. In no land is this more conspicuous than in China. There the protests of the missionaries against idolatry, opium-smoking, and gambling arouse combined opposition. The priests and religious men oppose them on religious grounds while the vicious are maddened by the denunciation of their sins. It is easy in such circumstances to stir the passions of the mob, and to render popular fury a most dangerous tide to stem. Yet not only do the missionaries, strengthened by their faith, brave it, but the new converts who are only just learning of the love of Jesus are eager to put themselves in the front of the conflict. Such an exhibition of Christian courage is described by Mr. Griffith John, whose portrait appears on the first page this week. The scene is depicted on page 620.

Mr. John says, on one occasion he was in great peril from an infuriated band of half drunken desperadoes of the most reckless description, to whom, at an earlier hour of the day, he had been pointing out the wickedness of their course, and the way of deliverance both from the impurity and power and consequences of sin. As by a preconcerted arrangement they rushed yelling toward him, and hurling at his head missiles and filth of a most disgusting character. The few Chinese Christians who accompanied him, without saying a word, or giving a look of angry deprecation, quietly surrounded Mr. John and another missionary who was on a visit to Hankow, and formed a complete body-guard around them, and though there were several very 'ugly rushes' from the mob, which were not only animated by bitter hostility, but also evidently determined to inflict serious injury on the missionary, neither Mr. John nor his friend received the slightest harm, though several of the brave defending company were somewhat seriously hurt."

AFRICA'S MILLIONS.

Bishop Taylor's Plans.

FEW people are aware of the immense population of the "Dark Continent" that are still outside the influence of the Christian missionary; yet one region alone in Central Africa has a population of at least seventy-five millions that never heard the name of Christ! This region covers about two million square miles, and is bounded on the north by the Livingstone or Congo River, on the south by the Zambesi, on the east by the great lakes, and on the west by the river Quanza and the Atlantic Ocean. This is the most fertile and best-watered country in Africa.

The Pogge-Wissmann expedition of 1881–83 found out many new tribes and nations, extending from the Kasai River to Nyawgwe on the Lualaba, a distance of seven or eight hundred miles. This expedition started from Loanda on the west coast, and proceeded for six hundred miles toward the Muata Yamvo's kingdom, but were, on account of war, obliged to go to the northward, and after forty-four days' travel reached Ki-Karsa on the Kasai River, entering a region never before explored by a white man. Here the travellers came into the country of the Tushilanges, a remarkable people, who dwell in well-built villages, till the soil, raising manive, maize, millet, and beans. They are peaceable and friendly, and received the travellers as "the spirits of departed chiefs" come back to revisit "the glimpses of the moon," and many people were introduced to them as claiming kindred.

The country is undulating, hilly, and abounds in rich pasture land; but only goats, pigs, and a few sheep are kept. Palm trees flourish, and from the fibre of one the natives weave a beautiful fabric, closely resembling silk. The climate, though hot, is healthy and salubrious; the expedition was encamped here one month, and not a case of sickness occurred. One of the princes, Mukenge, offered his services as guide to Nyangwe, seven hundred miles distant, and offered to take fifty of his wives as carriers! Carriers being scarce, the offer was accepted. The travellers proceeded on their journey, and discovered a lake two thousand two hundred and thirty feet above sea-level, then entered the Basonge country. They had been previously struck with the numbers of Tushilange, who flocked about them in thousands, but the Basonge were even more numerous. These people were very far advanced in the industrial arts. They live in fine large houses, in clean villages, surrounded by palms and bananas. Lieutenant Wissmann brought home splendid specimens of their basket work, ornamented weapons, carved ivory, iron and copper utensils, and beautiful inlaid wares.

Leaving these interesting people and the fertile plains they inhabit, which Lieutenant Wissmann compares to the best-watered countries of Europe, the travellers proceeded through virgin forests to the Lubilash, where, to cross the stream, they were obliged to frighten the King of Koto, a venerable sorcerer called Kachichi, by setting off fireworks. They then entered the country occupied by the Batua, a dwarfish, pigmy race, no doubt allied to the Akka of the north and the Bushmen of the south.

They next entered the Beneki kingdoms, where the villages formed perfect models. The people are agriculturalists, many of them well-to-do. The villages were thickly populated and well arranged. Many of them took four and five hours to march through, and one took a whole day, and must have a hundred thousand inhabitants. From here the travellers marched through Kalebue and Milebue, also densely populated ports, then across a salt swamp to Nyangwe, when they were once more on travelled ground. Here the travellers wished to pay off Mukenge and his wives, and when they asked their indebtedness Mukenge declared he would be well satisfied with a musical box the next time the travellers visited his town!

Dr. Pogge returned with Mukenge, determining to return home the way he went; Lieutenant Wissmann returned home via Zanzibar, lectured before several scientific societies, was then engaged to head another expedition under the International African Association, re-entered the "Dark Continent," and met Dr. Pogge two hundred miles inland, then proceeded to the Congo basin. Dr. Pogge returned to Loanda, and died there on the 17th of last March.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE

for these teeming millions? The Lord has wonderfully opened up this region, and He certainly intends it to be occupied. Yes. Who was not struck by that remarkable and spontaneous action of the Methodist Episcopal Conference when they elected William Taylor, the world-known organizer of self-supporting missions, to the office of missionary bishop for Africa? The Lord's hand was in it all. The Bishop was brought into communication with a man who had studied this field and had presented it before two missionary societies, but they were unable to undertake any new work. The Bishop saw that here would be a good field to test the principles of the "great commission" given by Jesus, so immediately entered into arrangements for its occupation.

are now matured, and contemplate the following points: 1. That a chain of fifteen to twenty mission stations be established, extending from Loanda to Lake Tanganyika. These stations to be occupied by self-supporting, heart-consecrated missionaries. 2. That to this end two parties enter the continent—one from Loanda on the west, the other from the Zambesi on the east—each party consisting of fifteen to twenty missionaries, the western party to be under the personal direction of the Bishop and the eastern party under the Rev. W. R. Summers, M.D. These parties to approach each other, establishing stations on the way, and leaving two missionaries in charge of each, and so on until the leaders meet in a certain region in the interior, having completed a band of Gospel light across the "Dark Continent." Both parties are to enter Africa in the beginning of 1885. This work, though in harmony with, will be independent of the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Board, neither the Bishop nor his missionaries receiving a cent from the missionary society. No salaries whatever will be paid, the missionaries depending upon God to supply their needs from the indigenous resources of the country.

A fund for "building, outfit, and transit" expenses has been started, the treasurer being Mr. Richard Grant, 181 Hudson Street, New York. The Lord has providentially opened the way, provided a leader, and is quickly sending the men needed, and the "transit fund" will not be behind-hand. Hasten the day, O Lord! hasten the day when the inhabitants of that land shall no longer grope their way in darkness, but when all shall know Thee, from the least to the greatest. For Christ's sake, Amen!

THE PATCHED WINDOW.

To be poor and solitary and sick in a great city is perhaps the most miserable lot a man can endure. In the country, friends are sure to miss a man absent from his usual haunts, and will come and see him and render little services, or, in any case, will cheer him by their presence. But in a busy city there are so many faces that one is not missed when it drops out of the crowd. Some one may wonder where the man is, but there is no time for speculating on such subjects; his vacant place is soon filled, and he is forgotten. Meanwhile the man may be lying in that debatable land in which he does not know whether to-morrow will find him in this world or the next. If he has funds he can command the services of doctors and nurses; or if he be poor it may be that he has a wife or mother or sister who will watch by his bedside, smooth the tumbled pillow, administer the medicine, and speak words of encouragement; but if he is poor and solitary and sick in a great city he is a miserable man.

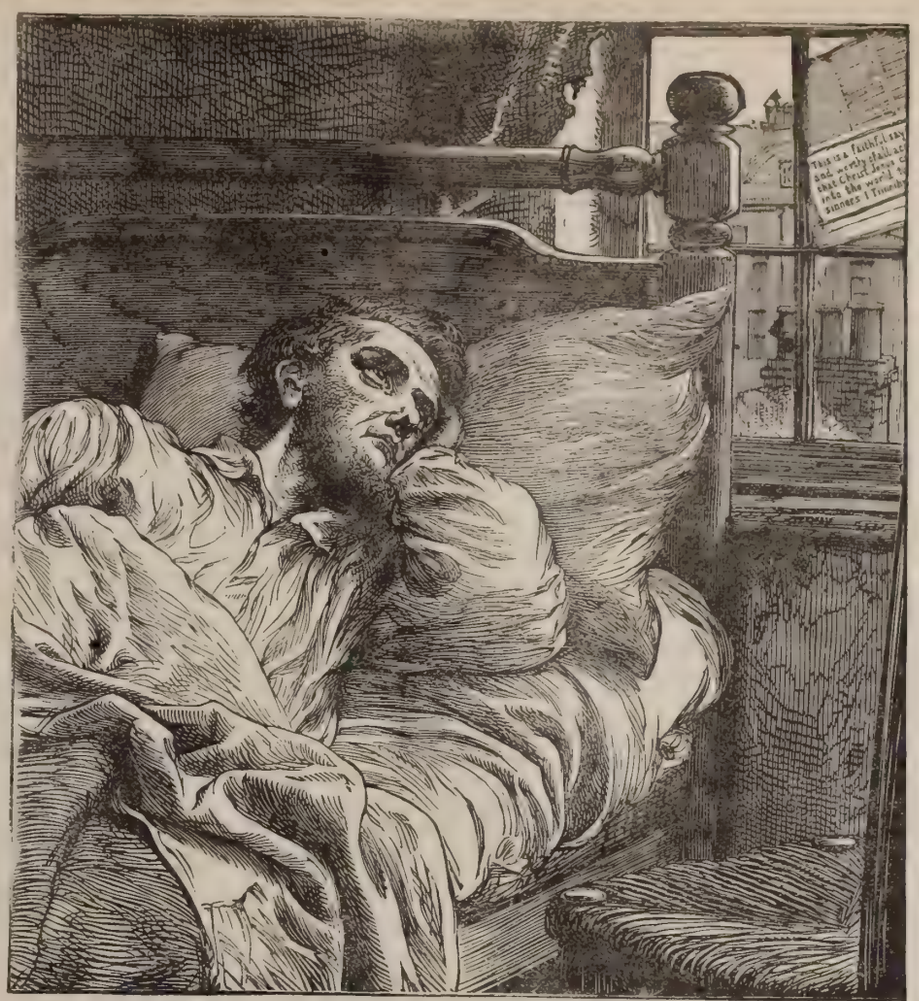
George Gower was in that plight. He was a carpenter by trade, but he was out of work. A long spell of dulness in building was upon his own locality, and he went to the nearest city in the hope that work of some kind might be had. He did find some at good wages for a time, but the dull time followed him there, and soon he found himself again unemployed. Day after day he sought employment, but returned at night to his miserable lodging without success.



A Gospel Message on a Patched Window.

It was a poor place, a mere closet, hardly large enough to hold the bed and leave a narrow passage at the side. The window was small, one of the panes was cracked, and it was so close to the houses opposite that very little sunlight could enter by it. The ceiling was low and discolored with the rain that penetrated between the loose shingles. A dreary room even in summer and when its occupant was in good spirits; but to lie there ill!—it was enough to make one shudder to imagine such a thing. Yet Gower was ill. He felt sure of it. Strange shiverings ran through his body. He was thirsty, and his skin was dry and hot. A drenching rain, which wetted him to the skin some days before, must have given him a bad cold. He scarcely recognized his room when he reached it. That was certainly the chair he sat upon this morning, but it seemed to him to have taken on a fantastic shape, and the bed—was that a bed?—his bed, it looked to him like a hearse. Was he in his own room, or was he on a journey? He was bewildered and excited, and finally flung himself on the bed without undressing and tried to sleep. The horrors of that night Gower never forgot. He seemed to travel over vast distances, to fall from enormous heights, to struggle from under huge weights, to be held by strong chains, yet to be under the imperative necessity of hastening on some urgent business. It was a dreadful night.

The next morning he was delirious. It was no one's business to look after him. He only rented the one room he used, and did not board in the house. Happily for him, his rent was overdue; so his poverty served him a good turn for once. The janitor, coming up to his room to collect the rent or give him a warning to quit if the rent was not forthcoming, found Gower tossing about restlessly and muttering indistinctly and incoherently at a great rate. The janitor did not stay there long. The bloodshot, flaming eyes and the flushed face of the sick man frightened him. Hurrying down the dark and narrow staircase without any definite idea of what it was best to do, he ran against a man going up. He knew him, and congratulated himself. He was a city missionary, and the janitor quickly told him about the man up-stairs. Even men who despise religion have an instinctive idea that a religious man has in him more than the average share of human kindness, and is the right man to have around in time of trouble.

"I will go up and see him," said the missionary. "Has he any friends?"

"None that I know of," said the janitor. "I never spoke to him except about his rent, and that is in arrear now."

The missionary climbed the stairs and entered the room. His practised eye told him at once that the illness was serious and might be fatal. It was useless to ask questions, so he gave the man a drink of water, and hurried away to report to his employers. He returned a few hours later with a doctor and a nurse, and Gower was undressed and made as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

It was a serious illness, and for a long time it seemed as if it would be a fatal one; but one day the missionary found, when he paid his usual morning visit, that the crisis was past and that Gower was sleeping naturally and peacefully. The next day, though still weak, he was able to talk, and asked who were the good people who had cared for him. The missionary told him, and in return heard his sad story. It was the story, only too common, of a lad piously brought up, but falling into temptation. A life of carelessness, sometimes of vice, and then poverty and sickness. The missionary prayed with him, and, fearing to say more in the weak condition of the patient, left him. On his next visit he found the man who the day before had been sad and despairing much brighter and more hopeful. The missionary talked to him of Jesus, and Gower said, "Yes, let me hear more of Him. Look there; I scarcely took my eyes off that after you left yesterday," He pointed to the cracked window, over which the nurse had pasted a piece of paper torn from a religious journal. The missionary looked and read, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (1 Timothy 1 : 15).

"That is the greatest truth ever given to the world," said the missionary.

"Yes, sir," Gower answered, "but you need to be such a sinner as I have been to value it. My mother taught me that text, but I had forgotten it, and yesterday when I had been thinking of my past life I looked up, and it seemed like a message from my poor dead mother to her wandering boy. That is just what she would say to me if she could speak to me now."

"We will pray to God to enable you to realize it still more," the missionary said, and he knelt down by the bed.

They had many talks after that, and when Gower was able to rise from his sick-bed he was not only made whole in body, but had within him a new heart and a right spirit, and was conscious that God had accepted him through Christ. In after years and in more prosperous circumstances he blessed God for the sickness and poverty that had come upon him to stop him in his sinful course and for that day when the glad message of the Gospel spoke to him from the cracked window.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Another Sufferer.

NOTHING could be more compassionate than Hester's tones as she told Robert Waldron how hopeless was his suit. Tenderness, sorrow for him, deep regret—all mingled in her voice, but there was not a tone of faltering.

They stood for a minute or two in silence, her calm, compassionate eyes shining upon him from across the great gulf between him and her. "Besides all this," said a voice in his inmost soul, "between us and you, there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence."

"Hester," he cried again, "have pity upon me! This is my punishment indeed."

"I am very sorry for you," answered her pitiful voice; "but you ought to have felt at first that it would be impossible. My father would rather go down to the very depths of poverty than see me here. Good-by. I can never come again."

He had thrown himself upon a chair, and hidden his face from the steady, reproachful compassion of her look, and she lingered for a minute, looking sorrowfully at him and around the room she should enter no more. This life of wealth and ease would have been very pleasant; even the brief snatches she had seen of it had been an enjoyment to her. She was growing a little weary of the long daily struggle and the sordid cares of poverty. If things had been different, what a glory it would have been to John Morley to see his daughter the mistress of Aston Court! But it was impossible now.

Robert Waldron heard her murmur good-by once more, but he did not raise his head. She lingered, as if searching for some word to comfort him, but there was none which her lips could utter. He listened to her footfall across the floor to the glass-doors opening upon the terrace, but he could not believe that she was going to leave him. He raised his head in time to catch a last glance of her pitying face, and her gesture of farewell; and then Hester was lost to him. He did not thing of following her. Eleven years ago, he had bartered for the pleasures of sin for a season, the happiness he craved in vain to-day.

Hester had spoken truly, he did not even now understand repentance. He was sorry that he had done the wrong for he now felt that he had by doing it deprived himself of more happiness than he had gained in committing it, but of the fact that he had sinned against God he thought nothing. Like a whipped child he grieved over his present pain and lamented the fault that had brought punishment upon him. There was no real repentance in him.

It is impossible to describe the disappointment of Mr. Waldron, when, after an hour's absence, he returned to the house, and found Robert alone and Hester gone. Robert told him of his rejection with a suppressed mournfulness which troubled his father's heart more than the most vehement expressions of grief. Mr. Waldron felt a little mortified that Hester's conscience should be more sensitive than his own. If he, a deacon of the church, had considered his son's early error atoned for, and consigned to oblivion, why should this young girl set up her childish judgment against his? Yet in his heart of hearts he knew that she was right. Robert, even in the first shock and agony of his disappointment, acknowledged the same. It was in truth a greater shock to him than it ought to have been; for in spite of all his doubts and hesitations, there had really been a well-grounded assurance in his mind that Hester would not reject him, with all his advantages; but she had now done it in such a manner as to pluck up every root of hope. She had said it was impossible with such utter decision, blended with an inexpressible pity — a pity which he felt keenly could never grow into love—that he knew he must never again approach her, or address himself to her on this subject. He loved her more passionately than before, but a dull despair had joined itself to his passion. Those pangs of punishment without which, she had said, he could not repent, had already come upon him.

This state of mind, a novel one to Robert Waldron, might have proved salutary, but for the intervention of his sister, who while rejoicing that Hester had declined the honor offered her, could not forgive her for its rejection. When Mr. Waldron announced to her that Hester had positively refused her brother, she could not refrain her tongue from a spiteful little speech, uttered in Robert's hearing.

"Don't talk to me about Hester Morley's scruples," she said; "I know her too well. It is because we have chosen a handsome boy for our pastor that she has said No to Robert."

"What do you mean?" asked Mr. Waldron, whose chagrin was only second to his son's.

"I mean," she answered, "that Carl Bramwell is in love with her, and she with him. I have suspected it for some time; and he confessed it to me only the other evening. If we had invited David Scott to the church at Little Aston, Hester Morley would have been only too proud to accept Robert."

Neither Mr. Waldron nor Robert felt quite sure of this, yet the poisoned shaft entered into their hearts. Mr. Waldron's thoughts turned with regret to the day when among the seventy students at the college he had selected this polished and scholarly young man to become the successful rival of his son. He could not help being fond of Carl, and he had had in the beginning, a scheme for furthering a love-match between him and his favorite, Hester. But that was before he had ever thought of her as his own possible future daughter, and now he could only be sorry that he had chosen him for the pastor of their little church.

As for Hester, she retraced her steps homeward, after her interview with Robert, in a strange mood of bewilderment and conflicting feelings. The fine old park, fresh clothed in the beauty of spring, lay around her; and she could scarcely realize the fact that she had just refused to become mistress of it, and of the great mansion belonging to it, which was the grandest place she had ever seen. The larch-trees were fringed and tasselled with green leaflets, with a crimson cone here and there among them; and the noble smooth-limbed beeches were white with their satin leaf-buds. The scent of violets hidden about the roots of the trees, and of cowslips nodding among the grass, was wafted past her upon the soft breeze. High over head rose the sky, higher and serener than in winter, and a few cool gray clouds floated across it. How different was all this from the close street, and the gloomy walls, and the dusky windows of her home! Hester sighed heavily, and there was a multitude of regrets in her sigh. Alas! for the time that had gone by, and the ineffaceable sin which had been stamped upon it forever.

She knew by the deep trouble of her own heart, that she could have loved Robert Waldron; and for the sake of the love which might have been, a fine, sweet sense of tenderness softened her spirit toward him. The days came back to her vividly when she had loved him with the full-hearted ardor of a child; and if he had only remained good and true, so would she have loved him now. She began to see the nature of his punishment; and to feel something of its weight.

She had no one to tell of what had befallen her that morning—of the vision which had opened suddenly to her, but from which she had turned steadfastly away. It would be impossible to speak of it to her father, and still more so to Rose. She had not seen much of Annie lately, and this was not a secret to tell to a woman whose husband and brother shared every thought. So she was obliged to hide it away.

It was impossible for Carl not to see upon Hester's face a deeper shadow than that which had rested upon it for some time before the evening, now several weeks ago, which they had spent together at Aston Court. He had not been so often at John Morley's house of late; but Grant told him that something was amiss with Hester, and that if she did not rally quickly, she would have to leave home, which she had never left before, for change of air. He had said the same to Hester herself, and given her a great dread. For how could she leave home now above all other times, when Rose was a pensioner upon her? Carl therefore felt that as her pastor he ought to seek her confidence, her ill-health as the doctor hinted, being probably caused by mental worry and anxiety of some kind. Accordingly one day when he was visiting the sick he called on Hester.

"I have been thinking much of you lately," he said as he sat down opposite to her. "You were committed to my charge. I have a right to speak. You are in great sorrow. When I look down upon you in chapel, your face is pale and sad. You do not sing as you used to do. I know your life is lonely, and very full of cares. But God has ordained it, and He is infinite Love. We also love you, Annie, and Grant and I. Why are you so cast down and disquieted? Is it anything you can tell to me? I might be able to help you. Is there nothing I can do for you?"

"Oh! I have been very miserable," said Hester, with a sharp accent of pain in her voice.

"There will come a change," answered Carl; "'though heaviness may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning.'"

"The morning is very long in coming," she said, sighing mournfully.

"It may seem so," he continued, "it may even be so, but it is coming surely and steadily. You are weary now, till your heart faints within you, but it will not be forever. Cannot you tell me your new trouble?"

"Yes," answered Hester, acting upon a sudden impulse to confide in him though she had resolved to bear her burden alone. It was growing too heavy for her now, and her spirit was beginning to fail. "Yes, I will tell you, and you can help me. Do you see the door and window opposite? There is a little room there, and some weeks ago my father gave me his permission to let a poor woman come and live in it. She is very poor and very ill. Mr. Grant has seen her."

"He told me so," said Carl.

"He believed she was not likely to recover at first," continued Hester, "but she is getting better now; not so strong that she can ever go away, and yet not so ill that she is near death. What am I to do? She has no friend in the world except me; not a creature to care for her or help her. But we are so poor, and I am afraid sometimes that we shall be obliged to leave this house altogether; then what is to become of her?"

"You are meeting trouble half-way now," he answered cheerfully.

Hester drew closer to him, with a frightened face, and whispered her next few sentences.

"Hush! it is Rose Morley, my father's wife. You have heard of her? My father never sees her; she runs no risk of him seeing her. If I had not known she would be safe, I never dare have taken her in. She was utterly homeless and friendless, and I brought her here to die, as we both thought. You know my father nearly killed Robert Waldron at our own door? But now we know she may perhaps live years and years; think what that means. Did I do right to take her in? Ought I to have turned her away into the world ill, even dying as we thought? Do you think my father will not be glad at last, when he comes to know?"

"God bless you, Hester," cried Carl, laying his hand upon hers which still rested upon the table, as if she needed that support to keep her from trembling too greatly.

"You don't know what it is like to go from my father's presence to hers," resumed Hester. "Sometimes I wonder why God lets such things come to pass, and I have hard thoughts of Him. That is the worst of all. She is very penitent; really, truly penitent, and bears her punishment well; but she is solitary and very sorrowful. Will you sometimes come to see her? You can come as a minister without any one being surprised; but you must not be too harsh to her. Will you help me by doing this for her?"

"Help you!" said Carl, "I am very glad to help you."

Once more he saw the pale face behind the dim casement opposite. Hester also saw it, and the tears stood in her eyes.

"No one knows it but me, and now you," she said. "It has been too heavy a burden for me to bear alone. I am not very old yet, but I feel old, older than almost any one I know; a great deal older than Lawson's mother. I suppose it is the anxiety; and now I have more than ever. Mr. Grant said I must leave home; but how can I ever leave home? There was my father first, and now there is Rose as well. You must come and see her for yourself."

"We will go at once," he answered; yet he lingered, and looked into her face with the color mounting upon his own, and an expression of utter anxiety coming across it. He had a word or two to say, which, left unspoken, would make this interview, sought by him, altogether unsatisfactory and incomplete. He hesitated and stammered, then reproached his coward courage, and spoke hastily.

"I am your pastor, your soul is committed to me. You spoke sympathetically just now of Robert Waldron. Do you know that he loves you?"

"Yes," she replied, the crimson flush mantling her cheeks as well as his, "he told me so; but Rose is living near me. What could I say to him? I could never, never become his wife."

"Thank God!" cried Carl.

Carl followed Hester down-stairs, and across the court, which seemed dark to him, for the glass in the window of the old nursery was scarcely transparent, and shed but little light on the outside staircase leading up to it. Hester opened the door quietly, and Carl had time to see Rose before she was aware of their entrance. She was leaning languidly back in a cushioned and padded chair by the fire, the light of which fell upon her worn and colorless face, and the thin fair hair pushed back carelessly from it. Her eyes were shut, and the whole aspect of the wan woman was one of complete dejection and of banishment from every gladness in life. At the sound of voices she sprang up with a glance of terror which showed how she lived in hourly dread of discovery. There was something inexpressibly forlorn in the peculiarity of her circumstances, which touched Carl's heart to the core. He clasped her emaciated hand in his own, and pressed it with a warmth and heartiness which he had not ventured to bestow upon Hester's.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 5, 1 Kings 1 : 22-35. Golden Text, 1 Chron. 28 : 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Child of Repentance and Restoration—Chosen of God—Appointed by David—Adonijah's Discontent—His Rebellion—Secret Dealing Implies Impurity—Bathsheba's Appeal for her Son—David Orders Solomon's Succession—Adonijah a Self-Appointed King—The Adonijah Spirit—Solomon Solemnly Inducted—His Father's Charge—The Banquet Broken up.

DAVID'S son Solomon was God's choice for the kingdom. At the time of his birth the Lord loved him, and even sent the prophet Nathan to give him a name, Jedidiah, "Beloved of the Lord." This was all the more precious because it was such a seal to God's entire forgiveness of David's sin with Bathsheba, Solomon's mother. True the child of sin, which Bathsheba bore him, must die; but Solomon the son of repentance and restoration was peculiarly dear to God. In taking the injured mother as his wife before all Israel, and in honoring her as such till his dying day, David made all the reparation possible under the circumstances, and Solomon, the fruit of that union was therefore God's beloved. But God had also given him the name Solomon, even before his birth when he said to David, "Behold a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days" (1 Chron. 22 : 9).

David fully understood the mind of God on this matter. His own favorite son Absalom was dead, whom he might otherwise have been tempted to choose, on account of his beauty and his popularity. The king spoke of God's choice of his successor as a settled matter. "The Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father, to be king over Israel forever. . . . And of all my sons (for the Lord hath given me many sons) my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel" (1 Chron. 28 : 5). Consistently with this, David had sworn to Bathsheba that her son Solomon should reign after him.

But there are always some who do not will with God. David had older sons than Solomon, and according to the birthright reason would give the throne to one of them. Truly Amnon the eldest was dead; of Chileab or Daniel we hear nothing but the fact of his birth, and probably he died in infancy, Absalom the third son was dead also. Thus it happened that Adonijah, David's fourth son, was the oldest of his living sons (II Sam. 3 : 2-4). Without doubt Adonijah was a man of the world, governed by reason and common-sense, with self-interest as his ruling principle without any regard to the mind and will of God. Following the example of his brother Absalom, he formed a conspiracy against his father, although he "had not displeased him at any time, saying, Why has thou done so?" Oh how truly was God's Word to David fulfilled, "I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house" (II Sam. 12 : 11).

No doubt Satan was at the bottom of it, as he is at the bottom of all sin and evil, no doubt he represented to Adonijah that his father did him an injustice in choosing Solomon, and that it was but a righteous thing that he should assert his priority of birth, and lay claim to the throne. But the enemy of souls would be sure to keep back the fact that God Himself was the first King over Israel (1 Sam. 8 : 7), and that He who is King of kings has a right to appoint whom He will to reign as His representative. Adonijah, whose external appearance was probably far better than Solomon's, for he was "a very goodly man," conferred with Joab and Abiathar, so that he might have partisans in the army and in the priesthood; but he did not confer with God, nor yet with David, his father. Had his cause been a right one he could have inquired of the Lord about it, and he would not have feared to come openly forward and claim his rights from his aged father. It is always a bad cause which

CANNOT BEAR THE LIGHT,

"He that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light lest his deeds should be reproved" (John 3 : 20). Whenever a young person is reading a book and closes it hastily when any one comes near, it is very clear there is something in that book which cannot bear the light. When two people are talking together, and at the sound of a footstep instinctively leave off, it is almost sure that something was said too unkind or too impure for other ears to hear.

Joab, who had been faithful to David until now, turned aside after Adonijah. It may be this rough, abrupt man of the world prided himself on his integrity, and compared himself with David to the king's disadvantage, because he himself made no profession of religion. The faithful old Nathan, the man who never appears upon the scene except as the messenger of God, became aware of the rebellion, and instructed Bathsheba to go in and apprise the king; reminding him of his promise to her that Solomon should be his successor. Bathsheba followed his directions, and at once when the king's attention was gained reminded him of his promise to her, and then told the facts of Adonijah's rebellion, and how Joab and Abiathar were with him. Then she made appeal, "And thou, my lord, O king, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee, that thou shouldst tell them who shall sit on the throne of my lord the king after him. Otherwise it shall come to pass, when my lord the king shall sleep with his fathers, that I and my son Solomon shall be counted offenders." Bathsheba had not finished speaking when Nathan entered, and said, "My lord, O king, hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne?" And then he gave even a fuller account of the insurrection than Bathsheba had given, showing how all the king's sons except Solomon, and also the captains of the host, with Joab and Abiathar, were feasting and saying, "Let King Adonijah live." And Nathan's appeal was as strong as Bathsheba's, "Is this thing done by my lord the king, and thou hast not shewed it unto thy servant who should sit on the throne of my lord the king after him?"

It was enough; the old king saw that strong and immediate measures must be taken. He called Bathsheba, and ratified to her the promise which he had made with an oath, that Solomon should reign after him, and declared that it should be done that day Then he sent for Zadok the priest, Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, one of his mighty men of valor, as the representative of the army in the place of the insurgent Joab, and commanded them, "Take with you the servants of your lord, and cause Solomon, my son, to ride upon mine own mule, and bring him down to Gihon: and let Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet anoint him there king over Israel; and blow ye with the trumpet, and say, God save King Solomon."

the Lord's anointing was not upon him: he is the type of self. Self-assertive, self-reliant, self-directing, endued in no way with power from on high; while the anointing of Solomon was a token that he was set apart to be God's king, separated to His service, representing Him, and carrying out His thoughts and purposes. In our own lives, there is a great deal of the Adonijah spirit. His name means, "God is my Lord;" his actions said "I am my own master." Whenever self-assertion or self-reliance take possession of us, we are manifestly not under the anointing of the Holy Ghost, which always makes us feel so small and so absolutely nothing. Where God is, He outshines and outdazzles ourselves and other men.

The king also gave orders regarding Solomon, "that he may come and sit upon my throne; for he shall be king in my stead; and I have appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah." And Benaiah, the godly officer said, 'Amen: the Lord God of my lord the king say so too. As the Lord hath been with my lord the king, even so be He with Solomon, and make his throne greater than the throne of my lord King David." What a contrast from the action of Adonijah, in which no mention of God is found! These men, the godly priest, the godly prophet, and the godly officer went to carry out the king's command. Zadok anointed King Solomon, and they blew the trumpet. The Lord, who has the hearts of all men in His hand owned the carrying out of His own purpose, and He widened the hearts of the people so that they all said, "God save King Solomon." And they were supremely happy. There is always joy in doing the will of God from the heart, His ways are ways of pleasantness; great joy have those who love His law, and nothing can offend them. "All the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them." But better to Solomon than all the joy of the people, was to him, "And thou Solomon my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve Him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind; for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts; if thou seek Him, He will be found of thee; but if thou forsake Him, He will cast thee off forever" (1 Chron. 28 : 9). First know God. None can serve or love one whom they know not, then serve with a perfect heart and with a willing mind. When we do know Him, it is perfect freedom to serve Him with a heart-whole service, commensurate with our knowledge of Him.

Very different from the holy joy of David's servants in the anointing of Solomon, was the revelry at the feast of Adonijah. The guilty Joab heard the noise, and his once valorous heart must have quailed when Jonathan, the son of Abiathar the priest, brought in the tidings that the anointed Solomon sat upon the throne of the kingdom, and that by the king's command. Fear came upon them all, the feast was broken up, and the would-be king fled to the horns of the altar in fear for his life. So come to naught man's plan and purposes, so are God's purposes established.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Chief Event of the Week in Europe has been the meeting of the three Emperors at Skierniewice, in Poland. On September 15th the aged Emperor of Germany, accompanied by the Emperor of Austria-Hungary, visited the Czar of Russia at that ancient castle. The three Ministers—M. de Giers for Russia, Prince Bismarck for Germany, and Count Kalnóky for Austria—were also there. Their presence shows that the emperors did not meet merely to shake hands, but to pledge their words as a more judicious way of sanctioning ministerial arrangements than putting them on paper. The imperial potentates hunted, banquetted, dined, and reviewed the troops, but the three diplomatists were engaged in serious conference. The party broke up on the 17th. Nothing is known of the deliberations or the object of the meeting. If the conjectures favored in Europe have any basis of truth, the result of the conference will be a closer alliance between the three nations, directed to the crushing out of domestic conspirators, and the arrangement of an anti-English policy, which Russia will adopt on the borders of India, and Germany in South Africa.

The French Press was Occupied last Week in reviling America and American newspapers. Its ire was kindled by the outspoken criticisms by American newspapers, of the bullying and blundering policy France has adopted toward China and Madagascar. Le Paris, in an article entitled "Our Good Friends, the Yankees," says: "All that hateful malice can dictate to scribblers in delirium has found its way into their columns. It is a pity Frenchmen are unable to read the diatribes and understand the folly of their fanaticism for their American friends. France never received from England, her traditional enemy, or Germany, her enemy of yesterday, a more undeserved or odious outrage than those with which the Americans, whom she has always treated with affection, have covered her." The French editors seem utterly incapable of comprehending that American journalists are in the habit of expressing their opinions fearlessly, without regard to the feelings of those whom they may hurt.

The Cholera in Italy and France Continued its deadly work last week. The Times correspondent thus describes the situation at the close of the week: "The dread disease still remains in the rural districts of Southern France, where little hamlets have been suddenly stricken with the epidemic after it had apparently left the department. Some fifteen new villages have been visited during the week. In the larger cities there have been only occasional deaths. The total number of deaths in Italy up to date is 6328, or about a thousand more than the total for France. Americans must not be deceived by temporary fluctuations in the death rate in Naples into supposing that the epidemic is on the decline. Probably a month will elapse before it is mastered, or it burns itself out. Further ravages in the smaller cities may be expected. In Spain there has been a total of 282 deaths, of which number 241 occurred in the Province of Alicante and the rest in two Pyrenees Provinces—Lerida and Tarragona. Friday's great local fête of St. Januarius in Naples drew out one of the largest throngs ever seen in the city, and though the police kept the cafés closed, it is feared that the mere fact of the assemblage will produce grave results in spreading the disease."

Rumors of Negotiation between France and China are again current. M. Patenôtre, the French Minister to China, has asked Prime Minister Ferry what attitude to assume in case China makes proposals of peace directly to him, and has been informed that the Chinese overtures should be received with extreme caution, as it is not believed that they are earnest, but are only manœuvres for the sake of gaining time. It is, however, asserted that France is disposed to entertain definite and serious proposals for mediation in the Chinese question. It is announced that Prime Minister Ferry, in behalf of the French Government, is willing to forego pressing the indemnity claims upon China, provided the latter government shall cede to France for ninety-nine years the port of Kelung, the present treaty port of the island of Formosa.

A Destructive Inundation has Desolated a large tract of country in China. The steamer San Pablo, which arrived at San Francisco on September 15th, brought news of a frightful inundation in the province of Kiangsee. The news is dated at King-Tak, the chief centre of the pottery manufacture, and one of the four great markets of the Empire. The floods lasted four days, and the entire country was submerged to the depth of sixty feet, and whole houses were swept away. It is believed that fully seventy thousand persons perished. It was feared that a pestilence would follow. Cholera has broken out at Amoy. The number of deaths is not given. It has been declared to be an infected port.

A Canadian Contingent to Assist General Wolseley in his attempt to rescue General Gordon from Khartoum sailed from Quebec on September 15th. Lord Landsdowne, the Governor-General of Canada, and Lady Landsdowne went on board the vessel on which the contingent sailed, to bid the men farewell. They shook hands with all the petty officers. Before leaving the Governor-General amid loud applause addressed Major Denison and the other officers and men at some length, wishing them good luck on their expedition and a safe return. Their presence with the regular forces, he said, would show that the English Empire did not consist merely of the British Isles. It was complimentary to the abilities of the Canadians that, though the imperial government could turn to either of the four quarters of the globe for men to man the boats conveying the troops up the Nile, it should turn its eyes to the Dominion of Canada. Lord Wolseley had not forgotten the experience he had gained on his Red River expedition, nor how the Canadian voyageurs who then accompanied him surmounted all difficulties. Some of the men in this expedition served under Lord Wolseley on the Red River. The contingent numbers three hundred and ninety men.

Emigration to the United States is Urged by the Earl of Roseberry, who, speaking at Aberdeen recently, denounced the government's emigration scheme, which has for its object the sending of emigrants to the colonies and diverting the tide of emigration from the United States. He said that the government's scheme was fraught with the greatest danger, as he feared that as soon as the colonies became thickly settled they would become more independent of the home government, and finally sever from the mother country and establish a government of their own. "Besides," the speaker said, "the government will gain nothing from attempting to divert the attention of emigrants from the United States, as, in my opinion, that country is the greatest blessing mankind had ever bestowed upon them, and England has more interest in the United States than in Canada, because more of her people emigrate thither."

News from Ashantee Painfully Illustrates the truth that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." The country is in a disturbed state, owing to the death of the King. Small-pox has been raging in and around Coomassie, and among the victims was the King, Quacow Duah, who died very suddenly. At the funeral three hundred of his subjects were killed. Immediately afterward Coffee Calcalli, who was King of Ashantee at the time of the war in 1873, and was subsequently deposed, was found dead in his bed, having been murdered, as was generally believed, although it was given out that he died from apoplexy. The successor to the throne will, it is supposed, be Meniah, who was King up to a few months ago, but who was deposed on account of his barbarous cruelties.

[A PHILANTHROPIST writes us that in his prison visitations he has found no literature so frequently blessed of God to the conversion of the depraved prisoners as copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and especially of that number in which, some time ago, appeared the portrait and life of Jerry McAuley. Finding that God was using it so extensively, he bought for distribution every copy of that number we had in stock. We republish that portrait and life in the hope that it may be still more widely used, and are having an extra number printed, that we may be able to supply any Christian workers who may wish to distribute them in places where they may do good.]

Many were the inquiries made on Sunday, September 21st, by people on Broadway, New York, near Thirty-fourth Street, of the meaning of the scene there witnessed. Six stalwart policemen guarded the doors of the Tabernacle, and around them surged a vast crowd, vainly begging and pleading for admission. Beyond, stretching across the wide space made by the junction of Sixth Avenue with Broadway, the multitude pressed and jostled until a platoon of policemen arrived to clear the car-tracks and release the blocked cars. It was

A STRANGE CROWD.

There were hardened roughs from the Fourth Ward, and there were bankers and brokers and merchants; there were women with scanty clothing and faces bruised by the hands of drunken husbands; there were women whose painted cheeks and flaring attire denoted the "strange woman," and there were ladies who had arrived in carriages half an hour before the time appointed, only to find the large building filled to the last niche.

Inside the Tabernacle, the Doctors of Divinity on the platform looked into the faces of two thousand people, as strangely blended and as representative of all ranks of society as the crowd outside. A brief service was soon over, and then the lid of a coffin placed at the foot of the platform was raised, and the vast crowd filed past and out of the doors, and made room for the crowd outside, which for three hours poured in a steady stream past that cold, still face in the casket. It was a scene never to be forgotten—that file of countenances changing every moment. Few eyes were tearless as they rested on the casket, and of the women not a few leaned over and kissed those white lips closed in the silence of death.

Who was this man whose funeral obsequies had power thus to move the heart of a great city? Who was he, who, dropping out of the mass of a million and a half of living beings crowded in one city, had left a void in so many hearts, and whose memory could draw tears from the eyes of men hardened in sin, familiar with the interior of the Penitentiary, and women whose lives, miserable as they are, rarely move them to weep? That man was a notorious river-thief, the terror of the police and of his neighbors, a man who, when his heart was bent on murder and his body clothed in the stripes of the convict, the Lord took and transformed into an instrument for His use. If any witness of that funeral scene doubted the power of the Gospel he must have been convinced then. The drunken, disreputable, thieving loafer, whose death a few years ago would have been the occasion of rejoicing to the city, had in a few short years so worked for Christ, had rescued men and women from misery and sin in such numbers, had comforted and encouraged such hosts of the lost and despairing, that a great city mourned his loss, and looked around in dismay to find if, in the million and a half of its inhabitants, there was one man capable of filling the place his death had made vacant. The power that had worked such a change in heart and life was the same power which once seized the leader of a band of persecutors on the way to Damascus, and caused him afterward to say: "By the grace of God I am what I am."

The Jerry McAuley, the evangelist of the slums, whose death the city mourned, was the ragged, desperate "tough" miraculously transformed by the same Almighty power. Dr. Charles F. Deems rightly characterized Jerry's life as

A ROMANCE OF PROVIDENCE.

In recounting it we use, as far as possible, the words of its hero:

"I was born in Ireland [about the year 1836]. Our family was broken up by sin, for my and left home to escape the law before I knew him. I was placed at a very early age in the family of my grandmother, who was a devout Romanist.

"At the age of thirteen I was sent to this country, under the care of a married sister in New York City. Here I ran errands in the family and assisted my brother-in-law in his business, and soon, by the practice of little tricks, became well used to dishonesty, and was as great a rogue as one of my years could be. After a while I felt I could live by my own wits, and left my sister's home to take care of myself. I took board in a family in Water Street, where were two young men with whom I associated myself in business. I earned what I could, and that not being sufficient to supply my daily wants, I stole when I had opportunity.

"We had a boat, by means of which we boarded vessels in the night, stealing whatever we could lay our hands on. Here I began my career as

"In the day-time we went up into the city and sold our ill-gotten goods, and with the proceeds dressed up, and then spent our time, as long as our money lasted, in the vile dens of Water Street, practising all sorts of wickedness. Here I learned to be a prize-fighter, and by degrees—rapid degrees—sank through all the grades of vice and crime, till I became a terror and nuisance in the Fourth Ward.

"I was only nineteen years of age when I was arrested for highway robbery—a child in years, but a man in sin. I was innocent of the criminal act which was charged to my account; but the rumsellers and inhabitants of the Fourth Ward hated me with good reason, and were glad to get rid of me. So they swore the robbery on me, and I couldn't help myself. I had no friends, no advocate at court (it is a bad thing not to have an advocate at court), and though not guilty of that crime I was sentenced to fifteen years in the State prison. I burned with vengeance; but what could I do? I was handcuffed, and sent in the cars to Sing Sing.

IN PRISON.

"When I arrived at the prison I was put to the carpet-weaving department, and for two years not a word could be said against me. All the keepers and guards spoke well of me. I minded my work, and was quiet and orderly. I tried to learn to read and write, and improved very much, more especially in reading. Then I got cheap novels and read, to pass away the time.

"I had been in the prison four or five years, when, one Sunday morning, I went with the rest to service in the prison chapel. I was moody and miserable. As I took my seat, I raised my eyes carelessly to the platform, and who should I see there beside the chaplain but a man named Orville Gardner, who had been for years one of my confederates in sin. 'Awful Gardner' was the name by which I had always known him. Since my imprisonment he had been converted, and was filled with desire to come to the prison, that he might tell the glad story to the prisoners. I had not heard he was coming, and could not have been more surprised if an angel had come down from heaven.

"He told them it was only a little while since he had taken off the stripes which they were then wearing; and while he was talking his tears fairly rained down out of his eyes. Then he knelt down and prayed and sobbed and cried till I do not believe there was a dry eye in the whole crowd. Tears filled my eyes, and I raised my hand slowly to wipe them off, for I was ashamed to have my companions or the guards see me weep; but how I wished I was alone, or that it was dark, that I might give way to my feelings unobserved! I knew

THIS MAN WAS NO HYPOCRITE.

We had been associated in many a wicked deed and sinful pleasure. I had heard oaths and curses, vile and angry words from his mouth, and I knew he could not talk as he did then unless some great, wonderful change had come to him. I devoured every word that fell from his lips, though I could not understand half I heard. One sentence, however, impressed me deeply, which he said was a verse from the Bible. But that was a book I had never read.

"I went back to my cell. What I had heard was ringing in my ears, and the thought possessed me to find the verse which had so struck me. Every prison cell is supplied with a Bible; but, alas! few of them are used. Mine I had never touched since the day I entered my narrow apartment, and laid it away in the ventilator. I took it down, beat the dust from it, and opened it."

The impression made upon McAuley's mind by the change in "Awful Gardner" was apparently more powerful than the sermons and teaching he had heard. The miracle of conversion was before him to examine for himself.

A lady visited the prison about this period, whom Jerry describes as Miss D—, who took an interest in him and read the Bible and prayed with him. Eventually, Jerry was induced to pray for himself, and as he prayed his convictions and desire for pardon increased. One night in an agony of seeking he resolved to pray until he found peace. He threw himself on the stone floor of his cell, and wept and prayed there, determined that he would not sleep until God had forgiven his sins. In the night occurred, which to the last Jerry professed himself unable to pronounce real or imaginary. He seemed to feel a hand laid on his head and heard a voice saying: "Thy sins which are many are forgiven." At that time he evidently believed in its reality, and accepted it as an assurance of acceptance; for he rose from his prostrate position and commenced praising God. The guard pacing the corridor was astonished by hearing in the dead of night the cell echo with shouting and the noise of hands clapping and the prisoner jumping about. He was alarmed, and opened the door to ascertain the cause. Next day Jerry was reported for disorderly behavior. But it was the only time. Jerry was a changed man, and as long as he remained in the prison he continued steadfast.

The joy and happiness that filled his soul could not be hidden. Jerry commenced work among his fellow-prisoners. He knew little of the Bible, less still of theology, but he could tell the men working out their punishment of a power which had renovated him and filled his heart with joy. Several of those men were converted, others of them, of whom Jerry had hopes, fell away after their release, but he kept track of them, and after he was liberated and at work for God he had the happiness of seeing them all restored. Jerry had by this time served seven years and six months—half his sentence. The prison officers reported favorably of him, and he received

A PARDON FROM THE GOVERNOR.

Outside the prison walls Jerry encountered a trying ordeal. He knew the consequences of going back to his old haunts in the Fourth Ward, and as he wandered about, not knowing where to go, he was sufficiently cautious to abstain from going there. "I wanted to do right," Jerry says; "I wanted to please God. I inquired for a prayer-meeting. I was told of one; but when I got to the door I was afraid to enter. I had never been to a Protestant place of worship, and nobody invited me in. Most unfortunately the only friend I found directed me to a lager-beer saloon to board. Lager beer had come up since I went to prison, and I did not know what it was. They told me it was a harmless drink, wholesome and good, and simple as root-beer. I drank, and that began my downfall. My head got confused. The old appetite was awakened. From that time I drank it every day, and it was not long before I went from that to stronger liquors.

"The night I stopped praying I shall never forget. I felt as wretched as I did the day I went to prison. And now began a career of sin and misery which I cannot fully describe. Satan got completely the upper hand of me. The dear Saviour who had been so gracious and so precious to me in the prison I let go. How I wonder now that He did not let me go! But He did not.

"From this I became a river-thief, boarding vessels at night and doing the stealing myself. And oh, how many from death have I had while engaged in this wicked business! One or two instances will serve as specimens.

"One night we were out on the river in our boat, looking for chances. We had been disappointed in some of our plans at Greenpoint, but at Brooklyn we stole a rope-fender off a ship, the whole cost of which was not more than a dollar and a half, and yet for that we ran a fearful risk. The captain of the vessel saw us, and seizing his revolver fired at us, once, twice, four times. The balls came so close that I could feel them as they whizzed past my head, but they did not hit.

"All the time I was prosecuting this business, in my sober moments I had a longing to be a better man, to lead a sober life; but I felt that after all the joy and peace I had before had, I never could come to God again.

"One night we went over to Brooklyn on a plundering expedition. I was very drunk. There was a certain vessel at the wharf which we had our eye upon, but I was too intoxicated to do my share of the work, so I stayed in the boat while my partner boarded the ship. By some mishap

I FELL INTO THE WATER.

"The boat went one way, and the eddy carried me in another direction, and out from the wharf. I went down and touched bottom, and rose to the surface. Again I sank and rose. The third time, the thought came to me, 'This is the last, and now you are lost—you are drowned.' Hell seemed opening under my feet, and I fancied I could hear the wails and shrieks of the lost. Then something said, 'Call on God.' But how could I? I felt it was too mean; I had sinned too fearfully. But I did call, and the Lord heard me. I seemed to be lifted right up to the surface of the water, and the boat which had drifted off in another direction was brought right to me, so that I could get hold of it. I can't tell how it was, but it always seemed to me

A MIRACLE.

"The John Allen excitement had just commenced in Water Street, and the good Christian people were going through the ward to bring in the sinners to the meetings. I was sitting in my room one of these wretched days, when I heard a stranger in the hall below. The landlady was ill up-stairs, and the person who had entered came up. Just outside my door I heard a pleasant voice say to her, 'Do you love Jesus?' That voice—those words! It seemed like long-forgotten music. It recalled the past happy days and my heart was deeply touched.

"I went out and waited on the landing till he came down-stairs. He saw me; but I was a frightful looking object, and I think he was a little timid at facing me. However, I accosted him, and he told me to come down-stairs and he would talk with me. I had a colored shirt on, an old pair of pants, and my hair was cropped pretty close. I think now I must have been a formidable-looking object. I don't wonder the missionary didn't want to talk with me on the landing, but preferred to have me below on the pavement.

"We walked out together, up the street, till we came to the New Bowery. As we approached the Howard Mission he invited me in. I didn't know until then that there was such a place. A gentleman there met us, and spoke to me very kindly. They both said that if I would they would see what they could do for me. The idea struck me as it never had done before, that a drunkard like me couldn't get work, and there was no hope of decent employment unless I did reform. So I signed it. But I told them I shouldn't be likely to keep it, that I had taken it before, and broken it. I wanted to be honest, but I knew I couldn't keep it. 'Try it again,' they both said, 'and ask God to help you.' 'Well, to please you, I will,' I said.

"I went right home from there and told my partner what I had done. How he laughed! 'You take the pledge?' he said. He had a bottle of gin in his hand at that moment, and turning out a glass offered it to me. 'Tom,' said I, 'I have just taken the pledge.' But I drank it; and as I put down the glass, I added, 'Now, this is the last drink I shall ever take.' 'Yes, till you get the next,' said he.

"Just at that moment in walked the missionary. I kept as far away from him as I could, lest he should detect it in my breath. I think if he had asked me I should have honestly confessed what I had done. But he did not. He only invited me to go out and walk with him. I went; and as we walked I told him I was going out on the river that night, for we were dead broke, I was hungry, and money we must have. He looked sad and troubled. 'Jerry,' said he, 'before you shall do that, I'll take this coat off my back and pawn it, and give you the money.' I looked at the coat and saw it was worn and old, and I was touched to the heart. It was as much as I could do to keep the tears out of my eyes. 'Here's this good man,' I said to myself, 'poor, as I know he must be, willing to take the coat off his back and pawn it to keep me from doing wrong.' I don't know as he saw the effect of his words, but I hung my head. Then he went away, and in a little while he brought me fifty cents. I got something to eat, and we did not go out boating.

"Day after day my new friend followed me up, and so closely that I could get Soon after this we were invited to the missionary's house to tea. He lent me a coat to wear. After tea they had singing and prayer. I cried and cried. Oh, the joy and excitement of that evening! I shall never forget it. These good people had come down into the Fourth Ward to labor among the very lowest of low and wicked men and women, and God had given them a trophy in me, one of the hardest cases in the ward. How their faith was strengthened! After that the missionary used often to walk round with me, his arm in mine. This was a great help to me, for all my old companions had heard of my conversion, and it was such a strange event that they would shout after me. So it was a protection to be with some one whom they truly respected."

NO CHANCE TO DRINK.

Through the influence of the missionary, work was procured, and for some time Jerry was enabled to live. He obtained a situation in the Custom House at four dollars a day, and then he married one of the converts at the mission who, like himself, was striving to leave the ways of sin and to follow Christ. From that day forward Mrs. McAuley was a true helpmeet to her husband, helping him to lift the fallen, and encouraging him in all his labors in the cause of the Saviour. The origin of is thus described by Jerry McAuley: "One day I had a sort of trance or vision. I was singing at my work, and my mind became absorbed, and it seemed as if I was working for the Lord down in the Fourth Ward. I had a house, and people were coming in. There was a bath, and as they came in I washed and cleansed them outside, and the Lord cleansed them inside. They came at the first by small numbers, then by hundreds, and afterward by thousands.

"Before I came out of this vision, I was in tears. Then something said to me, 'Would you do that for the Lord if He should call you? Would you do it for Jesus' sake?' And I answered, 'Yes, Lord, open the way, and I will go.' I felt that I could go down there where I had always lived. I was used to the filth and misery, the drunkenness and Romanism, and I felt no reluctance to contend with it.

"A little while after that my health gave way, and I took a vacation. I went with my wife to Sea Cliff to attend the camp-meeting. All the time the thought of this work was pressing upon me, and I prayed God to open the way for me to present the subject. He gave me the opportunity. From there I went to Sing Sing camp-ground, and presented it, and afterward to Ocean Grove. Many were interested in the proposed work, and gave me in larger or smaller sums, until I held in trust four hundred and fifty dollars.

"Then the Lord opened the way for me to begin the work in a small way at 316 Water Street, next door to where the John Allen meetings had been held. The house was in the hands of an aged missionary, but the evening meetings were very small. The City Mission and Tract Society, at the suggestion of one of their friends, put the house at our disposal."

From that time to the present, the Water Street Mission has been open day and night, and every evening a meeting has been held there, in which Jerry McAuley was assisted by Christian friends in the three cities, who volunteered or were invited to aid him in the work. Hundreds of souls have been converted there, and some of the most wonderful changes of life and character that the history of Christianity in America can show, have commenced there.

A little more than two years ago Jerry McAuley was enabled to establish in Thirty-second Street near Sixth Avenue. He had the assurance that the Water Street Mission would not be neglected, and his heart yearned to do a work for Christ among sinners of another class. Near the Cremorne are hundreds of houses devoted to the practice of vice. Abandoned women and profligate men meet in the neighborhood to drink and to gamble, and at night the scene in that locality is one that makes the Christian's soul tremble, lest the vengeance of God, which destroyed Sodom, should fall on a city in which such scenes can be witnessed.

Jerry spoke of his desire to labor in the midst of that scene, and friends who had watched the work God had enabled him to do in Water Street encouraged him. A notorious haunt of profligate persons happened to be in the market, and by the liberal contributions of wealthy Christian friends Jerry was enabled to secure it. It was fitted up comfortably and opened. Since that day there have been heard every night, right in the midst of the roar of drunkenness and debauchery, the songs of the Lord's house, and night by night the Gospel of the Saviour has been preached, and sinners, sunk in depravity, have been told by one who was himself rescued from the same pit, of Him who came to seek and to save the lost. God is blessing the work, and many women have been led to abandon lives of sin and return to the path of virtue, and many wicked men have been converted through the blessing of God on this enterprise.

PILATE'S WASH-BASIN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 28, 1884.

"He took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it."—MATT. 27: 24.

The Prisoner and the Governor — A Startling Contrast—The Message from Pilate's Wife—Pilate Bullied by the Priests—His Surrender—The Water Sent for—An Empty Ceremony — Useful as a Symbol—In Pilate's Case a Dead Failure—Hands Still Stained—The Power of Conscience — Historical Instances — A Converted Farmer's Restitution—A Poor Preacher's Debts Paid — A Converted Rum-seller's Stock Destroyed — Converted Cash-Boxes — Conscience at the Judgment — What Moral Purification is — The Laver of the Gospel — The Laver in the Temple—A Universal River —A Blind Child's Eyes Opened.

AT about eight o'clock in the morning, up the marble stairs of a palace, and across floors of richest mosaic, and under ceilings dyed with all the splendors of color, and between snow-banks of white and glistening sculpture, passes a poor, pale, sick young man of thirty-three, already condemned to death, on His way to be condemned again. Jesus of Nazareth is His name.

Coming out to meet Him on this tessellated pavement is an unscrupulous, compromising, time-serving cowardly man, with a few traces of sympathy and fair dealing left in his composition—Governor Pontius Pilate. Did ever such opposites meet? Luxury and pain, selfishness and generosity, arrogance and humility, sin and holiness, midnight and midnoon.

PILATE AND JESUS.

The bloated-lipped governor takes the cushioned seat, but the prisoner stands, his wrists manacled. In a semicircle around the prisoner are the Sanhedrists, with flashing eyes and brandished fists, prosecuting this case in the name of religion, for the bitterest prosecutions have been religious prosecutions; and when Satan takes possession of a good man he makes up by intensity for brevity of occupation. If you have never seen an ecclesiastical court trying a man, then you have no idea of the foaming infernalism of these old Jewish Sanhedrists. Governor Pilate cross-questions the prisoner, and finds right away He is innocent, and wants to let Him go. His caution is also increased by some one who comes to the Governor and whispers in his ear. The Governor puts his hand behind the ear so as to catch the words almost inaudible. It is

A MESSAGE FROM CLAUDIA

Procula, his wife, who has had a dream about the innocence of this prisoner and about the danger of executing Him, and she awakens from this morning dream in time to send the message to her husband, then on the judicial bench. And what with the protest of his wife, and the voice of his own conscience, and the entire failure of the Sanhedrists to make out their case, Governor Pilate resolves to discharge the prisoner from custody.

But the intimation of such a thing brings upon the Governor an equinoctial storm of indignation. They will report him to the Emperor at Rome. They will have him recalled. They will send him up home, and he will be hung for treason, for the Emperor at Rome has already a suspicion in regard to Pilate, and that suspicion does not cease until Pilate is banished and commits suicide. So Governor Pontius the matter, and proposes that Christ be whipped instead of assassinated. So the prisoner is fastened to a low pillar, and on His bent and bared back come the thongs of leather, with pieces of lead and bone intertwisted, so that every stroke shall be the more awful. Christ lifts Himself from the scourging, with flushed cheek and torn and quivering and mangled flesh, presenting a spectacle of suffering in which Rubens, the painter, found the theme for his greatest masterpiece.

But the Sanhedrists are not yet satisfied. They have had some of His nerves lacerated; they want them all lacerated. They have had some of His blood; they want all of it, down to the last corpuscle. So Governor Pontius Pilate, after all this merciful hesitation, surrenders to the demonaical cry of "Crucify Him!" But the Governor sends for something. He sends a slave out to get something. Although the constables are in haste to take the prisoner to execution and the mob outside are impatient to glare upon their victim, is necessitated. Yonder it comes, a wash basin. Some pure, bright water is poured into it, and then Governor Pilate puts his white, delicate hands into the water, and rubs them together, and then lifts them, dripping, from the towel fastened at the slave's girdle, while he practically says: "I wash my hands of this whole homicidal transaction. I wash my hands of this entire responsibility; you will have to bear it." That is the meaning of my text when it says, "He took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it."

Behold, in this, that ceremony amounts to nothing, if there are not in it correspondences of heart and life. It is a good thing to wash the hands. God created three quarters of the world water, and in that commanded cleanliness; and when the ancients did not take the hint He plunged the whole world under water and kept it there for some time. Hand-washing was among the Jews. The Jewish Mishna gave particular direction how that the hands must be thrust three times up to the wrists in water, and the palm of the hand must be rubbed with the closed fist of the other. All that well enough for a symbol, but here in the text is a man who proposes to wash away the guilt of a sin whch he does not quit and of which he does not make any repentance. Pilate's wash-basin was

A DEAD FAILURE.

Ceremonies, however beautiful and appropriate, may be no more than this hypocritical ablution. In infancy we may be sprinkled from the baptismal font, and in manhood we may wade into deep immersions, and yet never come to moral purification. We may kneel without prayer, and bow without reverence, and sing without any acceptance. All your creeds, and liturgies, and sacraments, and genuflections, and religious convocations amount to nothing unless your heart-life go into them. When that bronzed slave took from the presence of Pilate that wash-basin he carried away none of Pilate's cruelty, or Pilate's wickedness, or Pilate's guilt.

Nothing against creeds; we all have them either written or implied. Nothing against ceremonies; they are of infinite importance. Nothing against sacraments; they are divinely commanded. Nothing against a rosary, if there be as many heartfelt prayers as beads counted. Nothing against incense floating up from censer amid Gothic arches, if the prayers be as genuine as the aroma is sweet. Nothing against Epiphany, or Lent, or Ash Wednesday, or Easter, or Good Friday, or Whitsuntide, or Palm Sunday, if these symbols have behind them genuine repentance, and holy reminiscence, and Christian consecration. But ceremony is only the sheath to the sword, it is to the kernel, it is only the lamp to the flame, it is only the body to the spirit. The outward must be symbolical of the inward. Wash the hands by all means, but, more than all, wash the heart.

Behold, also, as you see Governor Pontius Pilate thrust his hand into this wash-basin, the power of conscience. He had an idea there was the blood of an innocent person, whom he might have acquitted if he only had the courage. Poor Pilate! his conscience was after him, and he knew the stain would never be washed from the right hand or the left hand, and until the day of his death, though he might wash in all the lavers of the Roman Empire, there would be still eight fingers and two thumbs red at the tips.

Oh, the power of conscience when it is fully aroused! With whip of scorpions over a bed of spikes in pitch of midnight it chases guilt. Are there ghosts? Yes, not of the graveyard, but of one's mind not at rest.

"And thus Brutus, amid his slumbering host, Startled with Cæsar's stalwart ghost."

Macbeth looked at his hand after the midnight assassination, and he says:

"Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood Clean from my hand? No; this my hand will rather
The multitudinous seas incarnardine, Making the green one red."

For every sin, great or small, conscience, which is the voice of God, has a reproof more or less emphatic. Charles IX., responsible for St. Bartholomew massacre, was chased by the bitter memories, and in his dying moment said to his doctor, Ambrose Parry: "Doctor, I don't know what's the matter of me; I am in a fever of body and mind, and have been for a long while. Oh, if I had only spared the innocent, and the imbecile, and the cripple!" Rousseau declared in old age that a sin he committed in his youth still gave him sleepless nights. Charles II., of Spain, could not sleep unless he had in the room a confessor and two friars. Cataline had such bitter memories he was startled at the least sound. Cardinal Beaufort, having slain the Duke of Gloucester, often in the night would say, "Away! away! why do you look at me?" Richard III., having slain his two nephews, would sometimes in the night shout from his couch and clutch his sword, fighting apparitions. Dr. Webster, having slain Parkman in Boston, and while waiting for his doom, complained to the jailor that the prisoners on the other side of the wall all night long kept charging him with his crime, when there were no prisoners on the other side of the wall. It was the voice of his own conscience.

From what did Adam and Eve try to hide when they had all the world to themselves? From their own conscience. What made Cain's punishment greater than he could bear? His conscience. What made Ahab cry out to the prophet, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" What made the great Felix tremble before the little missionary? Conscience. What made Belshazzar's teeth chatter with a chill when he saw a finger come out of the black sleeve of the midnight and write on the plastering? Conscience, conscience.

Why is it that that man in this audience, with all the marks of worldly prosperity upon him, is agitated while I speak, and is now flushed and is now pale, and then the breath is uneven, and then beads of perspiration on the forehead, and then the look of unrest comes to a look of

HORROR AND DESPAIR?

I know not. But he knows, and God knows. It may be that he despoiled a fair young life and turned innocence into a waif, and the smile of hope into the brazen laughter of despair. Or it may be that he has in his possession the property of others, and by some stratagem he keeps it according to law, and yet he knows it is not his own, and that if his heart should stop beating this moment he would be in hell forever. Or it may be he is responsible for a great mystery, the disappearance of some one who is never heard of, and the detectives were baffled, and the tracks were all covered up, and the swift horse or the rail train took him out of reach, and there are only two persons in the universe who know of it—God and himself. God present at the time of the tragedy and present at the retrospection, and conscience—conscience with stings, conscience with pincers, conscience with flails, conscience with furnaces, is upon him; and until a man's conscience rouses him he does not repent. What made that to God go to his infidel neighbor and say: "Neighbor, I have four of your sheep. They came over into my fold six years ago. They had your mark upon them, and I changed it to my mark. I want you to have those sheep, and I want you to have the interest on the money, and I want you to have the increase of the fold; and if you want to send me to prison, I shall make no complaint"? The infidel heard of the man's conversion, and he said: "Now, now, if you have got them sheep you are welcome to them. I don't want nothing of those things at all. You just go away from me. Something has got hold of you I don't understand. I heard you were down at those religious meetings." But the converted man would not allow things to stand in that way, and so the infidel said: "Well, now, you can pay me the value of the sheep and six per cent interest from that time to this, and I sha'n't say anything more about it. Just go away from me." What was the matter with the two farmers? In the one case a convicted conscience leading him to honesty, and in the other case a convicted conscience warning against infidelity.

Thomas Oliver was one of John Wesley's preachers. The early part of his life had been full of recklessness, and he had made debts wherever he could borrow. He was converted to God, and then he went forth to preach and pay his debts. He had a small amount of property left him, and immediately set out to pay his debts, and everybody knew he was in earnest; and to consummate the last payment he had to sell his horse and saddle and bridle. That was conscience. That is converted conscience. That is religion. Frank Tiebout, had a large amount of liquor on hand at the time of his conversion, and he put all the kegs, and barrels, and demijohns in a wagon and took them down in front of the old church where he had been converted, and had everything emptied into the street. That is religion. Why the thousands of dollars sent every year to the United States Treasury at Washington as

"CONSCIENCE MONEY"?

Why, it simply means there are postmasters, and there are attorneys, and there are officials who sometimes retain that which does not belong to them; and these men are converted, or under powerful pressure of conscience, and make restitution. If all the moneys out of which the State and the United States treasuries have been defrauded should come back to their rightful exchequers, there would be money enough to pay all the State debts and all the United States debt by day after to-morrow.

Conversion amounts to nothing unless the heart is converted, and the pocket-book is converted, and the cash drawer is converted, and the ledger is converted, and the fire-proof safe is converted, and the pigeon-hole containing the correspondence is converted, and his improvement is noticed even by the canary bird that sings in the parlor, and the cat that licks the platter after the meal, and the dog that comes bounding from the kennel to greet him. A man half converted, or a quarter converted, or a thousandth part converted is not converted at all. What will be the great book in the Day of Judgment? Conscience. Conscience recalling misimproved opportunities. Conscience recalling unforgiven sins. Conscience bringing up all the past.

ALAS! FOR THIS GOVERNOR,

Pontius Pilate. That night, after the court had adjourned and the Sanhedrists had gone home, and nothing was heard outside the room but the step of the sentinel, I see Pontius Pilate arise from his tapestried and sleepless couch, and go to the laver and begin to wash his hands, crying, "Out, out, crimson spot! Tellest thou to me, and to God, and to the night my crime? Is there no alkali to remove these dreadful stains? Is there no chemistry to dissolve this carnage? Must I to the day of my death carry the blood of this innocent man on my heart and hand? Out, thou crimson spot!" The worst thing a man can have is an evil conscience, and the best thing a man can have is what Paul calls a good conscience. But is there no such thing as

MORAL PURIFICATION?

If a man is a sinner once must he always be a sinner, and an unforgiven sinner? We have all had conscience after us. Or do you tell me that all the words of your life have been just right, and all the thoughts of your heart have been just right, and all the actions of your life just right? Then you do not know yourself, and I take the responsibility of saying you are a pharisee, you are a hypocrite, you are a Pontius Pilate, and do not know it. You commit the very same sin that Pilate committed. You have crucified the Lord of glory. But if nine tenths of this audience is made up of thoughtful and earnest people, then nine tenths of this audience are asking within themselves, "Is there no such thing as moral purification? is there no laver in which the soul may wash and be clean?" Yes, yes, yes. Tell it in song, tell it in sermon, tell it in prayer, tell it to the hemispheres. That is what David cried out for when he said, "Wash me thoroughly from my sin, and cleanse me from mine iniquities." And that is what, in another place, he cried out for when he said, "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow." Behold, filled with living fountains. Did you ever see the picture of the laver in the ancient tabernacle or in the ancient temple? The laver in the ancient tabernacle was made out of the women's metallic looking-glasses. It was a great basin, standing on a beautiful pedestal; but when the temple was built, then the laver was an immense affair, called the brazen sea; and oh, how deep were the floods there gathered! And there were ten lavers beside—five at the right and five at the left—and each laver had three hundred gallons of water. And the outside of these lavers was carved and chased with palm trees so delicately cut you could almost see the leaves tremble, and lions so true to life that you could imagine you saw the nostril throb, and the cherubim with outspread wings. That magnificent laver of the old dispensation is a feeble type of the more glorious laver of our dispensation, our sunlit dispensation.

THE LAVER OF THE GOSPEL,

Here is the laver holding

having for its pedestal the Rock of Ages, carved with the figure of the lion of Judah's tribe, and having palm branches for victory, and wings suggestive of the soul's flight toward God in prayer, and the soul's flight heavenward when we die. Come, ye auditory, and wash all your sins, however aggravated, and all your sorrows, however agonizing. Come to this fountain, open for all sin and uncleanness, the furthest, the worst. You need not carry your sins half a second. Come and wash in this glorious Gospel laver. Why, that is an opportunity enough to swallow up all nations. That is an opportunity that will yet stand on the Alps and beckon to Italy, and yet stand on the Pyrenees and beckon to Spain, and it will yet stand on the Ural and beckon to Russia, and it will stand at the gate of heaven and beckon to all nations. Pardon for all sin, and pardon right away, through the blood of the Son of God.

A LITTLE CHILD

that had been blind, but through skilful surgery restored to sight, brought to sight, said: "Why, mother, why didn't you tell me the earth and the sky are so beautiful? Why didn't you tell me?" "Oh," replied the mother, "my child, I did tell you often; I often told you how beautiful they are; but you were blind, and you couldn't see!" Oh, if we could have our eyes opened to see the glories in Jesus Christ we would feel that the half had not been told us, and you would go to some Christian man and say, "Why didn't you tell me before the glories in the Lord Jesus Christ?" and that friend would say, "I did tell you, but you were blind and could not see, and you were deaf and could not hear."

History says that a great army came to capture ancient Jerusalem, and when this army got on the hills so that they saw the turrets and the towers of Jerusalem, they gave a shout that made the earth tremble; and tradition, whether true or false, says that, so great was the shout, eagles flying in the air dropped under the atmospheric percussion. Oh, if we could only catch a glimpse of the towers of this Gospel temple into which you are all invited to come and wash, there would be a song jubilant and wide resounding, at New Jerusalem seen, at New Jerusalem taken, and hosannas of other worlds flying midair would fold their wings and drop into our closing doxology! Against the disappointing and insufficient laver of Pilate's vice, and Pilate's cowardice, and Pilate's sin, I place the brazen sea of a Saviour's pardoning mercy!

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN made in all four voyages to the Arctic, from the fourth of which he never returned. When he left his native country on that fatal expedition he knew perfectly well the risks he would have to encounter. In all his previous voyages thither he had been surrounded with perils, from which his escape seemed like a miracle. His second voyage especially had been nearly fatal to the whole party.

The expedition embarked May 23d, 1819, on board the sailing vessel Prince of Wales. The vessel passed through Davis Straits July 25th all well, but on the 7th of August they had an earnest of those perils which thickened around them, and almost overwhelmed them at a later period. Their ship struck violently on a point of rock projecting from the Island of Resolution. A gentle swell freed them from their perilous situation, but the current hurried them along in contact with the rocky shore, and the prospect was most alarming. Presently they came into contact with a large iceberg lying aground. Their peril was now more appalling than ever. After their first concussion, the ship was driven along the steep and rugged side of this iceberg with such amazing rapidity, that the destruction of the masts seemed inevitable, and every one expected they should again be forced on the rocks in a most disabled state, a result which must have been decisive. After a three days' contest between the pumps and the leaks, the ship was so far repaired as to be comparatively water-tight.

The Prince of Wales had borne them safely through the dangers of two years, but in August of the year 1821 she was again surrounded and frozen in. Sir John Franklin felt sure that the severe nip she received would so strain her timbers, as that when she was released she would sink, and he therefore took preparatory steps to abandon the vessel. Among others he despatched hunting parties, partly to obtain fresh provisions, but chiefly that he might learn the condition of the ice. The vessel being surrounded by lofty bergs, he could gain no idea of the state of the ice over which they must make their way. Four men were sent with guns and directed to make a careful survey and report on the route. Sir John with his officers awaited their return anxiously. At last they came, and as the men obviously differed in opinion the captain listened attentively as each stated the result of his observations. (See illustration.) Sir John and his officers then retired to consult together, and the order was given to prepare to leave the ship.

The place to which Sir John decided to aim was Point Lake, distant 149 miles as the crow flies. The next day they started, each man, including officers, carrying as his share of the load a weight of about ninety pounds. It was not until November 7th, 1821, that they obtained succor. In the mean time they ate all the provisions brought from the ship, all the game they had been able to kill on their way, and even the tops of their shoes and strips of clothing. Six of the party died from cold and hunger.

A VISIT TO AN OPIUM DEN.

Down a narrow street (I give not its name; I dread the merest off-chance of any young reader being led by these lines to visit, and, perhaps, as some now victims to the drug did at first, taste it from prurient curiosity), we came to a shut-up, deserted-looking house. Above the door are two mystic letters, Chinese words, which tell the secret to the initiated. Where have my eyes been? I ask in amaze. How true is it, even in the physical domain, we but see what we have learned to see. I have passed down this street not infrequently, and never have I observed the Chinese sign until now. Further on, over a door, I see in letters I read, but do not understand, Ye-hop, and on the window, Yeung in fat hak. Translated, the first phrase implies righteousness and harmony. Oh, dismal parody on the beautiful words! neither can be found in an opium den. The second phrase implies that opium is sold here.

Entering, we find ourselves not in a boarding-house for Chinese sailors, but in a simple and unblushing opium den. Stumbling through a narrow aperture, in a wooden partition (the whole house is curiously partitioned into little dens), we find a Chinaman on a platform raised about a foot from the floor, coolly preparing the opium for his pipe. The process is a curious and slow one, and the man who smokes many pipes a day must give much of his time to preparation.

The smoker, lying on his couch or divan, with the pipe, lamp, and other implements on a tray, takes a portion on the point of a wire and warms it carefully over the flame of the lamp. He dips it again in the little jar of opium until the requisite quantity adheres, alternately warming it over the flame and pressing it on the flat bowl of the pipe, turning it over and over and working it carefully on the end of the wire, until it is reduced to the state of a soft solid by the evaporation of a portion of the water. During this process it swells up into a light porous mass from the formation of steam within, and must, therefore, be heated up to the boiling point of water. When the little bolus has been brought to the exact state fitted for smoking, it is worked into a conical-shaped ring around the wire, the point of the wire inserted into the round hole of the pipe, and, by twirling the wire around while withdrawing it, the opium is deposited on the pipe, the hole in it corresponding to the hole in the bowl of the pipe. The stem of the pipe being applied to the lips and the bowl held over the lamp, the heat of the flame is drawn in over the opium, converting into vapor all the volatilizable material in the bolus.

The vapor is inhaled into the lungs, and comes in contact with the immense surface of the respiratory mucous membrane, by which the alkaloids are absorbed into the blood, and thus act upon the whole system.

Notwithstanding the theory of some scientific gentlemen who have paid some attention to the subject that none of the alkaloids are carried by the smoke into the system, it is demonstrated a thousand times a day by every whiff a Chinaman takes of his pipe that certain constituents of the watery extract of opium are converted into vapor; and the sallow complexion, stupid visage, and wasted frame of old smokers, and especially the remorseless grip of the craving on every fibre of his nervous system, afford strong reason to believe, if they do not absolutely prove, that every inhalation of the vapor conveys a portion of the alkaloids into the victim's blood.

Up-stairs we found more victims; the house can accommodate fifty opium-smokers. It was not full; it often is. The gambling-room was locked; all were engrossed in the pipe; but it is a gambling hell as well as an opium den.

Further down the street we enter another den. Here the men seem of a stronger build and fiercer nature. They were full of some recent quarrel on board ship; and as in their own tongue they told their wrongs to the sympathetic missionary, it seemed to me as if the savage scenes of Canton were about to be re-enacted. We were not, however, in the slightest danger; they regarded us as friends; only in the telling of the quarrel there was a dramatic action and fierce look which to one who knew not what was said seemed threatening. Here again were opium-smokers puffing away; one had succumbed entirely, and was far off in dreamland, soon, however, to awake and greedily grasp the idolized though ruinous opium pipe.

THE RESULTS OF CHRIST'S COMING.

By Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B.

Who May See Christ on Earth—Children—Men now in Middle Age—The Preparation for It—Patience—The Earnest Desire—Not a Sign of Weakness—The End of Darkness and Doubt—Of Poverty and Misery—Of Class Distinctions.

To those who realize that Christ's Second Coming is not to be postponed until after the whole world is converted, its expectation becomes a new and real influence in life. Ever present, entering into all our daily plans and thoughts and duties, is the thought that we may in our own day witness it. The children of our households and schools, with a long life before them, may see the Lord Christ on earth. The hope is not confined to children. They who have spent half their days—even they whose heads are silvered with age—may take part in the triumph of the Lord. "Behold, I come quickly." He may be at our door. "The Lord is at hand."

Suppose we are altogether unprepared to meet Him; neglecting the salvation He offers, and refusing the obedience He claims; suppose that coming suddenly, He should find us among the enemies whom He will destroy with the brightness of His appearing! Suppose He should find us simply holding aloof from His cause, though wishing to be saved by His grace; ashamed to confess Him before men, and thus liable to be classed among those of whom the Son of man will be ashamed before His Father and the holy angels!

Rather let us "come behind in no gift, waiting for His coming." Let us in the enduring of trial, and in persevering endeavors after increased holiness. This is the argument of St. James, chap. 5, verses 7, 8, "Be patient unto the coming of the Lord; stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." The expectation of His near approach, while ignorant of the exact time of it, should prompt to increased vigilance. "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come" (Matt. 24: 42). "Little children, abide in Him; that, when He shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming" (1 John 2: 28).

They who trust and love Him must desire His return. Are they inconsistent in desiring it soon? Is it a sign of weakness? St. Paul speaks of the crown which was laid up not for himself only, but "for all those who love His appearing." The Thessalonian converts "turned from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 Thess. 1: 9, 10). Believers now, as of old, are "Looking for that blessed hope." Loving parents long for their children's return home. Friends look out earnestly for friends. A loyal nation is on the alert to welcome back their monarch. The Church desires the Advent of her Lord. "Behold, I come quickly; even so, come, Lord Jesus."

There are still dark places of the earth full of the habitations of cruelty.

COME!

and they who sit in darkness shall see a great light, and dens of hatred shall become homes of love. Foes of Thine mock Thy promises, defy Thy threats, trample on Thy laws. Come! and infidelity shall be silenced, and rebellion cease. There are mountains which obstruct the progress of the Gospel; deep-seated prejudices, venerable philosophies, tyrannies of caste, Antichristian customs identified with patriotism; and Thy prophets often cry, "I have labored in vain, and spent my strength for naught." Come! and every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill be brought low. Popish superstitions claiming heavenly authority; human priesthoods professing divine efficacy; tradition superseding Scripture; ceremonies substituted for faith; how do such Popish chains after four centuries of reformation, hold captive entire nations, who refuse to listen to the trumpet which proclaims liberty to the captive. Come! and those chains shall be broken, and those scales fall from eyes long closed to the light.

Alas for the dwellers in African wilds, only now discovered by the explorer! Alas for the millions of Chinese, whose venerable history and culture make them so often regard with contempt the teaching of "barbarians" of a recent growth! Oh, come! and a nation shall be born in a day, and the idols shall be utterly abolished; and Thine ancient people shall acknowledge their Messiah; and the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in.

Come to thy Church, and cleanse it from all that defaces its beauty. Drive out all false doctrine and unholy practice; all sectarian rivalry, bitterness of controversy, exclusiveness of spirit, worldly expediency, mammon worship.

PURIFY THY TEMPLE

from all vile trafficking; overturn the tables of the money-changers; put an end to frivolous disputes, and make varieties of method only illustrate unity and stimulate love. Come! and Thy prayer shall be fulfilled, "that they may be one even as We are One;" then will Thy Church put on her wedding attire to welcome the heavenly Bridegroom, and shall "look forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

The views of Christians may differ respecting the mode of its development; but who does not long for such a Millennium! that the "bitter cry" of may cease; and poverty give place to plenty, and sickness to health, and vice to purity, and crime to the love which is the fulfilling of all law; and the drink-curse be driven away, and factories of poison cease their unholy industry, and vendors of it close their doors, and law no longer encourage the cause while punishing the results; that the fire we ourselves kindle may be quenched, and the chasm we open for the destruction of multitudes be filled in; that competition may no longer grind down the trader, and what calls itself political economy no longer goad God's children into slavery and crush them with despair?

Oh for the time when the

and not mere might; and distinctions of station, endowment, nationality, shall not be the destruction of brotherhood; and men shall trust, not fear each other, seeking their own good only in alliance with that of their neighbors; and fortresses and fleets no longer frown defiance; and thrones no longer be symbols of fear and objects of suspicion; and laws no longer be needed to repress crime, but only to aid in common action for the common weal! Oh for the time when holy love shall no longer be debased to brutish lust, nor strength of body and brain be abused to injure and distress; when science shall pour fresh light on religion, and each new discovery evoke fresh hallelujahs to the Creator; when the pen and the press shall not corrupt, nor the tongue utter what is false or unkind, nor music lend its charms to vice: when art shall portray only what is pure, commerce be inseparable from honesty and beneficence, and amusement never stoop to give pleasure by stimulants that enervate the body or corrupt the mind!

AN END OF CLASS DISTINCTION.

Oh for the time when classes shall no longer be so separated, and interests be so distinct, and the constant accumulation of wealth be so linked with increasing aggravation of want as to threaten a social earthquake: when nation shall not strive with nation, but turn their swords into ploughshares and learn war no more; when mankind, reconciled by the Prince of Peace to their Father in heaven, will be reconciled to one another on earth; and the grand ideal be realized of a divine socialism—a universal brotherhood under the One Fatherhood! The wilderness will then rejoice and blossom as the rose, and earth will resemble heaven.

Come, Lord, to earth again;
Come quickly, come and reign;
Lord Jesu, come!
Enthrone the struggling right
Make clear the clouded light,
In victory close the fight,
Lord, quickly come!

Bid war and faction cease;
Bring in the reign of peace;
Lord Jesu, come!
Set every captive free;
Let all men brothers be;
Heal earth's long malady:
Lord, quickly come!

NEW BOOKS.

"GOLDEN THOUGHTS ON MOTHER, HOME, AND HEAVEN" is a collection of choice passages from eminent authors, American and British, relating to those three subjects dear to the heart of every man and woman. Dr. Theodore L Cuyler, in his preface to this collection, says: "The compiler has rendered a most valuable service by collecting into one sheaf these golden gleanings. In order to give his work the greatest richness and variety, he has laid under contribution more than three hundred widely-known authors on both sides of the Atlantic. In the main, his selections seem to have been made with excellent taste, the ruling motive being to choose those things which would be the most practical and the most profitable. Many of them are already familiar to us all; but that very fact proves their value. There are other readers coming on the stage of life who need to know these 'household words,' and one object of this volume is to carry these coined thoughts of standard value into a wide and permanent circulation. . . . It is because this volume contains so many valuable truths for fireside reading—in short, because it is such an excellent home book that I have been drawn to it and have written these words of honest commendation. When one has not time enough to read an extended treatise, he may take up this book and find some savory morsel of wisdom, some sweet touch of poetry, some timely hint for the hour, or some rich cluster of truths that shall be like a bunch of grapes from the King's own garden. Into the cleanly pages of my friend's volume 'nothing entereth which defileth.' And there is many a precious truth here which, with God's blessing, may make one wise unto salvation." Such a tribute from a clergyman so highly esteemed as Dr. Cuyler needs no addition from us.

Among the three hundred authors from whose writings these selections of poetry and prose are made are: Rev. John S. C. Abbott, D.D.; James Aldrich, Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. Horatius Bonar, Rev. Phillips Brooks, William C. Bryant, Thomas Carlyle, Henry Clay, Dr. Charles F. Deems, John B. Gough, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Hon. James Russell Lowell, Dwight L. Moody, Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, and John G. Whittier. It contains four hundred and fifty-three pages, and is published, handsomely bound in cloth, at $2.75. Other editions more expensively prepared, at higher prices, may also be had. The publisher is Mr. E. B. Treat, 757 Broadway, New York.

THE BELOVED PHYSICIAN

is a biography, from the pen of the Rev. George Hughes, of his late colleague, Dr. Walter C. Palmer. Mr. Hughes, probably better than any one else, knew and appreciated the excellences of Dr. Palmer's character. He was with him in his work, co-operated with him in his editorial labors, and saw him almost daily in those circumstances of daily worries which try and test the strength of every man's character. He was, therefore, able to speak with authority respecting Dr. Palmer's life and work. This book is a friend's tribute to the memory of a man well known by his labors throughout America, and whom many will be glad to know still more intimately through the pages penned by one who was his trusted companion and fellow-worker.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Bullet that Missed the Mark.—Mr. Steel said at a recent meeting: "Once John Knox was sitting at dinner in his usual place at the table. There was a small window right at his back. Suddenly he said to his family, 'I am going to change my place at the table, I don't feel quite safe here.' They laughed at him, telling him he was superstitious; but he took his own way, and changed his place. Just as he had done so, the report of a gun was heard, and a ball came right through the little window, falling below the table. Some enemy had done this, knowing where he generally sat, but God preserved him in His own wonderful way, and helped him to continue his wonderful work for the glory of His name."

Reminiscences of Whitefield.—The distinguished evangelist, Whitefield, once asked a glass manufacturer, "How do you make glass?" "Well," replied the glass maker, "it has to be put into the fire and refined before it can be of any use." "That is just what the Lord did to me; He put me into the fire to cleanse and make me pure before I could be of any service to Him," replied Whitefield. So must every one be willing to be put through God's refining fire before they can be of any service to Him.—At another time, Whitefield was walking along the street accompanied by a lady, when a man said to them, "I am a lost man." "I am so glad," replied the lady. Whitefield was rather annoyed at her unfeeling answer, and said, "Why are you glad?" "Because," replied the lady, "Jesus Christ only came to seek and to save the lost."

A Memorable Singing Practice.—Mr. Lockhead says: "I once heard of a Christian man who had gathered a few musical friends at his house to practise some of Mr. Sankey's hymns. They were singing the hymn, 'Around the throne of God in heaven,' and when it was finished he made the remark, 'I wonder how many people are now around that great white throne of God?' The next morning his wife asked him, 'Are you going to see the great review of soldiers to-day?' He replied, 'I would like to go, just to compare it with the great throng that is around the throne in heaven.' He went out in the morning to see the military spectacle, and before mid-day he was dead. He had become one of that great throng about Emmanuel's throne, whom no man can number. May we by prayer and faith be ready for the Master's summons, however suddenly it may come."

An Infidel Becomes an Evangelist.—"It is about eight years since I first came to Christ. I had left home before this. I was at Peterhead when He first spoke to my soul. I tried to make myself believe that there was no God, and no hereafter. I went from place to place thinking to drown the thought that would come into my mind that there is a God. I was putting my nephew to bed one night, a little boy about four or five years of age, when he said to me, 'Me say my prayers first, uncle!' My heart was deeply touched; I became more miserable than ever. Shortly after that I went to Glasgow, and attended some preaching services in the tent on the Green, and there I was led by the Holy Spirit to give myself away to Christ. Previous to that I was a professed infidel. Oh, how wonderful is the forbearance, and how perfect is the forgiveness of God! Jesus is now my All and in All."

A Sad Case of Poverty.—Captain Hatfield remarks: "We are scarcely aware of the suffering that is all around us. The other day I was asked to go and see a man who lives in Brown Street. I entered the house with some difficulty, and when my eyes got accustomed to the darkness, I saw a poor, attenuated, human creature, in the corner of the room, crawling out of his bed. There was nothing but poverty and wretchedness all around. I could see very well that the man was dying, and asked if he had no one to help him. 'Yes,' he said, 'I have my wife, but she has gone to try and get us something to eat.' I repeated a few verses out of the Psalms to him, for I could not see to read, and told him to send up to my office, and I would give him some help. I went away, and as I had the pleasure of helping that family, I thought on our Master's words, 'Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of these, my little ones, ye do it unto me.'"

Heart Disease Cured by Christ.—"A young lady was troubled with palpitation of the heart. She went to her medical adviser about it, and he said her case was a very bad one. She was staying with her sisters who were earnest Christians. They were all very anxious that this sister should be converted to Christ. They took her to church one evening, and at the end of the service she went into the manse, which was very near the church, to inquire more fully after salvation. The minister pointed her to 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.' When he had finished speaking the young lady slipped off her chair, and upon her knees besought the Lord to take her to heaven there and then. Accompanied by her sister, she made a second visit to the physician. He was very much astonished. Turning to her sister he said, 'What have you been doing to your sister? She is quite well.' She replied, 'Oh, we did nothing to her, but she has been to Jesus for the healing power, and He has made her heart better.' She had been very anxious before she found peace through faith in the Saviour, but when she accepted Christ her mind at once found rest, and she is still living, a happy, useful Christian."

A Mother's Farewell to her Boy.—A Christian worker narrated the following: "In a quiet rural village a mother lay dying, surrounded by sons and daughters; but her mind was brooding over one son who was not present. A telegram was sent to the absent one, to his place of business, in the great city. He showed the message to his master, who consented to let him go. In two hours he was ascending the hill which overlooked his home, and hurrying down he knocked at the door, which was opened by his sister, who greeted him with a loving smile, amid showers of tears. 'Come in,' she said, 'you are just in time;' and he walked into the chamber of death. The mother, reaching out her withered hand, said, 'I shall meet you in heaven, my darling,' and then she passed away. For a time the impression made upon his mind was deep, and he shunned his old ways and companions; but as he gradually mixed with his friends he sank deeper down than ever into sin, and at last he became an atheist. Passing down a street he heard some men singing, 'Washed in the Blood of the Lamb.' His first thought was, 'It is time those fanatics were put down; one can't stir a step at night but you hear them!' As he listened, he said to his companion, 'It's a good tune they are playing.' 'Yes, it is,' was the answer. They went into the meeting together. No particular impression was made upon the young unbeliever, but he went again to the meeting several times, and one night the chairman asked him to read Isaiah 57. He saw that he was in earnest about his soul. Friends, I was that young man, and in my own room I read the chapter and found rest for my soul that night, through faith in Christ, the crucified one."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the previous Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

Inquiries have been received respecting the terms on which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be supplied to persons desiring to introduce it to their friends. In response to this kindly project of our subscribers, we will mail the paper every week from October 3 to the end of the year to any address in the United States or Canada on receipt of twenty-five cents. The same offer made in former years has been singularly blessed. The paper sent by Christian people to unconverted acquaintances has, in a large number of cases, been the means of blessing. The low price at which it is offered for the three months will, we hope, encourage many to avail themselves of the opportunity of introducing the paper to families in which Christian literature is needed.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New Secretary of the Treasury is Judge Walter Q. Gresham, who, at the urgent request of the President consented to be transferred from the Postmaster-Generalship to the place made vacant by the death of Mr. Folger. It is known that Judge Gresham accepted the appointment with reluctance, and when the President first proposed it, he declined. The public, however, and especially the business portion of it, heartily approve of the selection. This approval is not limited to any party or wing of a party, but is expressed by men of all parties, who regard Mr. Gresham's unblemished record, and the remarkable ability he has displayed in many difficult positions, as proof of his fitness for his present honorable and responsible office.

The International Conference at Washington, convened to arrange for the acceptance of a common prime meridian from which to reckon longitude, is one of importance to the whole world. Some European countries are using a triple system; we are using a double system; and some countries use a single system differing from each other. France, Denmark, Spain, and Italy are the only countries which altogether ignore the zero of Greenwich; other countries use the Greenwich zero in addition to their own. The result is inconvenience and the possibility of disaster. The Senate Committee which recommended the convention pointed out several of those perils, the chief of which was the liability of mistake when two vessel of different nationalities meet at sea in stress of weather and one vessel asks and receives information as to its position. Congress authorized the President to invite representatives of every power to meet in Washington to fix upon and recommend the adoption of a meridian common to all. England is naturally anxious to have the Greenwich meridian adopted, and has made a concession with the view of advancing that object. It is stated that she has agreed to join the International Commission on the Metric System of Weights and Measures. If that is true, and the Metric Sytem becomes general, it will involve a revolution of a very sweeping character in all trade transactions, and possibly in the coinage.

A Strong Prohibition Movement is Reported from Louisiana. A newspaper correspondent, writing from New Orleans, states that the Prohibition party will put up full Congressional and Electoral tickets, and claim they will cast from 10,000 to 20,000 votes. There is a great deal of sincerity, the correspondent avers, in this movement on account of the increase of idleness and vicious crime on the part of negro laborers, who, from Saturday to Sunday night, gather at cross-roads stores to drink, gamble, and fight, till life at the business centres becomes intolerable. The churches are taking hold of the Prohibition movement, and the preachers, white and black, with the assistance of the women, are promising an active canvass. This is a live issue among the people, who are indifferent to the success of either of the great political parties, who make them the same promises in case of success at the polls.

An Effort to Break up Gang Rule in New York City is being made since the recent exposure in the press. One judge has given notice that he will so far co-operate with the police as to punish the ruffians who belong to the gangs that infest the western water front of the city, if they are arrested and brought before him. They have hitherto been charged with disorderly conduct when arrested, and if convicted have been sent to the city prison, where the influence of a rum-selling alderman could operate to procure their discharge on the very day of committal. Judge Duffy last week announced that he had discovered that the members of the gangs might be dealt with under the vagrant law, and he therefore, under that law, sent one of them to the Penitentiary for six months. The advantage of that course is that the prisoner can be released from that place only by an order signed by a judge of the Supreme Court. Only those who have witnessed the reign of terror established by these gangs can fully appreciate the boon that will be conferred on the city if Justice Duffy's scheme breaks them up.

At the Conference of the Prison Reform Association held recently at Saratoga, N. Y., several prison officials were present, and stated the results of their experience. Mr. Brockway, of the Elmira Reformatory, spoke of incorrigible criminals, whom he divided into three classes: professional, hereditary, and brutes. Mr. Maclaury, of Joliet Prison, had come to the conclusion that out of every hundred prisoners forty were incorrigible and would certainly go back to crime when discharged, thirty-five would probably do so, and only twenty-five would probably be reformed. Other officers of prisons concurred generally in this opinion. Warden Brush, of Sing Sing, who has generally fifteen hundred convicts under his charge, gave it as his opinion that the most fruitful causes of full prisons is disobedience in the family. He said: "Some time in life every one must learn to obey, and when I hear a child say to a parent, 'I won't' when told to do something, I see a candidate for prison." Mrs. Johnson, manager of the penitentiary for women at Sherburne, Mass., described the efforts made in that institution for the reformation of the inmates. Among them labor occupies a conspicuous place. They are instructed in the duties of domestic service, baking, cooking, washing and ironing, etc., and she said that all the women when discharged are immediately employed in good families at fair wages. Each day the women spend two hours in reading and writing. Mr. W. M. F. Rounds, the indefatigable secretary of the association, received many testimonies of the good accomplished through his labors.

A Resolution to Support Ex-Governor St John was introduced at the Illinois Methodist Conference in session at Carlinville on September 23d. An effort was made to have the resolution tabled as a political matter, with which the Conference had no concern. After considerable discussion, in the course of which several vigorous temperance speeches were made, the resolution was carried with but few dissentients. This decision does not, of course, bind the voters, but it is likely to have considerable influence over such of them as are wavering in their allegiance to either of the regular political parties. In Wisconsin also the Methodists are said to be prominent in organizing and pushing the Prohibition movement.

Two More Large Lumber Fires Occurred in Cleveland, Ohio, last week. One broke out on Sunday, September 21st, and burned over twenty acres, causing a heavy loss, estimated at nearly half a million. A second fire broke out on Saturday, September 27th, in the large yard of the Cleveland Saw Mill and Lumber Company. While the firemen were engaged in an effort to subdue it, news was brought that some one had set fire to a passenger train standing on the main track of the Connotton Valley Railroad. Every engine being engaged at the lumber fire, the cars which had not caught fire were detached and pushed back from those burning, which were allowed to burn out. This series of fires confirms the suspicion that they are the work of incendiaries, and extra police precautions are being taken to catch the offenders.

A Renewal of the Anti-Mormon Disturbances in Tennessee is apprehended. Notices have been posted in Wilson County, warning all Mormons to depart and never to return on pain of death. There are signs of excitement also in Lewis and Hickman counties. It appears that Mormon emissaries have been working in the State for over six years, and have made many converts, chiefly among the poorest and most ignorant of the people. They have not been molested until now, but recently the conduct of the converts, in which they have been encouraged by the Mormon elders, has been such as to arouse popular indignation. Much alarm prevails among the Mormons, many of whom are too poor to travel beyond the State limits. The killing of the elders in Lewis County recently, intensifies the panic.

The North Carolina State Exposition to be opened this week at Raleigh, is expected to be one of the most successful of such efforts. The main building contains one hundred and twenty-five thousand feet of space. Sixty counties have secured from five hundred to two thousand feet each to display their exhibits. There will be machinery from the New England, Middle and Western States. The main building will be lighted with electricity. From the 20th of October to the end of the month there will be an exhibit of live stock from Pennsylvania, Virginia, and other States. The mining interests of the State will be more fully shown than any State has attempted heretofore. In the Department of Agriculture's exhibit from Washington, there will be a gem parlor, and the roof will be thatched with mica. There will be pyramids of gold and copper ores. Corundum, kaonin and asbestos will be on exhibit in large quantity and of the finest varieties. The fishery exhibit will be the largest outside the Smithsonian Institution, and is put up according to the Davidson process.

The Twenty-seventh Anniversary of the Fulton Street Noon Prayer-meeting was held on Tuesday, September 23d, in the Middle Dutch Church, in Lafayette Place, New York. There were many ministers and laymen in the large audience who had attended the first of those prayer-meetings, more than a quarter of a century ago. Vines of smilax were twined around the pulpit, with roses blossoming among them. The Rev. Thomas Armitage, D.D., conducted the services, reviewing in a brief address the work of the prayer-meetings and their influence, which has extended all over the world. The Rev. Dr. Rudolph H. McKim and Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D., also took part in the services.

The Fifty-eighth Annual Report of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, of No. 50 Bible House, records an extensive variety of beneficent operations. The Executive Committee, headed by the Rev. Dr. John Hall and composed of ministers and laymen of the several religious denominations, is quietly yet vigorously pushing forward the work of city evangelization. It is gradually rebuilding and enlarging the mission chapels, and the new buildings as they are opened are to be called no longer "missions," but are to be known as churches for the people, and the Olivet Church, in Second Street, and the De Witt Church, in Rivington Street, are examples of what is intended by this new departure. A new church for the people is now erecting in Broome Street, near Centre Market. The Executive Committee selects those parts of the city most destitute of churches, so as not to be in conflict with others. The City Mission makes an earnest appeal for funds to continue and extend its valuable work.

A Young Lady was Frozen to Death on the mountains in Colorado recently. She resided in New York, but was visiting in Colorado for the sake of the mountain climbing, of which she was very fond. On September 23d she set out at six o'clock in the morning, accompanied by a young guide named Lamb, to ascend Long's Peak. They safely ascended the peak, but encountered a fierce snowstorm on their return, during which the lady became completely chilled. Young Lamb assisted her in the descent the best he could until about nine o'clock at night, when her strength entirely failed. He then carried her for half a mile, when, finding his own strength failing, he told her the only chance of saving either of their lives was for him to leave her and go to his father's house, seven miles distant, for help. He left her at ten o'clock and returned with assistance at four o'clock the following morning, but found the lady frozen to death. If the facts are as stated, the guide probably took the wisest course in leaving the lady to go for help, though if he had a manly disposition it must have cost him a struggle to desert her. In taking Christ as his guide through life the Christian is assured of safety. That Guide has already laid down His life for men (John 10 : 11, 28).

A Bride at Ninety Years of Age Recently told a visitor the history of her wooing. She had lived nearly all her life at Lexington, Ky., and during most of the time she had been on friendly terms with a gentleman who lived near her, and for more than fifty years attended the same church. She was in her ninetieth year, and her friend was eighty-two, when one day she received a letter from him in which he reviewed their long acquaintance, and proposed that the few remaining days they had to spend should be passed together. She need not go to the trouble of a formal reply, he wrote her; but if the proposal was distasteful she could simply send back the letter. If she retained it, he would understand that she looked favorably on his suit. The next Sabbath when the old lady's carriage drove up in front of the church her wooer stepped gallantly forward and helped her out. "Doctor," she said, "I have received your letter and have kept it." The following Tuesday the aged suitor called, and on the Thursday after there was a wedding. It may be hoped that the union will prove a happy one. If so, both parties will probably wish they had made it earlier in life. That is always the feeling of those who late in life become united with Christ. They regret the opportunities they have lost of serving Him and the troubles they have borne alone, through which His presence would have supported them (Hosea 2 : 19, 20).

A Dangerous Derelict was Reported Last week by the captain of the steamer Caland. She was an abandoned lumber-laden bark, having her mizzen-mast still standing, and she was drifting in the great highway of transatlantic steamers. Calculations have been made of the probable effect on her course of the currents and of the winds, so as to locate as nearly as possible the position of the abandoned ship, and give warning to outgoing steamers. The reason is obvious. There is no one in command or controlling the movements of the derelict, and she may drift across the track of some other vessel, or run into another vessel and do serious damage and put lives in peril. It would be a good thing if some steamer took her in tow or blew her up. In the voyage of life much harm is done by human derelicts—men who drift along carelessly and heedlessly, not intending harm, but, being without God's guidance, going astray themselves and menacing the spiritual safety of others (Eccles. 9 : 18).

The Place Senator Anthony Occupied in the esteem of his fellow-citizens is demonstrated by a fact published since his death. The Journal of Providence, R. I., says: "It is a significant fact that when a Rhode Islander spoke of Henry B. Anthony, he called him 'the Governor.' It is a long time since Mr. Anthony was Governor. He was for many years, consecutively, Senator of the United States, but the Smithfield farmer and the yeoman of the South County thought of him as the Governor; that is to say, as one of the citizens of the State, near and dear to Rhode Island. There was the sense of the personal relation. 'The Governor' was always accessible. He was always one of us." This fact shows that the personal relation always affects us most closely. Senator Anthony, sitting in the United States Senate, occupied a more honorable position and wielded a wider influence than as Governor of the State, but the Governorship involved an identification with the people that endeared him to them. It is in the same way that Jesus as the Son of man, the Saviour, lives in the hearts of His people. As the Great Teacher, as the Creator, and the Judge He commands our reverence; but it is as our Elder Brother and Friend that we love Him (Heb. 4 : 15).

A Clergyman was Recognized by His Lameness some time ago. The Chronicle of Charlottesville, Va., says that when James L. Orr was Speaker of the House of Representatives he visited the Warm Springs of North Carolina, where Dr. William S. White was also staying. Dr. White was chaplain of the university at which the Speaker studied, but as they had not met in many years neither recognized the other, though sitting in the same room at the hotel. After a time Dr. White rose and walked across the room with the old-time limp in his gait. Mr. Orr immediately recognized him, and asked him if he were not the Chaplain at the University of Virginia at such a time, naming the year. The doctor replied that he was. "I was there," said Mr. Orr, "a student at the time, and I knew you by the peculiar limp of your step." "Well," said the doctor, a little severely, "it seems that my limping made a deeper impression on you than my preaching." "Ah, doctor," quickly replied Mr. Orr, "I deem it the highest compliment we can pay a clergyman to say he is known by his walk rather than by his conversation." Mr. Orr's reply showed his ready wit, but it also pointed a further application. The world is so censorious and so little disposed to forgiveness that a flaw in the spiritual walk is seized with avidity and remembered after many excellences are forgotten (Gal. 6 : 1, 2).

SIGHT FOR THOSE WHO SEE NOT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind."—JOHN 9. 39.

The Last Judgment Inevitable—An Assize Always Going on—The Gospel as a Separator—Christ's Mission—That those who See not Might See—An Anxious Friend—A Model Blind Man—Knew he was Blind—Wanted Sight—Very Obedient—Owned that he Saw Afterward—Defended his Enlightener—Wanted to Learn—How the Blind Come to See—No Conceit in Them—A Poor Thief—Sham Sinners—A Slave and his Owner—Christ Likes Blessing—Fear a Proper Motive.

THE great day of judgment is not as yet. God in infinite long-suffering waiteth to be gracious, giving men space wherein to repent, and to be reconciled to Him. Jesus has come into the world for judgment, but not for that last and eternally unchangeable judgment which awaits us all. That hour and that advent will arrive; we have the declaration of God's Word for it. Read Matthew 25. "When the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory: and before Him shall be gathered all nations: and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." There is no question as to this sure fact; even if many more centuries should pass away, the dread assize will be held in due season. "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness." He is full of tenderness and long-suffering, and therefore he tarries; but the vision will come, it will not tarry. Settle this in your minds, and live as in the presence of that august tribunal.

Though the Day of Judgment be not at this hour, yet our Lord Jesus is now carrying on a form of judgment in the world. "His fan is in His hand, and He will throughly purge His floor." He sits as a refiner separating ever and anon his silver from the dross. His cross has revealed the thoughts of many hearts, and everywhere His Gospel is acting as a discoverer, as a separator, and as a test by which men may judge themselves, if they will.

Our Lord's great design in coming into the world is the salvation of men. "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved;" but, in order to that salvation, it is necessary that men should know the truth about themselves, and should take up a truthful position before God; for God will not endure a lie, neither will He save men upon false grounds. He will deal with all His creatures according to truth; if He condemn them it will be because equity requires it, and if He save them it will be because He has found a way by which mercy and truth are met together.

So, then, everywhere throughout the world, wherever Christ comes—comes by His Gospel and the consequences of it—a JUDGMENT IS GOING ON.

Men are set before the judgment-seat of their Saviour: they are tested, tried, made manifest, and declared. Light no sooner comes into the world than it begins to judge the darkness. Scracely had it been known to be darkness if the light had not revealed the contrast. Where the Gospel comes, some hearts receive it at once, and are judged to be "honest and good ground;" men who are willing to accept the Gospel come to the light that their deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God. Other hearts at once hate the truth, for they are the children of darkness, and therefore "they love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." You see, then, how without its being the main intention of Christ's coming into the world, it yet becomes a secondary effect, and, so far, an incidental purpose of His coming, that His very appearance among the sons of men should judge them. In this glass they see their own countenances, and discover their spots; by this plummet-line they test their own uprightness, and see how far they lean toward evil.

Now, I want to take you immediately to the text, and I shall dwell upon two points of it if there should be time. If not, I shall keep to one only. The first is enough to begin with: Christ has come that may see. It is a very wonderful thing about the Gospel that it is meant for people who think themselves most unsuited for it, and most undeserving of it—it is a sight for those who see not. An anxious friend gave me the other day a description of himself which was enough to make a man stand aghast to hear it. With many sighs and tears, he described to me the condition of a man lost by nature and by practice, and unable to help himself in the least degree. When he had completed his story—I let him finish it, and touch it up with a few extra strokes of black—I took him by the hand, and said, "I am sure that you are one of those whom Christ came into the world to save. You have given me the most accurate description possible of one of God's elect when aroused to see his state by nature before the Most Holy God. You are one of those for whom the Gospel was intended." I spoke boldly, for I felt that I was only stating the truth.

Since Jesus Christ came into the world to open men's eyes, I know that He did not come to open the eyes of some of those around me, for they have bright eyes, which smile on me while I am now speaking, and seem to say—here!" I cast my eyes all round the place, and I see nothing for the great Opener-of-eyes to do till I pause at yonder pew, for there sits a blind man. There are one or two here to-night whose natural eyes have for many years been sealed in darkness; and I say of them, if Jesus Christ has come to open anybody's eyes, He has come to open the eyes of the blind. It must be so. Infirmity and disability are needful preparations for the receipt of the blessing of sight. Suppose I heard that Jesus had come to make lame men leap like a hart. Well, I should look round and say that He did not come for that young girl—she can skip like a gazelle, and run like a fawn; He did not come for that young man—I saw him on his bicycle just now, flying over the ground swiftly as a swallow skims the stream. Neither did the healer of the lame come for that strong brother over there, to whom a quick, long walk is quite a pleasure. But just now there limped down yonder aisle a lame man on his crutch. Did you not hear his heavy movement? Well, if Jesus Christ came to heal lameness, that is the kind of person that He had His eye upon.

Now, I want you to consider the blind man of whom we were reading in the narrative just now as a sort of the kind of blind man that Jesus Christ delights to look upon, and to whom He rejoices to give sight. This blind man knew that he was blind. He never had a doubt about that. He had never seen a ray of light, and yet he believed that he was blind—not quite so easy a matter as some of you may think, for I have met with thousands of blind men who laugh at the idea of sight because they have had no experience of it, and they refuse to believe more than they can understand or feel. This sightless beggar had to be told that there was such a thing as sight; but being so told he believed it, and all his after experience went to confirm the unhappy fact. Under a full persuasion that it was even so he had taken up the proper position for a poor, blind man; he sat by the wayside, and asked for alms. Now, the man whom Christ delights to bless is the man who knows his right place, and is willing to occupy it. He does not conceal his blindness, and talk as if he carried a telescope about with him, and communed all night with the stars.

Many of you unconverted people are a deal too high; you will have to come down a good many notches before you will be in your true places. You dream fine dreams in your fond conceit of yourselves, fancying that you have kept the law from your youth up, and that you are abundantly religious, and excellent, and admirable, and all that you ought to be. As long as you think thus highly of yourselves, the blessing is hindered and kept away. You self-exalting ones are not of the kind that Jesus came to bless. He said Himself, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

This blind man not only believed that he was blind and knew it, but he had a sincere desire to be enlightened. It was no grief to him that Jesus had come that he might see. It was an intense joy to hear that Jesus had opened the eyes of other blind men; and, though He may have feared that his case was one quite out of the catalogue—for since the world began it was not heard that any man had opened the eyes of one that was born blind—yet he was pleased to find that and looked upon him, and was placing clay upon his eyes. He felt a gladness and an alacrity about his heart when he was bidden to go to Siloam and wash; his whole manhood went with the Saviour's act and deed; he gave himself up to the surgery of the Christ with the full consent of his being.

Now, are you hungering after Christ? Oh, soul, if you know your need of Him, and have a strong desire after Him, the heavenly work is begun! If there is within your spirit a burning longing to be reconciled to God by the death of His Son, your cure is already half wrought. Some of you have written me letters lately which show the actings of your hearts; these are blind movements enough, but they all grope after light. Poor souls that you are, what hope I have for you! Specially for him who with broken heart has begged our prayers these many months, and yet has not come out to light and liberty. I am so glad to see the strength, and vehemence, and agony of your desires. Your unbelief grieves me, but your eagerness charms me. Would God you would trust my Lord Jesus Christ and rest in Him!

This man is again, a model to every other blind man because

HE WAS VERY OBEDIENT.

As soon as the Lord said to him, "Go, wash," he went. There was no question with him about Siloam; he had no Abana or Pharpar which he preferred to that pool. He was fully submissive. He stood still, you know, and let the Master put the clay on his eyes. It did not look like an operation that could do him any good, but he believed that Jesus was a prophet, and so he waited, and let Him do whatever He pleased with him. How glad I am when I can see a poor soul offering a full surrender to Jesus. Oh be submissive to the saving hand! When thou art brought into such a state of heart that thou art willing to be anything or nothing so that thou mayest be saved, dear soul, thou art nigh unto the kingdom. The Spirit of God is at work with thee. Thou art very near to Christ. Believe on Him, trust in Him; and live, for He has come on purpose that they that see not might see. Catch at that sacred purpose of amazing grace, and let thy despair fly away. This is our first remark; this blind man becomes our model.

And now notice next, that,

this kind of man owns that he does see. He has been so thoroughly convinced of his blindness that, when he gets his sight, he owns it with glad surprise. To him the newly-given light is such a boon that he is overjoyed with it, and gladly cries, "Now I see." Some people do not know whether they are converted or not. I hope that they are saved, but such people are not generally of very much use. We have to spend our time and strength in taking care of them, and comforting them, and enabling them to rise above sheer despair. But the man that has been totally blind, and has known it, when he gets sight is equally sure that he sees. You cannot make such a man doubt the greatness and truthfulness of the change. He comes out and says, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

Again, when the blind man's eyes were opened, he began to defend the man that opened his eyes. He did it well, too. He said, "Herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence He is, and yet He hath opened mine eyes." On he went with arguments which confounded scribe and Pharisee. When the Lord takes a big blind sinner, and washes him, and opens his eyes, then the man will not have Christ spoken against. He will speak up for his Lord and Master; he cannot help it. You will not find him dumb, as some professors are. Why, some of your genteel Christians do not speak for Christ above once in six months, and then it would be better for them to have held their tongues, for they speak so half-heartedly. Here is a man with an open mouth, and he speaks right from his heart under the guidance of the Spirit of God, and is not ashamed to own what the Lord has done for him. We want many recruits of this sort. The church at the present day wants men and women who are so thoroughly and certainly converted that, when they speak about Christ, they speak positively, and with a power which none can gainsay or resist.

The best thing about this man was that, when his eyes were opened, he and when Jesus Christ spoke to him, saying, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" he asked, "Who is He, Lord, that I might believe on Him?" When he found that the Son of God was the self-same divine One who had opened his eyes, then we read that at once he worshipped Him. Notice that at the end of the thirty-eighth verse: "And he worshipped Him." He was no Unitarian. In the man who spake with him he saw the Son of God, and he reverently adored Him. If our Lord Jesus had not been God, He would have told the man to rise, and He would have rent his garments in horror at the bare idea of receiving divine worship; instead of which, our Lord instanced this as a proof that the man's eyes were opened, and immediately said that he had come for that very purpose—that those that did not see might see.

Thus I have shown you how this model blind man is the very man to whom the Lord Jesus will give sight, because the results that follow are glorifying to Christ. Are you such a person? Then, be comforted.

But how is it that such blind men do come clearly to see? The reason is sovereign grace, but still there are other reasons. First, there is no conceit in them to hinder Christ. It is not our littleness that hinders Christ; but our bigness. It is not our weakness that hinders Christ; it is our strength. It is not our darkness that hinders Christ; it is our supposed light that holds back His hand. It is easier to save us from our sins than from our righteousness. Our self-righteousness is that hideous boa-constrictor which seems to coil itself round and round our spirit, and to crush out of us all the life that would receive the Gospel of the grace of God. He that thinks that he knows will never learn. He that is blind and thinks that he sees will remain contented in the darkness all his life long. Now, dear friends, if you are in that state that you know that you are in the dark—a darkness that may be felt—if it seems horribly to cling to you, so that you cannot get rid of it, if you seem unable even to obtain a ray of light, then you are just in the right state to receive the eternal light from the Lord Jesus Christ.

The next reason is that such people as this always refuse to speculate. They want certainties. When a man feels his own blindness and spiritual death, if you discuss before him the fine new nothings of modern theology, he says, "I do not want them; they are of no consequence to me; there is no comfort in them for a lost soul."

A POOR THIEF

was converted some little time ago, and he was taken to hear a certain preacher who is exceedingly broad in his views. When the reclaimed thief came out, he said to a friend that took him, "If what that man said was true, it would be a fine thing for me, for I could have my full swing, and yet get off easy; but I know that it is a lie, and therefore I do not want to have anything more to do with him or his doctrine. A sinner like me deserves to be damned forever, and it is no use for anybody to tell me the contrary; therefore I want a Christ that can save me from eternal damnation. If this man's Christ only saves men from the little bit of damnation that he has preached, He is no good to me." That was a very sensible observation.

We have a lot of sham sinners about, and we have a number of ministers who preach a sham saviour, and a sham salvation; and the sham sinners like to have it so. But if Christ once deals with you—pulls you down to the last course, and digs your foundations up, then you will want a Christ that will begin with you upon no terms but those of free grace, and you will want a power that will work the whole miracle of salvation for you from beginning to end.

Again, people who are thoroughly blind are the kind of people that are glad to lean on God. A man that can see a little does not want to borrow guidance from without. He says, "No, no! I do not want it." Take a homely illustration from myself; I used to be very backward in using spectacles for some time, because I could almost see without them, and I did not wish to be an old gentleman too soon. But now that I cannot read my notes at all without wearing spectacles, I put them on without a moment's hesitation, and I do not care whether you think me old or not. So when a man come to feel thoroughly guilty, he does not mind depending upon God. If you sinners think that you can do a little without God, or can do with just a little help from God, why then you will keep away from the Lord Jesus. But when you come to this, "I must perish if Christ is not everything to me;" why, then you will have Him, for He never refused a soul that came to Him in that style.

You may have heard the story of

who were both under conviction of sin at the same time. Almost the next evening the negro found joy and peace through believing, but his master was months under conviction. So he said to the negro one day, "Sam, you know we were both pricked to the heart at that meeting, and here are you rejoicing in Christ, and I am still doubting and despairing. What can be the reason of it?" The negro said, "Why, you see, massa, Jesus Christ come along, and bring a fine robe of glorious righteousness, and say to Sambo, 'Here is a robe for you!' I look at myself, and see Sam all rags from head to foot, and I take the robe, and puts it on directly; so glad to have it. Jesus say same thing to massa, but massa say, 'My coat is very respectable. I think I can make it last a little longer. Massa patch up the hole in the elbow, and mend the skirt a little, and he go on with it. Massa's coat too good. If his coat were all in rags, like Sam's, he would not wait, but he would this very day take the glorious robe of righteousness." That is the whole truth of the matter. Some of you are not poor enough to be made rich by Christ.

A man said to me the other day, "Sir, I despair of myself." "Give me your hand," I said; "you are on the right road; but I want you to go a little further. I want you to feel that you are too great a fool even to despair of yourself." When you cry, "I cannot feel my own folly as I should," then I think your folly will be ended. I like to hear a man cry, "I feel unhappy because I cannot feel. I am grieved to think that I cannot grieve. I am in an agony because I cannot get into an agony." You are getting right, my brother. You are the sort of man that God will bless. Now, look away from yourself, agony and all, and just trust in Jesus Christ, who is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him. Own your blindness, and you shall find the light come streaming into your eyes. Because you are content and willing to lean wholly upon God, the Lord will guide you into peace and joy. What a mercy it is when we are brought to our last resort, and are compelled to hide in Jesus because we have no other shelter!

"'Tis perfect poverty alone
That sets the soul at large;
While we can call one mite our own,
We get no full discharge.

"But let our debts be what they may,
However great or small,
As soon as we have naught to pay
Our Lord forgives us all."

Once more, our Lord Jesus Christ does delight to work in those who are thoroughly blind in order to give them sight; it is high pleasure, His royal recreation. I know that a true man is never so glad as when he has helped those who want help. My Lord Jesus Christ rejoices to work among such as you are.

the truly necessitous. What a joy there is in that great heart of His when He can save souls on the borders of hell—when He can stretch out His hand and snatch them like brands from the fire. He knows that you will love Him as much as that woman did who had much forgiven, and therefore stood and washed His feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. He takes delight in you that cannot take any delight in yourselves. To you that are dried up and barren He will bring living water. He will open rivers in high places for the thirsty ones, and fountains in the midst of the desert for them that faint.

One said to me this week, "I am afraid to come to God, for I believe that I am only driven to Him by the mean motive of fear." "Ah," I replied, "it was the devil who told you that; because in the eleventh of Hebrews, among the first of the great heroes of faith we read that Noah, being moved with fear, built an ark for the saving of his house." Fear is not a mean motive; it is for a guilty man to feel. Where else can such poor sinners as we are begin, except with selfish fear? Do not judge yourself about that; the prodigal went home because he was hungry, yet his father did not refuse him admittance. As to its being mean to fear, it would be meaner still to defy your God. You ought not to say, "It is too mean a motive." Why, what but a mean motive can be expected from such a mean wretch as you are?

A boy has been rebelling against his father, and he has left his home in high passion, swearing that he will never go back. His father sends him a letter, and says, "Return, everything is forgiven; only confess your fault, and I will restore you to the family, and treat you as lovingly as ever." The boy reads this letter, and he says, "It is very kind of my father; I think I will go home;" but a wicked companion says, "Then you are going to eat humble-pie. It will be very mean of you after all you have said about fighting this matter through. Are you going to knuckle under to your father?" Why, it is the very devil tempting the boy, is it not? And so it was the devil who whispered to my friend that it would be mean to turn to the Lord through fear. Fear is a blessed thing; "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom;" and even slavish fear of God is a great deal better thing than presumption.

Oh, you poor blind one, look to Christ, and live! I was about to say, "Ye dead ones, come;" and I do say it, for God saith it—"Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." "What is the use of talking thus to dead people?" says one. My dear friends, I do not suppose that it would be of any use for you to do so, because, you see, you were never sent on such an errand; but I am as much sent to preach to the dry bones to-night as Ezekiel was when he stood in the valley and said, "Ye dry bones, hear the Word of the Lord." In the name of the eternal God, I say, "Ye guilty sinners, fly to Christ, and live." Come along with you, you who are the very worst in your own esteem—you who are all but in hell. The Lord saith, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God, and there is none else." He will not cast you away, but he will receive you now. God grant that you may come, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MISS LAURIE McLATCHIE,

Our Scottish Visitor.

As was stated in these columns last week, the gifted lady evangelist whose portrait appears on the next page is now visiting this country. As she will doubtless speak in many of our chief cities during her stay, our readers will be glad to know something about a lady whose talents and devotion have won for her a brilliant reputation on the other side the Atlantic. During the past ten years the ties have been drawn far closer which unite us with those who in Europe are engaged successfully in Christian work. They are a part of the same army to which we belong. We have one King, and our hearts beat with theirs in unison, moved by the same Holy Spirit. Though the Atlantic stretches between us, they are our brethren and sisters, and the time is coming when we with them will be gathered in our Father's house.

Those who can read in the face the index of character will be prepared, from the portrait of Miss McLatchie, to learn that she has, joined with brilliant mental gifts, deep spirituality, and that she possesses the power of moving and swaying large audiences to a degree seldom witnessed under a female speaker. This God-given power she has been led to consecrate to Him who gave it, and that He has accepted and used the offering laid upon His altar there is abundant evidence in the record of her work. She has devoted herself wholly to God's work, and caring nothing for the admiration and homage of worldly society, which her beauty and grace would have commanded, had she chosen to go into circles where those gifts always secure a high place for their possessor, she has counted herself well repaid by the honor of winning souls for her Master.

Laurie McLatchie was born in the pretty mountain village of Penpont, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, amid the hallowing and elevating influences of a pious home, her parents being conspicuous, even among their Christian neighbors, for their deep attachment to the service of Christ, and their exhibition of those winning graces which constitute the potent charm of His most devoted followers. Her parents' prayers for the salvation of her soul in early years were answered. They were enabled by God's blessing to see that when barely emerged from childhood their daughter had given her heart to Christ.

It was not long before her rare gifts were recognized by Christian people around her, even though the department of usefulness which she had selected as her special field of effort was a very humble and unobstrusive one. It was in 1874, while she was engaged at Glasgow in conducting classes for the culture of young people in Biblical truth, visiting the poor, and addressing mothers' meetings, without a thought of any more exalted sphere, that she received a special and pressing in the Congregational Church at Greenock. Regarding the summons as an unmistakable intimation of the divine will, she accepted it, and during the month of January, 1875, delivered a series of eloquent and effective evangelistic addresses to a large congregation, upon which God caused His benediction abundantly to rest, many souls being savingly impressed and added to the Church of God.

With that sagacity in recognizing whatever is intrinsically excellent and practically useful, which characterizes the Scotch people, Miss McLatchie was at once singled out to render more distinguished service in a larger arena, and before immense masses of people. She was invited to preach to that large class of the Glasgow population who do not attend church. She accepted, and from September, 1875, to April, 1876, she preached nearly every Sunday evening in the City Hall, Glasgow, to very large and deeply-interested audiences, the Gospel message being delivered in manifest demonstration of the Spirit and in power.

So brilliant was the success achieved, and so manifold and beneficial the results of her ministry, that without courting an extended publicity, the evangelist's fame spread far and wide, and there was an eager competition among numerous applicants for her services. As a consequence of these invitations, Miss McLatchie visited many towns in England and Scotland. She attracted immense assemblages in various English towns, including Walsall, Frodsham, Middlesbrough, Portsmouth, West Bromwich, Birmingham, etc., and it was no infrequent sight to witness capacious edifices crowded to their utmost limit fully an hour before the time announced for commencing the service.

HER INCREASING POPULARITY.

The continuous strain, however, upon Miss McLatchie's strength—not only in the delivery of her addresses with elocutionary skill and dramatic fervor, but also, and chiefly, in the conscientious and prolonged mental preparation which invested her efforts with their enduring qualities and secured for them universal appreciation and success—occasioned a temporary illness and a six months' rest; but in August, 1877, she once more resumed her work for Christ and souls, by a series of evangelistic efforts in Hengler's Circus, Liverpool. Since then she has conducted an evangelistic campaign in the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. There the local journals say her meetings moved the whole community as it had never been moved before. Converts by the thousand testified that her lectures, sermons, and Bible-readings had been used by the Holy Spirit to their conversion.

In the estimation of persons well qualified to form an intelligent and trustworthy opinion, Miss McLatchie is the peer of the late Mrs. Clara Lucas Balfour in power of felicitous illustration, and is undoubtedly her superior in pathos. While the body of her discourses and lectures is invariably arranged with a logical precision springing from intuition rather than from art, and studded with literary gems of a superlative order, her perorations are most glowing, and sometimes overwhelming in their cumulative grandeur. But, better than all, her prayerful and brilliant ministry has resulted in the conversion of hundreds of immortal souls to Christ. We sincerely hope that her sphere of usefulness in America will be a wide one, and will be abundantly blessed. Letters for her may be sent to the office of The Christian Herald, and we will forward them to her.

Among poor houses, small stores where groceries in the smallest quantities were retailed, and dry-goods of the very cheapest kind might be bought, a new paper store was opened. The stock was composed of half-dime novels, boys' story-papers, collections of popular songs printed on single sheets, and the poorest and commonest kind of literature of all sorts. There was a little stationery, too; a sheet of note-paper, an envelope, and a pen could be bought for two cents, and small bottles of ink, containing a good-sized thimbleful of the liquid, were sold for a cent each. Everything indicated that the customers expected were people who had very little to spend.

Barley was the name of the proprietor of the new store, but Barley himself had very little to do with it. Sam Barley was generally to be found at the corner grocery, which he visited the first day his store was opened, and which he continued to visit regularly thereafter. He was a decided acquisition to the company there, for he could sing a good song, though his voice was getting a little cracked and husky; he could tell a good story, and was always ready with some witty repartee. "A real smart man," was the verdict of the customers at the grocery on Sam Barley's character. It soon became known that Barley belonged to "a high family." He imparted the information freely after drinking a glass or two, when he would dwell on his wrongs, and rail at the ingratitude and baseness of his wealthy relatives and friends and the world generally in good, set terms.

"I have not always been what you see me now, neighbor," he would say. "I was a manufacturer once, employed a hundred men, and drove my own carriage. I have helped many a poor fellow in my time over his difficulties, and many's the cheque I've written that's saved a man from bankruptcy; but Sam Barley's nobody now. The men I helped would pass me in the street now. This is an ungrateful world, sir, a wicked, ungrateful world." Then Sam Barley would produce a handkerchief and wipe away a tear. After another glass or two that stage would be passed, and the old fellow would declare that it did not matter "so long as we are happy."

In the main, Sam Barley's autobiographical statements were correct. He had once been prosperous, and generous to a fault. But he was indolent and shiftless, as he always had been. His business simply slipped through his fingers and came to nothing, because he did not look after it, but spent his time in pleasure and convivial society. In his poverty it was impossible to help him, except by supporting him altogether. His friends thought they did enough when they gave him their left-off clothes and sent him a little money occasionally, which he conscientiously spent on himself.

The little paper store, however, was kept open, though Sam Barley affected to despise it, and never attended to it. He had a wife and six children, and how they lived no one knew but themselves. One of the boys ran on errands for a storekeeper a few blocks away; another was a telegraph messenger, and all were earning a little, which, with the small profit from the store, managed to keep bread in the house; but it was seldom that there was much more than that in the larder. It was a dreary, anxious life that the poor mother and her elder children led, and it was not relieved by the father, who did nothing when he was home but repine over his privations. It was only among the loafers at the bar that he could be cheerful.

One day a clergyman called at the little paper store to invite the family to his church. He was a conscientious man, who, hearing that they went nowhere on Sundays, was anxious about their eternal welfare. Sam Barley was at home, and talked freely with the minister, giving him full particulars of his past grandeur. The clergyman's heart was touched, and seeing that the man was well educated, promised to get him employment if possible. The next day Barley went to the grocery as usual for his morning nip, and having lighted his pipe, was wandering listlessly homeward when a bright boy ran across the street, and, raising his cap respectfully, asked him if he were Mr. Barley. Sam replied, and the boy said, "I am Mr. Carlton's son, the clergyman who called on you yesterday My father told me to give you this (handing a paper). I've been to your house, and they told me I should meet you. Will you please go to that address?"

Sam Barley looked at it, and saw the name of a large business firm, whose office was a few blocks away. He promised to go, and, expecting that he would receive some charitable gift, hurried away at once. Arrived there he found that there was no gift for him, and was disappointed.

"Mr. Carlton tells us," said the principal, "that you want work." Sam assented, though in his heart he was conscious that work was about the last thing he did want, and the principal continued: "I should like to oblige Mr. Carlton, who is one of my dearest friends, and I shall be glad to help you if you will let me. We shall soon find what you can do best; but at first you can copy these entries from the waste-book to the journal, and after a time we can perhaps find you something that will pay better."

Sam Barley Receives a Momentous Message.

Barley was not very grateful, for he had grown to love his idle, easy life; but he accepted, and set to work.

It was a weary task to mould that boneless, pulpy old man into anything better than the lazy, good-for-nothing fellow that he was; but the good men who had undertaken it were men who had faith in the power of God, and were not easily discouraged. The firm who employed him were kind and forbearing, and the clergyman visited the family regularly and spoke cheering words to them all. After a time Barley was persuaded to attend a temperance meeting, and induced to sign the pledge. Then for the first time there seemed hope of him. The struggle to keep away from his old haunt called out all the sleeping strength there was in his character, and gradually he lost the dull, listless look he used to wear. His employers noted the improvement, and encouraged him by advancing his wages and putting more confidence in him. Then he made his appearance at church with his wife and children, and paid close attention to the service. It was evident that a change of character was in progress.

Years passed by, and the little paper store had changed hands. Sam Barley had a neat little cottage on the outskirts of the city. His wife was no longer the weary, anxious drudge she used to be, and Sam Barley was earning enough to keep home comfortable. He looked ten years younger than he was, and was more active and energetic than in his best days. "I owe it all to you, sir," he said once to Mr. Carlton, "that day when your boy came to me in the street I was about as hopeless material as there was in all this city, but you have made a man of me. How came you to try your hand on me?"

"I should have been hopeless of accomplishing anything," Mr. Carlton said, "if I had followed my own opinions; but I learned long ago that the grace of God is not limited by circumstances. It can transform cases worse than yours. With faith in God I never despair of any one."

"Well, sir, I am bound to have the same faith myself, for I knew more of my own nature than any one else, and I never believed it possible for me to be anything better. I am changed by a miracle; it is nothing less."

"Those are the miracles the Saviour loves to work, Mr. Barley."

"Yes, sir, it is just like Him. If He had not loved me so as to send you to look after me I should have died a drunkard's death, and have been buried without hope for eternity. I cannot expect to live long, but I shall praise the Lord all the rest of my life for His undeserved mercy."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Disclosure.

THE sinful wife, living by stealth so near the man she had wronged, feeling in all its bitterness the ignominy of her lot, appealed to the clergyman's pity. Carl looked down on Rose's pale face much as his divine Master once looked at a woman who had similarly sinned and suffered. For her sin he had the deepest loathing and detestation. He had seen its consequences in the shadow on the home her misconduct had blighted, on the good Christian man who had fallen under the shock and the shame she had brought upon his name, and who had passed into a region of spiritual darkness more bitter to him than death. Then, too, how Hester had suffered! Her child life had been spent in gloom; she was prematurely aged by the sin of her stepmother and the withering effect it had had on all her surroundings. As Carl thought that the woman before him had inflicted misery on the one he loved, it was hard not to feel resentment; but the example of Christ was before him, and while he hated the sin, he had for the sinner all the pity and compassion that a Christian feels for one of Satan's victims.

"Do you know who I am?" asked Rose, looking him searchingly in the face with her dim blue eyes.

"Hester has trusted me with all your history," he answered. "I am come to see you, and I shall come often, to make your life here less solitary. No one else knows; we alone have your secret."

"I am only afraid of two persons finding it out too soon," replied Rose, drearily — "my husband, and one other —you know who I mean. He was trying to find me, and I felt as if I could do nothing else but come here. Do you think he will ever guess that I am here?"

"Never!" replied Carl, emphatically.

"Hester tells me he has never married," said Rose, a glimmer of satisfaction dawning upon her face. "I am sorry for that. If he had a wife he would not be troubled about me. But even if he did not try to find me, I could not go away from here. I cannot tell you what it is to think of leaving my home again; it is the only home I have, and Hester has promised I shall stay in it. It is more lonely than you think; I am here, day and night, all alone, yet I would not go away for the world. I know my husband will forgive me some time, and be very sorry for me. I have often wished for some clergyman to talk to, for there are hundreds and thousands of questions keep coming into my poor head. I am not very clever, but, perhaps, you will answer some of these questions. Only you are a very young man, and you do not know much of life yet."

"Perhaps not," answered Carl gently; "but I know something of God."

Rose looked again steadily into his face, which wore an air of grave yet tender reverence even for her, a lost and wretched woman. Her heart was sick for some communion with one who had authority to speak of God; that heart sickness, that craving for knowledge wherewith to quiet an accusing conscience, which forms the secret strength of the priesthood in every age. The sinner dare not go to an offended God, but would rather send some one to act as a mediator. It is only when the sense of God's fatherhood, His infinite, inexhaustible compassion, enters the heart that the repenting prodigal says, "I will arise and go unto my Father." Rose had not arrived at that blessed stage yet, and Carl, with his noble and thoughtful face, and his keen eyes bent with unspoken compassion upon her, seemed like a messenger come from God to her.

"I think I could speak better to you alone," said Rose.

Hester left them at once, and Carl, taking the only other chair which was in the little room, seated himself opposite Rose. She did not seem in any hurry to begin the conversation with him, but sat playing listlessly with her work which lay upon her lap; and he waited patiently for her to ask him some of the questions which troubled her.

"I have something to tell you that I dare not tell Hester," she said at last, her head drooping and her cheeks flushing a little; "she is like an angel almost, as innocent and ignorant. Sometimes I wish she was more like other girls; but she has always been quite alone, and grown up very strange. Oh! she is strange, is Hetty. I suppose I have done something toward it. Are you a friend of hers?"

"To be sure I am," answered Carl, smiling to himself; for she was not looking toward him, but gazing into the fire before her.

"Then perhaps you will know why I feel a very, very long way off from her," she said, wistfully; "I love her more than I can tell, but she is as far away as if she were one of the stars. I can talk to you better than to her. I am afraid to tell her all my secret; yet why I do not know. Why should I be afraid of little Hetty?"

Carl looked again at her with a glance of profound sorrow. He could have told her that it was her own sense of sin and shame which raised the barrier between her and Hester, but he did not. She seemed to catch his meaning from his silence; for she bowed her head, and burst into an agony of weeping.

"Oh! I know, I know," she sobbed, when she had ceased to weep; "but how can I come before God? How can I help being horribly afraid of Him?"

"Because God knows all your life," answered Carl tenderly; "and because His perfect holiness is consistent with perfect mercy. We can only know in part, and forgive in part; but He has that complete knowledge of you, that you can have no thought hidden from Him. Therefore you can go to Him speechlessly; you need not draw back from Him, as you do from Hester."

"Do you think my husband will ever forgive me?" she asked.

"Only in part," said Carl, with deeper tenderness; "you must not hope for more. In this as in everything else, man can only copy God very imperfectly. He will forgive you, it may be, in the hour of his death, or yours; but not before. There is a reproach and dishonor which cannot be wiped away."

"But what is to become of me?" cried Rose, wringing her hands in a paroxysm of grief and despair; "how am I to lead this horrible life? It would be better for me to die; a hundred times better. Oh! you don't know what it is."

"Is it much happier for Hester or your husband?" asked Carl, reproachfully; "and in this matter they have been guilty of no sin."

"No," she exclaimed, turning quickly upon him; "and why does God let them suffer for my folly? Why did not God strike me dead, before I brought all this evil upon them? They have done no wrong, yet they are as miserable as I am."

"I spoke rashly," he said; "they are far happier than you. Hester at least is not unhappy in herself. There is no anguish like the memory of sin."

"That is true," she moaned; "I could bear anything better than that. I remember the time when I did not think myself a sinner. I remember telling Miss Waldron I kept all God's commandments. I was a poor, silly thing then; I know better now."

There was a painfully pathetic mournfulness in this confession, which Rose made in an abstracted and dreamy tone, as if she had lost herself in the recollection of those innocent days.

Carl did not break in upon her thoughts; and the silence prolonged itself for several minutes.

"Do you know I have not quite made up my mind about telling you my secret," she said, when she roused herself to the consciousness of his presence, "I am afraid you will tell Hester, and she will be farther off from me than ever. Do you think she will?"

"Tell me what it is," he answered, gently; "and if I think she will, I will keep it from her."

"Oh!" she said, shrinking and trembling, while her face burned—"I have never told anybody who knows my history. They believe that I am a widow; everybody believed it; and that my little girl is an orphan. I called her Hester because—ah! I scarcely know why—Hester was the name I loved best; and I fancied somehow that she would come home to live with the first Hester. But now I dare not tell her."

"Where is your little girl?" asked Carl in a quiet and soothing voice.

"She was born in France," she answered; "I left Falaise, and went on and on through the country, not caring much, till I came to a little country convent, where there was a hospital for the country people—for the old, and sick and children, something like the poor-houses here; but not quite the same, because the sisters were the nurses; and there my little child was born. They did not want to christen her Hester, but they did it at last, only they added Maria to it; Hester Maria; and they kept us there for six months. It was a very strange six months. I felt happier than I did before, and thought oftener of God, and of His Son, Jesus Christ. But I never told the sisters about myself; and after a while I knew I must do something to get my own living and the baby's. They found me a place as lady's maid, in a Catholic family, and I had to leave my baby at the convent, and go away to Paris. Then I changed into an English family; and after six years, I agreed to come back to England. I saw him, you know whom, once in Paris, but he did not see me, and I felt quite faint. If I'd fainted he would have known who it was. So I came back to England."

"And your little girl?" said Carl again.

"I had scarcely ever seen her," continued Rose's wailing voice, "but then I paid the good sisters for her board, and brought her back with me. She is a pretty little thing; but so quiet, so sage and still. She is like the sisters themselves; you would say she never played or laughed. I was obliged to put her into a school in London, and she could never have any holidays, for I had no home, and neither of us have a single friend in the world. She has never been away from that school for four years, and it is in a close street in London. She does not know what it is to love a father or mother like other children. Oh! why did not God strike me dead? And now her last half-year has not been paid, and they will be cruel to my poor little Hester. I know what many schools are. They won't send her out into the streets, but they will make a drudge, and a victim of her, to bear everybody's faults. Oh! I know how my little one is suffering; but if God would only let me die, I am sure my husband would let Hester have her to live with her. Don't you think he would? He is a good man."

She buried her face in her hands, and broke again into a passion of tears. Carl deliberated for some minutes before attempting to offer her any consolation; and then he laid his hand softly upon her arm.

"Take comfort," he said, "I have formed a plan for your little girl, your Hester. She shall be mine. I will adopt her as my own until Hester herself can take charge of her."

"What is it you said?" asked Rose, incredulously; and raising her tearful face to look at him.

"I will regard your little Hester as my own child," he answered; "I am rich enough for that. You need not trouble yourself any more about her. She shall be my charge."

"But you live here in Little Aston," she said, her face still clouded with incredulity and anxiety, "you cannot bring her here. I would rather she died, the poor little thing, than ever see her father. She believes her father is dead, and in heaven—in heaven! Oh! I could not bear that she should ever know different. No, no; you cannot take charge of my little Hester, living here."

"Has she been happy where she is?" asked Carl.

"Oh! as happy as a little creature can be at school," said Rose, "but not as happy as she was with the good sisters. She has been there four years, and she knows no other kind of life. Only if her bills are not paid, I know what sort of taunts she will have to bear, and that makes me suffer. I earn all the money I can by sewing, but I do not quite keep myself; and how can I get enough to pay for her? And she wants new frocks and other clothes, and shoes. What can I do? Whatever can I do?"

She dropped her face again helplessly upon her hands, while Carl deliberated once more.

There seemed nothing he could do, except engage to pay the expenses of the forlorn, deserted little child, in her dreary school-home in London. It was true that he could not bring her to Little Aston, as in the first moment he had thought of doing, where she could be placed under Annie's care. The secret was not his own; it belonged to the poor mother, who dreaded that the child should ever discover she had a father not in heaven. He did not even know whether it would be well to confide it to Hester; it would only add to her cares and difficulties. There was nothing to be done at present but to pay the debts already accumulated, and to leave the child at school, until he could see more plainly how he could make her life happier.

"I suppose we must leave her where she is," he said, as soon as he had come to this conclusion, "but if you will give me the address I will write to-night, and ask the mistress of the school to send her account to me. You shall see it, and tell me if it is correct, and then you need feel no further uneasiness. I came in order to see if I could give you any comfort, any help. I am very glad to do this."

He spoke in a tone of such heart-felt sympathy, that Rose could not doubt his sincerity. She flung herself on her knees before him, and when he would not suffer her to kiss his hands, she sank down on the ground, crouching at his feet. He raised her up, spoke a few kindly words to her, and then, seeing her, agitation and trouble to be very great, he concluded she would recover more easily if alone, so he left her, and groped his way across the dark court into John Morley's house.

He did not see Hester again alone, for it was teatime, and she was making tea for her father in his gloomy room, which, for this one hour of the day, put on a more home-like aspect than at any other. Carl sat down with them, and lost no movement or glance of Hester's, though his eyes were seldom turned directly to her. A strong current of happiness ran through his whole being. There was a mutual secret and a mutual sympathy between them which must draw them very closely together in the future. John Morley asked him some indifferent question with regard to the poor woman he had been to visit, and he answered at random, his thoughts being fixed upon Hester. A gleam of light, strangely sweet and sad, flashed across John Morley's gray face, as he looked up at hearing Carl's irrelevant answer, and saw him gazing at his daughter. There was no one else, thought the father, to whom he could so confidently confide her future.

John Morley though a Christian man was at this time in darkness. It was with him one of those "moments" when in "a little wrath" God hides His face from His children It was a heavy blow which had fallen on the Christian man. To lose the wife he loved, in a way so disgraceful was a crushing disaster to him, and then had followed the loss of business, which produced that most wearing of all troubles, financial embarrassment. He could not understand his position. It seemed to him that he was bearing his trials with resignation; in reality he was sullen under them and fiercely resentful. Had he taken them to God, laying them in prayer before Him, he would have found them lightened. As it was, his faith had failed him, and, looking forward to the time when he must die, he trembled for Hester left alone in poverty, and wondered what would become of her. Years ago he would have trusted her to God's care and have been at peace. Now he was nervously anxious to see some human hand pledged to provide for her. It was therefore a relief to him to notice Carl's unconcealed admiration of her.

The meal was concluded almost in silence. Each one of the little party was busy with individual thought, each mental world so different from the other, but each absorbing. It was over at last and Hester rose to go to her hidden stepmother, while John Morley accompanied Carl to chapel, where there was a meeting, and walking side by side with him, put his arm affectionately through his. A rare token of friendship from a man like him.

There were, however, rocks ahead in the hitherto smooth track of Carl's life-voyage. He had been sensitive enough to feel an immediate change in the atmosphere of Aston Court, and he had attributed it to his own confession to Miss Waldron. But there was also rankling in Mr. Waldron's mind the suspicion, introduced to it by his daughter, that Carl had dealt unfairly with regard to Hester and Robert. Without intention, he grew cool toward him, and Carl was not slow in withdrawing from his former familiar intimacy with his patron.

DAVID'S CHARGE TO SOLOMON.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 12, 1 Chron. 22 : 6-19. Golden Text, ver. 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Old Age—The Peaceful Evening of Life—His Admission to Solomon—Acknowledging Dependence—The Great Need of the Church—God's Dwelling a House of Rest—Christ the Man of Rest—Bearing His People's Distresses—The Authoritative Blessing—A Christian Worker's Acquiescence—David's Regal Preparations—Made in Faith—David's Final Word.

SOLOMON was anointed king when he was about sixteen years old. Two years later, David, his father, who still continued to live, "called for [him] . . . and charged him to build an house for the Lord God of Israel." There is something grand in the of David's last days. His confidence that goodness and mercy should follow him all the days of his life (Ps. 23 : 6), was not misplaced. He was probably nearly a hundred years old, his battles were all fought, and God had given him peace. He was a witness that God forgave all his sins, and healed all his diseases (Ps. 103 : 3), but the weakness of old age was upon him, and he was learning that in man is no provision of strength for soul or body; that the Lord is our Strength for both. He had learned that in him dwelt no good thing, and now in his old age he was practising the lesson which so many fast ripening souls learn—to take everything from God, and willingly let everything be taken out of his own hands. The government was placed in the hands of a lad, but David saw God really in charge. Now he was about to depute Solomon at about sixteen years of age, to carry out his darling purpose of building a temple to the Lord.

"David said to Solomon, my son, as for me, it was in my mind to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God : but the word of the Lord came to me." It was said in all simplicity but what a lesson for the young king. David, the man after God's own heart, the author of the most popular hymns, perhaps the most esteemed man of God on earth at the time, would not undertake without the distinct guidance of God about it. It is a painful fact that in our day many Christians are quite sceptical about the close dealings of God with man, which are the very life of other Christians. Alas, the great lack of the Church, as well as the world, is a present God : doctrines, churches, sects, Christian work, services, meetings are often substituted for face to face intercourse with God. God wants not our work only—for that is more His loving gift to us than anything by which we enrich Him—but ourselves. He wants us that He may live in us, express Himself through us, manifest Himself, and shew to a lost world what a loving Father, and what a perfect Saviour they are rejecting.

David told Solomon how the Lord would not permit him to build the temple because he had shed much blood ; but He had said, "Behold a son shall be born to thee, who shall be

A MAN OF REST."

In 1 Chron. 28, where David's charge to Solomon was repeated in a large public gathering of all the chief men of Israel, after Solomon's accession to the throne, David speaks of the future temple as "an house of rest" (ver. 2). A man of war such as David was could not build "an house of rest!" There is an "house of rest" which God desires, that is our bodies, a living sacrifice (Rom. 12 : 1). But while we are fighting our own battles or the Lord's battles, we are not providing Him "an house of rest." It is as we learn to let our David fight Satan, that we can yield ourselves to the Lord as His dwelling-place.

David and Solomon are both types of Christ, David a type of Christ the Captain of our Salvation, Solomon a type of Christ, the Man of rest, dwelling in our hearts by faith. "I will give him rest from all his enemies round about ; for his name shall be Solomon (peaceable), and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days." This is just like the reign of Jesus in our hearts ; He brings peace and quietness even in the midst of trial, because it is such a reality to transfer difficulties, perplexities, trials, as they arise, to Him. It is such a reality to let all the burden of them drop into His hands and know He has undertaken. Even when He lays a burden of the Lord upon us, and opens our eyes to some fearful revelation of sin, of unfaithfulness, of wrong either in ourselves, in others, in the Church of Christ, or in the world—it is such rest to come with it all and put it definitely into His hands,

ASKING AND RECEIVING

an answer of peace. David continued, "Now, my son, the Lord be with thee ; and prosper thou, and build the house of the Lord thy God, as He hath said of thee. Only the Lord give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, that thou mayest keep the law of the Lord thy God. Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments which the Lord charged Moses with concerning Israel : be strong, and of good courage ; dread not, nor be dismayed." These words were no mere wish on the part of David but

AN AUTHORITATIVE BLESSING.

He had God's Word for it that Solomon should build His house ; and, moreover, as the patriarch of his house, he was king and priest for his family, to "bless in the name of the Lord." Yet David did not forget Solomon's personal responsibility. "Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments." No process of human reasoning can ever strike the line which divides God's sovereignty from human responsibility. It is not meet that man should know it. But this we know, that all the resources of God are at our disposal if we fully yield ourselves up to God, and are at His disposal. Our great responsibility lies in our will ; if that is yielded to God, and continues subject through all circumstances, we may trust God to give us charge concerning all those circumstances.

David's preparation for the house of his God was very lovely : "Behold, in my trouble I have prepared for the house of the Lord." Had David been allowed full fling to the desires of his heart, it is very probable that he might have prepared very differently ; but kept in check as he was by God, all the preparation was according to God's mind. And thus it must ever be in our great life-work which is to become, and to lead others to become, "an habitation of God through the Spirit."

had it in her heart to continue work on the Continent of Europe, where God had considerably blessed her labors ; the mind of the Lord was made known to her that this was not His call, and grace was given to have no longer a will about the matter. At the same time certain places and certain people in Europe were laid on her heart as an intense burden, until the whole was trusted over to God. Then she was brought to complete rest of soul about it, as fully as though she saw the answer to her prayers. Already three fourths of those prayers are answered, although in a far different way from what she had imagined.

David's preparation was indeed kingly, "A hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver." Each talent of gold was worth $27,375. each talent of silver $937 ; thus the amount of precious metal was almost incalculable. Added to this "brass and iron without weight ; for it is in abundance ; timber also and stone have I prepared ; and thou mayest add thereto." Workmen also were hired ready. We know how, when we have a favorite scheme, nothing seems too much to give to it, but it needed a disciplined heart to give so lavishly to a work which the giver should not see carried out. David was called to walk by faith. If Christian workers had more patience with God, much greater things would be accomplished. So many of us have our eyes set on our own tiny scrap of work, and many are planning and plotting to get men and money for our work, while God has mightier purposes to accomplish than our poor little minds can take in.

on the day of Pentecost, swept three thousand souls within an hour or two into the kingdom of God, without any begging for money, without any working up of the instruments by man. We are very often hindering rather than setting forward the real progress of Christ's kingdom by the energy of the flesh, which we mistake for holy zeal. The Lord could easily dispense with us and carry on His work without us, we do not need, like Moses in Egypt to "look this way or that" (Ex. 2 : 12), but rather to look alone unto Jesus. If all of us learned to cease from ourselves, and to cease from man in every form, and stand aside out of God's way, waiting for His commands, then we should indeed "see the salvation of God."

David's final word to Solomon was, "Arise, and be doing, and the Lord be with thee." When Jesus, our David makes all ready to our hand, there is but one thing to do—to arise and be doing. "David also commanded all the princes of Israel to help Solomon his son, saying, Is not the Lord your God with you? and hath He not given you rest on every side? for He hath given the inhabitants of the land into mine hand ; and the land is and before His people. Now set your heart and your soul to seek the Lord your God." What is this? When enemies are conquered, when we have rest from them, when there is no conflict because the Lord has subdued them, is that the time to set our hearts to seek the Lord our God? Yes, the very time! The time to seek Him and find Him as an indwelling God, that the victory may not be transient but perpetual. The more we know of God the more He enlarges our capacity to know Him better. The more we receive of Him, the more room He makes in our being to receive Him more fully. "Arise, therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord God, to bring the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built to the name of the Lord."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A European Warning to England has been indirectly administered. The Khédive of Egypt, presumably acting under the advice of Lord Northbrook, the British High Commissioner, announced that for the present the payments on account of the principal of the Egyptian debt would be suspended. On September 25th the diplomatic representatives of Germany, Austria, France, and Russia called separately upon Nubar Pacha, the Egyptian Prime Minister, and presented an identical note to him, in which the Powers make a formal protest against the action of the Egyptian Government. The note states that the Powers reserve the legal rights of creditors, and declares the suspension of the sinking fund a flagrant breach of the law of liquidation. The note also asserts that the Powers will hold the Egyptian Government responsible for the consequences of its act of suspension. It also declares that the letter of the Egyptian Minister of Finance, giving notification of the suspension, is null and void. It is said that Baron de Courcel, the French Ambassador at Berlin, has informed Prime Minister Ferry that Germany, Austria, and Russia have decided to warn the Khédive of Egypt that the stability of his throne will be endangered if he continues to indorse England's financial acts. In that case the Powers might support the restoration of the ex-Khédive, Ismail Pacha, to the head of the Egyptian Government. The situation is regarded as critical. There appears to be no alternative for England but to recede from her position or contend against united Europe.

The Siege of Khartoum has been Raised. Full details of its collapse have not been published, but it is evident that General Gordon is no longer menaced by the Mahdi's troops. One rumor assigns disaffection as the cause of the Mahdi's withdrawal, but another states that he received information of the approach of the British army. The French Consul at Khartoum has telegraphed to Cairo that the siege of that city having been raised the country in the neighborhood of Khartoum is freed from rebels, and the obtaining of food supplies is comparatively easy. He also says that he is on the point of starting for Dongola with Colonels Stewart and Power. General Lord Wolseley has telegraphed to the War Office to stop forwarding troops to Egypt for the present. The Marquis of Hartington, Secretary of State for War, will hold a conference with the chief military authorities, and it is believed that the expedition for the relief of Khartoum will be reduced to a flying column, owing to the favorable news recently received from General Gordon.

There has been no Renewal of the Conflict between the French and Chinese, but a panic prevails among the foreign population in China, owing to the menacing attitude of the Chinese. There are fears that they will vent upon inoffensive merchants and missionaries their resentment against France. A telegram from Shanghai says: "The Chinese are beginning to refuse to discriminate between the French and other foreign residents, and the dislike grows daily. In the event of an outbreak the native Christians will be the first to suffer, and after them the foreigners." Russia has manifested a disposition to interfere actively in the quarrel in the interests of France. The Russian Consuls have been ordered to protect French interests wherever French Consuls leave. The Russian fleet in Chinese waters comprises one ironclad, three cruisers, two corvettes, and six gunboats. Three other ironclads are expected to arrive. This strength, in view of the smallness of Russian interests in China, is considered significant.

A Revolution is Threatened in Belgium. The Roman Catholic party in that country has long been endeavoring to gain absolute control of the public schools, but has until this year been defeated. In the present Parliament the priests have effected a coalition with the Radicals, and have thus obtained a majority over the moderate Liberals. They were able to pass the unpopular measure, and the indignation of the people being aroused they petitioned the king to veto the measure. The king, however, believed it his duty under the Constitution to sign the bill, which he did, and has by so doing incurred the enmity of the people. There were serious disturbances in the streets of the capital on September 23d, the anniversary of the revolution of 1830. The veterans, according to custom, marched through the streets of the city and deposited wreaths on the monument of the revolution. The populace seized the occasion to make a great demonstration against the government. Immense numbers lined the streets along which the procession passed and cheered the veterans enthusiastically. At the monument one of the veterans made a speech, in which he said: "Our ancestors fought to make Belgium free. She is no longer so. Belgians will never be Romanists." A dense crowd followed the procession as it returned from the monument, singing the "Brabançonne" and the "Marseillaise." Troops are being massed in the Capital to preserve order.

Another Encyclical Letter is to be Issued by the Pope. The following summary of its contents is cabled to the New York Herald by its correspondent in Rome: "The Encyclical denounces liberalism, but the Pope carefully explains that what is meant by 'liberalism' is that political system where the civil and socal elements rest exclusively upon human agency, having no connection whatever with the supernatural; in other words, the Holy Father means by 'liberalism' all systems where religion is not a prime factor in the practical politics of the State. The Encyclical, however, warmly defends the principles enunciated by Mgr. Dupanloup, Père Lacordaire, M. de Falloux, M. de Broglie, and M. de Montalembert from the attacks of overrigid Catholics, while it most vigorously denounces liberalism in Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland. The Encyclical is intended to draw together and consolidate Catholics all over the world." The specious arguments imputed to the Pope are, as is usual in Papal effusions, to be understood as advocating a government by priests, which has in all countries been disastrous to the people.

A Subscription to Place a Memorial Window to the Duke of Albany in Salisbury Cathedral has resulted in a significant failure at its first reception. The cost was estimated at $2250, but although strenuous efforts have been made to collect the money only $450 have been raised. As the late Duke was said to be the most popular member of the royal family, and as the mourning over his death in the press and on the public platform was somewhat ostentatious, this difficulty in raising so moderate a sum for a memorial of him is regarded as significant of the drift of public opinion on the subject of monarchical government.

THE ATONEMENT FOR SIN AND SICKNESS.

By Capt. R. KELSO CARTER, of Pa. Mil. Acad.

This book is the clearest, most comprehensive, and original work yet written to show that Jesus Christ is the same perfect and complete Saviour, for soul and body, that He was eighteen centuries ago. All objections to faith-healing are fully met, and every case in Scripture thoroughly examined: e. g., Paul, Trophimus, Hezekiah, Timothy, etc. Ever since his own wonderful healing, five years ago, the author has constantly studied this subject in every phase, and has been intimately associated with God's chosen workers. He unflinchingly believes that he has received special light in writing this book. Handsomely bound in cloth, 250 pp., $1. Send for full circular. Address the author, Chester, Pa.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND.—Our Lord Jesus said in His prayer, Thy Kingdom come. What is Thy Kingdom come? Answer: When the spirit of man, with the spirit (or Kingdom) of God, is put within the body of man, it is then the Kingdom of God; fulfilling Luke xvi., 21, the Kingdom (or spirit) of God is within you.—Eze., xxxvi., 27; I. Cor., vi., 19; Rom., viii., 11. And in this manner the immortality of the body is to take place. The new Heaven (spirit or Kingdom of God) entering the new earth (body of man), thus making the body immortal. That body cannot die.—Rev., xxi., 1-4; Isai., lxv., 17. At the fall, Adam was driven out of the garden (his body called garden), and thus Adam and Eve fell from an immortal state to a state of mortality. They had to die.—Gen., ii., 15-17; Gen., iii. 23. But before the body can be made immortal the blood has to be cleansed of that evil which it received at the fall.—Joel, iii., 21. Law and gospel has to be cepet.—Rev., xiv., 3; Isai., viii., 20 (not the law of burned offerings.—Heb., x., 5), and sin has to be taken away.—Rom., xi., 27. We live in time that the Lord will fulfil all this in His people Israel.—Ez., xxxiii, 11. Books (two kinds) containing this doctrine will be sent by mail for 12 cents each. KING CHRISTIAN IX. and QUEEN LOUISA of Denmark—Frederiksborg Castle.

KING CHRISTIAN IX. AND QUEEN LOUISA OF DENMARK.

Parentage — Accession to the Throne — The Schleswig-Holstein Difficulty — Queen Louisa and the Royal Family — The Territories of Denmark—Frederiksborg Castle.

THE general assembly of the Evangelical Alliance was held this year in Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark. As the American churches were ably represented there, some account of its proceedings will interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. With that narrative it is appropriate to give the portraits of the King and Queen of Denmark and a picture of their palace. Their majesties are exceedingly popular in their dominions, and they displayed their interest in the Alliance, and their sympathy with the noble objects it is formed to further, by attending some of the later meetings. It is generally understood that both the King and Queen are sincere Christians. There is no certain information accessible on that point, but the excellent qualities and virtuous, lovable characters of their children, notably of the lady who is the wife of the Prince of Wales, prove that both mother and father must have tried to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and afford presumptive evidence of their own piety.

King Christian IX., of Denmark, was born on April 8th, 1818. He was not the son of his predecessor on the throne. That monarch, King Frederic VII., had no children, and with him ended the Oldenburg line, which had reigned over Denmark since 1448, a period of 415 years. Before his death there was an international conference, which framed the instrument known as the Treaty of London of 1852, by which the succession to the Danish throne was settled on Prince Christian, who was married to a niece of a former King of Denmark. His father was the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein and his mother, Louisa Caroline, Landgravine of Hesse-Cassel. He lived in Copenhagen, and held office in the Danish army as Inspector-General and Commander of Cavalry.

King Frederic VII. died in 1863, and Prince Christian ascended the throne according to the arrangement under the treaty. His accession was the signal for the outbreak of a commotion on a matter which had been for centuries. A large part of Denmark consisted of the two duchies of Schleswig and Holstein. The inhabitants speak German, and a large portion of them disliked their connection with Denmark, and desired either independence or a place in the confederation of German States. In 1848 both Schleswig and Holstein tried to shake off the Danish yoke; but the Danish troops, after a few indecisive engagements, succeeded in suppressing the revolution, and the then King of Denmark agreed to give the duchies a constitution. The leader of the revolt, the Duke of Augustenborg, who was, like the King of Denmark, a descendant of the Oldenburg family, renounced for himself and his heirs all claim to the duchies, and received as compensation a sum of money and a free pardon.

On the accession of Christian IX. a son of the Duke of Augustenborg revived the claim his father had renounced. His claims were supported by Prussia and Austria. The new King would doubtless have peacefully relinquished the duchies when menaced by his two powerful neighbors, had he not been encouraged to resist by the English Government, and by the promises of assistance made to him by Earl Russell, who was at that time at the head of the English Foreign Department. Prussia and Austria sent an army into the duchies, and Denmark was deserted by England. The contest waged between Denmark, single-handed, against the combined forces of Prussia and Austria was soon ended, and the duchies were separated from Denmark. Since then the King has sought to develope the interior resources and popular institutions of his country.

Her Royal Highness,

QUEEN LOUISA,

Princess of Hesse-Cassel, whose portrait appears with that of her husband on the frontispiece, was born on the 7th of September, 1817, her father being Prince William of Hesse-Cassel, residing at Copenhagen, and her mother, the Princess Louisa Charlotte, sister to the late King Christian VIII., and aunt to the present King of Denmark. The King and his wife are, therefore, cousins on the mother's side.

Their Royal Highness were married at the Palace of Amalienborg, in Copenhagen, on May 26th, 1842, where they have since resided, and all their children were born there. They have issue their Royal Highnesses Prince Christian Frederick William Charles, born June 3d, 1843; Princess Alexandra, the wife of his Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, born December 1st, 1844; Prince Christian Adolphus, born December 24th, 1845, who is now King of Greece by the title of George I.; Princess Maria Dagmar, born November 26th, 1847, now wife of the Czar of Russia; Princess Thyra, born September 29th, 1853; and Prince Waldemar, born October 27th, 1858.

THE KINGDOM OF DENMARK

is the smallest of the Scandinavian States. It occupies an almost insular position between the North Sea and the Baltic. It comprises several islands, the principal of which are Zeeland, Fünen, and Lolland, also the peninsula of Jutland, the outlying island of Bornholm in the Baltic, and the Faroe Islands. Its territories are Greenland, Iceland, and the West Indian Islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John. Denmark itself, since it was pared down by the joint efforts of Prussia and Austria, contains only 15,218 square miles—about half the size of South Carolina—and its population in 1880 was 2,096,400, a little less than the population of Missouri. Nearly one half of the people live by agriculture. There are 968 miles of railway in the country, of which the government operates about 650.

The constitution of the country vests the legislative power in a parliament, called the Rigsdag, which consists of two Houses. Both of these are in part elective. The Lower House, called the Folkething, consists of 102 members, elected by universal suffrage for three years. The Upper House is called the Landsthing. It consists of 66 members, of whom 54 are elected by electoral districts for eight years. The other 12 are appointed for life by the King. Denmark has an established church—the Lutheran—but other denominations are tolerated. The country has an excellent educational system, which is compulsory on all citizens, and its results are shown in the general intelligence of the people.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE IN DENMARK.

The Object of the Alliance—The Bethesda Mission House—Introductory Meeting in the Hall of the Copenhagen University—The Blended Trophy—The Delegates—The Address of Welcome—Address of Dr. Hoge of Richmond, Va.

THE eighth general conference of the Evangelical Alliance opened on September 1st, in Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark. There were 2000 members enrolled, of whom 20 were from America, about 180 from England, 1200 from Denmark, 250 from Sweden, and 100 from France and Germany. The object of the Evangelical Alliance is to promote a spirit of Christian brotherhood among the members of Evangelical churches, so that they may, by recognizing their relationship to one common Head, and through that to one another, forget the shibboleths of sect, and work lovingly together for one common end. By bringing the principles of brotherhood constantly within the view of Evangelical Christians, the Alliance claims to have had some share in the "general sweetening of the Christian atmosphere" which its friends observe with satisfaction. There has been so much competition, so much sectional bitterness rife among the Christian churches for many years, that men have been apt to forget that they were brethren in Christ; in bringing them together and uniting them in common effort, the Evangelical Alliance has achieved results which would not fall within the province of any one church or society.

All the meetings of the conference were held in

BETHESDA MISSION HOUSE

(Missionhuset), a fine building which was erected about two years ago, and is still fresh and bright in appearance, both inside and out. The principal hall, accommodating 1500 persons, is particularly handsome. The walls are decorated in an ornate style. Of color and gold there is abundance. Behind each of the pulpits a picture, painted on the wall, shines in brilliant hues. One (with a background of gold) represents St. Christopher—the "Christ-bearer"—who is in the act of carrying the infant Saviour across the water, according to the ancient legend. On the other side of the pulpit is a painting of the Good Shepherd. Below each picture a curtain droops in graceful folds, but on close examination this proves to be a painting also—a clever imitation only of a curtain. A miniature figure of St. John the Baptist surmounts the pulpit canopy. Below is a reading-desk with the words emblazoned on the front—"Saeden er Guds ord:" i.e., "The Seed is the Word of God." For the chief members of the conference 300 seats were reserved near the platform, and nearer still were in readiness ten chairs, covered in crimson and gold, for members of the royal family.

THE INTRODUCTORY MEETING was held on Saturday evening, August 30th, in the hall of the Copenhagen University. Long before the hour of seven, the foreign delegates, and many ladies with them, streamed in at the chief entrance, passing through the vestibule, where fine statues of Apollo and Minerva appear in marble, and then, between the broad staircases, near which the walls are radiant with frescoes on classic subjects. The hall of the University is a palatial apartment, lofty, commodious, and filled, on ceiling and wall, down to the very floor, with the products of pictorial native art, with here and there a peculiar instance of the eccentricities of genius. The body of the hall was crowded with members of the Evangelical Alliance from every European country, and from America. The union they had met to commemorate and to strengthen was symbolized by the flags of their varying nationalities harmoniously which was multiplied fourfold in different parts of the hall. Those members who could not find room below viewed the interesting scene from the lofty gallery, which is within a few feet of the roof. The rostrum bore on its front an inscription in Greek, happily appropriate to the occasion. Translated, the words were, "One in spirit and in truth." In the course of the evening no fewer than sixteen speakers, English, Danish, French, German, Swedish, Swiss, and Dutch mounted the tribune. There was one disappointment, felt severely by the European admirers of royalty, but no reference was made to it by any of the speakers. The seats reserved for royalty were vacant, notwithstanding the announcements in the Danish newspapers that members of the royal family would be present at the reception. The Alliance, however, got along very well without the royal personages. It found, as nations have done which have tried the experiment, that the seats covered with crimson and gold, and set in the place of honor, may stand empty without any harm happening to those around.

AN AUGUST ASSEMBLAGE, in which were many men whose character, intellect, and culture command the homage of the world, were present, and more than compensated for the absence of kings, who, as a rule, are not strong in those matters. America sent, among other eminent representatives, Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D., of Richmond, Va., Dr. Wilbur

Watkins and Dr. John Hall, of New York; Dr. James Good, of Philadelphia; Professor Elliott, of Chicago, and the loquacious German, Rev. Philip Schaff. Canada was represented by Professor MacVickar, of Montreal. France sent as delegates Dr. E. de Pressensè, Pastor Theodore Monod, and Professor Jean Monod. England sent Mr. Fowler, who is Lord Mayor of London this year, Sir W. McArthur, Lord Radstock, the Marquis of Ailsa, Principal Cairns, Dr. Boyd, and a large number of other professors and preachers. Russia was represented by Dr. Dalton, of St. Petersburg. Germany sent Count Bernstorff, Dr. Koegel, and others. Other countries were also well represented.

THE "ADDRESS OF WELCOME," from Dr. Kalkar, an ardently devoted friend of the Alliance, was listened to with deep attention. Dr. Kalkar has labored hard to bring about this conference, in spite of his advanced years. Eighty-four years of age, he is, in the best sense, a "grand old man." In the course of his speech, delivered with spiritual fervency and affectionate sympathy, the Rev. Dr. Kalkar said: "The Christian world has often been witness of great assemblies, but none recorded in national or ecclesiastical history could compare with that little community at Pentecost, who met with one accord in one place, and on whom the Spirit of God descended. This was the first awakening of the Church into life. Thank God, the echoes of the first Pentecostal miracle still resound in the Church of Christ.

"It is the hope of all true Christians that such days might arrive when the faithful would come in vast crowds from every country, and with one heart and one voice glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was this longing for union among evangelical Christians of all denominations and all nationalities which called into existence the Evangelical Alliance. On behalf of the Danish Committee, and of those whom the Committee represented, I welcome most heartily the excellent friends of that society who have come to the Copenhagen Conference. Looking upon this numerous assembly, I cannot but exclaim, 'God be praised! That which unites is much greater and much stronger than that which separates us.'"

A long line of delegates, representatives of the different nationalities, then came forward and

—now speaking in English, then in Swedish, some in German, others in French, and so on. All described the religious condition of their various nations, and expressed their desire for a strong manifestation and development of the union which already exists among evangelical Christians. This wish for combined action was all the more emphatically evinced in regard to those countries which more than ever feared the spread of Rationalism.

Speaking for the British Isles, the Lord Mayor of London returned thanks for the cordial welcome given by the Danish Committee. Reverting to the names of Bickersteth, Bunting, Raffles, Steane, and others, who were the founders of the Alliance, he said they would, if still alive, have been astonished at the progress the society had made throughout Europe and the world. He anticipated, as one of the results of the Conference, that those who took part in it would be bound together in closer ties of Christian brotherhood. With the assistance of a book of music, in which hymns were printed in three languages, the members severally sang, each in the one with which he was most familiar. This was done without any apparent confusion of tongues, and with vocal harmony. The Lord's Prayer, repeated in Danish, brought to a close one of the most eventful reception meetings in the history of the Evangelical Alliance.

Meetings of the usual character were continued through the week, and on Tuesday, September 2d, the admirers of royalty were gratified by seeing on the crimson and gold seats the King and Queen, the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark, the King and Queen of Greece, Prince Waldemar, and other members of the royal family.

Religion in the family was the subject of an

of Richmond, Va., which, unpremeditated as it was, and wholly extempore, literally thrilled the distinguished audience. Quoting from a sermon delivered on the previous day by the Rev. Prebendary Anderson, of Bath, England, he said it was perfectly true that men were not so much educated by books as by persons. They derived much knowledge from literature, but men, after all, were their teachers. It was by personal contact, by intercourse of mind with mind, and heart with heart, that character was moulded, giving and receiving impressions day by day; so that every man was as a sculptor, with 10,000 patient touches of his chisel forming the characters of those with whom he had associations, and giving them shape which, perchance, they might wear forever. If they learned more from men than from books, then how forcibly does the remark apply to the influences exerted, not only in society at large, but in the family. No topic discussed in the Conference would be more vital, more practical, or one of more practical power than this in its influence on all the churches.

The influence of a mother was beautifully expressed in the lines of Cowper on "My Mother's Picture:"

"Oh, that those lips had language! Life has passed With me but roughly since I saw thee last."

Nor have we forgotten the stanza in which he so gratefully embalms the memory of those to whom he owed a debt never to be repaid:

"My boast is not that I derive my birth
From loins enthroned, or rulers of the earth;
But higher far my proud pretensions rise,
The child of parents passed into the skies."

Were he to give the call, he had no doubt that, in the audience that evening, a hundred men would rise and repeat those lines.

If they wanted a commentary on the beauty of family religion, they would find it in the "Cottar's Saturday Night." No matter the tune, the music of the family gathering for prayer and praise was in the heart. There was no end to the theme, nor ought there to be; because so long as there was a church in the house there would be a church in the State and a church in the world; but when the church in the house ceased to be, the church in the State would no longer exist, and by and by there would be no church in the world. If there was no pious person in the house but one, that pious person ought to be the mother; she it was who first began with the child, and her influence continued the longest. The prayer which the mother taught the child to say at her knee was a good prayer also for a man:

"If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

God bless the influence and the memory of every Christian mother in that audience, in that land, and throughout the world.

FREDERIKSBORG CASTLE.

THIS beautiful building, a picture of which we give on our front page, is situated in the well-wooded district of North Zeeland, about twenty miles from Copenhagen, near the small town of Hillerod, which the vicinity of the castle has changed in the course of time from a village to a town. Frederick II. was the first who built a castle here, which was, however, on a smaller scale. His son, Christian IV., who was born here, undertook to rebuild the place of his birth on a larger and grander scale. The rebuilding took place between the years 1602–8, and the King was his own architect, and designed the execution of the work. The castle is built of red bricks, with sandstone angles and joists, and is in the modern Gothic style. It is situated in a small lake, on three islets connected by bridges. There are eleven towers, four courtyards, four vaulted bridges, and six public gates.

THE CORKED BOTTLE.

"NEAR the home of my youth," says a Christian gentleman, "stood a running fountain. It was very ancient, the date 1537 being roughly carved on its stone, and above it hung gracefully a willow tree, quite as old, the records of the city asserting that the archbishop who owned that estate before the Reformation had planted it three centuries ago.

"I loved that spot. There I would come, and resting on the edge of the granite basin, I would watch the little birds receive in their slender bills the drops which dripped from behind the jet.

"One day my father found me there, lost in childish musings. He had in his hand a fastened vial, and, to my surprise, he bids me hold it under the jet.

"'But, father, it is corked; nothing can get into it!'" I exclaimed.

"'And, my child, is not this the very same thing we do, we poor children of men, when we come to the throne of grace and offer petitions without a living faith? The stream is abundant, ever and ever flowing, but they are corked vessels we place under it, hearts hardened and fastened by unbelief. Think of this, my child, and bring to the fountain a vessel *un*closed."

"Years flew by, and I was no more a child, when I witnessed wl at recalled still more forcibly those words, which I never could forget. We were in the high Alps, that wondrous creation of the Almighty, which reminds one continually that his maker found His work 'good.' After having for several days been transported from one enchanting spot to another, till so much glory had become almost painful to behold, one morning we entered a region so wonderful that every pen has failed in attempting to describe it. Our hearts were full; our minds, released prisoners, felt near heaven; at last they breathed their native air; our souls adored and loved so much the more that Father who had left on this earth such an impress of His might.

"Just as we were going down the most beautiful pass, we noticed, climbing heavily, a number of mountaineers, carrying on their shoulders a litter. We dreaded coming near it, as we feared to see stretched there some unfortunate traveller. No; it was only a man asleep!—asleep in the presence of what angels would delight to contemplate—asleep when, had he looked, even his clogged-up heart must have been stirred, and have felt a thrill of life. I then remembered the words of my father; for was not this man even as he who did not uncork his vial? Were they not both images of the Christian, who stands surrounded by the fullest of promises, but does not take hold of them? He sleeps—sleeps in indifference, in coldness; sleeps in doubts, when, did he but lift up his eyes, he would behold enough to fill his soul with eternal gratitude."

The Ways of Petty Official Tyrants are Notoriously cruel. It would seem that they are the same across the Atlantic as here, if the facts of a recent case are a specimen. In a poor-house at Exeter, England, some damage was recently done by a baby, sixteen months old, for which its mother, supposed to have been negligent, and who was also an inmate of the house, was punished with a bread-and-water dinner; and this on Sunday, of all days, when the ordinary meal is better than usual. Hearing of it, the husband, also an inmate, was about to take her his own dinner; but, for resisting an attempt to prevent him, he was locked up, and kept all night to reflect on his misbehavior in a cell, "with mud and slush two inches deep," without boots or socks, and the next day was dragged before the magistrates for refractory conduct. Happily, the bench took a more humane view of the matter, and dismissed the charge.

THE WHITE HORSE CAVALRY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 5, 1884.

"And the armies which were in heaven followed Him upon white horses."—Rev. 19 : 14.

The War Horse of the Past—Not Degenerated by Labor—A Symbol of Strength—The Horse in History—Wellington's Steed at Waterloo—The Horse in Literature—Walter Scott's Tribute—A Symbol of Fleetness—An Emblem of Victory—The Procession of the Redeemed—The Regiment of Martyrs—Scotch Martyrs—English Martyrs—The Huguenots—Christian Philanthropists—The Christian Poor—Christian Invalids—Thomas Stockton's Sermon—A Fatal Operation—The Multitude—The Intense Personal Question.

It is impossible in our age to get any idea of the beauty and glory of the ancient horse. This animal comes down to us through centuries of oppression and bad treatment, which have taken the gracefulness from the limb, and the flame from the eye, and the arch of pomp from the neck. Take the finest horse that prances in any of the parks, and an ancient king would not have been seen riding upon him. The ox and the ass tilled the ground and carried the burdens, and the horse was kept for coronation and triumphal procession. You can, while reading Job's sketch of almost hear the champing of the bits and the clattering of the hoof amid the fallen shields : "Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? The glory of his nostrils is terrible. He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength. He goeth on to meet the armed men. He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

In all languages and in all literatures deference has been paid to the horse, and he is used as a symbol. Mordecai mounted him while Haman held the bit. Miriam clapped the cymbals on the banks of the sea, and said : "The horse and the rider hath he thrown into the sea." Patriarchs, and prophets, and evangelists, and apostles seemed to love to stroke his sleek hide and examine his exquisitely constructed hoof.

So it has been in all ages. Wellington would not allow his old war charger, Copenhagen, to be touched irreverently, the horse on which he sat without dismounting for fifteen hours at Waterloo ; and when Copenhagen died he was buried with honors of war and a discharge of musketry over his grave ; and to this day you may find his monument and his epitaph. There is no more beautiful passage in French literature than the description of the death of the old war charger Marchega. Walter Scott paid honors to this animal when, in "St. Ronan's Well," he ordered the girth unfastened and the blanket thrown over the smoking flanks.

So when I see him up and down literature, I am not surprised to find that St. John cries out in the text, "And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses ;" the figure setting forth the strength, the fleetness, and the glory of the redeemed. In all literature the horse is used as

AN EMBLEM OF STRENGTH.

When startled by sudden sight or sound, how he dashes along the highway! The hoofs strike fire, the harness is snapped, and the vehicle hurled over the rocks. With nostril panting, and foam flying in flakes, and head tossing from side to side, in wild triumph, he stops not at the missiles hurled at him, or the great shout of the multitude, "Whoa, whoa!" Away he dashes, irresistible. And here is a symbol of the strength of the redeemed. All their invalidism gone. All their decrepitude gone. Never to be tired and never to be sick. Never again to die. If the strength of ten giants were put into one person, the inhabitant of heaven could wrestle him down. Oh, what a glorious day it will be for you when, putting aside all earthly ailments and all earthly impediments, you shall take hold of the mightiness of celestial health! There will not be anything that you cannot lift, or crush, or conquer.

But the horse in the text is also

A SYMBOL OF FLEETNESS.

The wild horses on the plains at the sight of the hunter make the miles leap under them, and there are whirlwinds of dust rising from the flying feet ; and then far away the horse halts, and looks back upon his pursuer, and neighs in gladness at his escape. Take the fleetness of the horse as a symbol of the speed of the righteous in heaven. Almost all writers agree in saying that heaven is the centre of the universe. If that be so, then what must be the speed of a messenger spirit flying this way if he comes to help us in any crisis of prayer or moral struggle.

But the horse in the text and in all literature also is

AN EMBLEM OF VICTORY.

He was not used on ordinary occasions ; but on coronation day and in great processions the conqueror would ride along amid acclaiming multitudes. And am I not right in saying that all the redeemed in heaven are victors? Ay, more than conquerors, through Him that hath loved them. Then let us take our stand for a few moments on one of the avenues of the celestial cities, on one of the boulevards of heaven, and see this great procession of the text pass by. We will not have time to count all the companies, or regiments, or brigades of the redeemed ; but St. John points out a few of them : "And the armies which were in heaven followed Him upon white horses."

You have sometimes stood on the street waiting for some great procession to pass, and you waited hour after hour for it ; but after a while you heard the sound of brazen instruments, and then you heard the shout of the people from the windows and the housetops, and then the procession came up and passed on. You will not have to wait long on this avenue of heaven to see of the redeemed. Let the marshals of heaven clear the way. He rides on, the conqueror of earth, and heaven, and hell, on a white horse, and all the armies of heaven following Him on white horses.

Behold this procession of the text, the Commander-in-Chief of earth and heaven passing at the head of the troops, and on His head are many crowns, and He waves the sword of universal victory. Turn out, all heaven, to greet this Conqueror. Strew flowers on the shining way, wave all the banners of light, ring all the bells of heaven! Hosanna! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest. "And all the armies of heaven followed Him upon white horses."

Notice that

are the martyrs. How do I know it? Why, over and over again we find they are nearest the altar and nearest the throne, and they seem to be the divine favorites. And first, notice, in this great procession of the redeemed is the regiment of the martyrs. On earth they were hunted from city to city, they were sawn asunder, they were hurled out of life ; but now they pass in triumph. Eighteen regiments of Scotch martyrs—18,000 having perished in one persecution. Escaped from Lord Claverhouse, and Bloody McKenzie, and from the horrors of the Grass Market, now they pass in triumphal line. Grayfriars Churchyard took their bodies, but heaven took their souls. James Renwick, John Knox, Hugh McKail, and a great host, with high cheek bones, and strong arms and consecrated spirits. Some of them went through the glens of Scotland barefoot, and then they clambered upon hand and knees on the crags, and waited. Now they are in triumph. Once their song in the cave discovered them to their persecutors, and they were brought out and suffered agonies untold ; but now they are in the procession. Eighteen regiments! Eighteen thousand Scotch martyrs! Ride on, conquerors of Dunottar Castle, Bass Rock, and Rutherglen, ride on, ride on!

Here is an interreguum in the procession, but only for a moment. Here comes another regiment—ay, five regiments, ten regiments, twenty regiments, whole brigades of Queen Mary against King Jesus was an uneven fight. When the 20,000 chariots of God roll down the sky they roll over any foe. Queen Mary thought she had put the Christians down; she only lifted them up. Here they pass in the regiments on the white horses. Here is Bishop Hooper. Here is Rogers, the prebendary of St. Paul's. Here is Cranmer, who got back his courage in time to save his soul. Here is Anne Askew, who, rather than give up her faith in Christ, submitted to the tortures of the rack, and then after all the bones had been dislocated, she was carried to the stake, and then her last words went up in the flame-prayer for her murderers. A whole regiment of them picked out of the iron fingers of earthly torture and lifted into light. Ride on, great host, ye mounted troops of the English martyrs!

ENGLISH MARTYRS.

Another interregnum. You have to wait only a moment. Another regiment—ay, five regiments, ten regiments, twenty regiments. Who are they? Look at their sandals, look at their countenances. Tell us who they are. The men who fell on at Lyons, at Paris, at Orleans, at Bordeaux, while the king looked out of the window and said, "Kill, kill, kill!" As they ride along, you would not suppose that they had ever been pitched out of windows, or dragged through the streets, or mauled and cut, and in every wise insulted, until it seemed as if the cause of God was perishing from the earth, and cities were illumined with infernal joy, and the cannon of St. Angelo thundered at the triumph of hell. Yet these are the very persons whose blood-spattered bodies were thrown into the river Seine, and that were lifted out of a world's shriek into the joy of heaven.

Soldier of God, well done,
Rest from thy loved employ ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Master's joy.

Ride on, you regiments, you mounted troops of St. Bartholomew's Day! Another interregnum, but you will wait only a moment. Come on, now, the regiment of

THE CHRISTIAN PHILANTHROPISTS.

Did I say regiment? Five regiments, ten regiments, twenty regiments of Christian philanthropists. They went down to take care of the wounded on the battle-field. They plunged into damp and mouldy prisons, and plead before God and human governments in behalf of the incarcerated. They preached the Gospel to the besotted in great cities. They took the Bible and took bread into garrets of pain. They attended to most uncomely work for Christ's sake in behalf of the wounded and the suffering ; but in the rivers of heaven they wash off all the loathesomeness of those whom they attended, and now they are on the white horses riding on in eternal triumph.

Ah! that is John Howard, who circumnavigated the earth in the name of Him who said : "I was sick and you visited me." The resolution of the House of Commons and the recognition of all governments were not to him so much as this day of triumph as he passes along on the white horse. I recognize those as the Moravian missionaries. They were told if they went in to take care of the plague-stricken they must never come out of the house again ; so they made all their arrangements, and bade farewell to their friends and went into the plague-struck hospital, and toiled for the sick night and day, and afterward, worn out, lay down beside the dying, themselves to die. Ride on, ride on! That is Elliott, who toiled amid the savages of our own country and walked through the woods until his feet were bleeding, and said in a letter: "My feet are always wet, but sometimes I take off my shoes and I wring my stockings, and then I put them on again—my chief ambition to endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." There he is in the triumph—not walking now, but riding, a conqueror.

There is Elizabeth Fry, followed by many whom she taught the way up from Newgate prison to glory. Here is Grace Darling of the stout oar and the seabird's wing swooping upon the drowning. Here is the Good Samaritan who put the wounded man on the horse, himself walking, now riding in all the grander triumph because of that earthly dismounting. Hail! heroes and heroines of God, followed by the sufferers whom you healed, and by the abandoned whom you reclaimed, and by the lost whom you found. Ride on, conquerors!

Only a short interregnum. More regiments—five, ten, twenty regiments—regiments of

THE CHRISTIAN POOR.

They never rode before. The only ride they took was in the hearse to the Potter's Field. Poorly fed, meanly clad, insufficiently sheltered. They were jostled out of homes the rent of which they could not pay. They were jostled out of churches where their presence was an offence. From the way they went out of the world you might think they would have no very great reception on the other side. From the poor doctoring, and the rough shroud, and the hastened obsequies. But on the other side a glittering escort met them, and the snow-white chargers of God were brought in, and these conquerors mounted them. They have exchanged poorhouse for palace. They have exchanged rags for imperial attire. They have exchanged the weary walk for a seat on the white horse from the King's stable. Ride on, ride on! Christ waving His pierced hand back toward them, saying: "Ye suffered with me on earth, now be glorified with me in heaven. Follow, follow, on the white horses!"

A brief interregnum. There comes another regiment—ay, five regiments, ten regiments, twenty regiments—the regiments, the whole brigades, of

CHRISTIAN INVALIDS.

These are they who laid upon beds of suffering. From the firmness and exhilaration with which they ride this day you would not suppose they had ever been bent almost double with ailments, and that they had crouched with pain irremediable, and that they writhed in sufferings horrible to the beholders. After twenty-five years of useless prescription, and all surgery had failed, in one moment they recovered. The black groom Death put their one foot in the stirrup and gave them one lift, and they mounted to the white horse, riding on, a conqueror.

I heard Thomas Stockton in Philadelphia preach about the heavenly land, and after he had been preaching a few moments he stopped to cough, and he coughed, it seemed to me, for three or four minutes, and it seemed as if he would never get his breath and could never talk again; but after a while he rallied, and he put his hands upon his lungs and said: "Thank God, there will be

NO COUGHING IN HEAVEN!"

He is well now. Eloquent Thomas Stockton, glorious Thomas Stockton, he is in the procession.

I had a friend preaching the Gospel at the far West. He was seized with a disease which demanded immediate surgery. He must die without it, and the probability was he would expire under the process. But there was one faint hope, the surgeons told him, and for the sake of that one hope and in behalf of his family and his church, he resolved to endure all things. Sabbath morning came, and, standing in his pulpit, supported by a chair, he said: "My dear people, I start to-morrow for New York to submit to some painful surgery, and the probability is I shall die under it; but they tell me there is a hope of recovery, so I take that one hope for my family and my church; and so now I shall preach my farewell sermon." And I have been told by those who were present that suddenly his countenance was illumined with a supernatural joy as he said: "You will find my text in the 4th chapter of 2d Timothy, the 6th and 7th verses: 'For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord shall give me at that day.'" The next Thursday he was well, he was completely well. He had gone to that land where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick." Ride on, ye mounted troops of recovered invalids! Ride on, ride on!

But can I give you any idea of

THE MULTITUDE?

We sometimes say it took a procession an hour to pass a certain point, or five hours to pass a certain point. How long will it take this great procession of the redeemed? Since the world was created there have been 144 generations, and that would make 29,000,000,000 of people who have died. Figures beyond all human comprehension, and the vast multitude of them, no doubt, passed up into this heavenly procession, and no one but an archangel, with the arithmetics of eternity, could give any idea of that multitude. All the time increasing. At the beginning of the service we took this position on the boulevard of heaven and not one half of the first division has gone by. Get you up into some tower of heaven and look to the north, and look to the south. Is there any end? No, no! Coming, coming. Company after company, regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade, host after host. Marching, marching, forever, forever, forever! "The armies of heaven followed Him on white horses."

THE INTENSE QUESTION

for you and me is, "Will we be in that procession?" If we do not belong to the Lord's army here, we will never belong to it there. If we do not follow the King here, we will never triumph with Him there. You must remember that this white horse cavalry had great battles with the black horse cavalry of hell, and the arch demon has gained many a triumph, and he has carried off some who will be captives in chains and in darkness unto the great day. Which side are you on? If on the wrong side, cross over. Put spurs into the flanks of the steed and dash up under the standards of the cross. Though you may have for fifty years rebelled against this King, you may this day become His loyal subjects. Cross over, by the grace of God, cross over.

Of course I take this text as figurative, and yet I do not know but in some sense it may prove after a while to be literal. It has seemed to me inscrutable that horses that were whipped, and scourged, and maltreated by cruel owners should have no place for compensation and no other state of being. My little child said to one still younger: "There will be a heaven for the birds, and there will be a heaven for the lambs, and there will be a heaven for the horses." I had not the courage to correct the defective theology. I would not be at all sorry if I found in heaven there were real horses for the eternal triumph. But until then we must take it all as figurative, meaning the strength, meaning the speed, meaning the victory of the redeemed.

When the armies came back at the close of our late war, among the most wonderful things in

as they passed by in review, were the horses on which the generals rode. They had not been in battle many of them. Many of them had never seen hardship, many of those horses had been picked up after the battle, and I am told some of them were picked up unlawfully. But they passed along with rounded limb, and flaming eye, and flying feet, and arched neck. As they bounded to the sound of the drum and the blast of the trumpet, the riders bowed on either side to what seemed an almost interminable "huzza, huzza!" But when our Commander-in-Chief shall come, bringing many sons to glory, when He shall return from His victories, leading all lands, all ages, all centuries, will you and I belong to the white horse cavalry of the redeemed? If so, on that day we will understand better than we ever could in this world what St. John meant when he said: "And the armies which were in heaven followed Him upon white horses."

In the year 1836, on St. Kilda, one of the islands of Western Scotland, there lived a poor widow and her son. She trained him in the fear of the Lord, and was rewarded by seeing him grow up an honest, industrious, dutiful lad. The boy was sixteen years old, and longed to be doing more than he had opportunity of doing for his mother's comfort. He therefore welcomed the proposal of some boys about his own age, that they should search the rocks for the eggs of the seagulls.

On the day appointed Ronald set off to the cliffs, having supplied himself with a strong rope by which to get down, and a knife to defend himself with if the birds should attack him. He was joined by his companions, and the party soon stood at the edge of the cliffs.

One end of the rope was fastened securely around Ronald's body and the other was tied around a rock to prevent accident in case of the rope slipping from the hands of those who held it. Ronald was then lowered, until he was opposite one of the fissures in which the birds build, when he gave the signal to his companions not to let him down any farther. He planted his foot on a slight projection of the rock, and tried to take the eggs. Just then a bird flew at him, attacking him with beak and talons. Instantly he drew his knife, and struck wildly upward in defence of his face; but, oh! horrible to narrate, in place of striking the bird he struck the rope, and having severed some of the strands, he hung suspended over that wild abyss of raging waves by only a few threads of hemp. He uttered a piercing cry which was heard by his companions above, who saw his danger, and tried to draw him up. Awful moment! As they drew in each coil Ronald felt the severed threads uncoiling. "O Lord, save me!" was his first agonizing cry; and then, as the rope vibrated with his weight, and he realized his nearness to death: "O Lord, comfort my poor mother!"

Above, the anxiety was terrible. The boys were brave, but they could do nothing to help their comrade but draw in the rope, and none could tell if it would hold out long enough. Every haul seemed to weaken it. Very gently they pulled, so that no sudden strain might snap the few remaining plies, while as Ronald neared the top, two of the boys cast themselves prone on the rock and stretched over to grasp him so soon as he came within reach. Slowly he ascended, and at last, just as his overstrained nerves were giving way, he felt his hands grasped by sturdy fingers, and he was lifted up bodily over the edge of the cliff. He was saved, and he sank on the ground exhausted with excitement and terror. But he was safe, and his mother clasped him in her arms and thanked God.

Over an abyss, far more dreadful, hangs the unconverted man. Should the frail cord of his life break, his condition would be miserable beyond conception. With many that cord has already been injured by sinful excesses, and quivers as if at any moment it might part. Those who are safe on the rock of Christ are stretching out their hands to the rescue, but the imperilled men, careless of their danger, laugh and jeer at those who are trying to save them, and ask to be let alone in their business and their pleasures. Fatal madness! every hour sees some fall who reject the proffered salvation. Christ is still saying, "Ye would not come unto me that ye might have life."

THE FUTURE SEPARATION OF INDIA FROM ENGLAND.

The General Course of Events—A Development of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy—England to be the Prime Sufferer—Signs of Coming Events—Ireland to be Independent—Forces of Disintegration in India—The Warning of the London Times.

THE whole tendency of events during the past half century has been in the direction of an arrangement of governments and nations, such as is outlined in prophecy, as the state of the world when the close of this dispensation comes upon it. In 1840 nothing seemed more improbable than the unification of Italy and the depletion of the Turkish Empire, yet we have seen Italy united under one king, and the territory, subjected to Turkish misrule, pared down by successive wars and international conferences. There is much still to be accomplished before the ten-kingdomed confederacy described in the seventh chapter of Daniel is established. It is evident, however, to the student of prophecy that about eight years before the dispensation finally closes and will comprise neither more nor less than the area covered by Cæsar's Empire. How this rearrangement will come to pass cannot be exactly foretold; but the Christian student will as he reads the newspaper, note day by day how events occur which operate in the direction of the predicted end. That England should lose India, Ireland, Canada, and Australia seems to us now improbable; but so the prediction that great Babylon and Nineveh would be so utterly destroyed that men would be in doubt as to their site, must have seemed to those who heard the prophecy. Yet that has come to pass, and so will the prophecies that relate to existing nations. The old Roman world will be again united, probably not under one government, but assuredly so confederated that its head shall be able to direct its united forces and frame its policy.

THE CONFEDERACY WILL BE FORMED

The effect of these

will be felt most severely by England, because she now exercises control over large nations, which must be wrested from under her sway before the end comes. It is, therefore, to the British Empire, on which it is proudly boasted the sun never sets, that the gaze of the student of prophecy is directed; and in that empire he expects to trace first and most conspicuously the march of events, the issue of which is known to him.

It is only to the unwatchful and the superficial observer that revolutions and great national conflicts come as a surprise. For years before the explosive outbreak which startles the world, the causes that produce the explosion have been at work, and the materials have been drawing together. The sagacious observer notes them, and expects the result. Many years before that terrible revolution which, at the close of the last century, deluged France with blood, Chesterfield visited the country, and though he saw that to all outward appearance everything was calm and peaceful, yet under the surface of society he detected ominous signs of storm. He wrote to a friend: "All the symptoms which I have ever met with in history previous to great changes and revolutions in government now exist and daily increase in France." It was not until thirty-six years after those words were written that the Bastille fell, and the French Revolution was a recognized fact in Europe. Lord Chesterfield, reasoning from the past, expected the event as he read the signs he observed in the present. The student of prophecy has additional assistance; before him lies open the book of the future as well as the book of the past. "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy; . . . for the time is at hand" (Rev. 1 : 3).

With the light of prophecy shining upon us, we see a new significance in the rage, the deadly animosity of among us toward the English Government. Neither cruelty nor kindness, neither coercion nor concession affects their deep-seated determination to achieve the independence of Ireland. By any means, fair or foul, brave or cowardly, wise or foolish, they are proceeding steadily toward that goal. And we know from prophecy that in some way they will succeed; Ireland will in the future gain legislative independence. She was not included in the Roman Empire of the past, and she will not be in the ten-kingdomed confederacy when the end comes.

must also be separated from the British Empire, and it appears now that forces already exist which are capable of effecting that separation. These forces have not escaped the notice of intelligent Englishman. One of them, in a series of letters to the London Times, directs public attention to their ominous existence. Commenting on these letters in an editorial article, the Times of September 10th, 1884, reminds its readers that fifty out of the two hundred and fifty million people in Britain's Indian Empire—i.e., one fifth belong to self-governing States, which only nominally acknowledge the supreme authority of the Queen as Empress of India. They are practically almost independent, being governed by native princes called Rajahs, or Maharajahs, or Nizams, etc., who levy what taxes they like, enact their own laws, and maintain armies of their own, distinct from the British army of 190,000 soldiers. These feudatory States, containing only one fifth of the whole population of India, maintain native State armies amounting to about 350,000 men, while the British army for the whole of India consists of only 190,000 soldiers. At the same time many of these Hindoo and Mahommedan 350,000 soldiers are disaffected toward British rule, and would cheerfully fight against the British army in case of civil or foreign war. The Times says:

"Few Englishmen realize the existence of vast armed forces in India not under direct British control. A series of letters, of which we publish the last to-day (September 10th), offers a very disquieting view of the military apparatus of the country. It shows a population of 49,050,000 Hindoos and Mahommedans, under princes of their own, guarded by a formidable array of 349,835 troops of their own, with an artillery of 4237 guns. From north to south, from east to west, a chain of States is seen to stretch bristling with foot and horse, with forts and batteries. In all abounds. Horsemen in the pay of Scindiah or Holkar, the fierce retainers of the Nizam, the 100,000 soldiers of the Maharajah of Nepaul, would ask nothing better than to be led to battle, whoever the adversary. The Queen's native army is composed of soldiers drawn from the same sources. In the eyes of Englishmen and of Europe a thin red line of Queen's troops fences from foes our Indian Empire, occupied by two hundred and fifty million souls. But behind the screen is a tremendous host of other warriors, far out-numbering the British garrison, and as martial and permanently mobilized as it.

"To the common gaze the 350,000 native soldiers of the native princes and States are invisible, because they have no duties to perform. They fulfil no object but the gratification of personal vanity and love of display. A majority of the taxes wrung from the miserable peasantry is squandered on regiments and ordnance for which there is not any legitimate use. All the public works which an Eastern country needs even more than a Western, are starved, that Maharajahs and Nizams may glory in the possession of armed forces they have neither the right nor [at present] the occasion to wield."

It is evident from this emphatic warning from the chief of British journals that there is ever hanging over British rule in India a prodigious menace. For the present it is undemonstrative; but if it should be powerfully moved, it would be, as in 1857, a terrific factor in the problem. At any hour some cause such as a war between England and Russia, an imprudent enactment, or the call from some man in whom they think they recognize a Messiah, may move this powerful force to enthusiasm, and England may have, if embarrassed with European complications, to abandon all India. In that way, or in some other, India will be lost to the British Crown; the significance of these facts consists in their proof that forces exist sufficiently powerful to accomplish an end that we know must shortly come to pass.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

How a Father was Converted.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Ross said: "A little girl was lying on her death-bed. It was the last night of her short life upon earth. She called her father to her bedside, and, putting her little arms around his neck, said, 'Father!' 'Well, my child, what is it?' he asked. 'Father, what shall I tell Jesus is the reason why you will not love Him?' The poor father's heart was broken; and after a few minutes he said, 'Oh, my child, tell Him that I do love him!' And there and then he surrendered himself to Christ."

A Village Firebrand Saved.—"About Forty years ago, accompanied by a friend, I went to hear William Burns preaching. At the end of the service my friend, who was the very firebrand of the village, asked Mr. Burns how he might obtain salvation. His answer was, 'It is not I who have anything to do with it; go to Jesus and settle it with Him; just tell Him what you have told me, for Jesus Christ is all and in all, and I am nothing.' He did as he was recommended, and in a little time he became as conspicuous for his devotion to the Saviour as previously he had been notorious for evil."

A Collier's Timely Decision.—"Two Colliers in Edinburgh went to one of Mr. Moody's meetings. At the close of the service Mr. Moody asked all who wished to be spoken to about the great matter of salvation to stay behind. One of the colliers was very much impressed with what Mr. Moody had said, and told his companion that he was going to stay and settle this question with Christ. His companion urged him to come away, but he would not be moved. Mr. Moody spoke to him, and as he was hungering after salvation he was eager and ready to listen to all Mr. Moody had to say, and went away from that place fully trusting in God. Next day an accident occurred in the coal mine where he was working. He was taken up fearfully mutilated. As his friends bent over him he murmured, 'Oh, am I not glad that I gave my soul into Christ's keeping yesterday? not a minute too soon.'"

Shut up to One Text.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related: "A minister was once very undecided as to what text he should take for his subject on Sunday. At nine o'clock on Saturday night he had not made up his mind; and at ten o'clock he was in the same condition. The one verse that would always come uppermost in his mind was, 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.' He thought, 'I cannot take that text, 'for there is not an atheist in my congregation.' At eleven o'clock that verse was still ringing in his ears. What should he do? His people would feel insulted if he were to preach from that to them; but something always told him to take that for his text, and reluctantly he made up his mind to take it, and bear the consequences. He returned from preaching very downcast, and while he was sitting meditating, he saw one of the foremost Christians in his congregation coming up the path. 'Here she comes,' he thought; 'it is just what I expected. I had better open the door myself.' 'Come in, Mrs. ——,' he said; 'I know what you are come for.' She said: 'I am come to tell you how much good your sermon did me to-day. For months back I have been doubting the existence of a God. I have come through so many trials, and have suffered so much, that I argued with myself that if there is a God, and if He is a God of love, why should He see any of His children suffer as He does? But your sermon put all these thoughts out of my mind, and I went home and asked Him to forgive me for all the hard thoughts I had had of Him. He has forgiven me all that, and now I am rejoicing in the full sunshine of my Redeemer's countenance.' "

Recent Trophies of Temperance.—Mr. Parker said: "At an open-air meeting the other night a man came over to me and said that he would like to sign the pledge. One of the workers took him by the arm to lead him into the church. The desire for drink was so deep in that man's heart, that he cried out three different times on his way from the open-air meeting to the church, and it was not a hundred yards distant, Oh, let me away to get my last drop of whiskey!' Another man followed me into the church. We urged him to sign the pledge also. He said he was going to do so, but not yet; some other time would do. We urged him to do it now, telling him that God might not give him another opportunity. He yielded to our urging, after which we asked God to keep and strengthen that man, and he went away, fully trusting in his Saviour to keep him from falling."

Run Over by a Railway Train. — Mr. Maughan said: "I was at the funeral of a young man, a friend of mine, the other day. This young man and a companion went for a day's holiday, and were standing amusing themselves on a bank at the side of a railway, when my friend stepped down on to the rails. A train was coming up at his back which he did not observe. His friend had no time to warn him of his danger, when the train swept over him, crushng him to pieces. A few days before his death I had been speaking to him about his soul, but I cannot tell whether he had given himself to Christ or not. Oh, if he had not, what a dreadful awakening! I shall know some day. Oh, friends, ye who are not in Christ, take warning from this, and turn to Him at once! The Bible says, 'Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.'"

A Devil's Castaway Saved.—Mr. Daily Related: "George Whitefield, the renowned preacher, was preaching one night in Edinburgh. He took his text from Heb. 2 : 3. It was a wild, stormy night in winter. A poor wretched woman was coming along the road, meditating suicide. The snow was drifting in her face, and as she walked along she noticed the church that Whitefield was preaching in, lighted up, and warm looking. She went inside to get shelter from the storm. He was just at the end of his discourse, and when the woman entered he was saying, 'This salvation is a great salvation; it can save the very worst; God will even take the devil's castaways.' This poor woman heard these words, and went home and gave herself to the Lord. While his landlady was serving him with his supper that night, she made the remark, 'I think, Mr. Whitefield, you went too far when you said that the Lord would take the devil's castaways.' 'All right,' he replied, 'we shall see.' The next morning a woman came to the door and asked to see Mr. Whitefield. She said to him, 'Here is one of the devil's castaway's; the Lord saved me last night.' "

An Outcast Reclaimed.—At a Temperance meeting a man testified: "Two years ago in February last I came back to this, the city of my nativity, a wandering outcast, abandoned by all men, and I was going to say abandoned by God. I had no money, and no rag collector would have given a shilling for all the clothing I had in the world. I was a drunkard. Every living creature had given me up but my wife. Nothing would shake her love. I have heard her say, speaking of a family she dearly loved, 'The Frasers prayed for you, and God is engaged to them to save you.' But what did I do? I carried out all our furniture, piece after piece. I took the clothing from my wife and from our infants. Silently she suffered all, only remonstrating on the children's behalf. Yes, she wept, believed, and prayed, and she knew two friends who prayed, and whose prayers she knew brought blessed answers from God. So she worked and wept. And I, brute that I was, struck her. God forgive me. I turned her and my own children out on to the street because they had nothing left I could take from them. I then left the city, and at the end of three months I turned up here again. Day after day I had nothing but drink. Every day I could get some of that. I became cunning, stood by the rumshops, and watched till I saw a person, man or woman, whom by a pitiful story I moved to give me money that I might get more drink. One night I went to my wife's friends, the Frasers, in the hope that for her sake they might give me some money. They took me in, washed, clothed, and fed me, ay, even kept and loved me. I became a child again; I sat down and wept. I threw myself down in the room they had provided for me, and for the first time in my life I spoke to God, and asked Him for Christ's sake to forgive me my sins and snap the fetters of my cruel bondage. He graciously did so, and I became His child. Mrs. Fraser went for my wife and children, and we stayed there until I was able to provide for them."

LONDON LODGING-HOUSE SCENES.

By Rev. J. C. Whitmore.

I HAD agreed to meet a fellow-laborer in one of the vilest localities in London, in order to hold an open-air service on the evening of the Lord's day. But the streets shone brightly with continuous rain, the clouds were low, thick, and gray with silver streaks. The few wayfarers hurried along as speedily as possible, and it was clear to my friend and myself that street preaching was impracticable.

We met, notwithstanding, and the question arose as to the disposal of our time; and it was agreed that, instead of holding our projected service in the street, we should repair to a well-known lodging-house in the locality, and there make an attempt to speak to whoever might be sheltering from the ceaseless rain.

In other years this old house (now the resort of some of the worst of the dangerous classes) was a gentleman's mansion. Passing a back-kitchen door, we push open the front door, and enter unbidden, and

CLEARLY UNWELCOME.

Here are men and women—old and young, lads and girls, washing, cooking, eating, drinking, cursing, swearing, and blaspheming, without the least restraint. Across one end of the room the huge fire of coke sends forth heat almost unbearable. The room is divided by rough partitions into boxes all round the sides; a large unclean table, with benches encircling it, is in the centre. For a moment, as we enter, there is quietude. But brief time suffices to comprehend our character and errand; then the noise of conversation becomes louder than ever, appearing to become more clamorous, as if by that means to show us that we were not wanted.

We commenced singing, accompanied by oaths so hideous and appalling as to render the two a conjunction of

PARADISE AND PERDITION.

It fell to my lot to speak to them when the singing and reading finished, and I commenced by narrating how two men were working at cutting armor-plates for vessels of war. The plate, several inches thick, was in its place, the steam saw urged to its utmost velocity, when it broke in half with a loud report. One portion remained attached to the axis, the other flew toward the men, passed the nearest without touching him, but struck the second so fatally that in a moment he was in two pieces on the ground. There was only time for a look of astonishment to pass over his face before he was dead. One moment he was alive and well, the next he was—where?

Profound silence attended the narration, rendering only more audible the awful oaths and cursing in the adjoining kitchen, as I proceeded to urge the uncertainty of life, and the need of preparation for that unending life so swiftly coming. But louder and louder grew the oaths, while the screams of women mingled so fearfully that it was impossible to continue speaking; and several of us passed into the adjoining kitchen, hoping to quiet the tumult and resume the service.

The scene we beheld was simply horrible—the men and women were cursing and swearing with all their might, encouraging one young woman to continue brutal ill-usage to an elder woman who had REFUSED TO PAY FOR MORE DRINK.

The room was sickeningly heated, and the smell of raw spirits overpowering. As we entered, the elder woman was standing at bay, her dishevelled hair streaming over her face, and a strong, rough knife in her hand. Her antagonist was hurriedly binding her own hair, that she might see to renew the attack. With a yell of execration, the younger woman sprang forward, defying in her madness and drunkenness the uplifted weapon in the hand of her enemy. There was a rush and a struggle, the knife gleamed in the gas glare, descending with fearful force into the breast rushing to meet it; and then the younger woman relaxed her hold, and sank, quivering and bleeding terribly, upon the floor.

A dead, awful silence followed, rendering painfully audible the ticking of the large, old-fashioned clock over the fireplace, and the fall of the knife from the nerveless hand that had clutched it so fiercely a moment before. Quivering and gasping lay the heap upon the ground, as we stooped down and turned it tenderly to the light. To kneel down, to try and force our dry lips to speak, to note the paling, stiffening face, the eyes setting in death, and the limbs shuddering with the last agony—these followed swiftly one upon the other, as in a dreadful dream. Then came spasmodic struggles, a vain attempt at utterance, and silence and death.

It was strange how the majesty of the presence of God's messenger of death had stilled and refined that assembly of the outcast and the vile. Low words, quietly spoken, and gentle, pitying tones replaced the oath and the curse; womanly kindness was substituted for jeers and blows, only occasionally a low word breaking upon the stillness. We remained until a self-elected messenger returned with a surgeon and two policemen. The surgeon laid his hand upon the heart, listened for a moment to the mouth, glanced at the glazing eye, and exclaimed, who has done this?" Leaving two of the younger women to watch by the dead, we returned to the front kitchen, and there, without any attempt to renew our service in a formal way, we spoke quietly and seriously with those around concerning the awful suddenness of the event that had occurred, and the need of instant preparation for the tremendous eternity that must shortly come upon every one of us. General assent and quiet attention were accorded to our remarks, and drinking, oaths, and curses were banished for the night as by general and willing consent.

So, within the sound of the Gospel, but neglecting it herself, and preventing others from listening to its healing truths, a most unhappy young woman passed from time into eternity. With drink maddening her brain, rebellion and iniquity in her heart, and curses on her lips, she passed suddenly and most unexpectedly into the awful presence of the Judge of all the earth. Without a word of warning or a thought of death she was compelled to face the unknown, unending realities of the eternal world.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Numerous Letters on Politics Continue to arrive at this office. It is impossible to reply to all, especially as many of them are anonymous. It is not, however, right to leave them unacknowledged, as their writers are evidently conscientious and prompted by a sincere desire to promote the prosperity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Our friends in the South write urging us to advocate the election of Governor Cleveland, and so do all we can to prevent the elevation to the Presidency of "the man who wrote the Mulligan letters." Our friends in the East and West want to know why we do not support Mr. Blaine, and denounce the attempt to make a man President "who is a notorious libertine." We do not wish to discourage our friends who desire to help us in the work of editing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Their letters are interesting reading, and we are not distressed even when, finding they do not have any effect, they become abusive. What we are trying to do is to lay all the facts before our readers and to show the significance of them, believing that those for whom we write have sufficient intelligence to decide on their course for themselves. We know that their task will be a difficult one; but that is the fault of the conventions, who had an abundance of men of unblemished reputation to choose from in both parties. It is no part of our duty to tell our readers how they ought to vote. If we did so, they would justly resent our dictation as an impertinence. Neither do we care to discuss the question whether he is a greater sinner who breaks the seventh commandment than he who breaks the eighth, and we are sorry to see clergymen and newspapers exercising their ingenuity upon it. For ourselves, so intense is our horror of the liquor traffic that we would rather see St. John in the Presidential chair than any of the other candidates; but in the present state of affairs that is an impossibility. We know that many of our readers have the same preference, but some will not vote for St. John lest they deplete Mr. Blaine's strength and indirectly aid in electing Governor Cleveland. In the same way, numbers who would prefer to vote for General Butler will not do so through repugnance to doing anything that would promote Mr. Blaine's interest. It is inevitable that men, considering the practical effects of their votes, will arrive at opposite conclusions. All that we are concerned about is, that they consider carefully the situation, seek divine guidance, and then vote according to their consciences, disregarding the dictation of bosses, clergymen, and editors. Also that they refrain from judging, condemning, and vilifying those who differ from them.

A Demand for a Citizens' Ticket for Municipal offices in New York has been aroused. Tammany Hall has put a ticket in the field which excites suspicion of treachery. That suspicion was quickly confirmed by the withdrawal of Mr. Joseph O'Donohue, the Tammany candidate for the mayoralty, who, it is understood, objected to the terms on which alone he could have the Tammany support. It is openly asserted that the tactics of 1880 are to be used, and that Tammany votes for the national ticket are to be traded in return for Republican votes for the Tammany local ticket. The statement has caused considerable excitement, owing to the conviction that in 1880 General Hancock lost the State of New York by a similar bargain. The best men of both the Republican and Democratic parties in New York are contending for a fair vote and a fair count.

The Springer Committee of the House has prepared its report of the results of its investigation of the Star Route frauds. It states that the exact amount out of which the Government was defrauded in the Star Route mail service during the Hayes administration can never be accurately known. A report from Brady's successor, covering forty routes out of the ninety-three in which fraud is charged, estimates the amount stolen from the Government under the forty contracts at $2,172,132, and the Congressional committee says: "The whole amount of which the Government was defrauded in the Star Route mail service during the Hayes administration will exceed four million dollars." A specimen route, probably the worst, is cited by the committee. It is that of the Mineral Park and Pioche route, which was expedited so as to cost about $50,000 per annum. "During thirty-nine days it appeared that not a single letter or paper passed over this route, although the Government was paying nearly $50,000 a year for carrying the mails." Not one of the thieves has been punished. The report is signed by Mr. Springer and the Democratic members of the committee.

Governor St. John's Letter of Acceptance was published last week. It is brief and weighty. It presents some startling facts to the consideration of the people. In the course of the letter Mr. St. John reminds the country that: "There are about 175,000 retail dealers in intoxicating liquors in the United States, each of whom pays to our Government $25, in consideration of which sum they are permitted to carry on their business for a term of twelve months. When we add to this the amount paid by distillers, brewers, and wholesale dealers, we find that the interest of the Government in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is about $80,000,000 annually. This traffic, sanctioned as it is by the laws of our country, costs the people, at a low estimate, a thousand million dollars a year, not to speak of the destroyed homes, debauched manhood, poverty, heartache, crime, and corruption it produces." Mr. St. John thus concludes his letter: "Our country needs an administration that will rise above mere partisan considerations, and in the selection of public officials make honesty, sobriety, and efficiency and not service to party the test. It should be conducted, not in the interest of any particular section, party, race, or color, but in the interest of the whole people. To accomplish this all good citizens should promptly step to the front and be counted for the right. This is no time for dodging. Moral cowardice will never win, and surely never deserves victory."

Three More Fires in Cleveland, Ohio, were kindled last week, but the fire department was on the alert, and little damage was done. These make an aggregate of nineteen fires in three weeks, which have caused a total loss of over two millions. The impression prevailing in the city is that the fires are all the work of incendiaries, working in organized bands, and that they are stimulated by the communistic spirit which has been fostered and concentrated by the speeches of political agitators, whose violent harangues have been directed to setting labor against capital. The chief of the fire department has advised the owners of large buildings to have them guarded by watchmen authorized to shoot any man seen prowling around at unseemly hours. An excitement amounting almost to a panic prevails, and many employers are retiring from business and leaving the neighborhood.

The Prime Meridian Conference in Washington was unable to arrive at an agreement last week. Professor Rutherford, representing the United States, proposed that the prime meridian which the Conference should recommend to the respective governments should be that passing through Greenwich. This resolution was opposed by the representatives of France, and gave rise to an animated and at times heated debate. M. Lefaivre and Professor Janssen, the French delegates, contended that the object of the Conference was merely to discuss the general question of a common prime meridian and not to select and establish such a meridian. This view of the duties of the Conference was opposed by the representatives of the United States, of Great Britain, and of Sweden and Norway, who all considered that the desirability of a prime meridian was settled, and that the business of the Conference was to select the meridian and recommend it to their governments for adoption. If the Frenchmen remain firm, the Conference will probably separate without any result, as the delegates from the United States and Great Britain will not consent to any change from the Greenwich Meridian now in use. The cost of a change, which would involve the alteration of valuable charts, would be to Great Britain five million dollars and to the United States one million. The question is one of convenience only, but the French are making it one of national pride.

Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Scottish Evangelist, arrived in this city on September 30th. The applications received at this office were handed to her, to which she will reply. As she is now making her arrangements for the season, it would be well for any church desirous of securing her services to make an early application. In all the large cities of England and Scotland the largest buildings were found inadequate to contain the crowds which were attracted to her meetings, and the services were continued from week to week at the earnest request of the Christian churches of the cities. Probably no revivalist, with the exception of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, has been so extensively blessed on the other side of the Atlantic. The local press, both secular and religious, described her meetings as extraordinary, both in attendance and results. She has promised to preach in the Brooklyn Tabernacle for Dr. Talmage on October 17.

A Prohibition Campaign Paper is Being published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, of New York. It will be issued every week until after the election, and will contain news of the movement in all the States, giving names and localities of all Prohibition organizations and the results of the canvass week by week. It will also contain short, concise arguments in favor of Prohibition, which will be useful to speakers in the cause, and will form useful literature to disseminate in localities where citizens need information on the subject. The price for single copies is four cents.

German Testimony in Favor of Prohibition is so rare as to be exceptionally valuable when it is rendered. A German settler in Kansas thus writes of his experience of Prohibition in that State: "Like most Germans I was very much opposed to Prohibition before it was adopted in our State. Indeed, my aversion was so great that I earnestly contemplated selling my farm and turning my back on Kansas. Fortunately for me I could not sell. I say fortunately, because I have since found that I was greatly mistaken. The State, instead of going down, as was prophesied by the liquor party, has experienced the height of prosperity. It was said that immigration would cease if Prohibition was adopted, but the reverse took place. Immigration increases every day, and the price of land has raised in value. Farmers are in better circumstances than ever before.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt, of the New York Medical Mission, is making an effort to render aid of a very valuable character to the foreign missionary cause. He is helping young men who have consecrated themselves to missionary work in their medical studies. Experience has proved that medical knowledge is a most efficient aid to the missionary among the heathen; it gives him access to homes otherwise closed against him, and at seasons when the truth of the Gospel is welcomed. Dr. Dowkontt has set apart a floor of his house for the use of students, which he is filling, as means for furnishing are provided by Christian friends. Three young men have offered themselves, and been accepted. One is a young American, whose parents will meet all his expenses. Another is a Waldensian, who has been laboring among the Italians in this city for the past year, and whose expenses will be met by a Christian lady. The third is a native of Switzerland, whose heart has long been set upon mission work, especially in Madagascar; not being possessed of means, he will, for the first year, give lessons in German, Italian, etc., and thus help out his expenses.

An Invitation to Fanatics was Given Last week by a church dignitary. The Rev. Dr. Thorold, Bishop of Rochester, England, who is paying another visit to America, and who is the bearer of a fraternal resolution of sympathy from the Church Temperance Society of England to that of this country, spoke on temperance on September 24th at Grace Church. Religion, he said, must be at the back of all temperance reform, and the first condition of success in this country is that the work be eminently a national one. Added to that must be the creation of a temperance literature that shall be strictly American. A few fanatics upon the subject, he said, would be a great help in pushing along the work.

The Cure of an Incurable of Twenty Years is reported from Georgia. The sufferer is the wife of the Hon. John. A. Wimpey, one of the most prominent Republican politicians of the State. For twenty years Mrs. Wimpey has been an invalid, having been confined a great portion of the time to her bed and unable to walk a step. Of late years she was confined to bed entirely, being unable to lift her hands. She is an estimable woman, and bore her afflictions with rare fortitude, hardly hoping that she would ever be well again. She has lived for several years in Norcross, and has tried all remedies known to medical science for relief in vain. Neither change of atmosphere, the healing waters of mineral springs, nor the learning and experience of professors could bring any relief, and she was regarded by all her acquaintances as incurable. Recently revival services have been held at Norcross, and Mrs. Wimpey, being unable to attend, had her bed wheeled into a front room, where she could better hear the singing in the church. Left alone she prayed earnestly, and to her delight felt her strength returning. She rose and dressed, and feeling able to walk, she went to the church. She was recognized by many friends there, and the services were suspended while she related the cure God had wrought upon her. The whole congregation then joined in a song of praise. Mrs. Wimpey walked home unaided, and has gone about her ordinary duties since then, declaring herself permanently cured.

Two Children were Lost in New York Recently by a gentleman from Washington, D. C. They were visiting in this city, and when the time arrived for their return the father came on to conduct them home. They were respectively seven and nine years old, and were not familiar with the city. The father before returning took the children out for a day's pleasure in Central Park. During the day he drank to excess, and in the evening he went to a hotel, where he registered and left the children while he continued his spree. The next day he had lost all recollection of the hotel where he had left the children. In this dilemma he applied to the police, and Sergeant Brooks sent out an alarm, directing search to be made at hotels for the children. They were found at the Astor Place Hotel, in Third Avenue, and the father started at once for Washington with them. Few parents are so utterly reckless as to so grossly neglect their children, but there is reason to fear that many children are being lost for time and eternity by being left to the care of servants while their parents are away taking their pleasure (1 Samuel 3 : 13).

A Desperate Encounter with a Bear is Reported from Toronto, Ont. Two students from Syracuse, who were on an excursion in Frontinac County, saw a bear in the woods behind a fallen tree. One of them fired at it, and, thinking he had killed it, went around the tree to secure the body. The bear, however, was only wounded, and attacked him viciously. He was unarmed, and for more than ten minutes he struggled with the enraged animal to prevent it hugging or biting him. His companion came to his assistance, but was afraid to shoot, as the bear and the man were rolling on the ground, and he was afraid that in shooting at the bear he would kill his friend. At last he found a heavy club, with which he struck the bear and paralyzed it, and the man being then released, the bear was killed by a well-aimed bullet. Such a conflict typifies the spiritual struggle that often goes on in the soul with a besetting sin, like drunkenness or the opium habit. Supposed to be completely dead, it attacks its victim unawares, and seems to have so firm a hold upon him that only at the sacrifice of his life itself can it be eradicated. In such cases it is only by Christ's power deliverance can come (Mark 9 : 25–27).

A Bishop Thrashing Cowboys is the Subject of a despatch from Omaha published in the Troy Telegram. It states that last month Dr. Potter, who was recently elected Bishop of Nebraska, was making a tour of the cattle country in company with the Chancellor of his Diocese. At Paxton Branch, on the Ogallala Land and Cattle Company's range, they heard that Wilson, a man who had committed an offence of which the vigilance committee took cognizance, had been caught, and was held prisoner at Blue Creek ranch, sixty miles distant. Bishop Potter drove over there the next day, and learned that Wilson was to be killed at sundown. The Bishop implored the two cowboys who were guarding the prisoner to release him, but they were relentless. After pleading and praying with them for a long time Dr. Potter concluded they were past such influence, and wound up by giving them both a thrashing. This done, he unbound Wilson, who straddled a pony and escaped. It is quite an innovation for a bishop to undertake the duty of administering chastisement in that manner. It may be presumed that the Bishop was satisfied that the prisoner deserved to be set at liberty, and took the only effectual way of securing it. In his episcopal duties he doubtless finds many of the captives of Satan for whose liberation he has to wrestle, before, following his Master's example, he can set at liberty "those who are bound" (Isa. 61 : 1).

"THOUGH HE WERE DEAD."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Martha saith unto Him, I know that He shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?"—JOHN 11 : 24–26.

A Stream of Comfort for the Bereaved—Christ's Presence Means Life—Christ's Coming the Hope of the Church—Two Sacred Handkerchiefs—Knocking off the Fetters—II. Comfort for all Believers—Faith an Empty-handed Communicator—A Dog-keeper's Folly—The Endless Life.

MARTHA is a very accurate type of a class of anxious believers. They do believe truly, but not with such confidence as to lay aside their care. They do not distrust the Lord, or question the truth of what He says, yet they puzzle their brain about "How shall this thing be?" and so they miss the major part of the present comfort which the word of the Lord would minister to their hearts if they received it more simply. How? and why? belong unto the Lord. It is matters so as to fulfil His own promises. If we would sit at our Lord's feet with Mary, and consider what He has promised, we should choose a better part than if we ran about with Martha, crying, "How can these things be?"

Martha, you see, in this case, when the Lord Jesus Christ told her that her brother would rise again, replied, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." She was a type, I say, of certain anxious believers, for she set a practical bound to the Saviour's words. "Of course there will be a resurrection, and then my brother will rise with the rest." She concluded that the Saviour could not mean anything beyond that. The first meaning and the commonest meaning that suggests itself to her must be what Jesus means. Is not that the way with many of us? We had a statesman once, and a good man too, who loved reform;* but whenever he had accomplished a little progress, he considered that all was done. We called him at last "Finality John," for he was always coming to an ultimatum, and taking for his motto "Rest, and be thankful." Into that style Christian people too frequently drop with regard to the promises of God. We limit the Holy One of Israel as to the meaning of his words. Of course they mean so much, but we cannot allow that they intend more. It were well if the spirit of progress would enter into our faith, so that we felt within our souls that we had never beheld the innermost glory of the Lord's words of grace.

Martha also had another fault in which she was very like ourselves; she laid the words of Jesus on the shelf, as things so trite and sure that they were of small practical importance. Somehow it is almost as bad to lay up a doctrine in lavender as it is to throw it out of window. When you so believe a truth as to put it to bed and smother it with the bolster of neglect, it is much the same as if you did not believe it at all. An official belief is very much akin to infidelity. Some persons never question a doctrine; that is not their line of temptation; they accept the Gospel as true, but then they never expect to see its promises practically carried out; it is a proper thing to believe, but by no means a prominent, practical factor in actual life. It is true but it is mysterious, misty, mythical, far removed from the realm of practical common-sense. We do with the promises often as

cording to its real value. A gentleman stepping into a poor woman's house saw framed and glazed upon the wall a French note for a thousand francs. He said to the old folks, "How came you by this?" They informed him that a poor French soldier had been taken in by them and nursed until he died, and he had given them that little picture when he was dying as a memorial of him. They thought it such a pretty souvenir that they had framed it, and there it was adorning the cottage wall. They were greatly surprised when they were told that it was worth a sum which would be quite a little fortune for them if they would but turn it into money.

Are we not equally unpractical with far more precious things? Have you not certain of the words of your great Lord framed and glazed in your hearts, and do you not say to yourselves, "They are so sweet and precious?" and yet you have never turned them into actual blessing—never used them in the hour of need. You have done as Martha did when she took the words, "Thy brother shall rise again," and put round about them this handsome frame, "in the resurrection at the last day." Oh, that we had grace to turn God's bullion of Gospel into current coin, and use them as our present spending money!

Moreover, Martha made another blunder, and that was setting the promise in the remote distance. This is this distancing the promises of the Most High. "In the resurrection at the last day"—no doubt she thought it a very long way off, and therefore she did not get much comfort out of it. Brethren, do not refuse the present blessing. Death and heaven, or the advent and the glory, are at your doors. A little while and He that will come shall come, and will not tarry. Think not that the Lord is slack concerning His promise. Do not say in your heart, "My Lord delayeth His coming;" or dream that His words of love are only for the dim future. In the ages to come marvels shall be revealed, but even the present hour is bejewelled with loving-kindness. To-day the Lord has rest, and peace, and joy to give to you. Lose not these treasures by unbelief.

Martha also appears to me to have made the promise unreal and impersonal. "Thy brother shall rise again;" to have realized that would have been a great comfort to her, but she mixes Lazarus up with all the rest of the dead. "Yes, he will rise in the resurrection at the last day; when thousands of millions shall be rising from their graves, no doubt Lazarus will rise with the rest." That is the way with us; we take the promise and say, "This is true to all the children of God." If so it is true to us; but we miss that point.

I beg you to observe how the Lord Jesus Christ in great wisdom dealt with Martha. In the first place, He did not grow angry with her.

HE DID NOT CHIDE

her, though she lacked wisdom—wisdom which she ought to have possessed. I do not think God's people learn much by being scolded; it is not the habit of the great Lord to scold His disciples, and therefore they do not take it well when His servants take upon themselves to rate them. If ever you meet with one of the Lord's own who falls far short of the true ideal of the Gospel, do not bluster and upbraid. Who taught you what you know? He that has taught you did it of His infinite love and grace and pity, and He was very tender with you, for you were doltish enough; therefore be tender with others, and give them line upon line, even as your Lord was gentle toward you. It ill becomes a servant to lose patience where his Master shows so much.

The Lord Jesus, with gentle spirit, proceeded to teach her more of the things concerning Himself. More of Jesus! More of Jesus! That is the sovereign cure for our faults. He revealed Himself to her, that in Him she might behold reasons for a clearer hope and a more substantial faith. How sweetly fell those words upon her ear: "I am the resurrection and the life!" Not "I can get resurrection by my prayers," but "I am, myself, the resurrection." God's people need to know more of what Jesus is, more of the fulness which it has pleased the Father to place in Him. Some of them know quite enough of what they are themselves, and they will break their hearts if they go on reading much longer in that black-letter book.

When our Lord said, "I am the resurrection and the life," He indicated to Martha that resurrection and life were not gifts which He must seek, nor even boons which He must create; but that He Himself was the resurrection and the life; these things were wherever He was. He was the author, and giver, and maintainer of life, and that life was Himself. Poor Martha was looking up into the sky for life, or gazing down into the deeps for resurrection, when the Resurrection and the Life stood before her. She had thought of what Jesus might have done if He had been there before; now let her know what He is at the present moment.

Now, I am going to speak as I am helped of the Spirit; and I shall proceed thus—first, by asking you to view the text as a stream of comfort to Martha and other bereaved persons; and, secondly, to view it as a great deep of comfort to all believers.

I. First, I long for you to view the text as to Martha and other bereaved persons. Observe, in the beginning, that the presence of Jesus Christ means life and resurrection. It meant that to Lazarus. If Jesus comes to Lazarus, Lazarus must live. Had Martha taken the Saviour's words literally, as she should have done, as I have already told you, she would have had immediate comfort from them; and the Saviour intended her to understand them in that sense. Somebody says, "But I do not see that this is any comfort to us, for if Jesus be here, yet it is only a spiritual presence, and we cannot expect to see our dear mother, or child, or husband raised from the dead thereby." I answer that our Lord Jesus is able at this moment to give us back our departed ones, for He is still the resurrection and the life. But let me ask you whether you really wish that Jesus would raise your departed ones from the dead. You say at first, "Of course I do wish it;" but I would ask you to reconsider that decision; for I believe that upon further thought you will say, "No, I could not wish it." There would be serious drawbacks in the return of those whom we have loved best. Do you cry, "Give back my father!

GIVE ME BACK MY FRIEND?"

You know not what you ask. It might be a cause of regret to you as long as they lingered here, for you would each morning think to yourself, "Beloved one, I have brought you out of heaven by my wish. I have robbed you of infinite felicity to gratify myself." For my own part, I had rather that the Lord Jesus should keep the keys of death than that He should lend them to me. My dear ones that lie asleep could be awakened in an instant if the Master thought it best; but it would not be best. It does not seem to me, then, dear friend, that you are one whit behind Martha; and you ought to be comforted while Jesus says to you, "I am the resurrection and the life."

Furthermore, here is comfort which we may each one safely take, namely, that when Jesus comes the dead shall live. The Revised Version has it, "He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live." We do not know when our Lord will descend from heaven, but we do know the message of the angel, "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

THE LORD WILL COME;

we may not question the certainty of His appearing. When He cometh, all His redeemed shall live with Him. The trump of the archangel shall startle the happy sleepers, and they shall wake to put on their beauteous array; the body transformed and made like unto Christ's glorious body shall be once more wrapt about them as the vesture of their perfected and emancipated spirits. Then our brother shall rise again, and all our dear ones who have fallen asleep in Jesus the Lord will bring with him. This is the glorious hope of the Church, wherein we see the death of death, and the destruction of the grave. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

Then we are also told that when Jesus comes, living believers shall not die. After the coming of Christ there shall be no more death for His people. What does Paul say? "Behold, I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." When the Lord comes there will be no more death; we who are alive and remain (as some of us may be—we cannot tell) will undergo a sudden transformation—for flesh and blood, as they are, cannot inherit the kingdom of God—and by that transformation our bodies shall be made meet to be "partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." There shall be no more death then. Here, then, we have with which to wipe the eyes of mourners; when Christ cometh the dead shall live; when Christ cometh those that live shall never die.

But further, I have not made you drink deep enough of this stream yet—I think our Saviour meant that even now His dead are alive. "He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live." Those that believe in Jesus Christ appear to die, but yet they live. They are not in the grave, they are forever with the Lord. They are not unconscious, they are with their Lord in Paradise. Death cannot kill a believer, it can only usher him into a freer form of life. Because Jesus lives, His people live. God is not the God of the dead but of the living; those who have departed have not perished. We laid the precious body in the cemetery, and we set up stones at the head and foot; but we might engrave on them the Lord's words, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." True, an unbelieving generation may laugh us to scorn, but we scorn their laughing.

Again, even now His living do not die. There is an essential difference between the decease of the godly and the death of the ungodly. Death comes to the ungodly man as a penal infliction, but to the righteous as a summons to his Father's palace; to the sinner it is an execution, to the saint an undressing. Death to the wicked is the King of terrors; death to the saint is the end of terrors, the commencement of glory. Why do we dread the process which gives us liberty? I am told that persons who in the cruel ages had lain in prison for years suffered much more in the moment of the knocking off of their fetters than they had endured for months in and yet I suppose that no man languishing in a dungeon would have been unwilling to stretch out his arm or leg, that the heavy chains might be beaten off by the smith. We should all be content to endure that little inconvenience to obtain lasting liberty. Now, such is death—the knocking off of the fetters; yet the iron may never seem to be so truly iron as when that last liberating blow of grace is about to fall. Let us not mind the harsh grating of the key as it turns in the lock; if we understand it aright it will be as music to our ears. Imagine that your last hour is come! The key turns with pain for a moment; but, lo, the bolt is shot! The iron gate is open! The spirit is free!

II. I leave the text now as a stream of comfort for the bereaved, for I wish you to view it as a great deep of

COMFORT FOR ALL BELIEVERS.

I cannot fathom it, any more than I could measure the abyss, but I can invite you to survey it by the help of the Holy Ghost. Methinks, first, this text plainly teaches that the Lord Jesus Christ is the life of His people. We are dead by nature, and you can never produce life out of death; the essential elements are wanting. If you are regarded for a moment as separated from Christ, you are cast forth as a branch and are withered. A member severed from the head is dead flesh and no more. In union to Christ is your life. Oh, that our hearers would understand this! If I conjure up an experience over which I foolishly dote, which puffs me up as so perfect that I need not come to Christ now as a poor empty-handed sinner, I have entered into

THE REALM OF DEATH.

I have introduced into my soul a damning leaven. Away with it! Away with it! Everything of life is put into this golden casket of Christ Jesus; all else is death. We have not a breath of life anywhere but in Jesus, who ever liveth to give life. He saith, "Because I live, ye shall live also," and this is true. We live not for any other reason—not because of anything in us or connected with us, but only because of Jesus.

Now, further, in this great deep to which we would conduct you, faith is the only channel by which we can draw from Jesus our life. "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me;" that is it. Why doth the Lord so continually make faith to be the only link between Himself and the soul? I take it, because faith is a grace which arrogates nothing to itself, and has no operation apart from Jesus, to whom it unites us. You want to conduct the electric fluid, and, in order to this, you find a metal which will not create any action of its own; if it did so, it would disturb the current which you wish to send along it. If it set up an action of its own, how would you know the difference between what came of the metal and what came of the battery? Now, faith is an empty-handed receiver and communicator; it is nothing apart from that upon which it relies, and therefore it is suitable to be a conductor for grace.

When an auditorium has to be erected for a speaker in which he may be plainly heard, the essential thing is to get rid of all echo. When you have no echo, then you have a perfect building; faith makes no noise of its own, it allows the Word to speak. Christ puts His crown on faith's head, exclaiming, "Thy faith hath saved thee;" but faith hastens to ascribe all the glory of salvation to Jesus only. So you see why the Lord selects faith rather than any other grace, because it is a self-forgetting thing. It is best adapted to be the tubing through which the water of life runs, because it will not communicate a flavor of its own, but will just convey the stream purely and simply from Christ to the soul. "He that believeth in me."

Now notice, to the reception of Christ by faith there is no limit. "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever"—I am deeply in love with that word "whosoever." It is a splendid word. A person who kept many animals had some great dogs and some little ones, and in his eagerness to let them enter his house freely he had two holes cut in the door, one for the big dogs and another for the little dogs. You may well laugh, for the little dogs could surely have come in wherever there was room for the larger ones. This "whosoever" is the great opening, suitable for

SINNERS OF EVERY SIZE.

"Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Has any man a right to believe in Christ? The Gospel gives every creature the right to believe in Christ, for we are bidden to preach it to every creature, with this command, "Hear, and your soul shall live." Every man has a right to believe in Christ, because he will be damned if he does not, and he must have a right to do that which will bring him into condemnation if he does it not. It is written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," and that makes it clear that I, whoever I may be, as I have a right to endeavor to escape from damnation, have a right to avail myself of the blessed command, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and live." Oh, that "whosoever," that hole in the door for the big dog! Do not forget it! Come along with you, and put your trust in Christ. If you can only get linked with Christ you are a living man; if but a finger touches His garment's hem you are made whole. Only the touch of faith, and the virtue flows from Him to you, and He is to you the resurrection and the life.

I desire you to notice that there is no limit to this power. Before I was ill this time, and even since, I have had to deal with such a swarm of despairing sinners, that if I have not pulled them up they have pulled me down. I have been trying to speak very large words for Christ when I have met with those

DISCONSOLATE ONES.

I hear one say, "How far can Christ be life to a sinner? How low will the grace of God go? will it descend to summer heat? will it touch the freezing point? will it go to zero?" Yes, it will go below the lowest conceivable point—lower than any instrument can indicate; it will go below the zero of death. If you believe in Jesus, though you are not only wrong, but dead, yet shall you live.

But the poor creature fetches a sigh, and cries, "Sir, it is not only that I have no feeling, but I am become objectionable and obnoxious to everybody. I am a weariness to myself and to others. I am sure when I come to tell you my troubles you must wish me at Jericho, or somewhere else far away." Now, I admit that such a thought has occurred to us sometimes when we have been very busy, and some poor soul has grown prosy with rehearsing his seven-times-repeated miseries; but if you were to get more wearisome still, if you were to become so bad that people would as soon see a corpse as see you, yet remember Jesus says, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Ay, if you went so far as to go in and out among men like an unquiet ghost, so that everybody got out of your way, it would not put you beyond the promise, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

To conclude, if you once do believe in Christ, and come to live, there is this sweet reflection for you, "Whosoever liveth and believeth

SHALL NEVER DIE."

Our Arminian friends say that you may be a child of God to-day and a child of the devil to-morrow. Write out that statement, and place at the bottom of it the name "Arminius," and then put the scrap of paper into the fire; it is the best thing you can do with it, for there is no truth in it. Jesus says, "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Here is a very literal translation—"And every one who lives and believes on me, in no wise shall die for ever." This is from "The Englishman's Greek New Testament," and nothing can be better. The believer may pass through the natural change called death, as far as his body is concerned; but as for his soul it cannot die, for it is written, "I give unto my sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." These are not "ifs" and "buts" and faint hopes; but they are dead certainties, nay, living certainties, out of the mouth of the living Lord Himself. You get the life of God in your soul, and you shall never die.

"Do you mean that I may do as I like, and live in sin?" No, man, I mean nothing of the sort; what right have you to impute such teaching as that to me? I mean that you shall not love sin and live in it, for that is death; but you shall live unto God. Your likes shall be so radically changed that you shall abhor evil all your days, and long to be holy as God is holy; and you shall be kept from transgression, and shall not go back to wallow in sin. If in some evil hour you backslide, yet shall you be restored; and the main current of your life shall be from the hour of your regeneration toward God, and holiness, and heaven. The angels that rejoiced over you when you repented made no mistake: they shall go on to rejoice till they welcome you amid the everlasting songs and hallelujahs of the blessed at the right hand of God.

Believest thou this? Come, poor soul, believest thou this? Who are you? That does not matter, you can get into the "whosoever." That ark will hold all God's Noahs. What have you done? One said to me the other day, "I should like to tell you some of my sins!" I answered quickly, "I would like you would not; I have enough of my own without being infected with yours." What is any man that he should have the filth of another man's drains poured into his ear? No, no; confess to God, but not to man unless you have wronged him, and confession of the wrong is due to him.

"Ah," said one, "you don't know what I am." No, and what you are; but if you are so far gone that there seems to be not even a ghost of a shade of a shadow of a hope anywhere about you, yet if you believe in Jesus you shall live. Trust the Lord Jesus Christ, for He is worthy to be trusted. Throw yourself upon Him, and He will carry you in His bosom. Cast your whole weight upon His atonement; it will bear the strain. Hang on Him as the vessel hangs on the nail, and seek no other support. Depend upon Christ with all your might just as you now are, and as the Lord liveth you shall live, and as Christ reigneth you shall reign over sin, and as Christ cometh to glory you shall partake of that glory forever and ever. Amen.

THE LATE MR. JOSEPH LIVESEY.

THE town of Preston, England, claimed Joseph Livesey, the total abstinence pioneer, as one of its oldest tradesmen, as he had for more than half a century been prominent in every public movement for the benefit of the town, especially those of a benevolent character. But the reputation of Mr. Livesey is by no means local; all over the civilized world his name is honored and loved as one of the most noble men of his age. He is probably best known as the "Father of Teetotalism," for in that cause his prolific pen was engaged for sixty years. On Tuesday, September 2d, after an illness of several weeks, he died, at the advanced age of ninety years, and the following Friday he was interred in the cemetery at Preston.

Mr. Livesey was born on March 5th, 1794. His birthplace was the village of Walton-le-Dale, only one mile from Preston; at seven years of age he was left an orphan, and was indebted to his grandfather for a home; the latter, who was a small cotton manufacturer, was plunged by misfortune into poverty, and the orphan lad was doomed to work in a damp and dismal cellar as a hand-loom weaver. In that place he had to earn his daily bread and to educate himself, which he did by fixing the books he managed to procure upon a part of his loom, thus working with hands and feet, and, at the same time, truly acquiring knowledge under difficulties.

His first bookcase, consisting of two pieces of wood suspended by cords fixed to their ends, contained some odd volumes of periodicals and a Jones's "Theological Repository," which he had bought secondhand. "I shall never forget," he tells us, "as I descended the cellar steps, how I sometimes turned back to look at my newly acquired treasure." In 1811 Joseph Livesey joined the little Baptist church then meeting in Chapel Street, Preston, and he took a great interest in the services. When only eighteen years of age he protested against the free use of drink by ministers and members at an ordination service, but was only laughed at for his pains. The inconsistencies of his religious associates sorely vexed and troubled him.

On the 30th of May, 1815, or within three weeks of the battle of Waterloo, Mr. Livesey was married to Jenny Williams, also a Baptist. He was just turned twenty-one, and she was nineteen and a half. They were married at Liverpool, and made their way to Walton the next morning. By the death of a relative Joseph came into a lgacy worth $150, and with this he furnished a cottage, which he rented at $35 a year. From the first "Jenny" was a helpmeet indeed. Besides attending to her household duties, she wound the bobbins for three weavers —her husband, his uncle, and grandfather; and, Mr. Livesey says, "I soon learned the truth of the old saying, 'In taking a wife you had better have a fortune in her than with her,' and," he adds, "if men were always guided by this, and the females knew it, we should have happier marriages, and the girls would aim at acquiring substantial instead of artificial attractions."

Becoming a prosperous tradesman, Mr. Livesey did not forget his less fortunate fellows. Their difficulties had been his difficulties. The iron of poverty had entered into his soul. An ardent friend of political reform, a hater of injustice and oppression, he was also a strong believer in self-help. He started a night-school, founded a building society, aided other benevolent associations, and in 1825 published "An Address to the Poorest Classes," which contained much good advice upon household management, and strongly inculcated industry, thrift, and sobriety. The pamphlet commanded a wide circulation.

He published many other original works continuing his business at the same time. When asked on one occasion how he contrived to do so much work, he said: "I am entirely dependent upon my business for support, and when my other engagements are also taken to account, I shall be believed when I say that nothing but the pleasure I felt in the work could have induced me to persevere. You want to know how I find time for all my work; and my answer is, the time which others spend at the pot-house, or in visiting or attending parties, I spend in active pursuits; and, never taking any liquor at home or elsewhere, my head is seldom out of order; I lose no time in the evening to extinguish my reason, or in the morning to try to regain it."

Amid the variety of topics which suggested themselves to the reformer, he often addressed his "dear friends" on temperance. In one of such addresses, he says: "While drinking continues, poverty and vice will prevail; and, until this is abandoned, no regulation, no efforts, no authority under heaven, can raise the condition of the working classes. It is worse than a plague or a pestilence, and the man is no friend to his country that does not lift up his voice and proclaim his example against it. So shocked have I been with the effects of intemperance, and so convinced of the evil tendency of moderate drinking, that since the commencement of 1831 I have never tasted ale, wine, or ardent spirits. I know others who are pursuing the same resolution, and whose only regret is that they did not adopt this course twenty years since." Shortly after this, the 1st of September, 1832, Mr. Livesey signed the famous pledge of which he was the author. He continued faithful to it for fifty-two years, and, at the age of ninety, was as earnest a teetotaler as he had been at thirty-five.

Some years ago I made the voyage from New York to San Francisco on the sailing vessel Saucy Sadie, Captain Trenhorn. It was my first long voyage, and was taken as a restorative after a long and painful illness. The captain was my old friend and schoolfellow, who, learning that I had been ordered to sea by my physicians, insisted on my accepting his hospitality. The offer proved his kindness of heart, for an invalid landsman is by no means a desirable companion on board ship.

The first few days of the voyage I passed in my berth, suffering the torments of sea-sickness, and the captain and one of the men waited on me by turns, with all the kindness and tenderness of a woman. Gradually I gained strength, and was able to spend most of my time on deck. I soon found that the Lord had work for me there, and that there was no reason why I should be idle when separated from my beloved work at home. Many opportunities occurred for speaking a word for Jesus to the men, who, though a rough lot, in which many nationalities were represented, were uniformly kind and courteous to the captain's invalid guest.

One man especially interested me. He was an able seaman, though, I fancied, not a sailor from boyhood. He was a Scotchman, who on joining the ship gave his name as James Ferguson, but he was known as "Scottie" by the crew. This man was exceedingly reserved, always polite and respectful, but averse to conversation, especially on religious subjects. I was drawn to him by a certain refinement in his manner and by an admission he reluctantly made that he knew Greek, which admission I extracted from him when I found him with a Greek Testament in his hand, he having picked it up from the place on deck where I had laid it down for a few minutes while I went below with Captain Trenhorn.

"Yes," he said, he was considered a good Greek scholar twenty years ago, but it was ten years since he had opened a book in that language. How or where he learned it he did not say, but hurried away to another part of the ship on some duty which I believed to be feigned, to prevent my questioning him further. But my curiosity and interest were excited, for I felt sure that this man was not a common sailor.

I spoke to the captain about Ferguson, but could gain no light on the subject that was perplexing me. The captain knew only that he had sailed with him on several voyages, always did his duty well, had once saved a boy from drowning at imminent risk to himself, always volunteered for any service where there was unusual danger, and seemed reckless of his life. Also, a very unusual trait among men of his class, he would never touch his allowance of grog, and had adhered to his resolve in spite of banter and hard words.

This threw no light on the mystery I was confident there was in Ferguson's history and which I was anxious to discover, not for the sake of prying into his affairs, but because it seemed to me that he was not in his proper position and place in the world, and was intended for something better than he was now doing. I prayed much and thought much about the man, and was led to the conclusion that some grievous sin, some disgraceful act had banished him from society. This impression grew upon me, and seemed not to have been reached by my own reason but to have been imparted to me, and I felt so sure of it that I gave up my intention of trying to penetrate the mystery, and thought only of how best to present to him the infinite, inexhaustible love and compassion of God.

An opportunity occurred soon. It happened that the captain had found it necessary to make an example of an incorrigible evildoer among the crew by putting him in irons. It had occurred at an early hour of the day, when I was not on deck, and that night I asked Ferguson about it. He thought the captain had acted quite justly, and said he wondered that he had borne so long with the man's faults. Did he think he would be restored to his place in the ship after his term of punishment had expired, I asked. No, Ferguson thought not. He would be disgraced in some way. Taking that as a basis, I spoke to him of Peter's restoration after his denial of the Saviour, and of David being forgiven his heinous sin, and incidentally remarked that no sinner had ever been found who sought forgiveness honestly and failed to receive it. Those only fell hopelessly who were too proud to ask God's mercy.

The Morocco Case Found in Ferguson's Chest.

"Or too humble," added Ferguson.

"No," I said, "that can never be; a man who fancies he is kept back by humility is deceived by Satan. The humble man goes to his Father, no matter how heinous his guilt, and he is welcomed. God is pleased when men, recognizing how vile they are, place so high an estimate on His boundless mercy as to think it is great enough to cover their crime."

"Crimes against light and knowledge are specifically excluded," said Ferguson, in the tone of a man familiar with the subject.

"I am sure they are not," I replied. "I know the passage well to which you refer, but the two instances I mentioned just now prove that the construction you place on it is wrong. David and Peter stood in their respective ages at the very summit of spiritual privilege. They both fell in a way exceptionally disgraceful, and both were forgiven and restored. It was not found 'impossible to renew' them."

"You think, then, there is hope for the vilest reprobates—men whose sin is aggravated by their superior knowledge and privileges?" Ferguson's face as he asked the question I shall never forget. He waited breathlessly for my answer, and his eyes had a strange, unearthly light in them.

"I do not think at all about it," I said; "I am sure a broken, contrite heart was never carried to God yet and rejected, and never will be."

The man forgot my presence; tears rushed to his eyes, he leaned his head against the mast near which we were standing, and sobbed audibly. As I moved away, feeling my presence would be an intrusion at such a time, I heard him say, "I will arise and go unto my Father." I went below soon afterward, but it was long before I fell asleep. More than once I rose and prayed for that man on whom the Holy Spirit was working.

A storm was rising, which before morning became a perfect hurricane. I was too ill to go upon deck during the continuance of the storm, which lasted two days and nights before it blew itself out. Just before the sun rose on the third day the captain came hurriedly to my berth and asked me if I was well enough to see a dying sailor, who earnestly begged me to come to him. I dressed quickly, and followed my friend. I was distressed to find that the man was Ferguson, who had fallen from one of the yards to the deck, and sustained fatal injuries. It was easy to see he had not many minutes to live. He held out his hand to me as I entered, and said: "You will fulfil a dying man's wish?"

"Whatever you want done I will do faithfully to the full extent of my power," I answered.

"Thank you. Write down an address."

I took my pencil and wrote the address of a lady in Scotland, as Ferguson dictated it.

"She is my mother," he said. "It is fifteen years since she heard of me. Write to her when I am gone, and say that I am dead. Do not say how or where—it would grieve her. But say God in His mercy sent you to me as a messenger, and that, led by you, I found forgiveness and died in peace. Send with your letter her portrait. It is in my chest—the captain will give it you—God in heaven bless you for your message." Those were his last words. He died with a smile of peace on his face.

Captain Trenhorn told me Ferguson wished all his clothes and the money he had saved divided among his shipmates. I sat at a distance while the dead man's chest was brought on deck, and the captain portioned out its contents. I looked anxiously at them, and at last saw the sailor who was on his knees before the chest handing the articles to the captain take out an oval morocco case. I felt sure that was the portrait. The man beckoned one of his shipmates, and handing it to him bade him bring it to me. I opened it, and saw the face of an old lady, still beautiful and with a look of wonderful tenderness in her eyes. This portrait I mailed with a brief note, stating exactly what her dead son wished. I refrained from giving her my address, lest she should seek to know from me the details of his death. His secret I never learned, and I never desired to know it. It was sufficient for me that, led by the Holy Spirit, I had been enabled to lead a wanderer back to his Father's house.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Church Troubles.

THERE was a more perilous rock in Carl's course than the darkening of the great man's countenance. It will be difficult to give Miss Waldron credit for conscientiousness in what is about to be narrated, but it is necessary to do so. Like the best and wisest among us, she was self-deceived at times, and saw through the fog of her own feelings. She had loved Carl, had looked up to him with an admiration removed only by a step from worship. But her love for him died when he told her that he loved Hester, who seemed to her far below herself in culture and spiritual attainment. She could not reconcile in her own mind her conception of Carl as the strong, whole-souled spiritual guide with the realization of him captivated by a pretty face and a simple, guileless manner. Her love died, the halo departed, and Carl sank in her estimation to the level of common humanity. He was a weaker man than she had thought him. If he were weak in one thing he would be weak in others. He must be watched. So Miss Waldron thought, and she dropped her rôle of his disciple and became his critic.

At the beginning of the present century the Congregational churches were strongly Calvinistic. From all their pulpits there thundered the essential doctrines which seem to spirits more liberal, harsh and cruel. These latter had not denied the doctrines of election, divine sovereignty and predestination, but held it unnecessary to be continually dwelling upon them.

Time passed and the preachers began to dwell more upon the infinite love of God and to preach less frequently of the miseries of those whom God had not chosen and elected. Preachers who had read deeply of non-Calvinistic theology, who had been highly educated, did not openly deny the doctrines of Calvin, but they did not preach them so often and were more earnest in proclaiming "Whosoever will, let him come." They were for the most part in city churches, and in churches where the congregations were refined and cultured. In those churches Calvinism still remained ostensibly the creed of the church, but it was gradually becoming obsolete. In the rural churches where the pastors were old men, bred in the old order of things, and where the people still held firmly to the Calvinistic doctrines, those doctrines were taught still in all their bald harshness. Such was Little Aston, where for so long Mr. Watson, a rigid Calvinist, had dwelt with delight on the Calvinism he loved.

Carl, on the other hand, had labored to lead his people to holiness of life, and to that realization of God's love which would enter into every thought, and duty, and occupation of the day, and had let the doctrine of election severely alone. He did not deny that it was true; he scarcely knew as yet whether he held it or not. He was seeking light. At present his duty was that of the "ambassador for Christ," beseeching men to be reconciled to God, and he did it earnestly and with his whole heart. But he had never preached a single sermon at Little Aston on the doctrine which Mr. Watson had made his chief theme.

As Miss Waldron in her disenchanted state watched Carl, she suddenly realized this omission and called her father's attention to it. Mr. Waldron, like the other members of the church had not remarked it; but now that his daughter mentioned it, he too wondered that he should not have observed the omission. The leaven dropped in the flour worked there silently. To one and another member Mr. Waldron mentioned his fear that their pastor was not sound in doctrine, and pointed out the lack of Calvinism in his discourses. Miss Waldron in her classes took care to supply the omission of the pastor by presenting the old doctrines more prominently, and the young people who heard her contrasted her teaching with that of their pastor and wondered which they were to believe. The older and more influential members of the church became increasingly dissatisfied, while the younger grew in love for the young preacher.

Such a condition of affairs could not last long, and at last a church-meeting was called, at which Carl was not present, to consider the matter. Then Mr. Waldron openly stated his fears. For the first time in many years John Morley rose to speak. Since his trouble he had attended all the meetings more from force of habit than from other motive, and had been always silent. Now, however, he felt it his duty to speak.

Deferring to Mr. Waldron, and admitting that his remarks were justified by the absence of Calvinistic doctrine from their pastor's sermons, he appealed to the conscience of the Church. Had not its members grown in grace under Mr. Bramwell's ministry? Had not the young people whom he saw around him been brought to the knowledge of the truth by God's blessing on his labors? The Holy Spirit was owning his efforts, and he, for one, was content with preaching under which Christians grew holier and sinners were brought to Jesus. True, none more than he enjoyed "the strong meat" of Calvinistic theology, but he could dispense with it for the more practical teaching which God was blessing. Finally he urged the church to judge of the preaching by its fruits and to have confidence in their young pastor.

John Morley's speech had its effect on many; but there were others, and they formed the majority of the church, who were not convinced. One said that Calvinism was the distinctive feature of the denomination, and that if Mr. Bramwell was an Arminian he was out of place, and should preach in a Methodist church. Another said that he would not continue his membership of any church of which the pastor dishonored the faith of his fathers by preaching less than a full Gospel, and many more followed on the same side.

The meeting ended in a committee of three being appointed, Mr. Waldron and two others, to wait upon the pastor and expostulate with him, and to demand that in a sermon on some verse of the ninth chapter of Romans he should define his position.

Carl Bramwell received the committee on the following day. He met them courteously, and listened to their remarks with silent attention. As he made no reply, and did not respond to the demand for the special sermon, otherwise than that he would consider it and must have time for thought, one of the committee, a prosperous grocer, who prided himself on his theological learning and his bluff honesty, said:

"It is no use mincing the matter, Mr. Bramwell. We mean business. Either you must prove yourself a sound Calvinist or you must resign. We do not mean to have any man preach heresy in our church."

"I thought it was the Lord's church," said Carl, sadly. "It appears I was wrong; I think I had better resign. But I will think the matter over and try to obtain divine guidance. You shall hear from me in a few days."

One week from that day Carl Bramwell had written his letter of resignation, and had called a meeting of the church to receive it. How much it had cost him to write the letter no one knew. The Little Aston Church was but a small one, and its minister had not so large a sphere for usefulness as Carl had hoped to fill; but he had loved it, and had worked honestly and prayerfully for its good. Now he must leave it. He must step out of his pulpit with the brand of heresy on his brow, and he might even have to leave the ministry, for what Church would invite a pastor rejected by a Church so insignificant as Little Aston? He was sitting, melancholy and depressed, in his study on the evening when the Church was in meeting, debating whether his resignation should be accepted, when the door opened, and John Morley entered and seized his hand in an affectionate grasp.

"I could not stay after your letter was read," said John Morley. "Do you know all that is likely to befall you? Do you know what reports will go out against you to the other churches?"

"I foresee all," answered Carl, with a profound sigh, which was almost a sob.

"Are you prepared to enter some other denomination?" he asked. "You would be welcomed among many; but they would not be the people of your fathers."

"No," he answered, with an aspect of sad resolution. "I cannot change the creed I received from my forefathers. I must remain among my own people, even if I cease to be a minister among them."

"Then what will become of you? how will you live?" asked John Morley.

"God knows," said Carl, solemnly.

"My boy," continued John Morley, sadly, "ten years ago I was comparatively a rich man, and I wish I were so still, for your sake. But I have few possessions now except debts and my Hester. Still, give an ear to me. If you should be put out of the ministry, there could be no occupation more suited to you than mine. You may be a student and a scholar, if you are a bookseller. Nay, you may yourself become a writer of books. Come to me, then. My business was once good enough, and in young hands, like yours, it would thrive again. Do not despise it, Carl. It seems to me as if you might lift me out of my Slough of Despond. But this is only if you should fail in getting another charge. I trust another pulpit will soon be given to you."

John Morley had spoken hurriedly and stammeringly, and Carl had kept silent in amazement. But when he ended, and stretched out his trembling hand to him, Carl caught it eagerly, and bowed down his head upon it to hide his tears.

"Despise it!" he cried, "your home would be like a heaven to me. You love me, then? You would take me as your son?"

"With all my heart, my boy," said John Morley, laying his other hand tenderly upon the young man's head.

"And I accept your offer with all my heart," said Carl, after a brief silence. "You know I believe myself called by God to this ministry; but if He gives me no place in another church, I will return here gladly, as freely to you as to a father. We will confront the world together; and it will go hard with me indeed, if I do not win bread for you and Hester, as well as for myself."

A brighter look was upon John Morley's face than Carl had ever seen there. He asked him to walk home with him, as if he shrank from traversing a second time the streets to which he had been so long a stranger; and Carl accompanied him in a trance of mingled joy and sadness. The dark gables of John Morley's house, standing out against the darkness of the sky, possessed a new beauty for him. Even the dismal sitting-room, with its worn-out furniture, had a glory about it. He could very well pass a blissful life here with Hester. The future was no longer so dreary and blank to him; for if he were compelled to relinquish the lawful ambition of his calling, here would be his happiness as well as scope for his scholarly pursuits. He was already painting the coming years in bright colors, while he watched John Morley light his lamp, when he saw him casting an anxious and nervous glance at the black panes of the uncurtained window.

"Carl," he whispered, as if fearful of being overheard by some one without, "I have a fancy some nights of a face which looks in upon me out of the dark. I have never spoken of it to Hester, lest a child like her should be frightened. But look now at yonder corner."

Carl looked earnestly, and detected in the thick darkness of the night the wan outline of Rose's face, far enough from the casement to be only a dim and indistinct sketch. But it was there, with far-off eyes, gazing in upon her husband. A thrill of dread and compassion for them both ran through him. If John Morley should only resolve to verify for himself the reality of this haunting face, what would happen? He fixed his eyes more keenly upon the apparition, and advanced a step or two nearer the window, and it vanished suddenly into the darker shades of the night.

"You may be a little nervous and fanciful," he said; "you should have a curtain to this window. These fancies are not good for you."

"Nay, I like the night to stare in upon me," he replied gloomily. "I wonder, at times, if it sees any creature as like itself as I am; neither sun nor stars in many days appearing and no small tempest lying on me. No, no. Let that face, as well as the night, stare in to see what sort of a wretch lives here."

He sat down on his own chair, with his gray face half turned from the window, and the full light of the lamp falling upon it. He sank into a long, dreamy fit of reverie, while Carl watched anxiously the black, blank casement beyond him. The pale shadow of John Morley's wife looked in no more; but Carl, before going away, resolved to warn Rose of the risk she ran in thus venturing to gaze in upon the hearth she had forsaken and lost forever.

Mr. Waldron's first action, after having performed the duty of reading to the church Carl's resignation, and writing to inform him that the church accepted it, was to write at once to Dr. Hervey, the principal of the college, and entreat him to do all in his power to procure the young discarded minister a new charge. He found it a very difficult matter to explain his own conduct; but what is there that cannot be explained, almost to satisfaction, when it is a self-explanation which is given? Nothing would give Mr. Waldron greater pleasure than to see Carl in a position where his active and energetic mind could find more congenial hearers; and if the doctor could hit upon any plan for advancing his interests, he would do anything in his power to further them.

In the mean time, David Scott came down to take Carl's place in the pulpit, and to be patronized by Miss Waldron; while he stood on one side, and saw David drive away in her carriage, and himself only acknowledged by a freezing bow, strangled in its birth. Carl laughed at times, and chafed at times; and then repented of both natural emotions with a sincere effort to gain the mastery over nature. Annie felt the same, and yielded without any attempt at all to conquer herself; she only longed for some opportunity of speaking with feminine fidelity to her former friend. Robert came no more to Grant's house, though he was cordial with Grant himself, when he met him.

It became a question with Carl whether he should not at once accept John Morley's offer. He had so modest an opinion of himself that it did not seem beneath him to condescend to the business of a bookseller; and he spent the greater portion of his time in John Morley's house, with the idea that he was learning something of it. He drew closer to every member of the isolated household. Once again, as she went about the house, Hester sang gravely, but sweetly, songs which stirred his heart with the most delicious tremor. A blessed calm visited the desolate home. Even John Morley's worn face and sunken eyes seemed to catch a reflection of the pervading peace, as if he had at last consented to a truce with his tormenting memories. Carl began to think that his pastorate was there, and that the little flock given into his care numbered only John Morley and Hester and the lost and banished one, hidden from the sight of all men.

SOLOMON'S CHOICE.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 19, 1 Kings 3 : 5-15. Golden Text, Prov. 4 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Solomon's First Regal Act—An Acknowledgment of his Dependence—A Choice of Blessings—The Same Privilege Offered now—The Hindering Unbelief—Solomon's Response—Diffidence a Sign of Wisdom—God's Answer—Wisdom Given—Promised to Praying Believers.

GOD gave David his choice of judgments, but to Solomon He gave a choice of blessings. Solomon began his reign well, "The Lord his God was with him, and magnified him exceedingly" (II Chron. 1 : 1). "And Solomon loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of David his father: only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places." God had commanded that sacrifices should be offered before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and that the blood should be sprinkled upon the altar of the Lord, and the fat burned for a sweet savor unto the Lord (Lev. 17 : 1-9). It may be that in this disobedience Solomon was laying the foundation for his sad falling away in after life. But it is blessed to mark how as a king was to gather his people together for a national act of worship. He, a young man of eighteen, leading a consecration service, to which he called all the chief civil and military officers, "the captains of thousands and of hundreds," "the judges," and "every governor in all Israel, the chief of the fathers." The young king manifested without delay his confidence that a higher authority and a mightier power than his was over Israel; and he let those in responsible positions, both old and young, know that he acted only as the delegate of God. Solomon gathered these leaders of the people together to the place of sacrifice, the brazen altar which stood before the door of the tabernacle. By his offering of a thousand burnt offerings, Solomon and the people signified the fullest dedication of themselves unto the Lord.

"IN THAT NIGHT

did God appear unto Solomon, and said unto him, Ask what I shall give thee" (II Chron. 1 : 7). Are we awake to the fact that every one of us who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ is in precisely the same position as Solomon was? "Ask, and it shall be given you . . . for every one that asketh receiveth" (Matt. 7 : 7, 8); "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them" (Mark 11 : 24). "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, He may give it you" (John 15 : 16). "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full" (John 16 : 23, 24). Do these words of our blessed Lord's, and many similar ones, mean what they say? If so, why are we not asking and receiving that our joy may be full, and that we may make the joy of Jesus full by our trusting Him? It is just our miserable, wicked, unworthy unbelief, which hinders our loving God from giving. We do not really give Him credit for meaning what He says.

It was not when Solomon was urging some great request that God so spoke to him; it was when his heart overflowed with God's goodness to him, and he brought the representatives of his kingdom to His feet. He was in the spirit of thanksgiving, not of supplication. Many of us are so occupied with our prayers, and whether they are or are not earnest enough—whether we have or have not faith enough, that we have no attention left to give to God. And yet it is when our eye is upon Him, and off ourselves, that we can take in what He has to say to us. There is in the thought that the God of this vast universe should put Himself at the disposal of such puny creatures as we are, and yet Himself hath said it; and it is no mere figure of speech, but a solid glorious fact, that as soon as we take the place of humble, trustful recipients, He, our God and Father, gives us our heart's desire.

SOLOMON'S FIRST RESPONSE

was thanksgiving for the past, "Thou hast showed unto thy servant David my father great mercy, according as he walked before Thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with Thee; and Thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that Thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day." All this Solomon reckoned as the faithful keeping of God's promises to David. Oh, how it strengthens faith when we remember God's faithfulness to us in the past, how impossible we see it is for Him to fail us, and how sure it makes us that apparent failure is only the devil's misrepresentation of our God! "And now, O Lord my God, Thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father." The king sees God's hand in his coming to the throne, not David's, nor Nathan's, nor Bathsheba's. "And I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in." It is not often that we hear a young man speak thus. Generally diffidence is found among those who are the most advanced. Those who speak the most absolutely about facts of science, history, etc., are frequently those who make the most egregious mistakes. Real knowledge so acquaints us with our own ignorance that we are more ready to learn than to teach. And it is especially so as regards the knowledge of God. He "who of God is made unto us Wisdom," was perfect in diffidence as in all else, and He said, "I can of mine own self do nothing" (John 5 : 30). It was already the greatest mark of grace, the that Solomon could take this low place, nearly down to the level of Jesus Himself. It was the lesson which Paul learned through the buffeting of the messenger of Satan, "When I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. 12 : 9).

"And thy servant is in the midst of thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people, that cannot be numbered nor counted for multitude." How different this from David's spirit when he numbered the people! David had in this matter walked after the flesh; Solomon walked by faith, for he used God's own language (Gen. 13 : 16; 15 : 5). "Give therefore thy servant an understanding [or hearing] heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad: for who is able to judge this thy so great a people?"

This was virtually to give up the reins of government to God and suffer himself to be guided step by step. It was to take the place which Jesus took as Man, when He said, "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary; He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned. The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back" (Isa. 50 : 4, 5). It is this "hearing heart" which is the choicest gift we can ask or have, either for our directly spiritual work, our business, our home life, or for our own soul's well-being.

Surely Solomon was "praying in the Holy Ghost;" he let God lead him, instead of taking the lead and expecting God to follow. "And the speech pleased the Lord, that Solomon had asked this thing. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies; but had asked for thyself understanding to discern [or hear] judgment; Behold, according to thy words." How was Solomon to be sure of God's answer? Perhaps he did not feel any wiser than before. Very likely he felt more foolish and ignorant, but he believed the word of God which He had spoken, and events proved that he was justified in so doing. How many blessings have we lost, not for want of asking, but for want of taking our God at His Word, and believing we received! Oh, how often have we forgotten the condition, "shall not doubt in his heart" (Mark 11 : 23)! God told Solomon that He had given him a hearing heart, so that there was none like him before or after. And, just like Himself, He had given him what he forebore to ask—"riches and honor," and conditionally "length of days."

How can we be sure that Solomon believed in God's fulfilment of His Word? By his acting upon it. When he awoke, and the manifested presence of God was gone, he "came to Jerusalem, and stood before the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and offered up burnt offerings, and offered peace offerings, and made a feast to all his servants." This he would not have done had he been uncertain about the answer to his petition. He did not wait to feel wise, but rejoiced that he was so, because God had said it; and when, soon after, he was called to decide a very hard case, the which God had given him was manifest. "All Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment." Solomon's counsel to us by the Holy Ghost is this, "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." And the Spirit of God through the Apostle James exhorts us, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Bombardment of Kelung in China was commenced by the French admiral on October 1st. He telegraphed to his government that he "commenced operations by occupying the height of St. Clement. The Chinese forces, after a fairly warm engagement on Wednesday night, evacuated two of their works westward of the height, which we afterward occupied. I am now fortifying them, and shall operate on Saturday against their works eastward of the height. Our loss was four killed, one missing, and thirteen wounded. The Chinese loss is estimated at from eighty to one hundred killed and from two hundred to three hundred wounded." A serious riot among the coolies occurred at Hong Kong on October 3d. Some of the boatmen refused to convey cargo to the French ships, and a general strike followed, resulting in disorders. The populace maltreated the police, who endeavored to preserve order. The military finally quelled the disturbance. Several natives were killed and a number were wounded. The excitement has subsided. At Shanghai it is reported that the natives in Shangtung have killed an English colporteur named Bagnall. Lord Lyons, British Ambassador at Paris, has been instructed to protest to Prime Minister Ferry against the action of the French fleet in searching the English trading steamers in the Formosa Channel.

The British Naval Department has Heeded the protests of the Radical party in the matter of royal patronage. It, last week, refused to grant Queen Victoria's request to have her cousin, the Prince of Leiningen, made an admiral. The yearly pay of an admiral is $10,950. The prince's most notable exploit occurred when he was in command of the Queen's yacht some years ago, and ran down a vessel in broad daylight. The Naval Department would inevitably have incurred the censure of Parliament, the press, and the public, had it consented to make the prince an admiral.

News that General Gordon has Left Khartoum and assumed offensive operations against the Mahdi was cabled last week. A despatch received by the British Government states that Gordon suddenly appeared with a considerable force before Berber, which some months ago fell, by treachery, into the Mahdi's hands. General Gordon bombarded Berber for some time, effected an entry into the place, and recaptured it. The rebels and the hostile inhabitants fled when the bombardment ceased. The fall of Berber will enable Colonel Kitchener to reach General Gordon from Dongola and to ascertain his wishes regarding the Nile expedition and his opinion as to what necessity there may be for the Nile expedition going to Khartoum. This conference may result in the abandonment of the Nile expedition altogether. On his way to Berber General Gordon stopped at Shendy. He found that place deserted. He nailed to the trees a proclamation offering pardon to all who would lay down their arms. General Gordon's force was in boats, which were towed by four steamers. A document has also been published purporting to be the diary of a resident in Khartoum during the siege. From that it appears that General Gordon held the place with the utmost difficulty, boring mines under the besiegers' position, and fighting almost daily. His troops were disaffected and provisions scarce. General Gordon issued paper money.

The Pope has Excommunicated his Chaplain. Signor Campbello, whose conversion from Romanism was recently mentioned in these columns. He and his associate, Signor Savarese, have opened an Evangelical church in Rome. The Pope's reasons for denouncing the church are that it uses the Italian language in conducting its services, impugns the infallibility of the Pope, sympathizes with Père Hyacinthe, disbelieves in the real presence, refuses to invoke the Virgin, etc. The decree denounces with major excommunication all persons who join or persuade others to join the church.

An Exceptional Honor to Miss Clara Barton was paid by the International Conference of the Red Cross associations at Geneva. Miss Barton attended as a delegate from the Government of the United States; but her personal merits, so well known to the European societies by her work in the Franco-German war of 1870, won her a personal tribute. The Conference ordered that there be entered upon its record the following complimentary notice of the work done by Miss Barton: "Resolved, that Miss Clara Barton, President of the American Association of the Red Cross, is deserving of recognition for the humanitarian work she has done." The Conference decided to prepare for the eventuality of war, in order to mitigate some of its horrors. Among other arrangements, it was resolved to organize transportation societies for the wounded, which, in times of peace, should be suitably exercised with a view to test their knowledge and skill and to accustom them to the severity of discipline. At the close of the sessions an interesting exhibit was made of Red Cross work. About two hundred men volunteered to represent the dead and wounded on a field of battle. They were scattered over the great Mall of Geneva, and were picked up and carried away by the Red Cross corps in a most expeditious way. Miss Barton received a warm welcome at the Conference, and her addresses were listened to with close and respectful attention. She is also a delegate from the United States Government to the International Peace Society.

A Disastrous Hurricane in Iceland is Reported. It occurred September 11th, but the account of it did not arrive in Europe until October 3d. The report states that nineteen trading vessels and sixty fishing boats were lost and thirty-two vessels disabled. The most appalling feature of the hurricane was the loss of life. The exact number of those who perished has not yet been ascertained, but it is known to have been very great.

A $25 LANTERN For $12

PATENTED Perfection at the LOWEST PRICE

$10 to $50 easily made EVERY NIGHT.

The World Electro Radiant MAGIC LANTERN

The body of the Electro Radiant is a coneshaped reflector which gathers each divergent ray of light and concentrates them all on the main reflector, whence the whole mass of brilliancy illuminates and projects the picture with startling clearness. No combination of lenses, however ingenious, has ever been known to produce equal effects with the light used. The cost of an outfit to enable you to do a profitable business is small compared with the amount of money it takes to do any other business. Any one of ordinary intelligence can operate it, and $10 to $50 per night may be earned by giving Parlor, Sunday School, Academy or Public entertainments. For Public Entertainments, the possessor of an Electro Radiant has something that will "draw" with the combined power of the Theatre, the Circus, the Prestidigitateur, the Country Fair, the Temperance Crusade, and the Camp Meeting. A room that will hold 100 persons may be filled nightly and a good profit be cleared. You have only to tack the sheet to the wall, darken the room, place Lantern on stand, light lamp, and you are ready to begin the exhibition. The Electro Radiant projects on the screen a Picture eight feet in diameter. $10,000 were paid for the use of our Patent by Railroad Companies for Locomotive Headlights, it being considered the most wonderful light ever produced for the purpose. We have retained the exclusive right to make Magic Lanterns on the same principle, and the Electro Radiant is the result. The adjustment of Reflector, Lenses, Tubes, Slide, Rest and Cone are made with mathematical nicety. Optical laws governing such adjustments have been accurately calculated, so that you have in our Lanterns far more than appears, and we are placing within the reach of all, unsurpassed advantages for Learning, Amusement and Profit. The Transparent Slides for these Lanterns embrace views illustrating wonderful natural scenes from different parts of the world. The Scripture Subjects from both the old and New Testaments. Temperance—Showing the folly and misery of the Drunkard. Art—Copies of famous Statues, Bas-reliefs, and Engravings. Miscellaneous—Such as Ships at Sea in a Storm, Steamboat Race, Fort Sumpter, Daylight Scene, Moonlight, etc. History—Landing of Columbus, Declaration of Independence, Yankee Doodle, etc., Comic—Slide Splitters without number. You can add to your assortment at any time. Lantern with slides complete, packed in neat box, may be easily carried in hand.—The Electro Radiant No. 2 (shown in cut with slides and fitings complete will be sent by express on receipt of $12.00 or C. O. D. $3.00 is sent with order, purchaser paying the balance, $9.00 at express office. Full instructions and list of other views sent with each Lantern. Send money order or registered letter, send all orders to

World Manf'g Co. 122 Nassau Street, New York

This Lantern can be made very profitable at Church Fairs, Sunday School and other entertainments, and a large amount of cash realized at a very small outlay.

For Those Who Desire to Keep Informed concerning current literary matters, and who want their information in a compact shape, The Book Buyer, a monthly journal, was started a year ago. THE KING AND QUEEN OF ITALY—The King's Visit to a Cholera-Hospital.

HUMBERT I., KING OF ITALY.

His Noble Character—His Sympathy with his People—Birth and Parentage—Eminent Public Services—Accession to the Throne—Attempted Assassination—Visit to the Sufferers by the Earthquake—His Intrepid Inspection of Cholera Districts—Queen Margherita—Naples, its Scenes of Squalor and Disease.

KING HUMBERT of Italy, whose portrait, with that of his Queen, adorns the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, has earned for himself an honorable place among the crowned heads of Europe. We, who have the happiness of living under republican institutions, have and hold a supreme contempt for monarchs, as such. They are at best useless and expensive incumbrances, and at their worst they are an intolerable burden on the shoulders of the people, robbing them of liberty and denying them the inalienable rights of man. But those sentiments do not prevent our recognizing nobility of character when it appears under a royal crown, and of paying to it the tribute of homage it deserves. Kings are surrounded by fierce temptations; they are flattered and fawned upon, until they come to regard themselves as a superior order of beings. Their circumstances directly tend to foster and develope laziness, selfishness, and arrogance. All the more credit, therefore, is due to one who has a keen sympathy with the sick and suffering, and who disregards danger to himself when he may help and console the afflicted, and inspire others with courage by his example. That the King of Italy has done, and he is distinguished in Europe, as he will be in the history of his country, by the proud title of King

HUMBERT THE GOOD.

There is no monarch sitting on a European throne who has not cause to covet such a title of honor. Some of them are fiercely hated by their subjects; others are despised for their selfishness and indifference to the public weal; it is gratifying, therefore, to see that at least one among them has a human heart beating beneath the royal purple, and thinks with Solomon that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting.

When the cholera appeared this summer in Naples every one who knew anything of the sanitary condition of the city predicted that the visitation would be even more terrible than it had been in Southern France. The prediction was verified; the death rate did not creep up gradually, as it did at Marseilles, but went up by leaps and bounds. The rich were not exempted by their superior advantages, for the streets of Naples reek with the smells which physicians say are the most effective preparation for the plague, and they could not live in the city without inhaling the pestiferous odors. Many of them fled from the city as soon as the plague appeared; but the King no sooner heard of the outbreak than he hastened thither, that he might render all the aid in his power to the miserable people. He remained there, superintending the sanitary improvements, inspecting the hospitals in person, distributing money to the poor, and seeing for himself that every official did his duty. Such conduct deserves the highest praise.

BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

King Humbert is the eldest son and second child of the late King Victor Emmanuel, his sister, Princess Clotilde, the wife of Prince Napoleon Jerome Bonaparte, being one year older. He was born on March 14th, 1844, and is therefore now in the forty-first year of his age. His mother was before her marriage Archduchess Adelaide of Austria.

The kingdom of Sardinia, including the Principality of Piedmont, with the territory of Genoa and the hereditary Duchy of Savoy, as well as the Island of Sardinia, was ruled by Charles Albert, who abdicated in 1849, after the defeat at Novara, in favor of his son, the late King Victor Emmanuel, who was enabled, by the extraordinary events of 1859 to 1870—the result of the genius and devotion of Cavour and Guiseppe Garibaldi—to annex to his dominion all the other parts of Italy. He was proclaimed King of Italy in March, 1861, by a vote of the Italian Parliament at Turin, representing every province and capital except Rome and Venice, which were joined to the kingdom, respectively, in 1866 and 1870. But the work of reorganizing the ancient kingdom of the two Sicilies devolved in large measure on the present King, Humbert.

HIS SERVICES.

In July, 1862, Prince Humbert visited Naples and Palermo, while Garibaldi was at the very zenith of his fame, and shared the popularity of the great Liberator. When, three or four years later, the war between Prussia and Austria was imminent, Prince Humbert was despatched to Paris to ascertain the sentiments of the French Government in reference to the alliance between Italy and Prussia. On the outbreak of hostilities he hastened to take the field, obtained the command of a division of General Cialdini's army, with the title of Lieutenant-General, and was present at the disastrous battle of Custozza on June 23d, 1866, where, it is said, he performed prodigies of valor.

After the seizure of Rome by the Italian troops in 1870, Prince Humbert took up his residence in Rome, which at this time became at last the capital of a United Italy. Formerly the kingdom was composed of the separate kingdoms of Sardinia, the two Sicilies, the Pontifical States, the Lombardo-Venetian provinces of the Austrian Empire, the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, the Duchies of Parma and Modena, and the Republic of San Marino.

KING OF ITALY.

Humbert succeeded to the throne of Italy on the death of his father, on January 9th, 1878, and on the nineteenth day of the same month took the oath of fidelity to the Constitution before the united Senators and Deputies, and subsequently delivered an address in which he declared it to be the "faith of his House and his own strength, that the religious observance of free institutions is the best safeguard against all dangers," and that his only aspiration was to deserve the praise, "He was worthy of his father."

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HIM.

As King Humbert was making a State entry into Naples on November 17th, 1878, a man named Giovanni Passanante approached the royal carriage and attempted to assassinate his Majesty with a poniard. The King fortunately escaped with a slight scratch, but Signor Cairoli, the Prime Minister, who was riding with him, was wounded seriously in the thigh.

The people of Italy have not been in ignorance until now of the kindness and humanity of their King. Last year, on July 28th, when desolated the city of Casamicciola, near the bay of Naples, one of the first to visit the scene of desolation was the King. He travelled by the most rapid conveyances available, and arrived at Casamicciola early in the morning of August 1st. He was accompanied by the Premier, Signor Depretis, and two others. He displayed the deepest sympathy with the terrible distress of the people, making a careful examination of the ruins, and, being especially impressed with the awful and most extraordinary havoc that had been wrought, broke forth several times into exclamations of astonishment and grief. The Minister of Public Works urged him to turn back, owing to the difficulty of the ascent; but he replied, "If others go, so can I. Disaster makes all men equal." He listened patiently to the story of all who approached him, and replied with kindly and benevolent words to hysterical complaints of the groups of old people and women and children who remained among the ruins, as if unable to quit the place of their former dwellings.

Most harrowing incidents occurred en route. The few survivors encamped among the vineyards met the King with piercing cries for aid, accompanied by frantic gestures. One old woman rolled herself about on the ground almost at his feet, near the Hotel Piccola Sentinella, crying "Thanks, King!" By the King's order excavations were continued wherever there was a chance of persons being still found alive, and he personally superintended the work. The King also visited the tents of the Red Cross Society, and thanked the members of that gallant band for their philanthropic labors.

made its appearance in Italy early in August. By the middle of the month it began to rage with severity in several of the provinces of Piedmont and in Liguria. On the 23d of August it was reported that 58 deaths had occurred in the single province of Cuneo in the two preceding days. There were also many cases in the province of Massa-Carrara, and a few at Turin, Milan, Novara, and other towns of Piedmont and Lombardy. Then came an outbreak of great intensity at Spezzia. In two days there were attacked, in the villages surrounding that place, no fewer than seventy persons, and the malignant character of the disease was shown in the fact that forty-eight of these died within a few hours—in some cases in less than an hour—after they were first prostrated. Next the epidemic penetrated to Spezzia itself, and laid on the town a deadly grip. Tuscany almost completely escaped the plague, but it was impossible that Naples should enjoy a like immunity; for it presents, in an aggravated form, every evil that exists in the towns of the Riviera. In the words of a contributor to a medical journal, "every condition of filth which can invite cholera exists in that delightfully beautiful but disgracefully dirty city."

When the approach of the plague began to be seriously apprehended, toward the end of August, recourse was had to the usual devices of quarantine and sanitary cordons, so that Naples was said to resemble a besieged town. A number of families were removed from the most noisome dens in the overcrowded poor quarters of the city; floating hospitals were prepared in the harbor, and other like arrangements made. At the best, however, these measures were but feeble palliatives, and upon Naples before there was time to accomplish more.

The first case of undoubted cholera was reported on the 23d of August. Down to the end of the month only two or three cases per day were announced; but suddenly, on the 1st of September, 42 cases and 21 deaths were reported as having occurred on the previous day. The bulletin for September 1st was very much worse—122 cases and 63 deaths. On the 2d and 3d there seemed to be a slight diminution in the violence of the epidemic, the fresh cases in these days being 73 and 89 respectively, and the deaths 32 and 49. But on the 4th the number of new cases showed a great increase, and since then the plague has continued with ever growing fury. On Sunday, the 7th, there were 316 new cases and 113 deaths; on the 8th, 4 cases and 154 deaths; while on the 9th the terrible totals were reached of 937 cases and 3 deaths. The next day returns showed an improvement, the number of fresh cases having fallen to 754 and the deaths to 287, and subsequently the epidemic greatly declined. Even the last-quoted figures indicate a mortality twice as high as the maximum attained at Marseilles.

The King showed an utter recklessness of his own safety. He wanted to explore the Fondaco the filthiest block in Naples, and was deaf to warnings of danger. Several officials expostulated with him, telling him that the place was reeking with cholera germs, but he would not listen to them. Finally one of them cried out "You have no right to commit suicide. Nor have you a right to deliberately murder many of these unfortunate people who will follow you even into that hotbed of death!" Upon this the King bowed and got into his carriage again.

All classes became demoralized as the hor grew, but there can be no doubt that the King's example had the effect of preventing what would have otherwise been a fearful panic. The Italian people are almost crazy with enthusiasm for the King, and the Catholic newspapers vie with the democratic ones in lauding his course to the skies. The King and Archbishop fraternized from the start, and the feeling is general that the feud so long existing between the crown and the church will be healed as a result of this companionship.

THE HOSPITALS

were regularly visited by the King and the Archbishop (see frontispiece picture), and as the King passed down the wards, staying a few minutes at the bedside of this and that sufferer to speak some encouraging words, the patients raised themselves in their beds to call down blessings on his head. He was indefatigable in his efforts to add to their comfort, and sent the troops out of the city in order that their barracks might be used for hospitals. From his own private purse he gave freely to a fund raised to supply delicacies and nourishing food to the convalescents. It will be long before his generosity and sympathy are forgotten.

QUEEN MARGHERITA, whose portrait appears with that of her husband on the first page, is his first cousin, being daughter of the late Prince Ferdinand, Duke of Genoa, a brother of the late King Victor Emmanuel; her mother is Princess Elizabeth, daughter of King John of Saxony and Duchess of Genoa, who is now married to a second husband, the Marquis Rapello. Queen Margherita was born in November, 1851, and married Prince Humbert in April, 1868. She has one child, named Victor Emmanuel, who was born in November, 1869. Her Majesty is warmly beloved by the Italian people.

NAPLES.

THE city of Naples, a picture of which appears on page 668, is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. It is built on the shores of a semicircular bay, and it rises from the edge of the water like an amphitheatre, appearing to the traveller who sails up the bay a spectacle whose unrivalled beauty can never be forgotten. It was originally called Neapolis (the new city). It is one hundred and eighteen miles from Rome, and is built near the foot of the volcano Vesuvius. Its population in 1880 was 463,172. Prior to 1860 Naples was the capital of the kingdom of the two Sicilies, but in that year, by the daring of Garibaldi and the enthusiasm of the people, the two Sicilies were merged in the kingdom of Italy.

With all its beauty, Naples has the unenviable reputation of being the filthiest city in Europe. Dirt abounds in all the dwellings to an incredible extent. In one block, that of the Fondaici, there are the most hideous human habitations in Christendom. It is intersected with narrow courtyards, its houses are eighty feet high, the sunlight and air excluded, and the filthiest rooms, each with a dozen or fifteen inmates of both sexes. There is no water there to wash with; the place is alive with vermin; it is a literal sink of pestilence, and contains fully one fourth of the whole population of Naples. The danger from this filth is aggravated by the fact that in Naples there is no sewerage system. Noxious effluvia are produced by the local custom of preserving all refuse from the houses for fertilizing the vineyards and olive-groves in a great cistern called the "pozzo." This is connected with the street gutter by an overflow pipe, which carries off the surplus liquid. Whenever there is a sudden rain, water breaks into the pozzo and then out again, spreading the contents of the cistern, with its pestilential vapors, throughout the city, and finally into drinking wells and cellars. An effort was made when the disease appeared to have these cisterns cleaned, but the people armed themselves to protect their valuable contents, and the officials shrank from a fight over the matter.

"The town is, on the whole, as dirty and the contrast between the rich and poor quarters as striking as ever. We see one part of the inhabitants listening to the advice of the press and the medical profession and endeavoring to scour the streets and houses, and Chiaja, Chiatamone, Santa Catterina, La Villa, and San Ferdinando appear in a state of extraordinary cleanliness. At Pendina, the Mercato and the Porto, on the contrary, in the little streets that twist and cross each other, where the Neapolitan fishermen and lazzaroni live, the scavengers leave no trace behind them.

"There, in the middle of the narrow, ill-paved street, runs a thin stream of black and evil-smelling water. On either side the doors stand wide open, but it is very difficult to see clearly into these dark rooms, or rather dens, guarded as they are by gossiping women and romping children, the latter in semi or complete nakedness. When we do succeed in getting a glimpse of the interior we find a miserable bed almost worn to pieces, with here and there a heap of rags, a rickety chair, a table, and madonnas, dressed up in gilt paper, all of which a sickly lamp that is never extinguished illuminates in a half-hearted manner. There is mud and refuse which emits a vile smell, but no one stirs unless it be to buy a watermelon.

IN THE STREETS.

"Progression is not always easy outside, for the route is often impeded by other handbarrows and bearers waiting for their burden, so that in the vichis or little narrow streets there is frequently a perfect blockade. It is the duty of the guard to open a passage. At times the patient becomes restless on the litter, and, pushing away the cloth which covers him, he exposes a face with a deathly pallor upon it. On other occasions—which are only too numerous—the porters stop to drink, become weak in the legs, and stumble. Sometimes, moreover, the sick person is upset and projected upon the passers-by, who move about calmly, paying little heed to the cholera patients. There is a long procession of handbarrows in the streets around the hospitals of Cannochia and Piedigrotta. The bearers meet at the street corners and silently form in single file. When tired they calmly stop to rest, and even sit down upon their barrows, and then the parents, who frequently follow the bearers as far as the door of the hospital, take advantage of these stoppages to encourage the sick ones. The spectacles seen on the way are generally of a terrible character. The patients see funeral processions, terribly simple, with a hearse drawn by a pair of miserable jades which the driver is obliged to lash unmercifully to make them move.

CONTRASTS.

"The day before yesterday there was a crowd around the Mairie in the Foria quarter. Some asked for doctors, others demanded porters or hearses. The cholera had been doing its fell work during the night, and the number of cases increased continually. As there were not sufficient employés to deal with the difficulty, the more impatient portion of the crowd began to shout, when the sound of a clarinet and other instruments was heard playing a spirited waltz. The musicians approached, and succeeded in making their way through the crowd, followed by a young couple in their Sunday best, who were come to be married before the Mayor. The lady objected somewhat when she was obliged to go into the disinfecting room, like any ordinary person. She feared for her white dress, which would be spoiled by the chlorine, and the gentleman complained as to his gloves, which were of a somewhat uncertain color. As soon, however, as they entered the apartment where the ceremony took place their gaiety returned. A few minutes later they reappeared with smiling faces and the musicians resumed their waltz air, while the doctors went to attend the dying."

There was a daily decrease in the number of deaths from cholera in Italy last week. It is hoped that the worst is now past. A telegram from Naples states that that city is regaining its usual aspect, but a grave crisis in commercial affairs is feared. Hundreds of bills are protested daily. The Italian Government proposes to grant a million dollars to rebuild the poor quarters of Naples, which will be a great help to the city, both in furnishing better residences for the poor and in giving employment to men now idle. The superstitious prejudices of the people in regard to the cholera have not been dispelled.

AN OPIUM-SELLER'S CHRISTIAN WORK.

THE Rev. Dr. Baldwin relates that: "Ling Ching Ting, an opium-smoker and opium-seller, was converted at Foochow. He immediately wished to go and tell the story of the Cross in the District of Hok-Chiang, some forty miles away, where he had formerly lived. He was permitted to go. He met with much persecution—being driven out of some places, stoned in others, and maltreated in many ways. At one time, through false accusations brought against him, he was sentenced to be beaten with two hundred stripes, and the sentence was literally executed. He was carried up to Foochow, groaning with intense pain occasioned by the beating, yet cheerfully endured the trial, testifying to those who called upon him that Jesus would make his heart inside all peaceful, even while his body was in great pain. Through his labors the Gospel spread over the District of Hok-Chiang, where there are now

A THOUSAND COMMUNICANTS.

"He also went to one of the islands off the coast and there preached earnestly. A number of the poor islanders were soon added to the church. Among the inquirers was a man who had been a wicked pirate. He came to Ching Ting saying that he was convinced that all the religion he preached was true, and he wanted to be a Christian. He would immediately give up his piracy; but there was one little thing he thought he would hold on to. 'You know that some time ago we made a covenant with the fishermen here, by which we agreed to let their nets alone at all times except the 1st and 15th of each month, on which days we should take all the fish. Now this is an agreement between us, and I think it will be right for me to continue to take the fish.' Ching Ting thought that the man was being led by the Holy Spirit, and not wishing to discourage him, he expressed no opinion about his taking the fish, but said: 'Well, I'll put your name down as a probationer, and I will pray God to lead you into the right about all things.' About three weeks after that time he came to Ching Ting, and said with tears, 'Oh, Ching Ting, this fish business is all wrong too. It is stealing from the poor fishermen. I must give up: I want to be a whole-hearted Christian; and you must pray for me and help me to be one.' So became a humble disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. The work spread southward from Hok-Chiang through the Prefecture of Hing Hwa, where there are now five hundred communicants. Ling Ching Ting died in good ministerial standing in 1877."

One day a mandarin entered the shop of an old cloth merchant, a convert in the Amoy region, where the English Presbyterians were laboring. The old man surmised their intention to oppress and persecute him. "I know what you have come for," he said, and taking down some of the goods, pointed to them and to the rest in the shop, and said, "Take them, and take me also. I am an old man and very deaf. You may take my boys also and my little girl. We are all Christians and willing to go to prison." This man was among the first converts of the mission, which now numbers seventy stations and more than 2200 communicants.

NATIONAL RUIN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, October 12th, 1884.

"Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come, etc."—Rev. 18 : 10–13.

On cisatlantic shores a company of American scientists are now landing, on their way to find the tomb of a dead empire holding in its arms a dead city, mother and child of the same name—Babylon. The ancient mounds will invite the spades and shovels and crowbars while the unwashed natives look on in surprise. Our scientific friends will find yellow bricks still impressed with the name of Nebuchadnezzar, and they will go down into the sarcophagus of a monarchy buried more than two thousand years ago. May the explorations of Rawlinson and Layard and Chevalier and Opperto and Loftus and Chesney be eclipsed by the present archæological uncovering.

But is it possible this is

of Babylon? a city once five times larger than London and twelve times larger than New York? Walls three hundred and seventy-three feet high and ninety-three feet thick. Twenty-five burnished gates on each side, with streets running clear through to corresponding gates on the other side. Six hundred and twenty-five squares. More pomp and wealth and splendor and sin than could be found in any five modern cities combined.

A CITY OF PALACES

and temples. A city having within it a garden on an artificial hill four hundred feet high, the sides of the mountain terraced. All this built to keep the king's wife, Amyitis, from becoming homesick for the mountainous region in which she had spent her girlhood. The waters of the Euphrates spouted up to irrigate this great altitude into fruits and flowers and arborescence unimaginable. A great river running from north to south clear through the city, bridges over it, tunnels under it, boats on it.

A city of bazaars and of marketplaces, unrivalled for aromatics and unguents and high-mettled horses with grooms by their side, and thyme wood, and African evergreen, and Egyptian linen, and all styles of costly textile fabric, and rarest purples extracted from shell-fish on the Mediterranean coast, and rarest scarlets taken from brilliant insects in Spain, and ivories brought from successful elephantine hunts in India, and diamonds whose flash was a repartee to the sun. Fortress within fortress, embattlement rising above embattlement. Great

CAPITAL OF THE AGES.

But one night, while honest citizens were asleep, but all the saloons of saturnalia were in full blast, and at the king's castle they had filled the tankards for the tenth time, and reeling and guffawing and hiccoughing around the state table were the rulers of the land, General Cyrus ordered his besieging army to take shovels and spades, and they diverted the river from its usual channel into another direction so that the forsaken bed of the river became the path on which the besieging army entered. When the morning dawned the conquerors were inside the outside trenches. Babylon had fallen, and hence the sublime threnody of the text: "Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city, for in one hour is thy judgment come." But

DO NATIONS DIE?

Oh, yes, there is great mortality among monarchies and republics. They are like individuals in the fact that they are born, they have a middle life, they have a decease, they have a cradle, and a grave. Some of them are assassinated, some destroyed by their own hand. Let me call the roll of some of the dead civilizations and some of the dead cities and let some one answer for them.

Egyptian civilization, stand up. "Dead!" answer the ruins of Karnak and Luxor, and from seventy pyramids on the east side of the Nile there comes up a great chorus, crying: "Dead, dead!" Assyrian Empire, stand up and answer. "Dead!" cry the charred ruins of Nineveh. After six hundred years of magnificent opportunity, dead. Israelitish Kingdom, stand up. After two hundred and fifty years of divine interposition and of miraculous vicissitude and of heroic behavior and of appalling depravity, dead. Phœnicia, stand up and answer. After inventing the alphabet and giving it to the world, and sending out her merchant caravans in one direction to Central Asia, and sending out her navigators to the Atlantic Ocean in another direction, dead. Pillars of Hercules and rocks on which the Tyrian fishermen dried their nets, all answer, "Dead Phœnicia." Athens, after Phidias, after Demosthenes, after Miltiades, dead. Sparta, after Leonidas, after Eurybiades, after Salamis, after Thermopylæ, dead.

ROMAN EMPIRE,

stand up and answer. Empire once bounded by the British Channel on the north, by the Euphrates on the east, by the great Sahara Desert in Africa on the south, by the Atlantic Ocean on the west. Home of three great civilizations, owning all the then discovered world that was worth owning. Roman Empire, answer. Gibbon, in his "Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire," says "Dead!" and the forsaken seats of the ruined Coliseum, and the skeleton of the aqueducts, and the miasma of the Campagna, and the fragments of the marble baths, and the useless piers of the Bridge Triumphalis, and the Mamartine prison, holding no more apostolic prisoners, and the silent Forum, and Basilica of Constantine, and the arch of Titus, and the Pantheon come in with great chorus, crying: "Dead, dead!" After Horace, after Virgil, after Tacitus, after Cicero, dead. After Horatius on the bridge, and Cincinnatus, the farmer oligarch, after Pompey, after Scipio, after Cassius, after Constantine, after Cæsar, dead. The war eagle of Rome flew so high it was blinded by the sun and came whirling down through the heavens, and the owl of desolation and darkness built its nest in the forsaken eyrie. Mexican Empire, dead. French Empire, dead.

You see, my friends, it is no unusual thing for a government to perish, and in the same necrology of dead nations, and in the same graveyard of expired governments will go the United States of America unless there be some potent voice to call a halt, and unless God in His mercy interfere, and through a purified ballot-box and a widespread public Christian sentiment the catastrophe be averted. This nation is about to go to the ballot-box to exercise the right of suffrage, and I propose this morning, and in following Sabbath mornings, to set before you to destroy the American Government, and to annihilate American institutions, and if God will help me I will show you before I get through with these discourses the mode in which each and every one may do something to arrest that appalling calamity. And I shall plough up the whole field.

I. The first evil that threatens the annihilation of our American institutions is the fact that which once was considered a crime, has by many come to be considered a tolerable virtue. Five hundred thousand dollars by one political party sent into Ohio this autumn, and another five hundred thousand, if it can be raised, or if it has been raised, sent into Ohio this autumn by another political party. What does it mean? There is a legitimate use of money in elections, in the printing of political tracts, and in the hiring of public halls, and in the obtaining of campaign oratory; but is there any homunculus who supposes that this vast amount of money is going in a legitimate direction? The vast majority of it will go to buy votes. Hundreds and thousands of men will have set before them so much money for a Republican vote, and so much money for a Democratic vote, and the superior financial inducement will decide the action. You want to know which party will carry Ohio day after to-morrow? I will tell you. The party that spends the most money.

My sympathies are aroused for Ohio. Everything between Lake Erie and the Kentucky borders, her 39,964 square miles of political bribery. This moment, while I speak, the peddlers carrying gold from Wall Street, gold from Third Street, gold from State Street, and gold from the Brewers' Association, are at Cincinnati, and at Dayton, and at Columbus, and in all the political headquarters in that State, dealing out the infamous inducement. Then it is not only the money spent for votes in the Ohio election, but the success of the Ohio election will be used as a bribe for the whole nation, inducing the multitude of men who sit on the fence to jump off and run with the triumphant party for the 100,000 offices at disposal. The election in Ohio day after to-morrow will not let you know whom Ohio wants for President of the United States. It will only indicate which party had the largest exchequer.

GROWING SHAMELESSNESS.

After the last Presidential election a banquet was spread in New York to celebrate the victory, and in the presence of many of the mightiest men of the nation it was announced that Indiana had been bought up, had been carried in the election by bribery. Another word was used than the word bribery, but everybody understood. There was no surprise. Everybody knew that Indiana was bought.

A LEGISLATURE BOUGHT.

There used to be bribery, but it held its head in shame. It was under the utmost secrecy that many years ago a railroad company bought up the Wisconsin Legislature and many other public officials in that State. The Governor of the State at that time received $50,000 for his signature. His private secretary received $5000. Thirteen members of the Senate received $175.000 among them in bonds. Sixty members of the other house received from $5000 to $10,000 each. The Lieutenant-Governor received $10,000. The clerks of the House received from $5000 to $10,000 each. The Bank Comptroller received $10,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were divided among the lobbyists. You see, the railroad company was very generous. But all that was hidden, and only through the severest scrutiny on the part of a legislative committee was this iniquity displayed. Now, political bribery defies you, dares you, is arrogant, and will probably decide the election on the first Tuesday of next November.

Unless this diabolism ceases in this country Bartholdi's statue, to be lifted on Bedloe's Island, with uplifted torch to light other nations into the harbor, had better be changed, and the torch dropped as a symbol of universal incendiarism.

Unless this purchase and sale of suffrage shall cease, the American Government will expire, and you might as well be getting ready the monument for another dead nation, and let my text inscribe upon it these words: "Alas! alas for Babylon, that great city, that mighty city, for in one hour is thy judgment come." My friends, if you have not noticed that political bribery is one of the ghastly crimes of this day, you have not kept your eyes open.

II. Another evil threatening the destruction of American institutions is the against each other. A solid North. A solid South. If this goes on we shall, after a while, have a solid East against a solid West, we shall have solid Middle States against solid Northern States, we shall have a solid New York against a solid Pennsylvania, and a solid Ohio against a solid Kentucky. It is nineteen years since the war closed, and yet at every Presidential election the old antagonism is aroused.

When Garfield died, and all the States gathered around his casket in sympathy and in tears, and as hearty telegrams of condolence came from New Orleans and from Charleston as from Boston and Chicago, I said to myself: "I think sectionalism is dead." But alas! no. The difficulty will never be ended until each State of the nation is split up into two or three great political parties. This country cannot exist unless it exists as one body, the national capital the heart, sending out through all the arteries of communication warmth and life to the very extremities. This nation cannot exist unless it exists as and you might as well have solid brothers against solid sisters, and a solid bread-tray against a solid cradle, and a solid nursery against a solid dining-room; and you might as well have solid ears against solid eyes, and solid head against solid foot. What is the interest of Georgia is the interest of Massachusetts; what is the interest of New York is the interest of South Carolina. Does the Ohio River change its politics when it gets below Louisville? It is not possible for these sectional antagonisms to continue for a great many years without permanent compound fracture.

III. Another evil threatening the destruction of our American institutions is the

THE LOW STATE OF PUBLIC MORALS

What killed Babylon of my text? What killed Phœnicia? What killed Rome? Their own depravity; and the fraud and the drunkenness and the lechery which have destroyed other nations will destroy ours unless a merciful God prevent. To show you the low state of public morals, I have to call your attention to the fact that many men nominated for offices in the State and nation at different times are entirely unfit for the positions for which they have been nominated. We have now for the offices of President and Vice-President. Two of them are women. They are good. But three out of the eight men nominated for the offices of President and Vice-President have no more qualification for them than a wolf has qualification to be professor of pastoral theology in a flock of sheep, or a blind mole has qualification to lecture a class of eagles on optics, or than a vulture has qualification to chaperon a dove. The mere pronunciation of some of their names makes a demand for carbolic acid and fumigation! Yet Christian men will follow right on under the political standards.

I have to tell you what you know already, that American politics have sunken to such a low depth that there is nothing beneath. What we see in some directions we see in nearly all directions. The peculation and the knavery hurled to the surface by the explosion of banks and business firms are only specimens of great Cotopaxies and Strombolis of wickedness that boil and roar and surge beneath, but have not yet regurgitated to the surface. When the heaven-descended Democratic party enacted the Tweed rascality it seemed to eclipse everything; but after a while the heaven-descended Republican party outwitted Pandemonium with the Star Route infamy.

My friends, we have in this country people who say amounts to nothing. They scoff at it. We have people walking in polite parlors in our day who are not good enough to be scavengers in Sodom! I went over to San Francisco four or five years ago—that beautiful city, that Queen of the Pacific. May the blessing of God come down upon her great churches and her noble men and women! When I got into the city of San Francisco, the mayor of the city and the president of the Board of Health called on me and insisted that I go and see the Chinese quarters, no doubt so that on my return to the Atlantic coast I might tell what dreadful people the Chinese are. But on the last night of my stay in San Francisco, before thousands of people in their great opera house, I said: "Would you like me to tell you just what I think, plainly and honestly?" They said: "Yes, yes, yes!" I said: "Do you think you can stand it all?" They said: "Yes yes, yes!" "Then," I said, "my opinion is that the curse of San Francisco is not your Chinese quarters, but your

THE MARRIAGE INSTITUTION

MILLIONAIRE LIBERTINES!"

And two of them sat right before me—Felix and Drusilla. And so it is in all the cities. I never swear, but when I see a man go unwhipt of justice, laughing over his shame and calling his damnable deeds gallantry and peccadillo, I am tempted to hurl red-hot anathema and to conclude that if, according to some people's theology, there is no hell, there ought to be! (Applause.)

There is enough out-and-out licentiousness in American cities to-day to bring down upon them the wrath of that God who, on the 24th of August, 79, buried Herculaneum and Pompeii so deep in ashes that the eighteen hundred and five subsequent years have not been able to complete the exhumation. There are in American cities to-day whole blocks of houses which the police know to be infamous, and yet by purchase they are silenced, by hush money, so that such places are as much under the defence of government as public libraries and asylums of mercy. These ulcers on the body politic bleed and gangrene away the life of the nation, and public authority in many of the cities looks the other way. You cannot cure such wounds as these with a silken bandage. You will have to cure them by putting deep in the lancet of moral surgery and burning them out with the caustic of holy wrath and with most decisive amputation cutting off the scabrous and putrefying abominations. As the Romans were after the Celts, and as the Normans were after the Britons, so there are evils after this nation which will attend its obsequies unless we first attend theirs.

Superstition tells of

the cephaloptera, which enfolded and crushed a ship of war; but it is no superstition when I tell you that the history of many of the dead nations proclaim to us the fact that our ship of state is in danger of being crushed by the cephaloptera of national depravity. Where is the Hercules to slay this hydra? Is it not time to speak by pen, by tongue, by ballot-box, by the rolling of the prison door, by hangman's halter, by earnest prayer, by Sinaitic detonation?

A son of King Cresus is said to have been dumb and to have never uttered a word until he saw his father being put to death. Then he broke the shackles of silence, and cried out: "Kill not my father, Cresus!" When I see the cheatery and the wantonness and the manifold crime of this country attempting to commit patricide—yea, matricide upon our institutions, it seems to me that lips that heretofore have been dumb ought to break the silence with canerous tones of fiery protest.

I shall, in following Sabbath morning discourses, set before you other evils just as great and perhaps greater, for I have this morning only been permitted to open the outside door of this subject. I shall go on until I have shown you the way in which we may

SAVE THE LIFE OF THE NATION.

I want to put all of the matter before you, so that every honest man and woman will know just how matters stand, and what they ought to do if they vote, and what they ought to do if they pray. This nation is not going to perish. Alexander, when he heard of the wealth of the Indies, divided Macedonia among his soldiers. Some one asked him what he had kept for himself, and he replied: "I am keeping hope. And that jewel I keep bright and shining in my soul, whatever else I shall surrender." Hope, then, in God. He will set back these oceanic tides of moral devastation. Do you know what is for which contention is made to-day? It is the prize of this continent. Never since, according to John Milton, when "Satan was hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal skies in hideous ruin and combustion down," have the powers of darkness been so determined to win this continent as they are now.

WHAT A JEWEL IT IS—a jewel carved in relief, the cameo of this planet! On one side of us the Atlantic Ocean, dividing us from the worn-out governments of Europe. On the other side the Pacific Ocean, dividing us from the superstitions of Asia. On the north of us the Arctic Sea, which is the gymnasium in which the explorers and navigators develope their courage. A continent 10,500 miles long, 17,000,000 square miles, and all of it but about one seventh capable of rich cultivation. One hundred millions of population on this continent of North and South America—one hundred millions, and room for many hundred millions more. All flora and all fauna, all metals and all precious woods, and all grains and all fruits. The Appalachian range the backbone and the rivers the ganglia carrying life all through and out to the extremities. Isthmus of Darien the narrow waist of a giant continent, all to be under one government, and all free and all Christian, and the scene of Christ's personal reign on earth if, according to the expectation of many good people, He shall at last set up His throne in this world.

WHO SHALL HAVE THIS HEMISPHERE?

Christ or Satan? Who shall have the shore of her inland seas, the silver of her Nevadas, the gold of her Colorados, the telescopes of her observatories, the brain of her universities, the wheat of her prairies, the rice of her savannas, the two great ocean beaches—the one reaching from Baffin's Bay to Terra del Fuego, and the other from Behring Straits to Cape Horn—and all the moral, and temporal, and spiritual, and everlasting interests of a population vast beyond all computation save by Him, with whom a thousand years are as one day? Who shall have the hemisphere? You and I will decide that or help to decide it, by conscientious vote, by earnest prayer, by maintenance of Christian institutions, by support of great philanthropies, by putting body, mind, and soul on the right side of all moral, religious, and national movements.

Ah! it will not be long before it will not make any difference to you or to me what becomes of this continent, so far as earthly comfort is concerned. All we will want of it will be seven feet by three, and that will take in the largest, and there will be room and to spare. That is all of this country we will need very soon, the youngest of us. But we have about the welfare and the happiness of the generations that are coming on, and it will be a grand thing if, when the archangel's trumpet sounds, we find that our sepulchre, like the one Joseph of Arimathea provided for Christ, is in the midst of a garden. By that time this country will be all Paradise, or all Dry Tortugas. Eternal God, to Thee we commit the destiny of this people!

Richard Weaver, the Celebrated British evangelist, has been laid aside from labor by sickness. He has so far recovered as to be able to resume work. He was able to conduct an evangelistic service at Sale on the evening of September 21st. A large congregation listened to his earnest appeals, and on some a deep impression was made.

NEW BOOKS.

TEACHINGS AND COUNSELS is the title of a volume containing twenty Baccalaureate Sermons by Rev. Mark Hopkins, D.D., LL.D. It is published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. The sermons were originally preached at Williams College and published in pamphlet form. They have been revised and arranged, and are now issued in a handsome volume of 395 pages, at the price of $1.50.

Among the sermons contained in the volume are those on Faith, Philosophy, and Reason; Strength and Beauty; Self-Denial; The Manifoldness of Man; Choice and Service; Providence and Revelation; The Bible and Pantheism; Spirit, Soul, and Body; The Body the Temple of God. Dr. Hopkins has added to the twenty Baccalaureate Sermons his Memorial Discourse on President Garfield.

Although these sermons were addressed to students when they were delivered, there is little in them which does not apply to the ordinary reader. They are thoughtful and suggestive, and cannot fail to benefit the careful reader. This is notably the case with the sermon entitled "The Body the Temple of God," which is full of sparkling gems of original thought. Dr. Hopkins holds that under the Christian dispensation "it is the office of the body to stand over against the ancient temple, magnificent as that was, and to be the dwelling-place of God under this dispensation, as that was under the old, the only temple of God now on earth." It will be readily seen how much is implied in that conception, and the author points out briefly and forcibly some of the consequences of realizing it. Especially does he lay stress on the necessity of abstinence from intoxicating liquors and narcotics. He holds that sermons produced under the influence of either are "a service of God by 'strange fire.'" Finally, on this subject, Dr. Hopkins says: "Whatever course you may take, whether you do or not recognize the claims of God, 'you are not your own.' You may seek as most do to appropriate yourselves to your own selfish ends and thus rob God, but 'ye are not your own.' You do not belong to yourselves. You belong to God. You belong to humanity. You belong to a world that is waiting for your help." This brief extract will show the character of the book and the practical kind of teaching it contains.

is a work by Captain R. Kelso Carter, for sale at the Willard Tract Repository, 239 Fourth Avenue, New York, bound in cloth, $1.00. Captain Carter opens the book with a narrative of his own experience of the Lord's power and willingness to heal. He was cured of a painful disorder two years ago and publicly acknowledged the fact in St. George's Hall, Philadelphia. There was some trepidation at first, and he had to battle with the suggestion that if he became sick afterward both he and the doctrine he professed would suffer ridicule; but ultimately he triumphed, and he has had no sickness since.

Captain Carter deals exhaustively with the subject of faith-healing and with the objections and questions generally raised against it, with which he, like all those who have made a profession of their faith, has been assailed. Among the subjects discussed are: Sickness from the Devil; Who may be Healed; The Use of Means; Who are the Elders; Casting out Devils; Modern Thorns; God's Will to Heal.

THE BOOK-BUYER

is a monthly publication issued by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, price five cents, or fifty cents per annum. It is designed to be a guide to purchasers of books, who need to know something more of the character of a book than can be indicated in the advertisements which the publishers insert in daily journals. Its information is not confined to the domestic market, but it contains extracts from new foreign books, with the criticisms of the press and a list of the books published during the month. To ministers and young students collecting a library, the Book-Buyer will be a most useful guide.

FROM NATAL TO THE UPPER ZAMBESI.

A large number of extracts from the letters and diary of that devoted servant of Christ, Frederick Stanley Arnot, are collected in a small volume of seventy pages under the above title, which may be had from the Gospel Book and Tract Repository, 34 High Street, Toronto. Its price is ten cents, paper covers; thirty cents, bound in cloth. It contains a map of the region of Africa over which Mr. Arnot travelled in 1882. The book does not profess to be a description of the country; it is rather a record of Christian thought and experience while seeking to do work for the Lord among the heathen. There are, however, several thrilling incidents recorded.

On February 27th, 1882, Mr. Arnot writes: "We had a lively night last night. Just as the sun went down, the baboons began a free fight in the bush close by, making a horrid shrieking and roaring noise. After driving them off with sticks, we had scarcely turned in and got to sleep, when a pack of jackals came round us, laughing and barking. They wanted to get at the meat that was hanging round the wagon. I went off to sleep again, when roar! roar! Mr. Selons sprang up and out of the wagon. 'A lion! a lion!' he said. I got up and looked out; our little camp was all astir; the three Kaffirs going round the oxen to keep them from breaking loose, and Mr. Selons keeping his horses quiet. The lions, however, moved off without showing themselves."

Mr. Arnot's description of the Shoshong country and its ruler will surprise many people. Writing from that country on May 26th, 1882, he says:

"The moral condition of the town is, in many respects, most exemplary. I have not, since coming here, seen an intoxicated person, either black or white, which could not be said by any one, for the same period, in any other town in Africa, where the white man with his trade has access. The chief, Kama, has put down the drink traffic most effectually; not only has he forbidden the traffic among his own people, but he will not allow the liquor to pass through his country; consequently none whatever (except an occasional case or two smuggled in) has passed into Central Africa from this side for some years. If a trader is found out once bringing drink into the place, even for the use of the white people, he is turned off Kama's territory, and never allowed to enter it again.

"In many respects Kama is a noble chief, and it would be well if other rulers imitated his unselfish Christian policy. None of his people are allowed to want, if he can help it. If they are too poor to buy he provides them with a stock of cattle, the increase of which belongs to the poor man; and thus Kama has distributed during the last few years thousands of cattle to such of his people as have suffered through loss of crops, disease among cattle, etc.

"Although he has stopped all beer drinking among his people, and put down many of the revolting heathen customs which formerly the people delighted in, yet they all like their chief, and would almost to a man die for him.

"Now and then he gets up hunts on a large scale, hunting after the larger kinds of game. These hunting parties go far into the desert, and often suffer greatly from want of food and water; but the chief is always the first to go without his share, and will not help himself until all are supplied, so that there is not the slightest grumbling on the part of his followers.

"In spite, however, of all the chief can do, there are many very revolting practices carried on secretly to a fearful extent, such as the murdering of children. A deformed child is at once put to death; twins are seldom allowed to live. If any peculiar circumstance happen at the birth of a child, or any suspicious omens occur, such as the call of certain animals or birds, the child is murdered, the ordinary plan being to pour boiling water down the child's throat, and carry the body out to the wolves. They cast away the old people, cut their bodies, use enchantments, etc.; but all this is done secretly.

"I can, nevertheless, say confidently that one would see more vice and open immorality on a Saturday night in the High Street, Glasgow, than would be seen here in twelve months.

"The clothing of the people is scanty, but sufficient. They are naturally civil and polite to each other, and when addressing an older or superior person, finish every sentence with 'my father,' or 'my mother.' Both young and old address me as 'my father,' and often as 'my lord,' but it is merely civility."

A sadly interesting feature of this little book is a letter from the venerable missionary, Dr. Robert Moffat, written only a few days before his death in acknowledgment of a copy of the first edition. Dr. Moffat said: "Only a few lines to acknowledge your kindness in remembering me in connection with Mr. Arnot and his noble undertaking. Truly his spirit is that of a martyr ready for anything for Jesus' sake and perishing souls. I need only say that I have read it with the most intense interest. Of course many of the people of the regions through which he passed were well known to me; and had not head powers failed I should have been in those regions till this day. My heart is as warm as ever toward the Bechuanas, whom I never cease to remember in prayer."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Angel's Humble Duty.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Dewar, speaking to Christian workers on humility, said: "The Rev. Dr. Andrew Bonar at one time made the remark that the angel who was sent down to roll away the stone from the grave of Christ did not think that it was too humble a position for an angel to take, but rather felt honored in doing so. We should even be content to be the doorkeeper in the Lord's house, if by doing so we honor Him."

Comfort in a Personal Pronoun.—The Rev. Mr. Riddell related: "An eminently great and good man lay dying. His mind was calm and his heart was full of joy which showed itself on his countenance, as he uttered the delightful words My God! 'Ah,' he continued, 'I wouldn't give these two words for all the world to-night.' I remember also the case of a woman, who by an accident at sea lost husband, children, and income. For a long time she was inconsolable, and plunged into the deepest melancholy. Sympathy she would have none of, but one day she read in the Psalms 'He is the health of my countenance and my God.' 'My God! Mine!' she thought; 'then I have no fear; He is quite enough for me.' Immediately her mind became calm and serene; she put her foot on the Rock of Ages, and stayed there full of the peace which passeth all understanding."

A Jewish Walking-Stick Maker was in destitute circumstances, and the Rev. John Wilkinson called upon him to see what could be done. The man's wife said she had sold all she possessed, both of clothing and blankets, to get bread for the children. The family lived on the top floor of a house—husband, wife, and six children. The man was a walking-stick maker by trade, but had been out of employment several weeks. He looked quiet and respectable, but said he was not religious, and did not often go to Synagogue. Mr. Wilkinson set Christ and His salvation before both husband and wife, and they listened with deep interest. Pointing to a little fellow about six years old the father said, "That boy goes to the Board School, and has learned a pretty prayer. Kneel down, Isaac, and say it." The boy knelt, and, putting his little hands together, began, "Our Father which art in heaven," and repeated the words to the end. "Do you know where that prayer comes from?" Mr. Wilkinson asked. "It is the Lord's Prayer—the prayer the Lord Jesus Christ taught to His disciples." Turning to the little boy he asked, "Didn't you say, 'Give us this day our daily bread?'" "Yes." "Whom did you ask?" "God." "Will He give it, think you?" "Yes," said the boy, with childlike confidence. "Here is the answer to your prayer," and the missionary laid upon the table two coins. They all knelt together to thank God for this timely help. It would have brightened any heart to witness the change from sadness to joy; and Christ is no stranger in that family now, but a dear and trusted Friend.

Results of a Smile and a Nod.—Mr. Mabon, a city missionary, says: 'On Tuesday last, on my way to our meeting, I met two mothers going home from shopping. They had their babies in their arms, and I gave them a smile and a nod. They said to each other, 'We'll go and hear that happy-looking man to-night.' It was the turning-point of their lives, for they were converted to God that very night. On Thursday one of them said to me, 'I have had no peace since Thursday night at home.' 'Why?' 'My husband is continually scolding me for coming here.' 'Doesn't he approve of you having given your heart to Jesus?' 'It is not that, but he doesn't believe in conversion,' was the reply. I went to see him at once, and at our open-air meeting on Saturday he was the happiest-looking man in the crowd. He believes in conversion now, for by the might of the Holy Spirit, he, too, is a new creature in Christ Jesus, and rejoices in His salvation."

A Mother's Heart Touched.—Mr. W. A. Campbell relates: "I was recently visiting a woman, and talked to her about her soul. The only thing that seemed to move her was telling her that if not for her own, at least for her children's sake, she should turn from her evil ways. Then I pictured to her the last day, when she would be standing with her children at her side before the great Judge, and said, 'There will be no need to open the books to condemn you; your own conscience will be enough; your whole life will stand out in great glaring letters before you; and your children may turn round to you and say: "Mother, if it had not been for your bad example, we might have been at the right hand of God, and heard Him say: 'Come, inherit the place prepared for you,' but instead, we are at the left hand, and hear Him say: 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.'" 'Oh, what a reproach! How can you stand it?' I went away to let the woman think over these words, promising to call again, for I could see she was deeply moved, and she has since yielded herself to Christ."

A Squire's Puzzle Explained.—Mr. Arnot related: "A curate went to a new parish, and the people were much pleased with him personally, and with the manner and matter of his sermons; but some felt that they were only from his head, not from his heart. The proprietor of the estate was a young man, and one day he came and listened very attentively to a sermon from the text, 'Ye must be born again.' It was clearly and logically explained, but the living Christians thought it was not that of a man who felt what he said, or had realized the new birth himself. The young squire left the church, thinking, 'I don't know any one who has been born again; I should like to be so. I will invite the curate to dinner, and ask him if he has been born again.' When the curate got the invitation, he thought, 'Well, I suppose I must go and listen to this young fellow's talk about horses and dogs, instead of spending the evening at the literary society.' The squire had said in his note. 'Do not be surprised that I have not asked any one to meet you, as I wish to speak to you alone.' When dinner was over there were a few minutes of embarrassed silence which the curate broke by saying, 'By the by, you wished to speak to me about something?' 'Yes, it is about that sermon of yours,' answered the host. 'Why what is wrong with it?' 'Nothing that I know of, only that I don't know any one who has been born again. Now, to put it personally, have you been born again yourself?' The curate lowered his head on his hands, and the host went to the window till he recovered himself. In a few minutes the curate touched the squire on the shoulder, and asked, 'Can we have a minute's prayer together?' 'Yes, certainly, was the answer; 'come into the library.' They prayed together, and ultimately both became new men in Christ Jesus."

By Henry Groves.

Increasing Prominence of the Jews—Their Desire for Settlement away from Palestine Thwarted—Their Position as Witnesses — The Nest Stirred up—The Anti-Semitism of Russia Predicted—Her Passion for Holy Wars — The Hatred Reciprocated.

FEW things are more remarkable in the present day than the way in which the ancient people of God are being brought to the front, whether through their growing influence in the money market and in the politics of Europe, or through the bitter and inhuman persecution brought to bear upon them, in this century of boasted civilization and liberty, by those who would not only exclude them from all civil rights and social standing, but subject them to a system of plunder and outrage that recalls the bloodshed and rapine of the dark ages.

A THWARTED PURPOSE.

Lovers of Israel for the fathers' sake will have read with paintul interest the account of the outrages on person and property committed under the eyes of the Russian Government, that in their extent and ferocity far exceed what has for some time marked the anti-Semitic movement in Germany and Hungary. The bulk of the nation would probably gladly settle down where they are, could they, as in America and England, enjoy the common rights of citizenship with those around them, with very little practical interest or concern in what belongs to Israel's inheritance in the land of their fathers, or to their historic past or prophetic future. But God has purposes in reference to Israel that the majority of the Jews of to-day little dream of.

GOD'S NATIONAL WITNESS.

Israel is emphatically the only national witness God ever had in the world, and to this high destiny God destined them in the call of Abraham, and for its ultimate realization in the future He has kept them amid persecution, suffering, and woes that would have obliterated all vestige of any other nation under heaven. Verily, the bush has been on fire and yet not consumed, whether under Egypt, or in Babylon, or beneath the iron heel of Roman and European tyranny. "Ye are my witnesses: is there a God beside me?" says the prophet Isaiah; and in the midst of the atheism of the day God gives the world a witness that God is, whether man will heed it or not.

When the purposes of God are unfolded we shall better understand why Israel has been preserved through all the miseries of their national life and history; for, except with faint and transitory gleams of sunshine, it has been a nation of sorrows for well nigh four thousand years, ever since the smoking furnace of affliction and the burning lamp of fire ratified God's covenant with Abraham in Genesis 15.

But Israel has

and destiny, and God's hand is again coming in to stir up the Jewish nest, and to remind them that they are strangers in the lands of the Gentiles, and that they will find no rest for the sole of their foot till they get back to their own land. It is there that Antichrist finds them, when he makes his one week's covenant with them (Dan. 9). But while dwelling at length on the last form of Roman power as seen in Antichrist, "the man of sin," Scripture is not silent as to the enmity of Russia toward Israel; for we are told in Ezekiel (ch. 38, 39) that in the latter days "the prince of Rosh,* Meshech, and Tubal" shall come up against them as "a people brought back from the sword," and "gathered out of many peoples." These names are all familiar as connected with the Scythian tribes, and are frequently mentioned by Byzantine writers as belonging to tribes inhabiting the country lying along the shores of the Caspian and Black seas, under the names of Ros, Moschi, and Tuplai. They gradually extended over what now forms the Russian Empire, and we readily identify the Bible names with them, from which are derived the names of Russia, Moscow, and Tobolsk.

Thus the prophetic Word seems to point to Russia as one of the great enemies of Israel in the future, that shall come down upon them when dwelling in their unwalled villages.

The Russians are remarkable for their religious fanaticism, and as in the twelfth century the fanaticism of the Romish Church brought the hordes of the West in a crusade against the Mohammedan sacrilegious hold of the Holy Sepulchre and other sacred places, so nothing would be more likely to stir up the Russian national feeling than to recover the holy places once more, and that from the hands of the already hated Jew. "Stormy wind fulfilling His pleasure," represents how all the stormy passions of fallen men accomplish His ends and further His purposes, and He who says to the raging sea, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no further," says the same to all the personal and national antagonisms of man, who, like Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal in the future, and the Assyrian in the past, boasts in the power of his arm and in the glory of his high looks, for "the Lord, the Lord of hosts will lop the bough with terror, and Lebanon shall fall by a mighty one."

RECIPROCATED ANIMOSITY.

It is, then, deeply interesting to see all that is going on around us, and in the signs of the times to read intimations that enable us to "see the day approaching" (Heb. 10: 25), and to lift up our heads, knowing that our redemption draweth nigh. It is deserving of notice, in regard to the relation of Russia to Israel, how almost instinctively the Jewish people and their organs in England sided with the Beaconsfield policy in the attempt to back up Turkey against Russia. But while politicians carry out their thoughts regardless of God and of His purposes, it is well that those who have the sure Word of prophecy, should heed well what God has said, that the prophetic Word in all its detail may be as a light shining in the dark place of man's sin and rebellion, to whisper to the troubled soul that God is, after all, riding on the storm and directing the tempest, of which prophecy has beforehand pointed out the direction and the duration.

In conclusion, we would earnestly press everything connected with Israel upon the attention of the saints of God, reminding them that, as the translation of the Church is to precede the deliverance of Israel, all that indicates the nearness of the latter indicates the yet nearer approach of the former, when the Church, having been caught up to meet the Lord in the air, shall go in and sit down at the marriage supper in the kingdom of God, and thence at the appointed time come forth following Him who shall be to Israel and to the world King of kings and Lord of lords; when the battle of Armageddon shall close the scene of man's rebellion and bring in the reign of righteousness and peace.

Armageddon is where Antichrist falls, and probably that toward which Russia, with its confederate nations, will be directing their course when God will smite them as He did the Assyrian in the days of Hezekiah, and fulfil the prophetic utterances of such Scriptures as Ps. 149 and Rev. 2: 26-28.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning contained some ringing truths to which every Christian citizen should give careful attention. It is printed on page 660 of this paper. As will be seen, Dr. Talmage believes that our Union will fall and decay like the nations of antiquity did, unless certain public evils, now flourishing, are eradicated. There are citizens who do not care whether it lives or dies, providing it lasts their time, but we are happy to believe that very few belong to that class. To those who are prayerfully anxious that the freedom and national independence, for which our fathers laid down their lives, should be transmitted unimpaired to our children, Dr. Talmage's solemn warning is earnestly commended.

An Important Letter by Ex-Governor Horatio Seymour on the tariff question was published last week. Governor Seymour is an aged and experienced statesman who has withdrawn from politics, but is anxious that the nation should not, on this matter, commit itself to a policy which he believes would be suicidal alike to farmers and manufacturers. Governor Seymour calls attention to the fact that the main source of our national prosperity is the immense quantity of agricultural products we export to Europe. Statistics collected by the Government show that those exports are declining, and he believes that the decline is caused in some measure by the competition of other nations with us in the European markets. The vast plains of Russia, South America, India and Australia now produce large supplies of agricultural produce, and we are being driven out of the markets. It is true that we can afford to sell at lower prices than other peoples, but we are placed at a disadvantage by lack of reciprocity. That is, Europeans prefer to buy of people who buy of them. Our tariff practically excludes their manufactures, indeed, it is imposed for that purpose. Governor Seymour asks if we have not gone far enough on this line. There is, as Governor Seymour observes, no free trade party here, nor does any one advocate a change in the policy of raising our national revenue by taxes on imports; but we must be careful that in our anxiety to protect one industry we do not irreparably injure another. Both the political parties are concerned for the welfare of the nation and they may both profitably consider Governor Seymour's figures and arguments.

Thefts of the Public Land are Becoming serious. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report to Secretary Teller, says: "The time is near at hand when there will be no public lands to invite settlement or afford citizens of the country an opportunity to secure cheap homes. Meanwhile, vast stretches of uncultivated lands are everywhere observable, title to which has been acquired by evasions of law. The time has fully arrived when wastefulness should cease, and that portion still remaining should be economized for the use of actual settlers only." It would appear that laws intended to benefit bona fide settlers have been so applied by the land-thieves as to cover their frauds. The Commissioner therefore recommends the repeal of the pre-emption law, the timber culture law, and the desert land law, and that the commutation provisions of the homestead law be amended.

The United States are now the Largest Manufacturing country on the globe, according to a report issued last week by Mr. Nimmo, the chief of the Bureau of Statistics. The report shows that the value of the products of American manufacture consumed at home is five times the value of the manufactured products of Great Britain and Ireland exported to all other countries, and more than fourteen times the value of the exports of manufactured products from France to all other countries. A remarkable feature of the report is the list of figures showing how large a proportion of our products are required at home. It seems that of the gross product of the respective interests, we consume in the United States ninety-nine per cent of the coal mined in this country, ninety-five per cent of our iron and steel products, ninety-five per cent of the products of our leather industry, more than ninety-nine per cent of our manufactures of wool, ninety-five per cent of the products of our cotton manufactures, more than ninety-nine per cent of our manufactures of silk, and ninety-seven per cent of our manufactures of glass, glassware, earthenware and stoneware.

The Prime-Meridian Conference in Washington failed again last week in arriving at any agreement. After long debate the opposition of the French delegates to the adoption of an English meridian continued firm. They were willing to waive their preference for a prime meridian running through their own country, but they were not willing to recommend a meridian which would cross the territories of any other great Power. They insisted upon a common prime meridian which should be absolutely neutral—that is, which should lie wholly outside the limits of Europe and America. Commander Sampson, of the United States Naval Observatory, in replying to the French delegates, pointed out that a prime meridian, in order to be accurately determined and fixed, should run through some established national observatory, and should be in telegraphic communication with the rest of the world. It would be inconvenient and difficult to locate a prime meridian through Behring Strait or across the Azores, as suggested by the French delegates, because there were no facilities in either place for the necessary astronomical work. Furthermore, economy, as well as convenience, required the adoption of the meridian of Greenwich. More than seventy per cent of the world's shipmasters used this meridian in the calculation of their longitude, and the cost of necessary changes in existing charts, if any other prime meridian were adopted, would exceed $10,000,000. At the close of the debate one of the French delegates said emphatically to a United States naval officer that France would never consent to engrave on her charts "longitude, west (or east) from Greenwich." If the other nations should, as seems probable, adopt Greenwich as their prime meridian, France will have taken another step toward complete isolation.

A Day of Fasting and Prayer has been Appointed by the National Committee of the Prohibition party. Last week Mr. John B. Finch, the chairman, issued the following notice: "In view of the misery and crime resulting from alcoholism, and of the guilt fastened upon the people by governments—municipal, State, and national—by permitting and even licensing the traffic in poisonous drinks, the Executive Committee of the Prohibition party call upon the people of this country to observe Wednesday, October 29th, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and confession, and in view of the fact that many all over the land are aroused and realize the enormity of the liquor crime, and are willing to be at cost and pains to put it away, we call upon all Christian believers to unite in prayer to Almighty God that His aid may be given to measures which will result in the speedy putting away of this guilt and the suppression of the traffic in alcoholic drinks." It will be seen that this call does not ask Christians to pray for the success of the national Prohibition ticket. The request is one with which Christian Republicans and Democrats can conscientiously comply.

The Corner-stone of the New Building of the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association was laid on Saturday last. There was a large attendance. The building when completed will be the largest Y. M. C. A. building in the country. It is situated on Bond Street, running through the block to Hanover Place, and having a wing with an entrance on Fulton Street. Dr. Talmage, Dr. L. W. Bancroft, Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey took part in the proceedings. In the evening a meeting was held in the Academy of Music, when an effort was made to raise $15,000, which still remained to be collected to complete the arrangement with Mr. Marquand. That gentleman, it will be remembered, stipulated that his munificent gift of land and building should be supplemented by an endowment fund of $150,000, which the association was to raise. The sum in hand on Saturday amounted to $135,000. The collections and subscriptions received during the day realized $4000. The association therefore still needs to raise $11,000.

An Attempt to Destroy the New Parliament buildings in Quebec was made on Saturday, October 11th. There were two explosions of dynamite. The first occurred at twenty minutes to one in the afternoon. It caused a terrific shock, which was felt throughout the city. The utmost consternation was caused, the affrighted people rushing into the streets unable to imagine what had occurred. A general movement was made to the new Parliament houses, from which it appeared the noise came. There it was found that a hole about twelve feet high by five feet wide was blown out of the wall on the third story from the basement, near the place where the Speaker's chair is situated. People who were near the scene say that at the time of the explosion a shower of stones and other débris rose in the air from the south end of Parliament House and huge blocks of stone were hurled a distance of between two and three hundred feet. Two hours later a second explosion occurred in the north-east corner of the same building. The corner-stones forming the support of the building were badly bulged, and it is doubtful if it can be repaired without letting down the whole wall. Happily no lives were lost. Scientists in the city who examined the ruins are certain that the explosions were produced by dynamite. No evidence has been discovered to connect the diabolical act with the Irish miscreants who are concocting dynamite plots. They are naturally suspected, however, and threats of popular vengeance are freely used against them, especially by the French workmen at the building, who had a narrow escape.

Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Famous Scottish evangelist preaches in the Brooklyn Tabernacle on Friday (to-morrow) at 7.30 P.M. Dr. Talmage, in announcing, on Sunday, that Miss McLatchie had accepted his invitation to preach, said that he had had the pleasure of meeting her in Scotland during his last transatlantic tour, and that he had heard of her remarkable success in her own country and in England as a preacher. All our readers who are in New York or Brooklyn on Friday should avail themselves of this opportunity of listening to this gifted lady.

The Bishop of Rochester, England, Speaking upon temperance in Boston recently, remarked that in England the people of differing views had agreed to band together and give a common front to the deadly foe. He spoke of the progress the cause gained in England since eight bishops and three thousand clergymen of the Protestant Epscopal Church became total abstainers. In America, he said, you have a much better temperance law than in England, and he advised that the people make the most of it. He remarked upon the great benefit gained in England from the many coffee and tea houses in large cities, and advised that a little more money be spent in providing tea and coffee houses with attractions equal to those found in the saloons.

Secretary Chandler's Opinion of Drunken officers is not in accord with that of ex-President Hayes who, during his term of office reinstated those found guilty of the offence. In confirming the finding of a court-martial suspending an officer from rank and duty for two years, he having been convicted of drunkenness, the Secretary wrote: "Every naval officer whose use of intoxicating liquors becomes so excessive that his superiors cause him to be tried and convicted of drunkenness, should be sentenced to dismissal, and the sentence should be inexorably carried into execution. Whatever charity or assistance may be extended to such officers should be given when they reach some other walk of life than the naval service. They are worthless members of their profession, and should, in every case, be forced off the active list of the navy." The Secretary is right in thinking that such men are not fit for naval duties and responsibilities. Neither are they wanted in any other walk of life. While the victims of drunken habits they are nuisances wherever they go and charity and assistance are wasted upon them.

The Prospectus of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York for 1884-85 is now issued. It offers an unusually attractive programme. The members are entitled to the use of the Gymnasium; to the advantages of the evening classes, which include those for the study of German, French, Spanish, phonography, writing, bookkeeping, and music; admission to the lectures of the season, among which will be lectures or readings by Mr. J. B. Gough, Rev. Joseph Cook, George W. Cable, and Mr. Robert J. Burdette; and the use of the library of 30,000 volumes and a reading room containing 500 papers. Besides all these advantages there are the ordinary religious and social meetings. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing the secretaries at the Association Building, Twenty-third Street, Corner of Fourth Avenue.

Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, has been laboring in New York during the past month with remarkable success. His audiences have been drawn from that class which is a terror to the city. The power he has over those men is marvellous. Some of them met him in the prize ring and tried issues with him in another way. They know him personally and are attracted by curiosity to learn what their converted antagonist may have to say. It is astonishing how attentively and quietly they listen to home-thrusts from Hogan's lips, which, if they came from an ordinary preacher or evangelist, would inevitably provoke violence. Much good has been done by God's blessing on Mr. Hogan's labors, and we hear with regret that he is thinking of leaving soon on a Southern tour. Considering the state of New York City, and the beneficial influence already exerted by Mr. Hogan's work, it would be a wise thing if public-spirited Christian citizens were to place a hall at his disposal for the winter. It would cost far less than we spend in capturing and punishing the men whom God enables Mr. Hogan to permanently reform. Like the late Jerry McAuley, Ben Hogan has the power few possess of speaking with effect to roughs of all kinds. Now that the city has lost its honored and successful evangelist, it needs, more urgently than before, such a man as Hogan to continue the good work which Jerry McAuley so indefatigably prosecuted. A winter of Mr. Hogan's labor in New York would be a public benefit which the city ought to secure.

Twenty Missionaries are Needed for the Central African field. The Rev. William Summers, M.D., a graduate from Pennington Seminary, is about to lead a party of Christian missionaries into Central Afrcia, in conjunction with Bishop Taylor. A description of his plans was given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 25th. Dr. Summers lectured in the church at Pennington, N. J., recently on Africa and its need of the Gospel. He said that Bishop Taylor will enter Africa from the Atlantic coast with twenty missionaries about October or November, and that he (Dr. Summers) will enter Africa from the Indian Ocean with twenty more missionaries in May or June next. Both parties will advance toward the interior until they meet, thus completing the chain of mission stations across Africa from the mouth of the Congo on the Atlantic Ocean to the mouth of the Zambesi on the Indian Ocean. Forty missionaries will be required for the work, of whom twenty have already been secured.

A Dog's Tooth was Extracted Under Significant circumstances recently. The Philadelphia Ledger says that a dog belonging to a lady residing in Yardleyville, Bucks County, was the other day the victim of an accident that knocked one of his teeth partly out. The lady endeavored to relieve him by pulling it out entirely, but his struggles prevented her, and she said rather impatiently, "Oh, well, if you won't keep still I can't help you. Go away!" After going off some distance he returned and lay down on his back at her feet, with his mouth open, suppressed with evident effort his natural disposition to howl while she pulled the partially displaced tooth, and affectionately licked her hand when the grinder was finally dislodged. This illustration of canine sagacity is well vouched for. The dog could not undertsand the words used, but he evidently knew that his struggles prevented his being relieved. If Christian people arrived at the same conclusion and placed themselves and their trials quietly and trustfully in the hands of God they would often be spared much suffering (Ps. 46 : 10).

The Sale of a Daughter by her Parents was arranged, but not consummated in Pennsylvania recently. A farmer and his wife, notorious for their avarice, are living in Wayne County of that State. They have a beautiful daughter, eighteen years of age, to whom an elderly boarder in their family paid suit. Finding his attentions repelled by the girl, he applied to the parents. They were so far lost to all sense of their duty and responsibility as to negotiate for the sale of their daughter, for whom the wooer offered to give the deed of a farm. The girl was not informed of the bargain, but the parents purchased bridal attire for her and invited a party of friends to the wedding. The girl did not discover the plot until the morning of the day fixed for the wedding, when she tore up the bridal garments provided for her and fled from the house, taking refuge with some friends at Scranton. It is not often that parents are guilty of conduct so openly unnatural, but there is reason to fear that many marriages are arranged on terms equally degrading. The intense desire in the heart for riches it appears, can overcome natural affection (Prov. 15 : 27).

HEAVEN BELOW.

"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters."—REV. 7 : 16, 17.

The Home Country—Its Unalloyed Happiness—Present Enjoyment—I. The Perfection of the Provision—They Dwell in God—Their Necessities Prevented—Overpowering Influences Attempted—Injurious Influences Cease—All the Blessings for Present Use—The Fever of the Soul—II. The Provider—The Lamb-Shepherd—Includes Meekness and Sacrifice—III. The Manner of Providing—The Under-Shepherds—The Leading—The Heights and Living Fountains.

LET us think of this felicity, that we may be comforted in the prospect of it. All this is already enjoyed by tens of thousands of the redeemed. Some of those who were very dear to us on earth, whose faith we desire to follow, are now forever with the Lord, and this is their joyful portion—"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat." Our comfort lies in the sweet reflection that we are journeying to this goodly land. This divine inheritance is ours: we have the seal of the Holy Spirit upon our title-deeds; we have tasted of the grapes of its Eshcol; we already rejoice in the light and warmth of its celestial city to which we draw near. In a little time we shall be actually within the gate of pearl, and shall know in an instant infinitely more of its glory than an apostle could teach us here below.

We are like to one who hath in his hand the guide-book of a country to which he is journeying; he finds in it fair pictures of the scenery of the land and the architecture of the cities, and as he reads each page he says to himself, "I am going there! This is what I shall soon behold!" It would be a wretched thing to have such a book in one's hand and to be entering upon a lifelong banishment from home and

THE HOME-COUNTRY.

Then should we have to say, "This was my country once, but I shall never see it again. Fair are its skies and lovely are its vales, but mine eye shall ache in vain to gaze upon them. I am exiled forever from my own dear land!" It is not so with us who are believers in Christ: our faces are toward Immanuel's land, the land which floweth with milk and honey, and we have a portion among the blessed; a mansion is being made ready for each one of us, and we have this promise: "Go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Rejoice, then, beloved; for if your portion on earth be slender, if your condition here be sorrowful, if your trials multiply, if your strength declines, yet it is but a little while and he that will shall come, and shall not tarry.

But I want you to do this morning, and by God's grace I think we shall accomplish it, a little more than receive comfort. I long that we may "sit together in the heavenlies" even now. It seems to me that this world, if Christians lived as they should do, would become a nether heaven. The true Christian life, when we live near to God, is the rough draft of the life of full communion above. We have seen the artist make with his pencil, or with his charcoal, a bare outline of his picture. It is nothing more, but still one could guess what the finished picture will be from the sketch before you.

I. Keeping to the text, however, I want to speak, first, of which is enjoyed in heaven—"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat." This is the perfection of the provision.

I must, by your permission, go a little further back to make my description of this provision more complete. Notice the last sentence of the fifteenth verse: "He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. In the reading we interpreted according to the Revised Version, which gives a more correct rendering: "He that sitteth on the throne shall spread His tabernacle over them." The glorified dwell under the shadow of God. It is for this reason that "the sun shall not light on them, nor any heat," because they dwell in God. Oh, what a joy this must be in heaven, to be always within the circle of the eternal presence, which is always seen, always unclouded, always enjoyed! Such a dwelling means transformation, for none can dwell with God but those who are like Him, free from sin, and perfect in holiness. We cannot abide in God forever unless we are like Him, and this in itself is boundless bliss. The abiding in the outspread pavilion of Jehovah will certify a similarity of sanctity and purity between the redeemed and the great Father who becomes their dwelling-place. The Lord shall tabernacle over His glorified people: He shall be their eternal home.

Next we are assured that they shall have all

THEIR NECESSITIES PREVENTED.

"They shall hunger no more." To be supplied when we hunger is the mercy of earth: never to hunger at all is the plenitude of heaven. God shall so fill the souls of His redeemed that they shall have no longings: their longings shall be prevented by their constant satisfaction. That which they enjoy will be more than they ever desired to enjoy, or ever imagined that they could be capable of enjoying. Imagination's utmost height never reached to the exceeding bliss and glory of the world to come. The saints confess in the glory that it never entered into their hearts to guess what God had prepared for them that love Him. Heaven shall exceed all the desires of God's people; they shall not, even with their enlarged capacities, be able to wish for anything which they do not already possess; so that they shall hunger no more, in the sense that they shall never pant for more than they have.

They shall have done with the desires which it is right for them to have here—desires which intimate their present imperfection. Here it is their duty and their privilege to long after perfection, to be sighing and crying for a perfect deliverance from every shade of sin; but they shall not sigh and cry for this in glory, for they shall be without fault before the throne of God. None of them shall cry, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" This on earth is one of the most deeply spiritual of cries, never heard from any but those whose sanctification is greatly advanced. None will ever utter that bitter exclamation but men like Paul, to whom the slightest speck of sin has a horror about it akin to death itself. Fanatical persons it is the talk of blind men: but those whose eyes have seen the Lord abhor themselves, and sigh and cry over what other men call failures, and mistakes, and infirmities. To them their heart sins and unseen faults are things to weep over; they have sharp hungerings and piercing thirsts after complete likeness to Christ. This likeness the saints possess before the throne; and they shall not thirst any more, even after this best and most desirable of attainments, since they shall enjoy it to the full.

Beloved, observe that, as they have no kind of hunger, so they have also no measure of thirst; that is to say, they have no needs, no unsatisfied wishes of any sort. In whatever form a need might approach them, it is excluded, for both hunger and thirst are shut out. Oh, brothers, it has been blessed to hunger and thirst after righteousness; what must that higher blessedness be which rises above even these holy desires!

We have wishes here which ought not to be gratified; these occasion us our sharpest pangs of hunger; but there they shall never know an unlawful wish, a wandering desire, or even an unwise longing. They shall have all things that a renewed heart can enjoy. All that their perfected nature can yearn after they shall possess; there shall be no unsatisfied craving of their manhood, neither their risen body nor their sanctified spirit shall be moved to hunger or thirst after any evil, for there shall be nothing about them which has a tendency that way. The provision made for them shall be so absolutely complete that before they can desire any good thing they shall find it; before they know a need they shall have enjoyed the supply. This is wonderful! Yes, but all I can tell you is not the half of the truth.

Further, as we read we discover a third blessing, namely, that every overpowering influence is attempered—"Neither shall the sun light on them." What if by that "sun" is meant the full glory of God! If you and I could be introduced into the divine presence at once and as we are, the first result upon us must be a swoon, and the second must be death. We are not prepared to endure the Lord as our Sun, in meridian splendor. In heaven they are able to endure the immediate presence of God, not only because of the Mediatorship of Christ, through whom the glory of God shines with tempered splendor upon the saints, but also because they themselves are strengthened. From all this earthly grossness quit, they are enabled to stand in that light to which no mortal man can now approach. To us even "our God is a consuming fire" while we are here; but in the saints there remaineth nothing to consume. Blessed, indeed, are they who shall behold the King in the ivory palaces above!

When it is added, "Nor any heat," we learn that shall cease to operate. By our surroundings here we are troubled with many heats. The very comforts of life, like warm weather, tend to dry us up. A man may have gold, a man may have health, a man may have prosperity and honor till he is withered like the heath in the desert in the day of drought. Unless a dew from the Lord shall rest upon the branch of the prosperous he will be parched indeed. We have need of grace whenever God gives us blessings of a temporal kind. But no heat of that sort shall happen to saints in heaven; they can be rich, and honored, and perfectly beautiful, and yet under no temptation to self-exaltation. Here the heats which are around us tend to fever us. Many are the temptations of this life: some of them soft and deceptive, others fierce and terrible; but up yonder no sirocco shall ever blow, and the inhabitant shall no more say, "I am sick."

See, then, the perfect provision which is made by Christ for His saints above, and listen while we try to show that this same provision, in a modified way, lies to our hand even now. Come, beloved, do we not dwell in God? Do we not sing, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations?" If any of you believers have wandered away from your resting-place, whose fault is that? Has not the Lord given you Himself to be your perpetual pavilion? Has not Jesus said, "Abide in me?" Have you not sung in that sweet twenty-third Psalm, "I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever?" What more do you want? The Lord hath spread His tabernacle over you; you abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

A child of God in communion with Christ would not lift his finger to possess a world, nor wink his eye to see all the pomp of kings, nor move a step to enjoy all the honors of rank, nor rise from sitting at Jesus' feet to learn all the wisdom of philosophy. He is already filled; what can he have more? The best of the best has fallen to his portion, and shall he change it? No; like the olive tree, he saith, "Should I leave my fatness, and go to be promoted over the trees?" and with the fig, he cries, "Should I forsake my sweetness, and go to be promoted over the trees?" He that eateth of the bread which Jesus gives him shall never hunger more after a painful sort. The husks of carnal joy have no attractions to the son who banquets at his father's table.

"Neither shall they thirst any more;" they shall feel that the Lord Jesus is such an all-satisfying, all-sufficient portion that their

DESIRES CAN GO NO FURTHER.

I have sped across the sea with flying sails, bidding each gale waft me according to its will, hoping that I might somewhere find a port. Restlessly have I hastened to and fro, and been tossed up and down, the sport of every wave. My spirit has sped on and on through fair and foul, never abiding long in one stay. Happily there came a day when I found a fair haven. Down went my anchor; it took fast hold and held my barque. Under the lee of Calvary I found rest. Now blow ye winds, or cease to blow as shall best please you. I stir not out to sea again. In the fair haven of the love of God in Christ Jesus shall my spirit abide forever. If we could but reach this resolve, dear brethren, and hold to it, we should have no more anxieties and longings; we also should hunger no more, neither thirst any more.

And now, beloved, if you are being daily fed by Jesus and are dwelling in God, the light of the sun, as to temporal prosperity, will do you no harm. You may be rich, but you will not trust in uncertain riches; you may be famous, but you will be as humble as if you were obscure; you may be learned, but you will sit at Jesus' feet; you may be indulged with all kinds of worldly prosperity, and yet these things will not prove a snare unto you. "Neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat."

Those who dwell in God are not now parched with inward heat. We notice people of God who are anxious and fretful, and cause a great deal of misery for people round about them by always worrying, fidgetting, and being in a state of nervous excitement. But holy souls, who abide in Christ, take everything calmly. You can remember such persons, both men and women; whatever happened they remained unmoved, patient, and cheerful. Great losses came in the course of business, but the brother did not lose his balance; sad bereavements came, but the sister did not repine. If the believer endured a sharp affliction, his chief concern was that the Lord would sanctify it to him; if people persecuted or slandered him he was not surprised, for he expected to be hated of the world when he became a follower of Jesus. If he prospered, he did not get into a heat of pride. In patience he possessed his soul. God's good gift of the Holy Spirit comforted and strengthened him. He could say, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise."

"Neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat." How much of mischief comes to the human body through its heats! The doctor looks hopeful when our blood grows cool again and the fever ceases. The best cure for is to be made to dwell under the shadow of the Almighty, and to be fed by the Lord Jesus Christ; for that sacred shadow, and that health-giving food, prevent the burning sickness from coming near the chosen of the Lord.

"Ah," says somebody, "you are setting us up an exceedingly high standard." I am setting up a standard to which multitudes of God's people have attained, to which I would have you all attain. If this blessed bribe of heaven below does not make you ambitious to rise to this level, what more shall I say? It is for your own profit and for God's glory that you should not rest content short of this. Rise from the dust, my brethren. Ascend into the hill of the Lord, and stand in His holy place. Abide in Christ, and feed upon Christ, and then all this shall be yours to-day and throughout life. So much for the perfection of the provision.

II. Now will you give me your heart's attention while I touch a noble string, and that is, the description of

"For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters." You see this is the reason for all the provision and enjoyment; the verse begins with the word "For," signifying that this is the cause of all the felicity of the blessed, that the Lamb doth feed and lead them.

Who is this that feeds them? It is the Lamb. I wish it were possible for me to communicate to you the enjoyment my own soul has had in meditating upon this blessed word "The Lamb," as it stands in this connection. Does it not teach us, first, that our comfort and life must come from our incarnate Saviour—the Lamb? The expression is very peculiar; it is a figure, and no figure; a mixed metaphor, and yet most plain and clear! It is written, "The Lamb shall shepherd them." This is an accurate interpretation. How is that? A shepherd, and that shepherd a Lamb! Here is the truth which the words contain—He that saves is a man like ourselves. He that provides for His people is Himself one of them—"For which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren." A lamb is a member of the flock; but in this case the Lamb is the shepherd of the flock; a shepherd who is also a lamb must be the most tender shepherd conceivable, the most sympathetic and brotherly guardian that can be. When a man is shepherd to sheep he should be compassionate, but he cannot be so tender as if he actually partook of their nature. In our case our shepherd is to the full a partaker of our nature: we are men, and

OUR SHEPHERD IS A MAN.

Does it not mean more than that? "the Lamb" surely refers to sacrifice. Only run your eye back a verse or two, and you have the key of the expression, "they that washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." He, then, that feeds His people in heaven is the sacrifice, the atonement, the expiation.

Still, there is a third meaning which must not be overlooked. "The Lamb" must refer to the meekness of character, the lowliness and condescension of the Lord Jesus. The Lord Jesus Christ on earth was "led as a lamb to the slaughter." He was "meek and lowly in heart." He walked up and down among men, the friend of sinners, the lover of little children, the companion of the poor, and to-day He is not otherwise than He was on the earth.

Thus you see who it is that feeds the saints in heaven, and I desire you to feel that if you are to be fed and comforted here below, it must be by the same great Shepherd of the sheep, in the same character. There are no stores for you other than those which are in the hands of Jesus, in whom all fulness dwells; there are no comforts for you except as they are given from the throne where the Lamb is reigning. Turn ye away, my brethren, turn ye away from all the frothy novelties of modern thought, and the vain inventions of man, and behold the crown of your adorable Lord, the Lamb of God's Passover, the Lamb who shall overcome all the powers of evil and stand in the midst of the throne. If we can but live on these truths, and delight ourselves in them, we shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on us, nor any heat, but even here we shall find living fountains of water, and tears shall be wiped from our eyes.

III. I finish by giving a hint or two only upon the third point; that is to say,

THE MANNER OF THIS PROVIDING.

We have considered the provision in its perfection, and the Provider in His glorious character, now let us see how this provision is given to the saints, for in the same [illegible] is it brought to us.

In two ways the saints in heaven enjoy it—the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them. Go over this, and think first of the feeding of them. The Greek word is "shall shepherdize them." In heaven Jesus is a shepherd ruling over all His flock with a happy, genial, sympathetic sovereignty, to which they yield prompt and glad obedience. There the Lord Jesus cares for His people immediately and personally. He Himself bestows upon them all that they require. Here He has under-shepherds, and He hands out the food by our poor instrumentality; and, alas, sometimes we are found incapable, or forgetful, and the flock is not fed; but it is never so in heaven, for the Lamb Himself maintains the pastorate, and acts the shepherd in a manner which none of us can emulate. All else of care and feeding that saints can require in glory is in Christ. I know not what it may be, but this I know, that while they worship Him He cares for them. He is among them as the Chief Shepherd, at whose appearing the under-shepherds shall appear with Him in glory.

Up yonder Jesus still communes with them very closely, else were it not written, "The Lamb shall feed them." I remind you again of what we have said; He feeds them, therefore He is their Shepherd; yet still it is

them, therefore He is one with them; as if He fed with them, as if their food was His food, and His food their food, and they were one with Him in all respects. But what must fellowship with Christ be in heaven! I do protest I have sometimes had, and many of you have had, such communion with Jesus here that, if I could but have continued to enjoy it, it would not have concerned me the turning of a penny whether I were here or among the angels, for it was bliss enough for me to be with Jesus. But, oh! when we shall have enlarged our capacities, when our understanding shall have been cleared, and our affections purified, and all our manhood shall be made innocent and Christlike, what must it be then to behold His glory, to commune with Himself, to lean our head upon His bosom, to bask in His love, and to feel our hearts on fire with love in return! Now do you not think we can enjoy some of this to-day? Do you question it? What does the tenth of John mean, if Jesus is not the good Shepherd of His sheep at this day? Read it through when you get home. What does the twenty-third Psalm mean? Is that a psalm for another world, or for this? Does it not say, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters"?

Then it is added, "He shall lead." That is another work of the Shepherd, to lead His flock—"He leads them to living fountains of waters." You may read it, "He shall guide them to fountains of waters of life"; it is but a variation of the same thought. Now, even in heaven the holy ones need guiding, and Jesus leads the way. While He is guiding, He points out to His people the secret founts and fresh springs which as yet they have not tasted. As eternity goes on, I have no doubt that the Saviour will be indicating fresh delights to His redeemed. Never will the inexhaustible God who has given Himself to be the portion of His people ever be fully known, so that there will eternally be sources of freshness and new delight, and the Shepherd will continue to lead His flock to these living fountains of water. He will guide them,

"'From glory unto glory,' that ever lies before,
Still widening, adoring, rejoicing more and more,
Still following where He leadeth, from shining field to field, Himself our goal of glory, Revealer and Revealed!"

He will also cause them to drink of the river of His pleasures, so that they shall be full of bliss. Can we not grasp a little of this to-day? If we will but follow Christ we may drink of the water which He freely gives to all who believe in Him, even as He gave to the woman of Samaria. "I cannot see any joy," cries one. No; but to it. "Oh, but I read my Bible this morning, and I did not get anything from it." That may be; but if Jesus had been there and led you to the fountain, you would have been refreshed. How the texts open up when Jesus touches them! You are like Hagar; you have laid your child down among the shrubs to die; you are perishing of thirst, and yet if you would but listen you might hear the plash of the falling waters just behind you. You only need the Lord to speak and open your eyes and you will see rich supplies, for the living fountain is near at hand.

Go you to the Saviour to-day, and say, "Lord, lead me to living fountains of water. I drank years ago, and I have been drinking all along, but, Lord, I want deeper draughts. I desire to know more and love more." Jesus will lead you. He will do it now, and when He does so you will realize to the full how like this earth may be to heaven above. Let us commit ourselves like sheep to our great Shepherd. Come, ye wanderers, return to the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls. You that have been in Him these many years and fed in His pastures, come near to Him, and follow Him yet more closely, and your eyes shall be opened to see new rivers of delight where all seemed dry. You shall find in the valley of Baca a well, and drinking of it you shall go from strength to strength, till every one of you in Zion appeareth before God. How long will it be, O ever-blessed One, till we behold thee? Even now the day breaketh!

A COLPORTEUR'S SUCCESSES.

A CLERGYMAN asked a colporteur to visit in a village an old woman who was very ill, and in great darkness of soul. He did so, and the Lord blessed to her the simple words spoken, and gave her peace. Shortly afterward he was passing through the same village, and thus writes: "On my way I called on Mrs. B——, and found her very happy, trusting in the finished work of Christ. She is now raised up again from her bed, and she thanks God for this answer to prayer, especially as He had been pleased to lay her husband down. I spoke to the poor old man about his soul, when he replied, 'What a face a man must have to live seventy-four years without God, and then come to Him for pardon! Do you think God could forgive such a drunken old man as I have been? Why, sir, I never went on my knees in my life. Do you think God will like my prayers now after such a life?' I replied that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. He did not come for those who needed no repentance. I read John 3 and prayed with him, and gave him a tract.

"As I was leaving Mrs. B—— asked me to see her grandson, a young man about twenty-two years of age. I did so, and found him very ill. I opened my Bible and read to him the story of the Prodigal Son. As I knelt to pray the poor young man began to repeat the Lord's Prayer in broken and disjointed sentences. I stopped him, and told him that that prayer was not for him, for if God's kingdom were to come, and he unsaved, hell would be his portion. Next day, as I was returning that way, I was again called in to see him. I asked him if he wanted me. 'Oh, yes,' he said, 'I want you to read to me out of the Bible. I have had no rest or sleep since you left for fear I should wake up in hell.' I then knelt down and asked the Lord to give me the portion for him, and to bless it to him. I read 1 John 5; when I had got to verse 12 I stopped to speak to him, but he had already read the next verse, and said, 'See, God says, "These things have I written unto you;" that is what God says to me, is it not?' I told him it was, when the poor fellow, I thought, would jump out of bed for joy. He sent for his grandmother to tell her, his mother also, and his aunt.

"He lived only eight days longer; but all testify to the marked change in him—his only desire was that God would take him without pain. On the eighth day he was very restless, and asked his mother to send for me, six miles off. His mother went to make him a cup of tea, but when she brought it to him he was with Jesus. I arrived about three hours afterward, and found him gone. His mother told me he said, 'Mother, I love you, and you will come to Jesus, won't you?' She said she would. The old grandfather is now also a believer, and the aged couple are testifying by a changed life to the grace and power of God. The young man's father, too, now gives evidence of the work of the Holy Spirit, so that four souls in one family have been led to the Saviour through the labors of the colporteur."

The bitter, weary struggle against failure, which so many business men have fought in their respective spheres is often seen by outsiders to be hopeless long before the struggler himself recognizes the fact. He always seems so near the end of his difficulties. If he can only get safely through this week or this month he sees the path ahead quite clear. He exaggerates the value of his possessions, makes out lists of his liabilities in which many are omitted, and asserts his confidence in something turning up to save him from the dreaded resource of bankruptcy. He borrows money from his friends, and when he has wearied them, from usurers, hoping all the time that in some way help will come to him as it has come to others, and he will still preserve his good name. It is a bitter fight, and many a brave man has fallen despairing and broken-hearted on the scene of his defeat.

Such a fight Edward Raburn had been fighting for more than a year, when he mustered courage to make out a balance-sheet. He knew money was tight, that he had not been able to meet his notes punctually, though a few years before he had been taking his discounts; but he did not know how much he owed until that balance-sheet stared him in the face. He was appalled; his heart sank within him. But he had to go to his business, and it would never do to go with a downcast countenance. That would induce suspicion, and suspicion would be fatal. In that evil hour the necessity of "bracing himself up" seemed paramount. He went to his cellar, and bringing up a bottle of wine he poured out a glassful and drank it. It did him good and he drank two more. No one looking at him as he entered his office would have supposed that he had a terrible anxiety gnawing at his heart. Nor was he so conscious of it himself as he had been some hours earlier. The wine had given him new courage to face his difficulties and shed a rosy light on the dark future.

"Who would not pity a man who drinks that he may forget his misery for a brief hour. Especially would we pity the man who drinks because he wishes only to thrust his misery aside that he may struggle with his strength unburdened of the weight of care. But pity as we may we cannot forget that the man who yields to the temptation commits an act of unmitigated folly, which he will rue sooner or later. The next morning always comes bringing the weight of care back to the shoulders, and the aching head is far less able to think now than it was yesterday. He must seek it yet again. That was Edward Raburn's case and he trimmed his lamp with the same oil as before.

He was not an old man—little over forty—but those who knew him declare that in the year that followed his first resort to the bottle, he grew older in appearance by ten years, and he actually did grow older in the wear and tear on his system. His body at the end of that year was in a worse condition than it would have been if it had undergone ten years of ordinary labor. And what had he gained? Less than nothing. His prospects were bright to him when he was under the influence of liquor, but the brightness was delusive. He was more inclined to undertake rash and desperate ventures than in his sober time. His schemes were more like gambling than ordinary business, and gradually, dreading the hour when his mind resumed its normal condition, and he saw his true business situation with its clouded horizon, he shrank from it, and as the year drew to a close he was seldom quite sober.

Then the crash came. His name appeared in the list of bankrupts and he saw another man holding in behalf of his creditors his treasured household goods. It was heart-breaking work; and he was more strongly impelled to drink than ever. He obtained a situation in the warehouse of a friend who sympathized with him in his misfortunes, but he who had so long been used to command found it very hard to obey. Daily humiliations came upon him and he had only one support to nerve him to endurance. Still he applied for help to the liquor which gave him courage while it sapped endurance. Once and again he came to business in a state in which he was unfit for his duties and received a serious warning. Finally he was discharged, and drifting about from one place to another, at last brought up at the poorhouse.

Entering that refuge of the destitute one winter afternoon, he wandered aimlessly around until he came to a corner in which four of his fellow-inmates were grouped. They were men to whom but two years ago he would not have spoken. Poverty makes some men fierce and desperate; but in the poorhouse, especially with those who have been long there, there is far more dull, spiritless indifference written on the faces than any other expression. After a time there comes with it a look of low cunning, as the inmates find that crafty tricks will sometimes gain them some trifling luxury. There is also a keen interest in the story of a newcomer as in a tale the end of which is present before them. It is said that men never find the misfortunes of others a wholly unpleasant subject. That is especially true in the poorhouse, where many of the inmates are not sorry to hear that others have suffered and failed as they have.

Raburn was glad of any company that day to banish the thoughts which made solitude a horrible experience. He sat down among the men with whom he was to spend his time in future, and with bowed head and eyes fastened on the ground he answered the curious questions put to him. His new acquaintances were inquisitive; they had nothing to do, and this newcomer furnished occupation for the hours that were hard to kill.

The weeks passed by for Raburn in dull monotony. He was dull and depressed, and his craving for his accustomed stimulants was dreadful. But after a time enforced abstinence began to have its effect. His eye grew brighter, his mind began to recover some of its former acuteness, and he began to think. One morning he surprised the managers by asking if he could help them with the accounts. He was quick at figures, he said. They gave him work and once at his accustomed occupation he brightened still more. But a more important influence was at work.

A Christian gentleman who visited the poorhouse, and occasionally held a religious service there, noticed Raburn, and hearing his sad story, tried to help him in the way in which he most needed help. Life had lost all its hope for him, but he was pointed to a hope beyond the grave. He clutched at it eagerly, and as it entered his heart it permeated all his being. He was anxious to begin life anew, not as he once began it to make a fortune, but to live for God in the world. He was willing to begin humbly, and the opportunity was gained for him. Raburn worked honestly, steadily, and grew in the confidence of his employers. The dull, sodden look left his face, he was cheerful and contented, seeking continually opportunities for Christian work. He found many, but none were so welcome as that of going to the poorhouse where he had been an inmate, to tell his former companions of the power which had entered his heart within those very walls, and transformed him from a hopeless, weary, listless, dejected man into a being whose heart was fixed upon God, and whose life was full of the joy God gives to all who trust in Him.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

An Extended Sphere.

THE young minister whose work had been snatched, as it were, out of his hands felt disappointed and heartsick. He still clung to the hope that in God's own time his way to serve Him by preaching Jesus might be opened, but he feared. He resolutely set himself to contemplate the probability of his settling down in John Morley's bookstore as his future lot in life.

But before long, in the midst of this slumber of ambition, came a more important call than before for Carl. There was a great spring gathering of their denomination in London, and Mr. Waldron was to take the chair at the chief public meeting. In his palmiest days at Aston Court, Carl would never have dreamed of being present as a speaker at this meeting, where the greatest of their preachers would occupy the platform. But his friend, Dr. Hervey, who had been one of the appointed speakers, was seized with a sudden illness a day or two before, and sent for Carl. He told him what he wished to say, and started him off at once for London.

Carl achieved one of those brilliant and dangerous successes which occasionally fall to the lot of young orators. He took the meeting by storm, and every speech succeeding his fell flat upon the excited minds of the audience. Miss Waldron, who held a prominent place on the platform, drew her veil over her face and wept some of the bitterest tears of her life.

Carl's absence from Little Aston, which he had supposed would be only for three or four days, prolonged itself into weeks. Sunday after Sunday he was called upon to supply some pulpit in London and the neighborhood. It ended in his being invited to become co-pastor of one of the largest churches in London, whose minister was beginning to fail under the burden of his work. He accepted the offer only on condition that for six months he should be among them as a candidate merely, that they might judge whether he merited the brand of heresy. For it was possible, he said, that his views of truth, differing somewhat from the traditional theology, might fall under their censure, as at Little Aston.

He went home at last, but only for a few days. There was a conflict in his mind as to whether he should yet utter his love to Hester, or wait until his own future was sure; he decided upon keeping silence. He believed that Hester would feel too greatly divided between her duties to her father and Rose, and to him. She had asked him once, in a tone of trouble and supplication, not to let Grant talk any more about her leaving home. It would be impossible to do so, she added, hurriedly, for many years to come, if the time ever came. Carl's sensitive nature fancied there was a dread in her mind lest he should say anything to disturb her peace; and he resolved to say nothing till he could say all.

Among the farewells he had to take, none were so painful as parting with Rose. Her life was so sad, so solitary, and so peculiar, that it drew his chivalrous and tender heart very closely to her. The bond between them had to her something of the sacred relationship of a priest toward a penitent, whom he may absolve or condemn. She saw no one else but him and Hester; and she naturally leaned more upon him than upon a fellow-woman. Hester was the daughter of the husband she had betrayed, and she dared not reveal to her all the remorseful memories which oppressed her broken spirit.

"I have something to tell you," said Carl, as the best consolation he could give her when he was about leaving her in circumstances so desolate; "I have seen your child, your little Hester; and now I am going to live in London, she shall come very often to my house."

"God bless you!" cried Rose, sobbing. "But what is to become of me when you are gone? I feel at times as if I must force my way to my husband, and let him strike me dead if he will. I don't know whether I am doing right to be so near to him without him knowing it."

"You must be patient," said Carl, pitifully; "you must not tempt him to revenge. Do you not know how he nearly murdered Robert Waldron at his own door, and he would have died in the street if my brother Grant had not found him? Do you wish him to be hurried into murder? Be patient, and leave yourself in Hester's hands. She knows her father better than we do, she loves him more; she will not lose the right time, if it ever come, of confessing all to him. Trust yourself to Hester."

"But how can I be patient?" she explained, her pale face growing paler. "I think day and night that I shall never hear his voice speaking to me again. Perhaps even in heaven, where you tell me there is a place even for me, I shall be nowhere near him; and it may be that through all eternity I shall never hear him say, 'I forgive you.' Ah! you cannot tell what it is, you and Hester, who all your lives long have lived as if you looked up into the face of God Himself, and who have no pardon to seek but His, and He has little to forgive. Every night I lie awake and think that death will surely come before I hear him forgive me."

"These are only fancies," said Carl, gently; "you are likely to live many years. Your illness is passing away, Grant says. But there is a nearer hope for you, perhaps. As soon as I can offer Hester and her father a home with me, I shall ask her to be my wife; I shall ask her father to give her to me. Do you think they will consent?"

"Consent!" repeated Rose, "she loves you, and he thinks of you as a son, she says."

"Then," continued Carl, his face flushing with anticipated joy, "as soon as he is happy once more, when a portion of gloom passes away from his life, we can turn his thoughts to you; and perhaps, who can tell? your forgiveness may be fuller than we hope for now. Why, when Hester becomes my wife the whole of life will be turned to gladness!"

He felt as if the whole world would be made partakers of the joy he looked forward to. At the least all his world would be illuminated and warmed by it; and in the new summer which would begin for John Morley it might not be impossible to bring about a perfect reconciliation between him and Rose. The glow of his hope fell for a brief season upon her heart, but it died away, and left a more chilly darkness behind it, when Carl was gone, and she knew that it would be very long before she could see him again.

At the request of David Scott, and with the hearty approbation of Mr. Waldron, Carl preached once more to his first church before leaving Little Aston for London. He knew it well now, with all its foibles and littlenesses. It was by no means an assembly of angels. But it was with a larger charity that he bade it a last farewell. It had already repented of its unfaithfulness and unkindness, and looked back regretfully on its short-lived union with its faithful young pastor; but the tie had been broken by itself, and could never be re-knit. Mr. Waldron felt it, and did not hold his head as erect, or sing with so much energy and freedom as usual; while his daughter listened for the last time to Carl with conflicting emotions of exultation and chagrin.

For John Morley there had been a brief interval of interest in outer things, and of distraction from his own morbid broodings, during the last few weeks of Carl's residence in Little Aston; but as soon as he was gone, and the old routine closed in upon the house again, the faint throb of quicker vitality died away, and left him more dead than before. Even the fresh enthusiasm and hope of Carl's nature, tinged as they were with the buoyancy of a spirit which had not yet come into very close contact with the real world, had added a deeper shade to his disgust of life. He had looked back, and seen, through Carl's eyes, the fair visions which had attended his own early days; and the realities which had met him, in the march of the years, only grew more intolerable in their burden of shame.

The malady of John Morley, so long and carefully fostered, had reached a point where it was beyond his own power, or that of any man, to heal. Grant, who had cherished some hope, while Carl was in daily intercourse with him, gave up the case in despair. More closely than ever John Morley confined himself to his gloomy and unwholesome parlor, more unwholesome for his soul than his body, and there brooded over the dim memories of his grief.

But they were not dim just then. As if Carl had sharpened in every respect the keen sword of the spirit, John Morley's brain presented to him clearer and more poignant recollections of the past. It seemed at times as if he almost saw the face of his faithless wife and caught the echo of her voice somewhere upon the very confines of his ear. There was a subtle, mysterious feeling of her presence close at hand, haunting him with an indefinable terror. The closed room overhead did not seem uninhabited, though he could hear neither voice nor step in it. Once before entering his bedroom he stole cautiously to the locked door, and listened through the empty key-hole, if there were any movement within. No grave could be more silent, and he retreated, shuddering.

In his chamber he could not banish the impalpable presence. He felt that he had but to strain his sight a little, and listen with a more attentive ear, and he should succeed in seeing and hearing this shadowy visitant. But dimness of sight and dulness of hearing must be closing in upon him, in his premature old age; and there was a film, a mist, a nameless terror, darkening his mind. His nights were sleepless, and his days fuller of poisoned thoughts. He was like a man smitten with disease, who counts the moments of his fleeting life by the sickly throbbing of his pulse.

Hester was only partly aware of this aggravation of her father's malady. She had more to think of than in the days when she had him alone to study. There was Rose, and there was Annie, who was more warmly cultivating her friendship. Carl, too, claimed a large share of her thoughts. Nor was Robert Waldron forgotten; that would have been impossible. The recollection of him crossed her mind often, and always with a pensive tinge of sadness, which did not amount to sorrow or regret, yet which borrowed a shade from both.

Carl was gone away, without speaking any sure words of love, and she saw him no more. Robert had paid to her the greatest and deepest homage by which any man can testify his devotion; and it is not in the nature of a woman to hate or despise the man who truly loves her, whatever may be the character of his faults. He was still at Aston Court. She had seen him, and he had seen her twice, as he was passing Grant's house, and looked up to its windows. She heard very much of him through Lawson's mother. He looked pale and suffering; Madame assured her that he was desolated. Among her many other thoughts Hester gave a place—a poor paltry place, Robert would have considered it—to him. It was impossible he should ever rival Carl; but for very pity's sake, and because with Rose always in her mind he could not be far off, Hester often thought of Robert Waldron.

To Robert himself, the departure of Carl and the assurance of Madame Lawson that he had not proposed for Hester, brought a new hope. He knew the flatteries and adulations, so difficult to resist, which would wrap about Carl upon his introduction into the religious world of London; and he trusted somewhat to their seductions to make him forgetful of the grave, quiet girl at Little Aston. If Carl only withdrew from the field, he could not believe that she would persist in choosing poverty, and debt, and the increasing difficulties of her position, to the bright future he had to offer.

He possessed the faculty of burying in oblivion what he did not wish to remember, and he had forgotten the singular solemnity of Hester's rejection of his suit. The fact that she had refused him remained in his memory only as being possibly the caprice of a girl, under Carl's ascendancy. He blamed his father for hurrying him into a premature avowal, which would have been better timed by being deferred a little; but his withered hope bloomed again. There would be need of still more delicate management than before; but, after all, in spite of all, his little Hetty should one day be mistress of Aston Court.

"What news of Little Aston?" asked Robert of Grant, one evening, with the carelessness of a man to whom so small a place could yield no news of any interest.

"John Morley is dangerously ill," answered Grant, very gravely.

"Ill!" cried Robert, "what will become of Hester?"

"He is not beyond hope yet," said Grant, "and I shall do my utmost to save him; but his constitution is terribly weakened. To my knowledge, he has never turned the corner of the street since I have been here, except once to see Carl."

"Is he in bed?" asked Robert.

"To be sure, and the shop shut up altogether," he answered. "It has never done him any good; he is about as fit for business as you are. The place looks more dismal than ever; what with that room which is never opened, where the shutters are falling to pieces—"

"What room?" inquired Robert, as Grant hesitated.

"Oh, a drawing-room or something," he added, "which they say is never opened. But I am in a hurry. I promised Hester to sit up with her father to-night."

Grant left Robert with fresh food for thought. He knew very little personally of the man whom he had injured; years ago he had been Rose's husband, now he was Hester's father. The news of his illness affected him chiefly as it touched his own purposes. He was, with his customary selfish impulses, soon considering Hester's position should her father die, and how it would affect him. He flattered himself that Hester's reluctance to receive his suit arose partly from regard to her father; but his death would remove this stumbling-block—nay, might become a stepping-stone to the attainment of his end. She would be left homeless, penniless, and friendless; and it was incredible to suppose that she would again refuse the lot he would offer her. In his idle and luxurious worldliness, he could not comprehend the possibility of Hester choosing rather a life of difficulty and trial than his own lot of untroubled abundance of all things.

He had strolled on unthinkingly until he reached the entrance of the town, just as the clock of the old church struck ten. The streets lay before him, with lights twinkling fitfully in many of the windows. There would be no danger now in walking once again under the walls of Hester's home. He passed on to it, with the impatient swiftness of one who has been long denied a pleasure. The gloom of the evening was deeper there, for the street was narrow and the houses high on each side. He crossed over to the opposite causeway, and looked up to the second story. He had done so often in the old times to see if any light shone in Rose's pleasant sitting-room; but the shutters of that window were closed. In the next casement, however, glimmered a wan and sickly gleam, the beacon of illness, the pale watch-fire, where Hester, solitary and uncomforted, kept watch over the inroads of death. Why did his treacherous fancy mingle the images of Hester and Rose? He had diligently rooted from his memory all unpleasant and disquieting reminiscences. Yet now, standing in the dark, opposite the house, and looking up to the windows, he felt himself the boy he had been eleven years ago. A boy only. He caught again the oft-repeated apology for the past. It was as a boy he had loved and tempted Rose; it was as a man he loved and honored Hester.

He stood in the quiet street some minutes, no passer-by coming to disturb him. At length he heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and felt that it was time to move on. He traversed the whole length of the street, and then retraced his steps past John Morley's door. Was he in a dream to-night? Was he the boy of three and twenty; or the man of thirty-four years of age, weary, disenchanted, with a pricking goad in his conscience, which he could not altogether pluck out? To see Hester, only for a moment, would allay this fever of his spirit; and what would be more natural than for him to testify his concern for her, and her father? There could be neither harm nor danger in simply knocking at the door, and asking the servant how John Morley was. Perhaps Hester herself might answer his knock; as he could remember her doing once many years before. He called back her image to his mind; a grave, sweet, simple child, who hailed his coming with a demure rapture of delight. If he had only foreseen into what a womanhood this childhood was about to expand! With a profound sigh, Robert Waldron set his foot upon John Morley's threshold, and knocked a low, uncertain knock at his door.

THE TEMPLE BUILT.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 26, 1 Kings 6 : 1-14. Golden Text, Isa. 56 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Significant Name for the Temple—A House of Prayer—Applicable to the Temple of the Body—The Vocation of the Prayer-life—The Temple Windows—Light Increasing as it Penetrates—Having Light and Giving Light—Faith the Window of the Heart—Chambers Wrongly Occupied—The Silent Labor—Prior Preparation—The Hidden Stones—The Gold and Cedar Covering—Holiness God's Indwelling.

"MINE house shall be called an house of prayer for all people." This was God's thought for the temple of old; this is His thought for our bodies, which He makes the "temple of the Holy Ghost." It was the glory of the children of Israel that their mighty, glorious God was with them, and that the heathen around knew it. "They have heard that Thou, Lord, art among this people, that Thou, Lord, art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that Thou goest before them, by daytime in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night" (Num. 14 : 14). The glory of Christianity is Emmanuel, "God with us." Although heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Him, yet He is willing to make His dwelling-place in our being; "Ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people" (II Cor. 6 : 16).

is surely an house given up to prayer. God has never told us to preach without ceasing, but He has told us to "pray without ceasing;" yet there is far more of ceaseless preaching than ceaseless praying. God has set apart man's being for the transacting of business with Him; the most of us who are Christian workers appropriate our being for transacting business with men for God, instead of with Him for men. Most of us have yet to learn the vocation of a prayer-life, in which everything which is done and said is first settled with God. Many have the idea that such a life entails some strange monastic separation from our fellow-men. But we see in the life of our beloved Lord such naturalness, such simplicity, such homeliness, that it is clear these ascetic ideas do not come from Him. Yet Jesus was guided by His Father not only what to do, but also the very hour in which to do each thing as it came. His was essentially and yet simply a prayer-life.

We have seen how David (the beloved) made preparation for the building of the temple. Solomon also, after his father's death, sent to Hiram, King of Tyre, and made a contract with him to supply timber, stone, and workmen, in return for which Solomon supplied provisions. Thus in the fourth year of his reign Solomon began the actual building. We hear of no architect, and yet no building which the world ever saw surpassed Solomon's temple for beauty or for magnificence. God was the only architect, and Solomon, being "instructed for the building of the house of God" (II Chron. 3 : 3), only carried out His plans. The size of the temple was considerably increased over that of the tabernacle, yet it was not so large as Ezekiel's temple; God is ever seeking to make more room for Himself in our poor humanity.

"And for the house he made windows of narrowed lights," i.e., splayed, or narrow without and broad within. God would have light in His house, and light which increases as it penetrates. The Lord Jesus said, is the eye; therefore when thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light; but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness" (Luke 11 : 34). The eye in the body answers to faith in the heart; the eye takes in the light; faith takes in Jesus. If the eye is but single, and our faith sees Jesus only, then our whole body serves its right purpose as God's dwelling-place. And He wants us to light others also. "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. . . . Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 5 : 14, 16). If Jesus dwells fully in us He cannot but shine, and others cannot but glorify our heavenly Father. He cannot be hid, for what He is in heaven that He is in the hearts and lives where He dwells; the dwelling-place is nothing, but He who dwells there is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever" (Heb. 13 : 8). Light brings joy, and peace, and satisfaction, and so does Jesus; His presence banishes gloom, and mystery, and obscurity.

Against the wall of the house Solomon built chambers. We remember how in the time of Nehemiah similar chambers were abused, and Tobiah, the Ammonite, appropriated one of them to his own use, and Nehemiah, on discovering it, "cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber" (Neh. 13 : 8). God makes room in His house, but it is for Himself; not for our household stuff, not for the concerns of self. After all, we can only offer Him "chambers," while He is preparing "many mansions" for us (John 14 : 2).

"And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither; so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron heard in the house, while it was in building." The Apostle Peter speaks thus of God's children: "Ye also, as lively (living) stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

all prepared in the quarry! This is the true picture of most of us. There is a great deal of noise sometimes in blasting us out of our places. Some of us come out of the world with a tremendous fall, and get chipped and knocked about in the descent. And there in the quarry, near the earth we came from, many of us have to be hewn and prepared. Plenty of noise about all this — hammers, saws, files — much which goes against the grain; until, instead of our natural characteristics standing out prominently, our fitness to the building and to one another becomes the noticeable thing. God has created us for the body of Christ, not for ourselves; to be collectively, as well as individually, the temple of the Lord. He has made us for one another, not as we would fit ourselves to others, but as He would fit us. He is the great Architect, the great Master workman who has formed, and is carrying out His great design. All the noise, the stir, the tumult in our souls —all the conflict, perplexity, etc., comes from the resistance which the stones make to the Workman's tools. When all resistance is at an end, and perfect confidence reigns, then it is in great quietness that our God can fit us into the place in His house for which He has prepared us. There is a growing stillness of soul as we learn to accept all things from the hand of our loving God, and such a blessed confidence that He is caring for His own work, that it does not depend upon our zeal and effort, and that He makes use of us to much more real profit for his glory than we could be if under our own direction.

The chambers of the house led from one into the other. This reminds us of "grace for grace" (John 1 : 16); how all the knowledge of God we obtain, which makes room for Him, only leads on to more!

The whole building was of stone, covered within with cedar, and overlaid with gold;

"THERE WAS NO STONE SEEN."

This is God's ideal for His spiritual temple, built up of redeemed men, yet nothing of man seen, nothing but Christ apparent. While such things as strife, variance, debate, jealousies exist among us, oh, how much of the stone is there to be seen! For eighteen hundred years God has been building His temple of living stones, but the world sees and hears far more of the quarry than of the temple, the bride of Christ. The hammer and the axe are constantly at work, but the house is hardly yet seen, even among believers; the body of Christ as a whole is little thought of. We are so slow and so stupid in taking in God's thoughts. Jesus, the Son of God, came among us not only to die for our sins, but to embody God's thought, "God . . . manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. 3 : 6). He lived as man in the power of the Holy Ghost a life completely selfless; and God's thought is to prepare for Him a bride composed of redeemed, sanctified, selfless souls, in bodies transfigured and glorified, when He shall come again.

Solomon "built the house, and finished it; and covered the house with beams and boards of cedar. . . . And the word of the Lord came to Solomon, saying, Concerning this house which thou art in building, if thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; then will I perform my word with thee, which I spake unto David thy father: And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will not forsake my people Israel."

The Rev. Andrew Murray, author of that precious book, "Abide in Christ," once said,

"HOLINESS IS GOD'S INDWELLING."

This is God's truth. Holiness is no attempt of man's to bring himself up to God's standard, forcing himself into something which does not come natural to him, and then despairing at his failure to comply with the supposed demands of God. Holiness or sanctification is simply Christ indwelling us. Our part is a complete surrender once for all, and also as complete a surrender whenever any question of the will shall hereafter arise. Christ's part is to come into His temple, Himself the glory, Himself the spirit of praise, Himself the love, the joy, the peace, the power. With how many a difficulty arises when the struggle to deny self begins, just as in a letter recently received: "I feel that nothing short of a full and absolute surrender of the will (always strong) can be the means of solid comfort and peace." How difficult—nay, impossible, this is to human nature! Giving away what you want most of anything; but so it must be! It does look like an impossible tangle. But, although it is quite true that the will must be given up, to whom must it be given? To Him who has the will and the power, who is ever waiting for the opportunity to deal with that very self which makes the struggle so difficult. It is not throwing away our will into the sea, or into empty space, but surrendering it to be made the consort of the will of our God; not that it may be annihilated, but united to God's. The difficulty all arises from an innate want of confidence in God; from a doubt whether He is really to be trusted, whether He will not, after all, break down with us, or get tired of us, and leave us to our own devices. When God's indwelling is believed in, and Christ dwells in our hearts by faith, His presence in us detects self and exposes it. He undertakes the whole management, we concurring as He carries on the work by numberless things, great and small, which are always occurring to conform us to His image. Oh, let us recognize His indwelling as the glory of our lives; His indwelling of our hearts by faith and His indwelling of His Church, His bride!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

More Fighting in Tonquin is Reported. An official despatch dated October 8th from Hanoi states that Colonel Donnier, with two battalions of the foreign legion, two companies of infantry and a section of mountain artillery, had an engagement with Chinese troops in the valley of the Loo Chuan River, which lasted six hours. The Chinese made a stubborn resistance, but were finally completely routed. Four gunboats assisted the French forces. Four of the French, including a captain, were killed and twenty were wounded. Two days later four thousand men under General Negrier proceeded on the Langson road and found the Chinese headquarters at Bacloch; the latter were withdrawing. Thirty-seven thousand Chinese were encountered, who kept up a five hours' hard fight. Captain Plante and twenty men were killed and eight officers and fifty men were wounded. General Negrier was wounded in the leg. Twenty-five hundred Chinese were killed.

Another Treacherous Massacre is Reported from the Soudan. A boat ran aground in the Nile, and the party, consisting of forty Europeans and Egyptians, with five negroes and three servants escaped to land with difficulty. The sheiks offered hospitality to the party and enticed them to their houses, where they massacred all except fourteen of them, who are now prisoners. It is unknown whether there are any Europeans among the survivors. A report from an agent of the Mudir of Dongola who was near the scene of the catastrophe, states that Colonel Stewart, the leader of the party was killed. General Lord Wolseley has ordered the Mudir to proceed to Merawe with a strong force to rescue the prisoners said to be in the hands of the Arabs.

An International Conference is soon to be held at Berlin. The subject to be dealt with is the West African difficulty. Germany is intent on founding a colony with the object of diverting emigration from the United States. As was recently mentioned, the German exploring party came into collision with British settlers and the English flag was torn down. Mr. G. W. Smalley predicts that the outcome of the conference is likely to be the adoption of a plan of the British Government for controlling the Congo and the Niger by commissions, and for the amicable settlement of certain conflicting claims to isolated stations in the basins of both rivers. That will be a happy issue if it should be achieved. Other correspondents, however, apprehend that the present antagonism between Germany and England will be aggravated by the conference.

The Arrival in his own Dominions of King Tawhiao, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 31st, is awaited with eager interest by some of his subjects, in reference to religious changes which will be affected by it. During his absence two native clergymen, sent as a deputation from the native Church, have been in communication with his principal chiefs at Kihikihi, where they were assembled, with a view to secure their co-operation in an effort to overthrow the influence of Hauhauism, as the old fanatical superstition of the Maoris is termed, by favoring a Christian mission in native territory. The reply of the chiefs, while favorable in its tone, was to the effect that the action taken must depend on the views entertained by Tawhiao himself, and that on his return a special council should be held to obtain from him his decision on the matter.

An Ultimatum from the British Government has been sent to the Boers of the Transvaal. It is couched in decisive terms and will, it would appear, if neglected, be followed by war. The document recalls the repeated violations of treaties, and the acts of violence which have been committed by the Boers beyond the boundary lines of the Transvaal country. It demands of the Transvaal Government due satisfaction for these acts, the repression of the Boer fillibusters, and a thorough observance of the articles of the last convention entered into by both countries. It is reported that the British War Office is already preparing an expedition of 8000 men to proceed to South Africa, a portion of which force will be drawn from the East India army. Lord Salisbury stated at a political meeting that Canada had volunteered to furnish a force to act against the Boers.

A Redistribution Scheme has been Published by a British journal which is said to have gained surreptitious possession of it from a clerk in the civil service. Its authenticity has not been admitted by the government, but all classes appear to regard it as genuine. The scheme of representation approaches the American system in being based on arithmetical ratios. Small towns are to lose their privilege of electing members of Parliament, and the counties, divided up into districts, will have increased representation. Sixteen members are to be added to the House, of whom England is to have six and Scotland ten. The ratio of representation under the scheme is about one member to every 56,800 of the population. The plan will probably be modified before presentation to Parliament, and it certainly will be modified before it becomes a law.

It is remarkable that many of God's most eminent servants were in their youth about the most unlikely persons to become preachers of the Gospel. But the material rejected and despised of men is, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, often fashioned into a vessel fit for the Master's use. It is an encouragement to troubled parents, as well as to desponding Christians, to know of such instances. One case—that of a man who was privileged to do much good—is recorded in this sketch.

Mr. Rees, whose portrait appears on the first page, was born at Carmarthen, South Wales, on February 22d, 1815, and died at Sunderland on April 16th, 1884, at the age of sixty-nine. His father, who was a gentleman who owned large real estate, had been a naval officer, and was midshipman in the navy at the commencement of the French Revolution. He was present at the sanguinary and decisive battles of Camperdown and Copenhagen. Arthur was the youngest of seven boys and girls. His eldest brother entered upon the family estate, and was for many years an influential county magistrate.

As soon as Arthur knew his alphabet he was sent to school. A somewhat amusing incident occurred during his schoolboy days. Having taken, without permission, some apples from the school-garden, he was detected by the working of his conscience. When in class, reciting the ten commandments, he saw that the eighth came to his turn, and recollecting that he had but recently violated that identical commandment, he tried to avoid reciting it. He slipped out of his place, and took a turn lower down. The teacher saw him, and he too recollected the stolen apples, and divined the boy's motive in changing his position in the class. Fixing his eyes upon him, he quietly uttered the word "Conscience!" in a tone which made the youthful delinquent blush. No further notice was taken of his offence, the teacher rightly thinking that a conscience so active as his evidently was, would prevent a repetition of the offence.

At the age of thirteen, though little advanced in his studies, his father took him from school, and in March, 1828, he obtained for him the position of a first-class a government ship then moored alongside of a hulk, where little else met the eye but scenes of wickedness, and as little accosted the ear but profanity and the most revolting language. The berth assigned him was a hole ten feet long, six feet wide, and five feet high—destined to accommodate twelve human beings! In this ship he remained upward of three years. At length the ship was ordered off to the Mediterranean. Here young Rees, one of her crew, was found among others, when she arrived, as little likely, from his earlier training, of ever becoming an eminent preacher of the Gospel of Christ, as Saul on his way to Damascus.

By and by the Wasp reached Athens, where the crew landed, and Mr. Rees's description of this ancient city, styled the "Eye of Greece," several years afterward, and of the visit he and others paid to the Pasha (Greece was then in absolute possession of the Turks, for its separation from Turkey did not take place till 1829), showed the tenacity of his memory. The party was accompanied by a mounted guard of honor, and Rees, being the youngest, and somewhat diminutive of stature, was mounted behind one of the gigantic horsemen, either because there was not a sufficient number of horses, or because there was a fear of his falling off. That Mr. Rees could not remember in after life, but the recollection of entering Athens in that way remained vivid with him to the last. (See frontispiece picture.)

On leaving the classic ground of Athens, with the magnificent Parthenon and Mars' Hill, identified evermore with the bold Gospel proclamations of the Apostle Paul, young Rees sailed for the island of Ægina. Here he

NEARLY LOST HIS LIFE.

He could swim with the skill and courage of an expert before he was twelve years old, and he delighted to bathe in the warm waters of the Ægean Sea, when he arrived there. He had often jumped from the mizzen-chains after a piece of holy-stone thrown into the water, fathoms deep, caught it before it reached the bottom, and returned with it to the surface. Close to the shore was a rock, under the surface of the water, with a natural arch in it several feet wide. One day, while amusing himself by diving beneath the arch and coming up on the other side, he dived once too often. Not having plunged deep enough, and the water buoying him up against the roof of the arch, under water, kept him there until he was very nearly suffocated. On one occasion he was sent on a perilous undertaking into the town at night in search of a missing sailor, with two armed marines. He eventually discovered him in a state of helpless intoxication, and prevented him from becoming the prey of the prowling thief or midnight assassin. (See illustration.)

NARROW ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.

Smyrna was the next place to which he sailed. While staying in quarantine at Malta, in fetching some fresh water from the shore for the nearest vessel, an oar with which he was propelling the boat suddenly slipped out of the rowlock, and he was thrown overboard. (See frontispiece.) He kept himself afloat, however, till picked up by a Maltese steamboat.

At Portsmouth, where the vessel arrived soon afterward, young Arthur was paid off, and on leaving the ship was presented by Lieutenant Hay with a sword, a rifle, some mathematical instruments, and several French and English books. Arrived at the age of sixteen, he was appointed.

MIDSHIPMAN OF THE BRITANNIA.

A voyage to Lisbon sent him through some stirring adventures, but not long after this he terminated rather abruptly his connection with the sea. Being appointed to the Donegal under Captain Fanshawe, he was ordered, during service as a signal officer to the masthead for not being the first to notice a signal flying. Arthur refused, alleging that he was suffering from a sprain. Captain Fanshawe replied that in such case he was not fit to be in the ship. Very considerably piqued at this reply, Arthur wrote a note, begging to be invalided. He was examined by a surgeon, and received his certificate for England, thus suddenly

TERMINATING HIS CONNECTION WITH THE OCEAN.

He proceeded to London, boarded with his mother, who, being "in society," was glad of his escort to parties, which he often enlivened with his light guitar, an instrument which he could handle with much skill. He afterward left his mother and lodged in Compton Street with a young man named Edmund Yates, who was a relative of the celebrated actor of that name, and with whom he sometimes went behind the scenes of the Adelphi Theatre. Little, assuredly, was to be reaped there of moral or religious worth; nevertheless, quite sufficient to induce him afterward earnestly to warn others against frequenting such places.

The circumstances in which he was placed were uncongenial to an active mind, beside which he needed more money than his mother could give him. He therefore resolved on once more going to sea, and applied to various quarters, but in vain. He now concluded, as a boyish freak which might at once satisfy his love of adventure and his want of money, to become a wandering minstrel, performing on the guitar, which had ministered both to his own pleasure and that of others. He went first to the aristocratic quarter called Bryanstone Square, with his instrument and a Greek capote, or long cloak, the latter intended to give him a romantic appearance. No sooner had he struck a few chords, by way of prelude, than a servant maid, putting her head out of the kitchen window, pertly told him that her mistress was not at home. (See frontispiece.) He proceeded to the next door, and in screwing up one of the loosened strings of his instrument, snapped it. This put an end to his performances, and, disconcerted by his increasing misfortunes, he returned without a penny.

His mind now began to turn to better things. Some infidel notions which he had imbibed, yielded, through the reasoning of one of his brothers, to a conviction of the truth of divine revelation. He had his attention directed by a Christian to some fulfilled prophecies, which led him to a diligent perusal and

STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

This being accompanied with prayer, heavenly light speedily poured in upon his mind, while the grace of the Holy Spirit permanently influenced his heart. The sport which his companion, Edmund Yates, made of the change only increased young Rees's ardor. He was neither to be laughed, scoffed, nor forced out of his good impressions. He thirsted after an experimental knowledge of Christ as his Saviour, which eventually quenched all other desires. Presently, stripped of self, he came naked to Christ, made a free surrender of himself to God, and found a sweet peace, which remained unshaken to the end.

He now felt that he could not again join the navy, and wrote to his father to that effect, but obtained the unfatherly reply that "as he had found him one profession, and he did not like it, he might find another for himself." Arthur, after consideration, but knowing nothing of Greek or Latin, without which he was not prepared to enter college, and being low in finances, so that he could not engage a tutor, he accommodated himself to circumstances, purchased two grammars—one in the Greek and another in the Latin tongue—and, shutting himself in his room several hours a day, mastered the rudiments of both these languages, and made it a matter of prayer that God would make plain to him His will.

RESOLVED UPON BECOMING A CLERGYMAN;

He now proceeded to Bristol, and there he attracted the attention of some clergymen, by whom he was SENT TO COLLEGE IN WALES.

His chief tutor was afterward Bishop of Landaff. He passed his curriculum creditably at the close of 1839, obtaining a scholarship worth one hundred dollars a year. He then went to Bath, where he married. While at Bath he received an invitation from the rector of Sunderland to become his curate. He accepted this, and was ordained at Auckland, in January, 1841.

He preached his first sermon in Sunderland Church, without manuscript, in response to a sudden call to the pulpit. An influential parishioner asked him if he had not taken lessons in speaking when at college. "No," was his immediate reply,

"I SPEAK OFFHAND, AS GOD HELPS ME."

Mr. Rees characterized himself as possessing a rough and ready style of address. The fact is, he was plain rather than rough, and the readiness was the result of his dependence upon God for his words. His public ministry began to attract attention. He showed that he was in earnest in seeking the salvation of souls. At the week-night services on a Thursday evening, to which he invited the inhabitants, great numbers of men and women were awakened to a sense of their moral wretchedness and the necessity of accepting Christ.

While he pleased and profited the many, he gave offence to the few by his plain dealing. In the month of November, 1841, there occurred his first

A strong personal friendship also existed between Mr. Rees and Mr. George Muller, of Bristol.

Though verging on his seventieth year, up to a few months ago Mr. Rees seemed to be in the enjoyment of robust health. The first intimation to the public of his being unwell was given about six weeks before his death, when a lecture upon "Woman" was postponed, owing to his having had a fainting fit. By careful nursing the patient recovered, and was able, in the course of a few days, to resume his usual services, and to give the promised lecture. A week before his death he gave a counterpart to the lecture on "Woman" by delivering one on "Man," for men only. On returning to his residence, Mr. Rees was afflicted with another fainting fit, and suffered very acutely. His medical attendant was called in, and it was found that he was suffering from inflammation of the diaphragm. He rallied a little under medical treatment, but his disease was incurable, and on Wednesday morning occurred through failure of the heart's action. The deceased gentleman has left five daughters and one son. The second daughter is married to a gentleman successfully engaged in missionary work in Spain.

A public testimony to the dead preacher's worth was given on the day of his funeral. It was a spectacle the town had never seen paralleled. His own congregation, deputations from other congregations, and ministers of every denomination attended, testifying by their presence to the high appreciation in which Mr. Rees and his work were held in the town. A career strangely chequered, and which at one time seemed likely to be useless to the world, closed amid the tears of a whole town, which felt that his death was a general bereavement.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE following narrative of the remarkable cure of

is taken from the New York Sun of September 28th:

"Miss Daisy Perrin of 832 Hancock Street, Brooklyn, was given up by her physicians, and it was thought that she might die at any moment. For eight weeks she had not been able to rise from her bed, and for days one attack of convulsions followed another. On September 25, Captain L. W. Pennington of the steamship Gulf Stream called with his wife upon Miss Perrin. Captain Pennington believed that she might be healed through faith and prayer. He knelt by her bedside and for an hour prayed fervently with her. When he had finished Miss Perrin was strong enough to get up and walk, although for weeks before she had been unable to move her limbs. On Friday, September 26th, she went out and visited some friends, and the following day she was bright and cheerful.

"A reporter for the Sun visited her last night (September 27th). She was sitting up in bed in a room adjoining the parlor, and near her were her mother and young brother, and her uncle and aunt, with whom she lives. Miss Perrin is seventeen years old and very beautiful. She has dark brown hair, expressive eyes, and a fair complexion. She is self-possessed.

"'Daisy was taken sick about eight weeks ago,' said Mr. Perrin. 'The first symptoms were those of pneumonia. Then she got very bad indeed, and lost her sight. She had terrible pains in her head, and she could not speak louder than a whisper. The doctors said she had consumption, and that tubercles had formed both in her brain and in her lungs. Then she began to be attacked by convulsions, which were almost continuous, and she had to be watched day and night. She got so low that we all thought that she would not live much longer, and we were much grieved indeed. Her convulsions were so severe that we were in constant fear that each attack would end her life. When I went to business on Thursday morning I left her very low.'

"'I knew they thought that I was going to die,' Miss Daisy said, 'and I felt it myself. My head pained me so that I could hardly bear it, and I could not move my arms even. When Captain Pennington came in with his wife I had just got over an attack of convulsions. He said that I might be cured if I had faith. I said I thought I had. Then the Captain knelt down and prayed. It was not a set prayer, but one from the heart. He said to me. "Pray not that you will improve, but that your health will return at once."

"'I said "mamma" aloud, and that was the first that they knew that the prayer had been answered, for before I had only been able to whisper. Then I sat up and all my pain was gone. I took the bandage from my head, for it didn't ache any more, and then got up and was able to walk. I know that nobody but God cured me, for nobody but He could.'

"'I don't suppose that any one will believe it,' said Mr. Perrin, 'for I have often read about cures by prayer, and I did not.'

"'I want everybody to know about it,' said Miss Daisy, 'so that others may be cured by faith, too.'

"Captain Pennington lives at 373 Third Street, South Brooklyn. He is a fine-looking man, about fifty years old, with a gray beard and kindly blue eyes. The Gulf Stream got into port a week and a half ago. Captain Pennington is a Presbyterian, and belongs to the Rev. Dr. Talmage's church. Miss Perrin is an Episcopalian and belongs to St. Stephen's Church in Jefferson Street, Brooklyn, where she has been a teacher in the Sunday-school. The most remarkable part of the cure is that her voice which was almost gone, has returned full and strong. She said last night that she felt strong and well."

In the course of an interview with a reporter of the Sun, Captain Pennington said: "I am in the employ of William P. Clyde & Co., and follow the sea for a living. I do not accept any pay for cures which are produced through me, and I would consider it wrong to take pay. I am only the instrument of cure through the power of God. I do not do it myself. God does it through me, and only in cases where the patient and myself have faith in Jesus Christ. The first case in which I was instrumental was that of a lady who had been afflicted with typhoid dysentery. Physicians had given her up and she did not expect to live. They had stopped giving her medicine, and she was living on a few spoonfuls of milk and brandy per day. She was carried on board of my vessel in the arms of the steward. I knelt with her in prayer on a Tuesday night, and on Saturday morning she was cured and went away in a carriage. That was two years ago. I have not seen her recently, but I believe she is alive yet. I take no credit to myself for this. God did it.

"The next case was that of a boy fourteen years old, named Albert Barbier, of 45 Jewett Avenue, Jersey City. He was afflicted with St. Vitus's dance. He had no control of the muscles of his face or right arm or right leg. He could not shake hands or cut his victuals. He came on board my ship, the Gulf Stream. That night, off Long Branch, I knelt with him in prayer. He was not quite cured that voyage, but the next voyage out, he sailed with me again. I knelt with him when we were again off Long Branch. I prayed that he might be well enough to go on shore at Charleston, and he was. I took him to the Methodist church in Charleston on June 22d and I returned him to his parents on June 29th, well, and he is well to-day. I claim nothing for my own power, but give all the credit to the glory of God. The boy was a good Christian, and a believer like myself. He had faith in Jesus. I prayed with him only twice, and four days after the second prayer he was cured."

THE ARCH-FIEND OF THE NATIONS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon preached last Sunday Morning, October 19, 1884.

"Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine."—JOEL 1 : 5.

NOAH did the best and the worst thing for the world. He built an ark against the deluge of water, but introduced a deluge against which the human race has ever since been trying to build an ark—the deluge of drunkenness. In the opening chapters of the Bible we hear his staggering steps. Shem and Japhet tried to cover up the disgrace, but there he is, drunk on wine at a time in the history of the world when, to say the least, there was no lack of water.

having entered the world has not retreated. Abigail, the fair and heroic wife who saved the flocks of Nabal, her husband, from confiscation by invaders, goes home at night and finds him so intoxicated she cannot tell him the story of his narrow escape. Uriah came to see David, and David got him drunk, and paved the way for the despoliation of a household. Even the church bishops needed to be charged to be sober and not given to too much wine; and so familiar were the people of Bible times with the staggering and falling motion of the inebriate, that Isaiah, when he comes to describe the final dislocation of worlds, says: "The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard."

Ever since apples and grapes and wheat grew the world has been tempted to unhealthful stimulants. But the intoxicants of the olden time were an innocent beverage, a harmless orangeade, a quiet syrup, a peaceful soda water, as compared with the liquids of modern inebriation, into which a madness, and a fury, and a gloom, and a fire, and a suicide, and a retribution have mixed and mingled. Fermentation was always known, but it was not until a thousand years after Christ that distillation was invented.

While we must confess that some of the ancient arts have been lost, the Christian era is superior to all others in the bad eminence of whiskey and rum and gin. The modern drunk is a hundred-fold worse than the ancient drunk. Noah in his intoxication became imbecile, but the victims of modern alcoholism have to struggle with whole menageries of wild beasts and jungles of hissing serpents and perditions of blaspheming demons. An

in our world, and he built an invisible cauldron of temptation. He built that cauldron strong and stout for all ages and all nations. First, he squeezed into the cauldron the juices of the forbidden fruit of Paradise. Then he gathered for it a distillation from the harvest fields and the orchards of the hemispheres. Then he poured into this cauldron capsicum, and copperas, and logwood, and deadly nightshade, and assault and battery, and vitriol, and opium, and rum, and murder, and sulphuric acid, and theft, and potash, and cochineal, and red carrots, and poverty, and death, and hops. But it was a dry compound, and it must be moistened, and it must be liquefied, and so the arch fiend poured into that cauldron the tears of centuries of orphanage and widowhood, and he poured in the blood of twenty thousand assassinations. And then the arch fiend took a shovel that he had brought up from the furnaces beneath, and he put that shovel into and began to stir, and the cauldron began to heave, and rock, and boil, and sputter, and hiss, and smoke, and the nations gathered around it with cups, and tankards, and demijohns, and kegs, and there was enough for all, and the arch-fiend cried: "Aha! champion fiend am I. Who has done more than I have for coffins, and graveyards, and prisons, and insane asylums, and the populating of the lost world? And when this cauldron is emptied I'll fill it again, and I'll stir it again, and it will smoke again, and that smoke will join another smoke—the smoke of a torment that ascendeth forever and ever.

"I drove fifty ships on the rocks of Newfoundland and the Skerries and the Goodwins. I defeated the Northern army at Fredericksburg. I have ruined more senators than will gather next winter in the national councils. I have ruined more lords than will be gathered in the House of Peers. The cup out of which I ordinarily drink is a bleached human skull, and the upholstery of my palace is so rich a crimson because it is dyed in human gore, and the mosaic of my floors is made up of the bones of children dashed to death by drunken parents, and my favorite music, sweeter than Te Deum or triumphal march—my favorite music is the cry of daughters turned out at midnight on the street because father has come home from the carousal, and the seven-hundred-voiced shriek of the sinking steamer because the captain was not himself when he put the ship on the wrong course. Champion fiend am I! I have kindled more fires, I have wrung out more agonies, I have stretched out more midnight shadows, I have opened more Golgothas, I have rolled more juggernauts, I have damned more souls than any other emissary of diabolism. Champion fiend am I!"

Drunkenness is the greatest evil of this nation, and it takes no logical process to prove to this audience that cannot long be a free nation. So I go on in this brief series of Sabbath morning discourses, showing you the perils that threaten the destruction of American institutions. I had not time to conclude these subjects last Sabbath morning, and I shall go on this Sabbath morning, and the following at least, discussing these subjects. I call your attention to the fact that drunkenness is not subsiding, certainly that it is not at a standstill, but that it is on and it is a double quick. Beginning near by, I have seen more drunken people in Brooklyn and in New York in the last six weeks than in any two years of my life, and so have you, if you have been passing up and down these streets much. There is more rum swallowed in this country and of a worse kind than was ever swallowed since the first distillery began its work of death. Where there was one drunken home there are ten drunken homes. Where there was one drunkard's grave there are twenty drunkards' graves.

According to United States Government figures, in 1840 there were 23,000,000 gallons of beer sold. Last year there were 551,000,000 gallons. According to the governmental figures, in the year 1840 there were 5,000,000 gallons of wine sold. Last year there were 25,000,000 gallons of wine. It is on the increase. Talk about crooked whiskey—by which men mean the whiskey that does not pay the tax to government—I tell you all strong drink is crooked. Crooked otard, crooked cognac, crooked schnapps, crooked beer, crooked wine, crooked whiskey, because it makes a man's path crooked, and his life crooked, and his death crooked, and his eternity crooked.

If I could gather all the armies of the dead drunkards and have them come to resurrection, and then add to that host all the five and ten abreast, and then if I could have you mount a horse and ride along that line for review, you would ride that horse until he dropped from exhuastion, and you would mount another horse and ride until he fell from exhaustion, and you would take another and another, and you would ride along hour after hour, and day a day. Great host, in regiments, in briga Great armies of them. And then if you voice enough stentorian to make them all h and you could give the command, "Forw march!" their first tramp would make the e tremble. I do not care which way you loo the community to-day, the evil is increasing

I call your attention to the fact that there thousands of people born with a thirst for st drink—a fact too often ignored. Along s ancestral lines there runs the river of tem tion. There are children whose swadd clothes are torn off the shroud of death.

THE DRUNKARD'S WILL.

Many a father has made a will of this s "In the name of God, amen. I bequeath t children my houses and lands and estates, s and share shall they alike. Hereto I affi hand and seal in the presence of witness And yet, perhaps that very man has made other will that the people have never read, that has not been proved in the courts. will put in writing would read something this: "In the name of disease and appetite death, amen. I bequeath to my children evil habits, my tankards shall be theirs, wine-cup shall be theirs, my destroyed rep tion shall be theirs. Share and share alike; they in the infamy. Hereto I affix my hand seal in the presence of all the applauding ha of hell."

From the multitude of those who have evil habit born with them, this army is b augmented. And I am sorry to say that a g many of the drug stores are abetting this and alcohol is sold under the name of

BITTERS.

It is bitters for this, and bitters for that, bitters for some other thing; and good me ceived, not knowing there is any thraldo alcoholism coming from that source, are g down, and some day a man sits with the b of black bitters on his table, and the cork out, and after it flies a fiend and clutches the by his throat, and says: "Aha! I have after you for ten years. I have got you Down with you, down with you!" Bit Ah! yes. They make a man's family bitter his home bitter, and his disposition bitter his death bitter, and his hell bitter. Bit A vast army all the time increasing. An me also say that it is as thoroughly organiz any army, with commander-in-chief, staff cers, infantry, cavalry, batteries, sutler and flaming ensigns, and that every cand for office in America will yet have to pron himself the friend or foe of the liquor traffi

I have in my possession a circular of a l ers' association—a circular sent to all candi for office; it has been sent or will be sent—a to be filled up saying whether the candidat friend of the liquor traffic or its enemy; i he is an enemy of the business, then the n doomed; or if he declines to fill up the ci and send it back, his silence is taken as a tive answer.

It seems to me it is about time for the 17 000 professors of religion in America to TAKE SIDES.

It is going to be an out-and-out battle bet drunkenness and sobriety, between heave hell, between God and the devil. Take before there is any further national decad take sides before your sons are sacrifice the new home of your daughter goes dow der the alcoholism of an embruted hus Take sides while your voice, your pen, prayer, your vote may have any influen arresting the despoliation of this nation. 17,000,000 professors of religion should sides on this subject, it would not be very lo fore the destiny of this nation would be d in the right direction. Certainly, sermo ting forth the perils that threaten the de tion of our American institutions woul very poorly planned course of sermons i did not speak of drunkenness. Is it a evil? or is it

Let them testify in regard to this. ate of Maine says: "It is so great an evil up re we have anathematized it as a State." ate of Iowa says: "It is so great an evil out re we have prohibited it by constitutional endment." State of Georgia says: "It is so eat an evil down here that ninety counties of s State have made the sale of intoxicating nk a criminality." So the word comes up m all sources, and it is going to be a Water- , and I want you to know on what side I am ing to be when that Waterloo is fully come, d I want you to be on the right side. Either unkenness will be destroyed in this country, the American Government will be destroyed. unkenness and free institutions are coming o a death grapple.

Oh, how many are waiting to see if something not be done! Thousands of drunkards wait- who cannot go ten minutes in any direction thout having the temptation glaring before eir eyes or appealing to their nostrils, they hting against it with enfeebled will and dis- ed appetite, conquering, then surrendering, nquering again and surrendering again, and ying: "How long, O Lord, how long before ese infamous solicitations shall be gone?" d how many mothers there are waiting to see his national curse cannot lift! Oh, t had the honest breath who comes home h breath vitiated or disguised? What a nge! How quickly those habits of early ning home have been exchanged for the rat- g of the night-key in the door long after the t watchman has gone by and tried to see that erything was closed up for the night! Oh, at a change for that young man who we had ped would do something in merchandise, or artisanship, or in a profession that would do nor to the family name long after mother's inkled hands are folded from the last toil! that exchanged for startled look when the or-bell rings, lest something has happened. d the wish that the scarlet fever twenty years had been fatal, for then he would have gone ectly to the bosom of his Saviour. But alas! or old soul, she has lived to experience what lomon said: "A foolish son is a heaviness to mother."

IS THAT THE BOY

Oh, what a funeral it will be when that boy is ought home dead! And how mother will sit ere and say: "Is this my boy that I used to dle and that I walked the floor with in the ht when he was sick? Is this the boy that I d to the baptismal font for baptism? Is this e boy for whom I toiled until the blood burst m the tips of my fingers that he might have a od start and a good home? Lord, why hast ou let me live to see this? Can it be that ese swollen hands are the ones that used to nder over my face when rocking him to ep? Can it be that this is the swollen brow t I once so rapturously kissed? Poor boy! w tired he does look. I wonder who struck n that blow across the temples! I wonder if uttered a dying prayer! Wake up, my son; don't you hear me? wake up! Oh, he can't hear me! Dead, dead, dead! 'Oh, Absalom, my son, my son, would God that I had died for thee, oh, Absalom, my son, my son!'"

I am not much of a mathematician, and I cannot estimate it; but is there any one here quick enough at figures to estimate how many mothers there are waiting for something to be done? Ay, there are many wives waiting for domestic rescue. He promised something different from that when, after the long acquaintance and the careful scrutiny of character, the hand and the heart were offered and accepted. What a hell on earth a woman lives in who has

A DRUNKEN HUSBAND!

O Death, how lovely thou art to her, and how soft and warm thy skeleton hand! The sepulchre at midnight in winter is a king's drawing-room compared with that woman's home. It is not so much the blow on the head that hurts as the blow on the heart. The rum fiend came to the door of that beautiful home and opened the door and stood there, and said: "I curse this dwelling with an unrelenting curse. I curse that father into a maniac, I curse that mother into a pauper. I curse those sons into vagabonds. I curse those daughters into profligacy. Cursed be bread-tray and cradle. Cursed be couch and chair and family Bible with record of marriages and births and deaths. Curse upon curse." Oh, how many wives are there waiting to see if something cannot be done to shake these frosts of the second death off the orange blossoms! Yea, the God who works through human instrumentalities, waiting to see whether this nation is going to overthrow this evil; and if it refuse to do so God will wipe out the nation as He did Phœnicia, as He did Rome, as He did Thebes, as He did Babylon. Ay, He is waiting to see what the church of God will do. If the church does not do its work, then He will wipe it out as He did the church of Ephesus, church of Thyatira, church of Sardis. The Protestant and Roman Catholic churches to-day stand side by side with an impotent look, gazing on this evil, which costs this country more than a billion dollars a year, to take care of the 800,000 paupers, and the 315,000 criminals, and the 30,000 idiots, and to bury the 75,000 drunkards.

GOD IS WAITING,

Protagoras boasted that out of the sixty years of his life forty years he had spent in ruining youth; but the arch fiend of the nations may make the more infamous boast that all its life it has been ruining the bodies, minds, and souls of the human race.

Put on your spectacles and take a candle and examine the platforms of the two leading of this country, and see what they are doing for the arrest of this evil and for the overthrow of this abomination. Resolutions—oh yes, resolutions about Mormonism! It is safe to attack that organized nastiness 2000 miles away. But not one resolution against drunkenness, which would turn this entire nation into one bestial Salt Lake City. Resolutions against political corruption, but not one word about drunkenness, which would rot this nation from scalp to heel. Resolutions about protection against competition with foreign industries, but not one word about protection of family and church and nation against the scalding, blasting, all-consuming, damning tariff of strong drink put upon every financial, individual, spiritual, moral, national interest. The Democratic party—in power for the most of the time for forty years—what did that national party do for the extirpation of this evil? Nothing, absolutely nothing, appallingly nothing. The Republican party has been in power for about a quarter of a century—what has it done as a national party to extirpate this evil? Nothing, absolutely nothing, appallingly nothing. I look in another direction.

THE CHURCH

of God is the grandest and most glorious institution on earth. What has it in solid phalanx accomplished for the overthrow of drunkenness? Have its forces ever been marshalled? No, not in this direction. Not long ago a great ecclesiastical court assembled in New York, and resolutions arraigning strong drink were offered, and clergymen with strong drink on their tables and strong drink in their cellars defeated the resolutions by threatening speeches. They could not bear to give up their own lusts. I tell this audience what many of you may never have thought of, that to-day—not in the millennium, but to day—the church holds the balance of power in America; and if Christian people—the men and the women who profess to love the Lord Jesus Christ and to love purity and to be the sworn enemies of all uncleanness and debauchery and sin—if all such would march side by side and shoulder to shoulder, this evil would soon be overthrown. Think of 300,000 churches and Sunday-schools in Christendom marching shoulder to shoulder! How very short a time it would take them to put down this evil, if all the churches of God—trans-Atlantic and cis-Atlantic—were armed on this subject!

Of course it is not the province of the sermon I preach this morning to dwell so much as I shall hereafter upon the ways to contend against these great national evils, but I shall not let the opportunity pass in this discourse, whether it is logically a part of it or not—I shall not let this opportunity pass without charging you, the voters of America, on the first Tuesday in November, to go from your knees to the ballot-box, and then from the ballot-box back to your knees. Ask God what to do, and He will make it plain. Do not ask your political party. Vote with reference to that day when you must give an account.

YOUNG MEN OF AMERICA,

pass over into the army of teetotalism. Whiskey, good to preserve corpses, ought never to turn you into a corpse. Tens of thousands of young men have been dragged out of respectability, and out of purity, and out of good character, and into darkness by this infernal stuff called strong drink. Do not touch it! Do not touch it!

A CONEY ISLAND TRAGEDY.

In the front door of this church, summer before last, this scene occurred: Sabbath morning a young man was entering here for divine worship. A friend passing along the street said: "Joe, come along with me; I am going down to Coney Island, and we'll have a gay Sunday." "No," replied Joe; "I have started to go here to church, and I am going to attend service here." "Oh, Joe," his friend said, "you can go to church any time! The day is bright, and we'll go to Coney Island, and we'll have a splendid time." The temptation was too great, and the twain went to the beach, spent the day in drunkenness and riot. The evening train started up from Brighton. The young men were on it. Joe, in his intoxication, when the train was in full speed, tried to pass around from one seat to another, and fell and was crushed. Under the lantern, as Joe lay bleeding his life away on the grass, he said to his comrade: "John, that was a bad business, your taking me away from church; it was a very bad business. You ought not to have done that, John. I want you to tell the boys to-morrow when you see them that rum and Sabbath-breaking did this for me. And, John, while you are telling them, I will be in hell, and it will be your fault."

Is it not time for me to pull out from the great organ of God's Word, with many banks of keys, the tremulo stop? "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup, for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." Ay, is it not time for me to pull out the trumpet stop of the text? "Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine."

THE NIGHT OF THE WORLD.

By W. E. Blackstone of Chicago.*

Progress not Necessarily Increase of Godliness—Learning Existing with Atheism—Progress in Civilization—The Salt Augmented—Its Savour Diminished.

WE hear in these days so much boasting of the advance of science, the discoveries of philosophers, and the achievements of art, that we are not surprised to learn that this age is beyond all others the age of progress. But all the progress made does not prove that there is an increase of Godliness in the world. Many of the acknowledged leaders, to-day, in science and philosophy, yes, even those who rank the very highest among them are positive infidels. And very many more, who disclaim absolute infidelity deny the divinity of Jesus Christ.

It is strange, indeed, that the Christian optimists, in their noisy trumpetings of the strides of science, should lose sight of this momentous fact. It is not improbable that all this vaunted progress may usher in a period of unbelief and wickedness of devilish malignity. It has been so before in the world's history. The power, splendor and wisdom of David and Solomon were followed by the idolatry and the shedding of innocent blood of the reign of Ahab and Manasseh, resulting in the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the Babylonish captivity. The temple, built by Herod, was one of the grandest works of art. It flashed with splendor, and the temple service was conducted on a magnificent scale. The Jews of his time enjoyed great privileges in literature and learning, and yet they crucified the Lord Jesus.

The world by "wisdom" or "philosophy" (Col. 2 : 8), or "science falsely so called" (1 Tim. 6 : 20) can never find out God. Indeed, we have a clear evidence of this, in the

of our day. No matter how refined and polished is their garb or the delicacy with which they may be set forth, still they are only the poisonous deceptions of Him, who can appear as "an angel of light" (II Cor. 11 : 14). The truth is, that Satan is the arch enemy of God, and the world, in this present evil age (Gal. 1 : 4) is in his power (John 5 : 19) so that he besets the people of God with his "wiles," and arrays against them "principalities. . . . powers . . . and the rulers of the darkness of this world." (Eph. 6 : 11–13.) Therefore the Christian must "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

Surely, then, this wicked world, which is so radically opposed to God, and under the present control of His arch enemy, is not growing better. On the contrary, judgment, fire and perdition are before it. (II Pet. 2 : 2–6; Jude 7; Mark 9 : 43–48, etc., etc.). Perilous times are coming (1 Tim. 4 : 1, etc. II Tim. 3 : 1, etc.). "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." The tares, which naturally grow much faster than the wheat, shall continue up to the harvest. (Matt. 13 : 40.) "The mystery of iniquity," which already worked in the days of the apostles, shall culminate in "the man of sin" the personal Antichrist, whom even the mass of the Jews will receive (John 5 : 43; Isa. 28 : 15–22), and who will be so great and rule with such universal authority, that he is to be destroyed only by the personal appearing of the Lord Himself. (II Thess. 2 : 8.)

There is no hope then, for the world but in the Coming of Christ the King. And praised be God for the promises. The Lord will come at the end of this age, Antichrist will be destroyed (II Thess. 2 : 8; Rev. 19, 20). All things that offend shall be gathered out (Matt. 13 : 41–43) and the Millennial Kingdom of righteousness shall be established on the earth.

But it is insisted that the world has made great and refinement, in benevolence, in personal liberty, international fraternity, Christian work, etc. In proof of this, the abrogation of slavery is often cited—also the cessation of the inquisition and martyrdom—the establishment of charitable institutions, the great postal and commercial means of communication, built upon the agencies of steam and lightning—the right of trial by jury, international arbitration, missionary triumphs, etc. But we answer that civilization and refinement are not the source of holiness. They may elevate the head while the heart is untouched. The gilded palace of sin is as certainly the gateway to hell, as the darkest den of vice.

The cultured and scientific atheist, is as surely in the service of Satan, as the thief or the murderer. Jesus Himself classed them all together when He said "he that is not with me is against me." (Matt. 12 : 30.) So it matters not how much more like an angel of light the serpent may appear, nor how civilized and refined the world may be. Satan is the devil still. And the world is still the world.

His manifestations and methods may be changed, but the spirit of darkness is the same. And accordingly, we see that while slavery is disappearing—Communism, Socialism and Nihilism are lifting their godless, headless forms. And darker are their forebodings than were even the days of the inquisition and martyrdom. Oppressing monopolies, systematic peculation and fraud are parallel with charitable institutions. The mails, so useful for news and correspondence, afford a most convenient agency for disseminating the flood of obscene literature which is blasting the morals of the young. Trial by jury has too often proved a mere farce, in which the criminal escapes. The nation which opened the way for the missionary, also forced upon the teeming millions of China the awful curse of opium.

It is also argued that, as Christians are the light of the world, and the salt of the earth (Matt. 5 : 13, 16; Phil. 2 : 15), the greatly increased number of professed Christians must certainly have augmented the light and the salt, and consequently have made the world better.

Let us notice carefully that Jesus speaks of the salt losing its saltness and becoming good for nothing, and He also intimates that the light may be hid under a bushel. And therefore He exhorts, "Have salt in yourselves." (Mark 9 : 50.) Evidently the Jews lost their "savor," (Matt. 5 : 13) and "were broken off." (Rom. 11 : 20.) This leads to the solemn query—is the professing Church progressing or declining in faith and spiritual life?

THE KINGDOM IN MYSTERY

(Matt. 13 : 10–11), or the state of Christendom until Christ comes again, is taught us, we believe, by the parables of Matt. 13. "The parable of the sower shows the varied and imperfect reception of the Word. The parable of the tares shows the early and continued effects of Satan's presence among the saints. The parable of the mustard-seed shows outward growth sheltering evil. The parable of the leaven shows the gradual and utter corruption of the truth. The parable of the treasure hid in a field shows what Israel is to be in the world. The parable of the pearl of great price shows what the Church is to Christ. And the parable of the drag-net shows the cleansing of the kingdom at His Second Coming."

There is, perhaps, but little opposition to this interpretation of the parables, excepting that of the leaven, which has been extensively interpreted to teach exactly the opposite, viz., that the power and influence of the Gospel or Christian life is to permeate the masses of the world, until the whole is leavened into holiness. The inconsistency of this is seen when we consider that precisely the contrary is taught by the parable of the sower and the tares, each of which most undisputably show that evil is to continue and grow up to the end of the age. This is surely the most sufficient and scriptural reason for assigning the same typical meaning to t leaven, in this and the correlative passage (Lu 13 : 21), which we find it to bear in the num ous other passages, where the same word is use viz., the corrupting influence of evil and t symbol of death.

Here then we are most emphatically taug not only that the world is growing no better, b that the professing Church itself, will lose its sa ness, becoming nominal and lukewarm, whc end is graphically depicted (Rev. 3 : 16). T entire teaching of the Word of God, we belie agrees with this.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVA GELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND

One of God's Postmen.—At a Recent Meeti Mr. Stuart said: "At one time Dr. Chalm was speaking to a woman about her soul, b he said she did not see where she was includ He said: 'If the postman should bring yo letter with your name written on the outsi would you doubt for a minute that it was you?' 'Oh, no,' replied the woman; would take it at once.' 'Well, supposing G sent you a letter right from Himself with yc name written on it, would you take it?' 'C yes,' replied the woman, 'I would take 'Well, He has sent you that letter,' replied I Chalmers, 'and I am the postman, and here is;' and he pointed her to the words in R 22 : 17, 'The Spirit and the bride say com And these words were blessed to that woma her eyes were opened, and she received Lord as her Saviour."

Testimony of a Changed Man.—A member a Mizpah Band says: "The Lord has lifted feet out of the sinking sand, and planted th on the Rock of Ages. I sometimes think might have been in darkness and despair, hac not been for the goodness of God in sending one Sabbath morning to a free breakfast tha given in James Morrison Street Evangelis Hall. I attended theatres and music-halls many years. What are they? Places of s and where many young men and young wor lose their character. But there is One wh able to redeem your character, and He is y Saviour, who died for you. It was at one the refreshment bars in the Theatre Royal t I first got the worse for drink. It was o Saturday night, and when I arrived home ea on Sunday morning my father turned me out the house. I went back a second time, and brother, who is a Christian, persuaded father to let me in. I went to the Free Bre fast that morning, and it was there that Lord opened my eyes, and I found peace w God, through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Pardoning Murderous Mutineers.—"Ma years ago in Russia a regiment of troops m nied. They were at some distance from the c ital, and were so furious that they murde their officers, and resolved never to submit discipline; but the Emperor, who was an ceedingly sagacious man, no sooner heard o than, all alone and unattended, he went i the barracks when the men were drawn up, a addressing them sternly, he said to them, 'S diers, you have committed such offences agai the law that every one of you deserves to be to death. There is no hope of any mercy one of you unless you lay down your arms mediately, and surrender at discretion to your emperor.' And they did it there then, though the heads of their officers w lying at their feet. They threw down their a and surrendered, and he said at once, 'Me pardon you; you will be the bravest troo ever had.' And they were too. That is what God says to the sinner: 'Now, sinn you have done that which deserves my wra Down with your weapons of rebellion! Gro arms at once. I will not talk with you until submit at discretion to my sovereign authori And then He says, 'Believe in my Son; t Him; accept Him as your Saviour. This d you are forgiven, and henceforth you will be most loving creatures that my hands have ma

None will more loudly sing the praises of God than those who have been washed in the precious blood of Christ, and had their transgressions blotted out."

A Prayer Nailed on the Bed-Post.—A Minister relates: "A few weeks ago, on a Saturday morning, there was a knock at the door about nine o'clock. A woman had called to ask me to go and see a person who was apparently dying. Locking up my study, I started off. Reaching the house, I ascended a narrow stairway into a large room, open to the roof, with a partition across it, on the other side of which lay a woman, upon an old 'four-poster,' suffering much from bronchitis. On the post of the bedstead, behind her head, some one had nailed a printed prayer, and while I was remarking upon what true prayer was, she said, with great difficulty, because of her breathing, 'Ah, sir, it's no use having the prayer nailed up there upon the bedpost;' and, laying her hand upon her heart, she continued, 'It must come from the heart, mustn't it, sir?' Being strangers, she endeavored to tell me that she had had a former husband, who was a Christian, and as he was dying, he said, 'Jane, I am nearly in heaven,' and turning her eyes up to me, she very innocently said, 'Sir, I never saw a man so happy as he was; he seemed just as though he was getting ready to go to the fair.' To visit the fair was the height of earthly bliss to this poor woman. Under the blessing of God, the woman's life has been saved, and, through her illness and the word spoken, her soul is saved also."

Light Let into a Dungeon.—A well-known evangelist related: "A man was confined in a dungeon for a length of time. He soon became quite accustomed to the darkness. His friends endeavored to restore him to light and liberty. With this end in view they let in a ray of light, and also a rope. As soon as the light entered his dungeon the captive looked all around him, and, to his horror, he saw that the walls were covered over with all manner of creeping things and that the place he had been in for so long in peace had now altogether become loathsome, and from which he would have given or done anything to make his escape. Vainly he strove to do so by climbing the slimy walls, but it was of no use, he always fell back again. And then he called out. 'Oh, the light! the light! if I had not known the light I should still have been happy.' 'We let down a rope with the light,' they called to him. And now he saw what he had not noticed before; that the rope was there just within his reach. He took hold of it, and was brought into the full light of day. So it is with those who are bowed under the burden of sin. They say to us, 'If you had but let us alone, we had a kind of peace when we thought nothing of our sins.' But when the light of the Gospel is let in it gives them vivid view of the guilt and blackness of their hearts. But the light alone will never save them, they most take hold of Christ, the divine rope, who will light them out of the fearful pit and out of the miry clay. Jesus saves to the very uttermost all who come unto God by Him."

An Unexpected Supper.—Mr. Martin, a colored evangelist, related: "I was on my way home from preaching one night in London, when a man, very much the worse for drink, came up to me and struck me in the face. I took him by the arm and led him away to a coffee house. When we got inside he looked around him and asked me where he was. I told him. 'Ah,' he replied, 'you don't know what kind of man I am, for if you did you would not have anything to do with me.' 'It does not matter how bad you are,' I replied, 'I wish to be your friend.' 'Do you?' he said, 'well, will you give me twopence?' I asked him what he was going to do with it, and he told me that it was to buy drink he wished it. 'Well,' I said, 'I'll not give you the twopence, but I'll give you as much coffee and cakes as you like to take.' 'Will you?' he said; 'you don't know what you are taking in hand.' I told him never to mind that, but to eat as much as he wished. He began, and did full justice to the food put before him, after which he took his departure. I stayed behind and prayed the Lord to save that man. A little afterward a woman entered the room where I was sitting, followed by three children. She addressed me thus: 'Are you the darkie that gave my husband as much coffee and cakes as he wished.' 'Yes,' I said, 'I am,' and asked her if she would like some also. 'Yes,' she replied; 'my children and I are very hungry.' After having her supper she explained to me that when her husband went home he told her that there was a darkie in the coffee house who was giving away coffee and cakes. About a year afterward I got a letter from the man, asking me if I remembered him, and telling me that he had given himself to Christ; that that night in the coffee house was the turning point in his life. At the railway station one day I met him, but would not have recognized him had he not spoken to me, there was such a change in the man. He said, 'I am going to take you home and give you a meal in return for that meal you gave me.' And when we arrived at his house, his wife had a nice comfortable tea waiting for us. I went back to my work encouraged and strengthened, thanking God that I had been made instrumental in leading that man to Christ, giving Him all the glory."

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION IN BROOKLYN.

On Monday and Tuesday of last week a Convention of ministers and Christian workers was held in Dr. Cuyler's church, South Oxford Street, Brooklyn. It was conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and at each session the doors of the large church had to be closed long before the time fixed for the commencement of the proceedings, and hundreds went away unable to obtain admission. It is the first of a series of Conventions to be held by the evangelists in the larger cities of the East, with a view to arousing the churches to the work of evangelizing the masses who are without religious instruction. Three sessions of the Convention were held each day, morning, afternoon, and evening, which were attended by many clergymen, as well as laymen, prominent among those who occupied the platform being the Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, the Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, the Rev. Dr. Edward Beecher, the Rev. L. Richardson, the Rev. C. H. Buck, the Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, the Rev. Dr. Lyman, the Rev. Dr. Paxton, and the Rev. Edward Judson. Mr. Moody presided, and Mr. Sankey occupied the seat at the organ and led the singing, which followed each address and prayer. The meetings were very earnest, and were indicative of an intense desire to realize the object in view.

At the Monday morning session the topic, "How to reach the outlying masses," was discussed. Mr. Moody suggested that one of the best ways was that which is now practised in London of giving quarterly missions of ten days in each of the churches, during which clergymen should preach to the masses, while the church members worked personally to draw in the outsiders. He maintained that great good came from religious excitement and revivals, and that they were strictly in accordance with the teachings of Christ. The Rev. Edward Judson, of the Berean Baptist church, New York, contended that while missions were productive of great good, the work of evangelizing the masses must be done by the local churches, and that when the poor found that they were wanted in these churches they would come. Each church member should constitute himself a missionary, and above all, the seats in the churches should be made free.

Mr. Moody's address occupied the whole of the afternoon session, and it was heard throughout with the closest attention. He said: "Our object in calling our friends together during these two days is to strengthen them and quicken them for the great work before us in the future. One of the saddest things of the present day is to see so many members of the church who do not separate themselves from the world. Another thing that I noticed both in the old country and here is that a good many church people are inclined to reject a part of the Bible. Some of them give up the Old Testament. Now, you can't do that without giving up the New Testament. With me it's the whole Bible or none.

"There are one hundred and forty quotations from the Old Testament in the four Gospels," Mr. Moody said, "and if you're going to discount the Old Testament what are you going to do with the New Testament? You can't give up the story of Noah and the flood without giving up Christ. Do I believe the story of Lot and his wife? Of course I do, and I preach it, and I believe that Lot ought to be a warning to a great many men in Wall Street and in Brooklyn. Let us thunder out the whole truth, and preach the whole Bible. Do I believe the story of Jonah and the whale? Of course I believe it. Scientific men tell us it was impossible for a whale to swallow a man, but couldn't God prepare a fish to swallow Jonah? Couldn't He prepare a man to swallow a whale if He wanted to? [Laughter.] There's a good deal in the world that I can't understand, but that I believe just the same.

"There's been more Bibles published in the last seven years than in the 700 years before. Is not that a fulfilment of Christ's prophecy: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away but my Word shall not pass away.' They print in London alone 500 Bibles every hour of the day right along, year in and year out. Isn't the Word of God going on? Let sceptics talk, but let's you and I go on and read the Bible. The Bible tells us more than any newspaper can tell us. The New York Times and the Herald will give us the news of yesterday, but that's all. The Bible is our news book from which we learn what our future is to be. We can't afford to reject or disbelieve any part of this news book, whether it tells us of the past or of the future. It is not eloquent preaching that is to save the world," said Mr. Moody in closing. "It is unsealing the Bible and showing its plain truths to the understanding of those inside as well as those outside, the Church of Christ."

On Tuesday morning the subject before the Convention was: "How can we improve the singing in our churches and Sabbath-schools?" The session was conducted by Mr. Sankey. The other sessions were devoted to the question: "What more can we do for the young men in our cities?" The Rev. Cuthbert Hall introduced the subject in a weighty address.

Mr. Moody who followed, said: "I never think of young men that I don't get fired. Your Christian work won't go on unless you get the young men. A young man may come up here from the country and hear a popular preacher for six months, and nobody will ever speak to him. I have heard sermons on recognizing your friends in heaven. It might be a good plan to recognize them on earth. [Laughter.] Think of the poor boy from the country, with only a little money to spend, strolling about and trying to get some pleasure after his day's work. Now, just let Dr. Hall or some of you take Dr. Cuyler's church and fill it with young men, and then let the mothers and daughters of the church go out and bring in the young men. A young man likes to come to church with his sweetheart. A man may growl when he is obliged to go with his wife, but he never will when he comes with his sweetheart. [Laughter.] Let us take up a collection right now for the Young Men's Christian Association to show how much we think of the young men. Perhaps there is some wealthy woman who would like to give $5000. Perhaps the ministers here will take up collections for this purpose in their churches next Sunday." A vote was taken whether there should be a collection, which was carried, and the collection was taken up accordingly.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1884.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Election in Ohio does not afford much encouragement to either party. General Robinson, who, as the Republican candidate for Secretary of State, was at the head of that ticket, was elected by a plurality of 11,321. Flickinger, the Republican candidate for the Membership of the Board of Works, had a plurality of 17,476, and Johnson, for Supreme Court judge, a plurality of 15,450. A majority of the Congressional Delegation is Democratic, eleven Democrats and ten Republicans having been elected. The total vote cast was 780,373, being 62,205 more votes than were cast last year, and 64,187 more than in October, 1880. The reason General Robinson and Judge Johnson ran behind their ticket was that the sympathy they had shown with the temperance movement caused the liquor dealers to unite against them. The Prohibition vote is given at 9510. Last year it was 8362. Politicians of all parties are busily figuring out inferences from the returns for a guide to the probable result in the State next month. It is a complicated calculation of a very uncertain character. Mr. Blaine cannot be sure of polling the same number of votes as were given to the Republican candidates last week. There were doubtless some voters who saw no reason to bolt the State nominations, but who are disaffected toward the Presidential candidate. Probably, too, General Robinson polled some Prohibition votes which in November will go to St. John. On the other hand, Governor Cleveland cannot count on the solid Democratic vote, as General Butler will be a factor in the November election, which did not appear in that of October. The extraordinary efforts made by the Republicans to carry the State, and the fact that Mr. Blaine himself went there before the election, led the country to expect a more decisive Republican gain than the returns show.

West Virginia, which also Held a State Election last week, gave Democratic majorities. A Governor, two Supreme Court judges, and other State and county officers were elected. There was a fusion of the Republican and Greenback tickets. At the time of going to press the official figures have not been published, but sufficient is known to prove that the Democratic ticket is elected. The total vote was 150,000. This is about 50,000 more votes than were cast at the last election. The Republican vote has increased by 33,000, and the Democratic vote by 16,000. About 9000 Greenback votes were cast last election, which this year would go to the Republican ticket. If there was no increase of Greenback votes, the net Republican increase this year is 14,000. The probability is that the highest majority any Democratic candidate has will not exceed 3000. This, however, is significant, because at the election of 1882, when there was a fusion like that of this year, the Republican-Greenback ticket had 1000 majority, and at the Chicago Convention West Virginia was promised to the Republicans.

An Effort is Being Made by a Daily Journal, which once occupied a high position in public esteem, to cast a stigma on Governor St. John. It is trying to persuade its readers that he is running for the Presidency in defiance of the wishes of the temperance people. That view of the situation is misleading. There are a few temperance societies which have expressed a wish that Mr. St. John should withdraw, but they are not important ones. The great majority of the temperance people are enthusiastic in his cause as a candidate of clean character and excellent capacity. Among the temperance people who are opposing Mr. St. John is Neal Dow, who in 1880 was the Prohibition candidate for the Presidency, and who learned the measure of contempt in which he was held by the country in the returns, which showed that only 10,305 out of more than nine million votes were given to him. Neal Dow this year is working for Mr. Blaine, and it is well for Mr. St. John that he is. St. John needs no better sponsor than John B. Gough, who, in a brief speech in New York last Friday, said that although he had voted the Republican ticket at every election but one, and although he did not believe one per cent of the charges made against Mr. Blaine were true, he should this year be counted for St. John and Daniel. He thanked God that they had a candidate with a clean record.

The President has Filled the Place Vacated by Secretary Gresham by inviting Mr. Frank Hatton into his Cabinet. The appointment was made on October 14th. Mr. Hatton was, until his promotion, First Assistant Postmaster-General. He now becomes Postmaster-General. The appointment is on the lines of civil service reform, and that is the only good thing that can be said for it. It seems like a grim joke that in less than four years the office which was filled by Thomas L. James should have been given to Frank Hatton. Happily we are near the time when Mr. Hatton must give place to his successor, or we might see practical effect given in post-office management to some of the ideas Mr. Hatton has so forcibly expressed in his editorials. President Arthur's appointments have, with very few exceptions, received the approval of the country, and he appears through his term to have been prompted by a conscientious desire to put the right man in the right place; the selection of Mr. Hatton for any place, and especially for that of Postmaster-General, has therefore caused a general feeling of painful astonishment.

The International Conference at Washington agreed, on October 13th, by a large majority, to recommend the meridian of Greenwich to the respective governments as the prime meridian from which longitude should be universally reckoned. The only vote cast against the decision was by the delegate from St. Domingo. The delegates from France and Brazil refrained from voting. The advantages to be gained by uniformity in this matter, and the dangers which diversity in the mode of reckoning is liable to produce, are so obvious that it may be hoped that France will comply with the recommendation of the Conference. It has been suggested that as the meridian of Greenwich runs through her territory, she might fix upon some place standing upon it, and there erect a transit instrument, and call the place Greenwich, thus saving her national pride. The Conference decided to have the degrees counted as now—east and west. It was expected that it would have recommended continuous reckoning from 1 to 360, but a change of that kind would have caused a heavy expense, and might have led to confusion.

Florida does not Hold a Prohibition Convention this year, and no State Prohibition ticket will be put in the field. A circular has, however, been issued by the State Executive Committee of the National Prohibition party, advising voters to cast their votes only for such candidates for State and county offices as are temperance men. In cases where there is no temperance candidate running, it advises voters to withhold their ballots. The committee has appointed four Presidential electors and alternates, so that Prohibitionists may vote for St. John and Daniel. The secretary of the committee requests us to give the names of the electors for the benefit of our readers in Florida. They are: J. W. Lawlor, J. H. Miller, C. C. Beasley, and Alexander Niblo.

The Mormons have been Foiled in their Attempt to defeat the new Anti-polygamy law by getting members of their Church on the Grand Jury. Judge Lane, on October 4th, rendered judgment on the question. He said: "That a man who believes it right to commit a crime which he is called upon to try, cannot be an impartial juror, though he should not be influenced by such a motive. If a man believes it right to practise polygamy, in a polygamy case he cannot be impartial. A juror, according to all human experience, cannot possibly be impartial in a trial of that kind if he believes polygamy to be a command—a law proclaimed by the Almighty. It makes no difference how many human laws are passed, he will still believe polygamy right, because he thinks a higher law is governing him." As the jurors could not in the circumstances be considered impartial, they were properly excluded.

The New York Policeman who Committed a brutal murder in November last, and whose conviction and sentence were recently referred to in these columns, is to have a new trial. At the general term of the Supreme Court an application for a new trial was granted on the ground that the policeman was excited by liquor, and that no malice was proved against him. As the man has been condemned to death, no one will grudge him a full inquiry into his case; but it will have a very injurious effect if the police learn that if they commit murder when they are drunk they will escape punishment. Such a result will increase the danger reputable citizens are already in from the revolvers and clubs carried by ruffianly policemen.

The Record for a Single Week of the Results of the liquor traffic has been prepared by the New York Observer from the files of six newspapers. The appalling list is as follows: Murders, 11; murderous assaults, 17; suicides, 13; wife beatings, 7; affrays, 19; miscellaneous, 41; total, 108.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey will Hold a Christian Convention at Rochester, N. Y., on November 16th and 17th. They are expected to hold a series of revival meetings shortly at Syracuse, N. Y., but the date has not yet been announced.

Miss Laurie McLatchie Preached on Friday evening last to a large congregation in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Her text was: "The Lord shut him in" (Gen. 7 : 16). She made an earnest and eloquent appeal to her hearers to seek the Refuge provided for penitent sinners, before God closed it as He closed the door of the Ark against the scoffers in the days of Noah. Her vivid picture of the events of that time of the world's destruction made a deep impression on the congregation, which sat as if spellbound under her words. Her voice, which is remarkably soft and melodious, filled the large building, and could be distinctly heard in every part. She has received invitations to labor in several cities, and to deliver her lecture on "the Scottish Covenanters" in others. Letters for her sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be duly forwarded to her.

The Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York is doing a noble work for young men, especially for those who come to the city from the rural districts in search of employment. Many young men, expecting to find work immediately, come wholly unprovided with funds; others, who have money, often spend all they have before securing employment; and both classes, being surrounded with temptations, are apt to drift into the idle and criminal classes. The Bowery Branch seeks these strangers, and helps them to get work. It also holds regular religious services for their benefit, and by Christian counsel helps to keep them out of temptation. In many cases applicants are without money when they go to the rooms, and sometimes they are also without clothes. The Association has already aided 56,800 men, as follows: Sent to hospitals, 686; situations procured, 10,267; garments furnished, 4825; lodgings, 85,842; meals, 433,230. During the winter months the calls are always numerous, and the Association asks for aid in meeting them. All contributions go to a separate fund, used exclusively in this charitable work, and not a dollar of it is applied to current expenses. Parcels of clothing would be very welcome, and would be sent for if the Association is notified by mail.

A Riot in Birmingham, England, has been developed by the constitutional struggle. On October 13th a Conservative demonstration was organized at which two prominent members of Parliament—Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Randolph Churchill—were to deliver speeches. Birmingham is a town of about 400,000 inhabitants, the majority of whom are Radicals. There has been much excitement in the town since the Lords rejected the bill extending the franchise, which excitement culminated when the two Conservative leaders appeared. The Radical mob, in great numbers, forced an entrance to the hall by battering in the doors with heavy planks, and overwhelmed the Conservatives, who were powerless. A free fight ensued, in which the furniture and wreckage of the hall were freely used as weapons. The mob swept from the platform the officers of the meeting and the speakers. The platform, after being twice stormed, was demolished and left a confused mass of timber. All the chairs and doors were smashed into atoms. The hall was as badly wrecked as if it had been the scene of a dynamite explosion. The refreshment bars were looted and the liquors drunk, and the bottles thrown on the floor. The gas fittings were wrenched from the walls. There was great excitement, and threats of retaliation were made. This is only one of many signs that the approaching struggle for the abolition of the House of Lords will be one of extreme virulence.

An Alarming Fire on a Transatlantic Steamer is reported from Ireland. The steamship Nevada, of the Guion Line, arrived at Queenstown October 17th, having left New York on October 17th. Two days before her arrival at that port smoke was seen issuing from the hold. The captain and his officers descended, and found that part of the cargo, consisting of cotton and hops, was on fire. They were nearly suffocated by the smoke. When they returned to the deck orders were given to throw part of the cargo overboard and to deluge the remainder with water. During the whole of that day and night the officers, crew, and passengers worked unceasingly, and the next morning the fire was under control. Later in the day there was another outbreak, and work upon it was resumed. On her arrival at Queenstown on Friday the Nevada had ten feet of water in her hold, and was listing heavily to port. The officers and crew being exhausted, a boat was sent ashore for assistance, which was promptly dispatched. The cargo suffered heavily, but the ship was uninjured. One of the steerage passengers, a woman, died of fright. The other passengers were unhurt, and were landed at Queenstown.

Wilhelm I., Duke of Brunswick, Died on October 18th. His territory was a very small one, but the honor of the succession is causing much discussion in Europe. The next heir is the Duke of Cumberland, but the German Emperor objects to his mounting the throne. The Duke is violently opposed to Prince Bismarck, who has already snatched Hanover from him. A suggestion has been made to him that he should resign his claims in favor of a candidate acceptable to Germany; but no arrangements have as yet been made.

Another Battle was Fought between the French and Chinese near Langson on October 10th. The Chinese appear to have fought with desperation, but they were defeated. A telegram from the French commander states that the enemy's losses were heavy. He says: "Our artillery strewed the ground with Chinese bodies. After losing all their positions the Chinese fled toward Langson. They halted near Phutruong and Khauh. The French loss was twenty killed, including one officer, and ninety wounded. Two officers received slight wounds. Our troops were animated with the greatest ardor. The Chinese in this engagement were a part of the best troops of the Empire. They were perfectly armed, and manœuvred in European style. The Chinese losses were three thousand killed, including their chief commander." It must be remembered that this account of the respective losses proceeds from French sources, which are not noted for their accuracy. On October 17th the French forces were again attacked near Tamsui, and the Chinese were again repulsed with terrific slaughter. The French general has reported to the government that he will need a veritable army to drive the Chinese out of Tonquin.

Negotiations for the Berlin Conference on the Congo question are proceeding amicably. France and Germany have agreed on the points to be submitted. England has accepted the invitation conditionally on the questions to be discussed being limited to those connected with the commerce of the Congo, and that the disputes with France respecting the West African coast be excluded. Our own government has been invited to send a delegate. Mr. Henry M. Stanley will attend as a deputation from the Belgian Association. A correspondent of the Neue Freie Press states that in an interview Mr. Henry M. Stanley said that in order to open the trade of the Congo country the Powers must not enter into a quarrel to suit selfish ends. They must abandon all idea of taxing settlers in that country. Mr. Stanley admitted that the climate on the African coast is fatal, but the African Association had worked out a sanitary plan that would enable Europeans to travel with impunity to the interior, which is as healthy as America. He stated, however, that the colonists to the Congo must be secured for years against any customs dues in order to procure that prosperity which will attract emigrants.

A Serious Delay has Taken Place in the Progress of the Relief Expedition under General Wolseley. The General complains bitterly of the failure of the Commissariat and transport service, which, he says, has paralyzed his advance. It is stated now that he is organizing an expedition upon camels, which indicates that he has found the Nile route impracticable. Osman Digna, the Mahdi's lieutenant, who has been harassing General Gordon in Khartoum for many months, will probably escape the punishment General Wolseley intended to inflict upon him. Travellers report that he has arrived at Tamai, and is massing his troops there. General Gordon appears to be still fighting successfully against the forces menacing Khartoum. There are conflicting stories about the Mahdi, but as the season has arrived when the tribes can leave their farms for warfare in the field, there is a prevalent fear that he may reach Khartoum before the expedition.

Six Officers of the Russian Army and Two women accused of Nihilism were executed in the St. Petersburg Citadel on October 18th. They were seized, secretly tried, condemned, and executed before the citizens knew that any arrests had been made. It is said that the Czar has notified his ministers that he intends to pursue a liberal course hereafter in his home government, and hopes of reform are built thereon; but no signs of them have yet reached the outer world. The Nihilists do not appear to be dismayed by the rigor of the government. They are devoted to their cause, and the vacant places left by the executioner are promptly filled up. There is just now apparent inactivity, caused by the death of the leaders of the movement and the necessity for drilling the new members of the order. These new members are said to be of aristocratic birth and good education, and declare themselves ready to die for the cause of liberty in Russia.

The Outrages on the Jews in Morocco have been stopped, and the wicked Governor has been punished in consequence of the interference of the Italian Minister. The correspondent of the New York Times relates horrible incidents of cruelty practised on the Jewish population. The stories told of inhumanity toward the Jews are almost incredible. An aged chief rabbi was whipped and then pilloried in the scorching sun because he refused to draw false deeds of debt against Jews in favor of the Governor. Another rabbi was dragged through the streets by the hair and brutally flogged.

THE PARABLE OF THE LOST SHEEP.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost. I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance."—LUKE 15: 4-7.

Christ's Hearers—A Disreputable Lot—His Defence—The Shepherd in the Track of the Sheep—I. One Engrossing Thought—A Sheep Lost—Senseless—Shiftless—The Shepherd's Concern—His Property in it—A Shepherd to it—II. One Object of Search—A Definite Search—All Absorbing—Personal—Persevering—Successful—III. One Burden of Love—IV. One Source of Joy—Who are the Just Persons?—The Sick Child.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ while He was here below was continually in the pursuit of lost souls. He was seeking lost men and women, and it was for this reason that He went down among them, even among those who were most evidently lost, that He might find them. He took pains to put Himself where He could come into communication with them, and He exhibited such kindliness toward them that in crowds they drew near to hear Him. I dare say it was a queer-looking assembly, a disreputable rabble, which made the Lord Jesus its centre. I am not astonished that the Pharisee, when he looked upon the congregation, sneered and said, "He collects around Him of our community, the wretches who collect taxes for the foreigner of God's free people; and the fallen women of the towns, and such-like riffraff make up His audiences; and He, instead of repelling them, receives them, welcomes them, looks upon them as a class to whom He has a peculiar relationship. He even eats with them. Did He not go into the house of Zaccheus, and the house of Levi, and partake of the feasts which these low people made for Him?"

Our divine Lord defended Himself by what is called an argumentum ad hominem, an argument to the men themselves; for He said, "What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not go after that which is lost, until he find it?" No argument tells more powerfully upon men than one which comes close home to their own daily life, and the Saviour put it so. They were silenced, if they were not convinced. It was a peculiarly strong argument, because in their case it was only a sheep that they would go after, but in His case it was something infinitely more precious than all the flocks of sheep that ever fed on Sharon or Carmel; for it was the soul of man which he sought to save.

The argument had in it not only the point of peculiar adaptation, but a force at the back of it unusually powerful for driving it home upon every honest mind. The going after the sheep is a part of the parable which our Lord meant them to observe; the shepherd pursues a route which he would never think of pursuing if it were only for his own pleasure; his way is not selected for his own ends, but for the sake of the stray sheep. He takes a track up hill and down dale, far into a desert, or into some dark wood, simply because the sheep has gone that way, and he must follow it until he find it. The more steadily you look at this parable the more clearly you will see that our Lord's answer was complete. We need not this morning regard it exclusively as an answer to Pharisees, but we may look at it as an instruction to ourselves; for it is quite as complete in that direction. May the good Spirit instruct us as we muse upon it.

I. In the first place, I call attention to this observation; the one subject of thought to the man who had lost his sheep. This sets forth to us the one thought of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Good Shepherd, when He sees a man lost to holiness and happiness by wandering into sin.

The shepherd, on looking over his little flock of one hundred, can only count ninety-nine. He counts them again, and he notices that a certain one has gone; it may be a white-faced sheep with a black mark on its foot; he knows all about it, for "the Lord knoweth them that are His." The shepherd has a photograph of the wanderer in his mind's eye, and now he thinks but little of the ninety and nine who are feeding in the pastures of the wilderness, but his mind is in a ferment about the one lost sheep. This one idea possesses him:

"A SHEEP IS LOST!"

This agitates his mind more and more — "a sheep is lost." It masters his every faculty. He cannot eat bread; he cannot return to his home; he cannot rest while one sheep is lost. To a tender heart a lost sheep is a painful subject of thought. It is of all creatures the most senseless. If we have lost a dog, it may find its way home again; possibly a horse might return to its master's stable; but a sheep will wander on and on, in endless mazes lost. It is too foolish a thing to think of returning to the place of safety. A lost sheep is lost indeed in countries where lands lie uninclosed and the plains are boundless. That fact still seems to ring in the man's soul—"A sheep is lost, and it will not return, for it is a foolish thing. Where may it not have gone by this time? Weary and worn, it may be fainting; it may be far away from green pastures, and be ready to perish with hunger among the bare rocks or upon the arid sand."

A sheep is shiftless; it knows nothing about providing for itself. The camel can scent water from afar, and a vulture can espy its food from an enormous distance; but the sheep can find nothing for itself. Of all wretched creatures a lost sheep is one of the worst. If anybody had stepped up to the shepherd just then, and said, "Good sir, what aileth you? you seem in great concern;" he would have replied, "And well I may be, for a sheep is lost." "It is only one, sir; and I see you have ninety-nine left." "Do you call it nothing to lose one? You are no shepherd yourself, or you would not trifle so. Why, I seem to forget these ninety-nine that are all safe, and my mind only remembers that one which is lost."

What is it which makes the Great Shepherd lay so much to His heart the loss of one of His flock? What is it that makes Him agitated as He reflects upon that supposition—"if He lose one of them?" I think it is, first, because of in it. The parable does not so much speak of a hired shepherd, but of a shepherd proprietor. "What man of you having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them." Jesus, in another place, speaks of the hireling, whose own the sheep are not, and therefore he flees when the wolf comes. It is the shepherd proprietor who lays down his life for the sheep. It is not a sheep alone, and a lost sheep, but it is one of his own lost sheep that this man cares for.

This parable is not written about lost humanity in the bulk—it may be so used if you please—but in its first sense it is written about Christ's own sheep: as also is the second parable concerning the woman's own money; and the third, not concerning any prodigal youth, but the father's own son. Jesus has His own sheep, and some of them are lost; yea, they were all once in the same condition; for "all we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." The parable refers to the unconverted, whom Jesus has redeemed with His most precious blood, and whom He his undertaken to seek and to save; these are those other sheep whom also He must bring in.

This thought, therefore, presses upon Him, "One of my sheep is lost." It is a wonderful supposition, that which is contained in this parable—"if He lose one of them." What! lose one whom He loved or ever the earth was? It may wander for a time, but He will not have it lost forever; that He cannot bear. What! lose one whom His Father gave Him to be His own? Lose one whom He has bought with His own life? He will not endure the thought. That word—"if he lose one of them" sets His soul on fire. It shall not be. You know how much the Lord has valued each one of His chosen, laying down His life for his redemption. You know how dearly of His people: it is no new passion with Him, neither can it grow old. He has loved His own and must love them to the end.

If you have ever been in a house with a mother and father, and daughters and sons, when a little child has been lost, you will never forget the agitation of each member of the household. See the father as he goes to the police-station, and calls at every likely house; for he must find his child or break his heart. See the deep oppression and bitter anguish of the mother; she is like one distracted till she has news of her darling. You now begin to understand what Jesus feels for one whom He loves, "if He lose one of them."

Moreover, the man in the parable had a third relation to the sheep, which made him possessed with the one thought of its being lost—he was a shepherd to it. It was his own sheep, and he had therefore for that very reason become its shepherd; and he says to himself, "If I lose one of them my shepherd-work will be ill-done." What dishonor it would be to a shepherd to lose one of his sheep! Either it must be for want of power to keep it, or want of will, or want of watchfulness; but none of these can appertain to the Chief Shepherd. Our Lord Jesus Christ will never have it said of Him that He has lost one of His people, for He glories in having preserved them all.

"If he lose one of them," says the passage;

IMAGINE THE CONSEQUENCE.

What scorn would come from Satan! What derision would He pour upon the Shepherd! How hell would ring with the news, "He hath lost one of them." Suppose it to be the feeblest; then would they cry, "He could keep the strong, who could keep themselves." Suppose it to be the strongest; then would they cry, "He could not even keep one of the mightiest of them, but must needs let him perish." This is good argument, for Moses pleaded with God, "What will the Egyptians say?" It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones shall perish, neither is it for the glory of Christ that one of His own sheep should be eternally lost. You see the reason for the Lord's heart being filled with one burning thought; for first, the sheep is His own; next, He is full of compassion; and then again, it is His office to shepherd the flock.

All this while the sheep is not thinking about the shepherd, or caring for him in the least degree. Some of you are not thinking at all about the Lord Jesus. You have no wish nor will to seek after Him! What folly! Oh, the pity of it, that the great heart above should be yearning over you to-day, and should fail to rest because you are in peril, and you, who will be the greater loser, for you will lose your own soul, are sporting with sin, and making yourself merry with destruction. Ah, me! how far you have wandered! How hopeless would your case be if there were not an Almighty Shepherd to think upon you.

II. Now we come to the second point, and observe the

ONE OBJECT OF SEARCH.

This sheep lies on the shepherd's heart, and he must at once set out to look for it. He leaves the ninety-and-nine in the wilderness, and goes after that which is lost until he find it.

Observe here that it is a definite search. The shepherd goes after the sheep, and after nothing else; and he has the one particular sheep in his mind's eye. I should have imagined, from the way in which I have seen this text handled, that Christ, the Shepherd, went down into the wilderness to catch anybody's sheep He could find. Many were running about, and He did not own any one of them more than another, but was content to pick up the one that He could first lay hold upon; or rather, that which first came running after Him. Not so is the case depicted in the parable. It is His own sheep that He is seeking, and He goes distinctly after that one.

Jesus knows all about His redeemed, and He goes definitely after such and such a soul. When I am preaching in the name of the Lord, I delight to think that I am sent to individuals with the message of mercy. I am not going to draw the bow at a venture at all; but when the divine hands are put on mine to draw the bow, the Lord takes such aim that no arrow misses its mark; into the very centre of the heart the word finds its way; for Jesus goes not forth at a peradventure in His dealings with men. He subdues the will and conquers the heart, making His people willing in the day of His power.

Note that this is

AN ALL-ABSORBING SEARCH.

He is thinking of nothing but His own lost sheep. The ninety-and-nine are left in safety; but they are left. When we read that he leaves them in the wilderness we are apt to think of some barren place; but that is not intended; it simply means the open pasturage, the steppe, the prairie; He leaves them well provided for, leaves them because He can leave them. For the time being He is carried away with the one thought that He must seek and save the lost one, and therefore He leaves the ninety-and-nine in their pasture. "Shepherd, the way is very rocky!" He does not seem to know what the way is, His heart is with His lost sheep. "Shepherd, it is a heavy climb up yon mountain side." He does not note His toil; His excitement lends Him the feet of the wild goat; He stands securely where at other times His foot would slip. He looks around for His sheep and seems to see neither crag nor chasm. It is grand to think of the Lord Jesus Christ with His heart set immovably upon the rescue of a soul which at this moment is lost to Him.

It is an active search too; for observe, He goes after that which is lost, until He find it; and He does this with

A PERSONAL SEARCH.

He does not say to one of His underlings, "Here, hasten after that sheep which was lost, and bring it home." No, He follows it Himself. And if ever there is a soul brought from sin to grace, it is not by us poor ministers working alone, but it is by the Master Himself, who goes after His own sheep. It is glorious to think of Him still personally tracking sinners, who, though they fly from Him with a desperateness of folly, yet are still pursued by Him—pursued by the Son of God, by the Eternal Lover of men—pursued by Him until He finds them.

For notice the perseverance of the search: "until he find it." He does not stop till He has done the deed. You and I ought to seek after a soul, how long? Why, until we find it; for such is the model set before us by the Master. The parable says nothing about His not finding it; no hint of failure is given; we dream not that there may be a sheep belonging to Him which He will never find. Oh, brethren, there are a great many whom you and I would never find; but, when Jesus is after His own lost sheep, depend upon it such is His skill, so clearly doth He see, and so effectually doth He intervene, that He will surely bring them in. A defeated Christ I cannot conceive of. It is a personal search, and a persevering search, and until He finds it. Let us praise and bless His name for this.

Observe that when the shepherd does find it, there is a little touch in the parable not often noticed—He does not appear to put it back into the fold again ; I mean, we do not find it so written, as a fact to be noted. I suppose He did so place it ultimately ; but for the time being He keeps it with Himself rather than with its fellows. The next scene is the shepherd at home, saying, "Rejoice with me ; for I have found my sheep which was lost." It looks as if Jesus did not save a soul so much to the Church as to Himself, and though the saved are in the flock, the greatest joy of all is that the sheep is with the shepherd.

III. Now, we must pass on very briefly to notice a third point. We have had one subject of thought and one object of search ; now we have

ONE BURDEN OF LOVE.

When the seeking is ended, then the saving appears—"When He hath found it, He layeth it on His shoulders, rejoicing." Splendid action this ! How beautifully the parable sets forth the whole of salvation. Some of the old writers delight to put it thus : in His incarnation he came after the lost sheep ; in His life He continued to seek it ; in His death He laid it upon His shoulders ; in His resurrection He bore it on its way, and in His ascension He brought it home rejoicing. Our Lord's career is a course of soul-winning, a life laid out for His people ; and in it you may trace the whole process of salvation.

But now, see, the shepherd finds the sheep, and He layeth it on His shoulders. It is an uplifting action, raising the fallen one from the earth whereon he hath strayed. This laying on the shoulders was an appropriating act. He seemed to say, "You are my sheep, and therefore I lay you on my shoulders." More condescending still is another view of this act ; it was a deed of service to the sheep. The sheep is uppermost, the weight of the sheep is upon the shepherd. The sheep rides, the shepherd is the burden-bearer. The sheep rests, the shepherd labors. "I am among you as He that serveth," said our Lord long ago. It was a rest-giving act very likely needful to the sheep which could go no further, and was faint and weary. It was a full rest to the poor creature if it could have understood it, to feel itself upon its shepherd's shoulders, irresistibly carried back to safety. What a rest it is to you and to me to know that we are borne along by the eternal power and Godhead of the Lord Jesus Christ ! "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him, and he shall dwell between His shoulders." The Christ upbears us to-day ; we have no need of strength ; our weakness is no impediment, for He bears us. Blessed rest of faith, to give yourself up entirely to those hands and shoulders to keep and carry you even to the end !

IV. We close by noticing one more matter, which is—the

ONE SOURCE OF JOY.

This man who had lost his sheep is filled with joy, but his sheep is the sole source of it. His sheep has so taken up all his thought, and so commanded all his faculties, that as he found all his care centred upon it, so he now finds all his joy flowing from it.

I invite you to notice the first mention of joy we get here : "When He hath found it, He layeth it on His shoulders, rejoicing." "That is a great load for you, shepherd !" Joyfully He answers, "I am glad to have it on my shoulders." The mother does not say when she has found her lost child, "This is a heavy load." No ; she presses it to her bosom. She does not mind how heavy it is ; it is a dear burden to her. She is rejoiced to bear it once again. "He layeth it on His shoulders, rejoicing." Remember that text : "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame.' A great sorrow was on Christ when our load was laid on Him ; but a greater joy flashed into His mind when He thought that we were thus recovered from our lost estate.

Oh, you cannot understand it except in a very feeble measure ! Let us try to find an earthly miniature likeness. A son is taken ill far away from home. He is laid sick with a fever, and a telegram is sent home. His mother says she must go and nurse him ; she is wretched till she can set out upon the journey. It is a dreary place where her boy lies, but for the moment it is the dearest spot on earth to her. She joys to leave the comforts of her home to tarry among strangers for the love of her boy. She feels an intense joy in sacrificing herself ; she refuses to retire from the bedside, she will not leave her charge ; she watches day and night, and only from utter exhaustion does she fall asleep. You could not have kept her at home, she would have been too wretched. It was a great, deep, solemn pleasure for her to be where she could minister to her own beloved. Soul, remember you have given Jesus great joy in His saving you. That day the shepherd knew but one joy. He had found his sheep, and the very pressure of it upon his shoulders made his heart light, for he knew by that sign that the object of his care was safe beyond all question. Now and this joy of his was then so great that it filled his soul to overflowing. The parable speaks nothing as to his joy in getting home again, nor a word concerning the joy of being saluted by his friends and neighbors. No, the joy of having found his sheep eclipsed all other gladness of heart, and dimmed the light of home and friendship. He turns round to friends and neighbors and entreats them to help him to bear the weight of his happiness. He cries, "Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost." One sinner had repented, and all heaven must make holiday concerning it.

But the text tells us there was more joy over that one lost sheep than over the ninety-and-nine that went not astray.

WHO ARE THESE JUST PERSONS

that need no repentance? Well, you should never explain a parable so as to make it run on four legs if it was only meant to go on two. There may not be such persons at all, and yet the parable may be strictly accurate. If all of us had been such persons, and had never needed repentance, we should not have given as much joy to the heart of Christ as one sinner does when he repents. But suppose it to mean you and me who have long ago repented—who have in a certain sense, now no need of repentance, because we are justified men and women—we do not give so much joy to the heart of God, for the time being, as a sinner does when he first returns unto God.

It is not that it is a good thing to go astray, or a bad thing to be kept from it. You understand how that is ; there are seven children in a family, and six of them are all well ; but one dear child is taken seriously ill, and is brought near to the gates of death. It has recovered, its life is spared, and do you wonder that for the time being it gives more than all the healthy ones? There is more expressed delight about it a great deal than over all those that have not been ill at all. This does not show it is a good thing to be ill. No, nothing of the kind ; we are only speaking of the joy which comes of recovery from sickness.

Take another case : you have a son who has been long away in a far country, and another son at home. You love them both equally, but when the absent son comes home he is for a season most upon your thoughts. Is it not natural that it should be so? Those at home give us joy constantly from day to day, but when the stream of joy has been dammed back by his absence, it pours down in a flood upon his return. Then we have "high days and holy days," and "bonfire nights."

Moreover, you know that the joy over penitents is so unselfish that you who have been kept by the grace of God for many years do not grieve that there should be more joy over a repenting sinner than over you. No, you say to yourself, "There is good cause. I am myself among those who are glad." You remember that good men made great rejoicing over you when you first came to Jesus ; and you heartily unite with them in welcoming newcomers.

Oh, poor sinner, here to-day, will you not

YIELD TO THE GOOD SHEPHERD?

Will you not stand still as He draws near? Will you not submit to His mighty grace? Know that your rescue from sin and death must be of Him, and of Him alone. Breathe a prayer to Him—"Come, Lord, I wait for Thy salvation ! Save me, for I trust in Thee." If thou dost thus pray, thou hast the mark upon thee of Christ's sheep, for He saith, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." Come to Him, for He comes to you. Look to Him for He looks to you.

THE work of evicting a few poor Irish families from their dwellings for the non-payment of rent has cost the British Government the fine gunboat, a picture of which appears on the next page. It appears that on the little island of Instrahad, situated at the mouth of Lough Foyle, there are a number of people who have failed to pay their rents. The landowner secured eviction warrants against them, and the sheriff and his assistants were directed to evict the families. The Government has kept for some time the gunboat Wasp on special service on the north-west coast of Ireland, and her commander was ordered to go to Moville, and there take on board the sheriff and his men, whom he was to carry to Instrahad.

It could scarcely have been a congenial service to the captain, Lieutenant-Commander Nicholls. Last year he had proved his humanity and sympathy with the wretched people by making extraordinary exertions on their behalf. The Society of Friends, compassionating the poor, raised a fund to supply them with seed-potatoes, and Commander Nicholls obtained permission from the Government to distribute these potatoes to the needy families along the coast. It was a dangerous duty, for the coast is not only rocky, but the deep water around covers numerous sunken rocks, the terror of sailors. It was also a disagreeable duty, the task of loading and unloading the vessel being an exceedingly dirty duty. Nevertheless, the commander and his crew worked so cheerfully and with so much alacrity, as to call forth from the Quaker committee a written testimonial expressing their obligations to the captain and their sense of the kindness and courtesy he and his men had displayed.

On September 22d, however, the Wasp was engaged on a very different service, but a sailor is bound to obey orders, however uncongenial they may be to him. The vessel was at Westport when the orders came to go round to Moville and take up the evicting party for Instrahad. The weather was stormy, but Captain Nicholls promptly obeyed. The Wasp left Westport on September 21st, and followed the north coast of Donegal, which is wild and rugged and studded with numerous little islands, of which Tory Island is the most important.

Tory Island is two miles and a half long and one mile wide, and has a lighthouse on the north-west extremity. The north side presents a range of cliffs from one hundred feet to three hundred feet high. A fog hung over the island as the Wasp approached it, but the light was clearly made out. Captain Nicholls remained on deck during the greater part of the voyage, but early on the morning of September 22d, he gave the man at the wheel directions for steering and went below. Soon afterward the man at the wheel noticed that the vessel was drifting rapidly to leeward, and sent to the captain to suggest that the course be changed or she would strike the northern point of the island. The commander is said to have replied that if the vessel was keeping the course he had marked out on the chart that would prove quite safe. Soon afterward the gunboat struck, and in less than twenty minutes went down in thirteen fathoms of water. Only six men were saved of the fifty-eight on board. They were the cook, quartermaster, two marines, and two seamen. They state that no efforts of their own could have saved them if they had not been washed ashore. At the time there was a heavy sea on, with a thick, blinding rain, but nothing like a gale blowing. Most of the men were in their hammocks when the ship struck, and to that fact is attributed the large loss of life which occurred. Those who were saved climbed into the rigging when the ship struck, and were projected toward the shore when the vessel lurched over before going down. They were washed on shore and were cared for in the lighthouse. A steamer was sent promptly to the scene of the disaster, but was unable to rescue any lives.

"DOES IT LAST?"

THE question is often being asked in Great Britain as in our own land in reference to special evangelist efforts, "Will this revival of religious enthusiasm last?" The following testimony from Plymouth, England, one of the cities visited two years ago by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, replies to the question so far as that place is concerned:

Among the fruits of the late mission of God's honored servants, Messrs. Moody and Sankey, to this country may be included the evangelistic services at St. Andrew's Hall, Plymouth.

The meetings are attended almost entirely by those who frequent no place of worship, and who are attracted by the singing of Mr. Sankey's hymns outside the hall.

The services are strictly undenominational and have been carried on without any break for nearly two years with abundant blessing, and very many have, we trust, been "born again." It has rarely happened that a meeting has been held without some one soul professing to be converted. It has also become the sphere of Christian work for many of those who date their conversion from the Moody and Sankey Mission. A band of workers called

THE "BLISSFUL BROTHERS"

—Mr. Bliss having been much blessed in calling many of them from the bondage of drunkenness and vice into the glorious liberty of children of God—have rendered much assistance in gathering in the people from the streets.

We regard this work in Plymouth as a very distinct answer to the question so often asked by those who have not been intimately associated with the Moody and Sankey Mission, "Does it last?"

MARION'S VISIT TO HER MOTHER'S PENSIONERS.

"Is there anything I can do for you, mother?" said Marion Lee, as she sat by her mother's bedside, near which was the little table covered with medicine bottles and untasted delicacies indicating the presence of illness.

"No, my daughter," said a feeble voice from the bed. "Nurse has cared for me nicely. I am as comfortable as I can be while this pain continues. There is one thing I would like you to do but it is not here. I have been troubled all night about my poor old women in your father's house in South Street. It is three weeks now since I was there. I should feel relieved if you would go and see them and read a chapter to them. I am sure they must miss my visits; I have been so regular until now."

"But, mother, I could not take your place there. I should not know what to say to them."

"I wish you did, Marion. I have prayed day and night for you these twenty years—ever since you were born—that you might have that knowledge of the Saviour. But still I should like you to go; some of them are too old to see to read and the others understand better when some one reads to them. You need not say much; talk to them as you would to your class in the Sunday-school. You cannot be too simple."

"Certainly, I will go, mother, if you wish it. It is very little for me to do to ease your mind."

Soon afterward, Miss Lee, with her Bible in her hand, was on the car on her way to the poor quarter in which her mother's pensioners lived, and in which Marion had not set foot since ten or twelve years before as a little girl she had accompanied her mother on one of her ministering visits. It had required an effort now to comply with her mother's request, for Marion was conscious of her unfitness for the task. Although well read in the Bible, a Sunday-school teacher and a child of many prayers she did not yet know Jesus as her Saviour. The theory of salvation she knew perfectly; she could tell whether a preacher was orthodox, and knew exactly where to find the passages which were relied upon as proofs of particular doctrines, but of Christ's preciousness as her own Saviour she knew nothing. She had led a life singularly free from open wickedness, had from her childhood an intense abhorrence of falsehood and deceit, and was transparently pure in thought, word and deed. In short, she was "very near to the Kingdom of God." Possibly if she had been guilty of heinous sins, the knowledge which she possessed of divine things, might have led to her being borne into the Kingdom, but she had not felt her need of a Saviour, and therefore had not sought Him with the diligence, with which the sin-burdened soul often seeks for reconciliation with God. She could and did in her Sunday-school class speak eloquently of Christ's love, of His suffering for the world, and of the way of salvation through Him; but the experienced Christian listening to her words would have missed that tone of personal attachment—the all-mastering love, which Christ's own people, whom He has saved, involuntarily use when speaking of their dear Lord. Marion knew that her heart had not been touched, and while she was willing to teach young children in the Sunday-school she shrank from speaking to aged Christians whose hearts were given to Christ though their minds were uncultivated. Nevertheless, at her mother's desire, she went to the poor eastside tenement house.

The house had once been an aristocratic mansion, but now the tide of movement uptown had left it to be let off in portions to the poor, and there Mrs. Lee had established at different times several aged widows whose rent she duly paid from her own pocket to her husband's agent. The poor women gave a warm welcome to Marion when they knew who she was, and listened with concern to her account of her mother's illness. Then she offered to read to them and they gathered around to listen.

It was the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah that Marion read. That was the subject of the lesson the previous Sunday in the Sunday-school and she had studied it carefully. She had a soft, sweet voice and a wonderfully clear, distinct enunciation. An old fisherman, who lived on the floor above, and knew the old women well, stopped to listen as he passed their door on his way out, and being attracted by the words and the musical voice in which they were spoken, entered, and sitting down quietly, made one of the little congregation.

Marion made little comments as she read, explaining how the Jews were expecting a royal deliverer when Christ came, and they rejected Him because He came in a guise so humble. That His very sufferings borne for the people were regarded as a reproach, and as indicating God's displeasure with Him. It was an intelligent exposition; but, as she made it, one of the old women who sat opposite to her fixed upon her a penetrating gaze from two shrewd dark eyes. As Marion concluded the old woman said:

"Thank you, Miss, for your kindness in making it all so clear to us. I'll pray that you may know the blessed truth yourself."

Marion colored deeply. Was it possible, she thought, that even this old woman could see that her religion was mere head-knowledge—theory and not vital belief?

"You have not had many griefs or sorrows yet, I guess," the old woman continued, "but when they come you will find every word you've said is true. The Lord has borne 'em all. I'm old now and I've had a long life of trouble, but I'm happy now, for I'm trusting Him, and shall see Him soon. You don't look as if you had done much wrong; you have an innocent face, but you need the Lord to show you what is in your heart, for temptations will come even to the best, and it's hard fighting 'em when your heart is on the side of the tempter. You know, as I didn't when I was your age, that we are healed through the Lord's stripes. I hope if you are wounded you will go to Him for healing. He'll do it as no one else can. God bless you, Miss, and may you forgive an old woman's bluntness. I wish I had met your dear mother earlier, I'd have been saved from many a sin."

Marion's Exposition of the Gospel Message.

The old fisherman, all this time, had sat silently with his eyes closed, but now he rose and taking Marion's hand he said, "you are very near to God, my daughter," but sometimes it's hardest for those who are nearest to come to Him. The Saviour said it was like a camel getting through a needle's eye, but take an old man's word for it, it's worth the struggle." He looked down at her with strange fondness and added, "Such a life as yours ought to be the Lord's from the beginning. I am older than your father, and I am an ignorant man, but the Lord has enlightened my heart. Will you let me pray with you before you go?"

Marion bowed her head: her heart was too full to speak. They all knelt down while the unlettered fisherman pleaded with God that His Holy Spirit would fill every heart there, and especially the one which seemed to be so well fitted for His temple, yet "lacking one thing."

It was an earnest prayer, and when they rose from their knees Marion's eyes were full of tears. She silently grasped the hand of each and hurried away. She went straight to her own room and there knelt in earnest prayer such as she had never offered before.

Years have passed since that day. Marion's mother is dead, but she did not pass away until she had rejoiced over her daughter's conversion. Her place is filled by Marion, and there is no place in which she is so welcome as in that where she received a blessing when she went to impart one.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Unexpected Meeting.

When Rose Morley heard of her husband's dangerous illness, she implored Hester to suffer her to see him at once, lest he should die without forgiving her. But his malady was more of the mind than the body, and Grant forbade any kind of agitation for him. John Morley's brain was at work with too busy and too perilous an activity. He was neither insensible nor delirious; but from hour to hour his thoughts were flashing, with lightning speed, over all the events of his past life; and his tongue, so long reticent, read aloud the secret records.

To speak to him of Rose, in this strange fire and fever of his memory, would have been madness. The only persons he admitted near to him were Hester and Lawson; and to them his tongue ran on fast of all his love to her, and of all the torture of despair and shame he had suffered for her. Her name was always upon his lips. There was something of a solemn humiliation in this spectacle of a soul, forced at last to make itself known to some other human soul.

It was difficult to Hester to turn from her father to Rose with gentleness. She began to question whether the sin the unfaithful wife had committed did not shut her out from all claim to her husband's pardon. When Rose demanded an entrance she replied by telling her all that her father had said. Until that moment Rose had not felt the fulness of the wrong she had inflicted upon a nature like John Morley's. She could scarcely hope any more; but she would minister to him afar off, and Hester, sorry for her in her heart, gave her permission to help in the additional labor of the house.

The servant was gone to bed, and Rose was sitting up by the kitchen fire, waiting to let in Grant, when Robert Waldron's low knock reached her ear. She was scarcely afraid of being recognized now; especially in the dim light kept burning in the entrance. Yet she crept slowly and tremblingly to the door, and paused with her fingers upon the handle before turning it.

For a minute or two Rose Morley and Robert Waldron stood face to face in silence, feeling as if they had met in another world. Yet it was the old place, the door she had opened to him so often, the threshold he had crossed with guilty feet. There was the difference only 'twixt now and then; but the wofulness of the change was in Rose. He stood there, still handsome, almost young, with the air and mien of a man with whom all the world was pleased; and she confronted him, motionless, nearly lifeless, a faded, withered woman, bowed down with the world's censure.

"Hush!" she whispered, in a guilty tone, and with a gesture of silence, such as she might have used in the former days, "he is sleeping perhaps. Follow me softly. There is nobody to see you."

He would have given worlds to escape from this interview, yet he had no power to resist. He followed her reluctantly, watching her now with keen eyes, which would not allow him to pass over any change in her.

Where could she be taking him? He climbed a steep staircase after her, and the light fell upon the swarthy leaves of ivy about the door; and then he remembered the melancholy little room opposite Hester's window, which had once oppressed and fascinated his attention.

This refuge was a mere, bare, comfortless cell in his eyes. The poor pieces of furniture, provided by Hester with so much difficulty, looked mean and scanty. The two chairs, the table, the pallet-bed, a book or two upon the narrow window-sill, a basket of work—this was all the room contained. The walls were dark with smoke, and the low roof was not ceiled. There was not a loft over the stables at Aston Court which was not better fitted for a human dwelling than this. Yet this was the poor shelter to which Rose Morley had been brought—by him.

He had not spoken yet; he could not speak. Could this monstrous dream be by any chance a reality? His conscience also was so diligently at work among the records of the past, turning back to old leaves which had long since been pressed down, that he was unconscious of his own dumbness before this awful apparition of his first love. If she had kept silence, he would have sat mute for hours, gazing at her in blank bewilderment.

"You have found me out," she murmured at last, in a voice of fear, "and there is no help for me but to throw myself upon your mercy. Do not drive me from here; do not betray me. Nobody knows I am here, except Hester and Carl Bramwell. If you ever had any love for me, leave me here in peace."

"Here!" he repeated, casting round the place a glance of disgust.

"Yes, here," she added, vehemently. "Why, it is a hundred times better than the place to which I might have fallen through you. Do you know who has saved me and gives me now this refuge? It is Hester. But for the remembrance of her, the good little child I had forsaken, I might have fallen lower than I did. I owe all to Hester, my little Hetty."

Her voice, broken and trembling, fell into sobs, until she could speak no more. The name of Hester brought Robert back to the present, and his deep, absorbing love for her, so widely different to his fitful and poisoned passion for Rose. What influence had her presence there upon Hester with regard to him?

"How long have you been here?" he asked, in lowered tones, as if afraid of being overheard. "I have sought for you everywhere. I could not endure to think of you in poverty, without a home and without friends. Why did you never let me know where you were? It was cruel to me."

Still thinking of himself, as such scoundrels always do, he asked this last question in a tone of so much tenderness, that Rose trembled and flushed a little. A last gleam of the vanity of girlish days flashed across her saddened heart.

"Why have you never married, Robert?" she asked. "I could have been happier and more contented if you had been married. Have you never loved any one—" but me? she would have added, but her lips only moved, no sound came through them.

"Yes," he answered, briefly; "I have loved."

"And would she not marry you?" asked Rose, as soon as the spark of jealousy which his words had kindled had died away. "Is it possible that any woman could say No to you?"

"I love Hester," he said again, with the short, sharp utterance of one in great anguish of mind.

"Hester!" she echoed, "Hester!"

She could say no more; but she sat silent for a few minutes, thinking of what might have been had she but resisted temptation eleven years before. She saw herself John Morley's honored and happy wife, the wife of a prosperous and happy man, the mother of Hester, about to become the mistress of Aston Court. A phantasmagoria of brilliant scenes, in which she played a prominent part, flashed before her mental vision and she realized, as so many sinners ultimately do, that she was not only a sinner but a fool. She had not heeded the warning, "He that sinneth wrongeth his own soul" (Prov. 8 : 36). Now she knew that she had bartered for sin and misery a life well suited to her, that might have been hers, if she had not chosen her own lot.

"Oh, Robert!" she cried. "What can be done?"

"Nothing!" he said, in an accent of bitterness and despair; "nothing! I know now that Hester could no more love me than an angel could come down from heaven to me. How could she, having you before her eyes?"

He had almost told her that his chief hope had been to discover that she was dead, but he stopped himself in time. It was not in his nature to hate her, as some men hate the woman they have fancied they loved. He was sorry for her, but with his characteristic selfishness he was still more sorry for himself.

"Robert," said Rose, "we neither of us knew what we were doing, when we sinned against a man like John Morley. It has been well-nigh the death of his soul, as well as mine. But I think now, I am a better woman than I was then. Look away from me, look away from me. I wish to tell you what I think God has done for me, and I cannot bear your eyes to look into mine while I speak of Him."

She was silent again for a moment or two, sitting before him, with bended head and closed eyelids, as if searching into her own soul with a keen and unsparing scrutiny. His eyes were riveted upon her in spite of her appeal. A feeble smile played once more about her pale lips, and her eyebrows expanded as if some pleasant thought had come to her amid all the pitiless shame and trouble of her interview with him. She was once more something like the Rose he had known.

"I believe," she said, softly and solemnly, "that He has forgiven my sin, for the sake of His Son. I believe that when the woman who was a sinner stood at the feet of Jesus, weeping and washing His feet with her tears, He saw me there; and it was of me, as well as of her, He said, 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven.' I believe that."

She raised her eyes to him, with a serene and hopeful light in their blue depths. Yet even as he dared to look into them for a moment, the tears came across them and dimmed them.

"But my husband," she said, "does not forgive me. He has treasured up all our sins, and now he is counting them over one by one, while he is perhaps dying. Do you know that he recollects each day as if it were only a week ago, and he keeps on saying, 'On such a morning he came here, and I heard Rose singing to him in the drawing-room;' or 'Such a night I found him here when I came home from chapel.' Oh, it is horrible! He must hate us with a terrible hatred. If he should be lost, it is you and I who have brought his soul to ruin."

"No, no. He is a good man," muttered Robert.

"He was a good man," she continued mournfully. "He was so good himself that he thought no evil of you or me, though he took so much notice of all we did. But all these years our crime has come between him and God. Do you suppose he would not have rejoiced in your death or mine? They say he was almost guilty of murder. And now he is going to die!"

"He is not going to die, my poor Rose," said Robert.

"I wish I tould die for him!" she exclaimed. "I should not be sorry to die. It would be well for me to be out of the world altogether."

There was a passion of mournful pathos in her words, and Robert Waldron could have cast himself at her feet, and hiding his face in her lap, have given way to an agony of grief and repentance. It was true that he had not known till now what he had done. Till this moment he had not seen the blackness of his transgression. At times when he had been himself low-spirited, or when the even tenor of his comfort and well-being had been infringed, he had experienced what he had been pleased to call repentance. But it was now, looking at Rose and thinking of John Morley counting over his wrongs perhaps in the very hour of death, that his real remorse began. Two lives—Those of Rose and John Morley had been turned into gall and bitterness by his wrongdoing, and even Hester, whom he loved more than all, had by that same sin missed the sunshine and happiness which were the heritage of other children. Robert Waldron saw all around him misery and suffering as the fruit of his sin. He hated it, he loathed it and himself, but he could never recall it nor could years of regret and remorse undo what he had done. There was no place of repentance though he might seek it carefully and with tears. He groaned as he realized this and there stole a subtle and fine sense of his speechless anguish over Rose.

"I thought never to let you know," she said, "but now I see you again—it must be for the last time—I cannot help telling you. I have a child."

"A child!" he repeated.

"Yes," she said, believing she was giving him the only consolation in her power. "You shall see her some day. I thought you should never, never know; but perhaps it would be wrong to keep her all to myself. She thinks her father is dead and in heaven; you must never tell her different. She is about as old as Hester was when I was married. You remember little Hetty?"

Remember her! He had done nothing else these months past. There was no consolation or relief in the thought of their child to him as there was to Rose; it only deepened the heavy cloud which hung over him.

"I have called her Hester," said Rose, after a pause, for he had not answered her last question. Robert bowed his face upon his hands and groaned. This then was the Hester who was to belong to him—his own child, who was never to know him as her father. But for Hester Morley, grave and gentle and sweet, with all the simple grace which satisfied his taste, the guileless and saintly soul which would have helped him to save his own unstable soul—this Hester was lost to him forever by an irrevocable forfeit.

"My punishment is greater than I can bear," he cried, bitterly.

"No," she said, "your punishment is not so great as mine. Think of it. You are rich and honored, and no one casts a stone at you; while I am a beggar at my husband's door, and he does not know that I am fed by his hand. If he knew, he would fling me as a worthless thing into the street, where every one who passed by would revile me. Yet I think our sin was equal. But I don't know. No: it was more evil in me than in you. Let my punishment remain. I deserve it all."

Robert Waldron scarcely heard her. The sound of her words passed through his brain without making any impression there. This woman beside him, who had laid her thin chilly fingers upon his hand, had but a small share in his thoughts. He could no longer endure her presence. He must be alone to taste, drop by drop, the dregs of the bitter cup which he had first tasted hastily in his youth. He rose abruptly and said that he must leave her.

"It is the last time you will ever see me," said Rose, calmly.

"No," he answered; "we must see one another again."

"You do not know what you say," she added. "There is peril in this house for you and for me. It will never happen again that we can meet as we have done now."

She had opened the door, and was holding the light while he prepared to descend the crazy staircase, so shading it with her hand that the rays fell upon him and the steps he had to tread upon, while her own face was in shadow. She glanced round the sombre court for an instant. A light shone in Hester's window opposite, and the face of Lawson pressed eagerly against the panes, watching Robert making his slow and cautious descent. But he had not seen her yet.

THE TEMPLE DEDICATED.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 2, 1 Kings 8. Golden Text, ver. 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Great National Convention—A Legal Religious Holiday—The Ark Within the Temple—The Visible Story—The King Blesses the People — His Self-Abnegation — Solomon's Question — Faith Necessary — Great Things Asked—Seven Distinct Petitions—Judgment Implies Sin—Pardon Implies Confession—The First Causes Forgotten — The Answered Prayer.

PREVIOUS to his dedication of the temple, Solomon brought up the ark of the covenant of the Lord and placed it there in the Holy of holies. And the king made this a great day in Israel. We are accustomed in these days to see thousands of people gathered together for cricket matches and athletic sports, but alas, it is not the custom now to make an high day and a holy day to the glory of our God ; in the world man takes precedence of God. Solomon, the wisest man who ever lived, did not count it foolishness to gather together "all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel," to bring up the ark of the Lord. Solomon did not look upon his religion as a respectable adjunct to his political life, but in the early part of his reign he acted only as God's representative. The Lord hasten the time when rulers shall govern for Him again.

No sooner was the ark set in its true place than "the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud : for had filled the house of the Lord." The ark was a visible witness to Israel of God's dwelling in His temple, and among His people. When our bodies are set apart, or sanctified to their true purpose, "the temple of the Holy Ghost," "an habitation of God through the Spirit"—then Jesus Himself comes in to dwell, and the cloud of His blessed presence eclipses all else, Jesus is manifest, the priests (Rev. 1 : 6), cannot minister for the High Priest is there. The presence of God came in a cloud. However much our loving, gracious God may fill His temple, there is always more and more of Him to know ; when we see Him, there is "no similitude" and yet He is there. When the ark was set up, and the temple filled with God, then Solomon the king "turned his face about, and blessed all the congregation of Israel." It was the office of the priests and Levites to bless in the name of the Lord (Deut. 10 : 8 ; 21 : 5), but Solomon, although no priest, and although only a young man, as father of his people was led by the Holy Ghost to bless the congregation. He then recounted God's dealings with David about the building of the temple, and His choice of himself (Solomon), to do this work. In all this the young king took no glory to himself, but said, that He spake, and I am risen up in the room of David, my father, and sit on the throne of Israel, as the Lord promised, and have built an house for the Name of the Lord God of Israel." In all this the young king lays all the stress on what God has done, not on what he has done, on what God is, not on what he is.

As Solomon, not Zadok the high priest, blessed the congregation, so Solomon, and not the priests, spoke the words of dedication. He was a pliable, supple instrument in the hands of God, and the Lord used him. Solomon stood before the altar of the Lord, in token that, by virtue of the sacrifice burning there, he and the people were accepted by God, and he spread forth his hands toward heaven, in token that he received by faith from God the things which he asked. In the fulness of his heart he began by saying, "There is no God like Thee." There was no constraint about this prayer, Solomon's cup was running over. God had made him wiser than all men, and thus he stood at the head of the world's wisdom, placed there by God ; in politics, merchandise, riches and glory he stood almost unequalled. But all this was nothing compared to the fact that the mighty God of the mighty universe condescended to manifest His presence in the house which Solomon had built him ; and now on the day of dedication filled the house with His glory. None get into the very presence of God without becoming small ; Solomon broke off suddenly in wonder, "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee ; how much less this house that I have builded?" And He, this mighty God, condescends to dwell in us, to make our bodies His habitation. It is so inconceivable, and yet the Lord hath spoken it ! Well may we need faith to take in even such a thought, and how much more for

THE GLORIOUS REALITY,

"That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God !" (Eph. 3 : 17–19.)

"Yet have Thou respect unto the prayer of Thy servant." The king asked great things of God, that He would hearken that day to his prayer, and every day when prayer should be made in that place of which He had said, "My name shall be there." And also that his eyes should be open day and night toward His house. Was it too much to ask? Not of such a God ; with the heart of a father, and the hand of Omnipotence ; He loves to be inquired of. Oh when we see the teaching of Jesus full of glorious promises of answer to prayer, how is it that we ask and receive so little at His hand of power and love? "Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save ; neither His ear heavy, that it cannot hear" (Isa. 59 : 1). Solomon made on behalf of his people : one for decision in any cause between man and man, four for pardon of national sins, and deliverance from judgment sent on account of it, one for answer to the cry of a stranger, and one for the maintenance of their cause in war. Solomon's prayer might have been a national adaptation of Paul's words, "Be careful for nothing ; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 5 : 6). Solomon looked upon God as the true Umpire between man and man. How much of injustice, of partiality, of ill-temper, how much of suspiciousness—which arises from being so frequently deceived—might be averted, if the disputes between man and man were referred to God ! When the children in a family or school do wrong, and the real offender cannot be discovered, nor the real truth found out—if the parent or employer would definitely by faith put the whole thing into God's hands, and count on Him to bring all to light, He would always do it, and then no injustice would be done, and the children would have a practical lesson that God is the all-seeing God. God knows how to condemn the wicked, and justify the righteous, as none other can.

In praying for deliverance from judgment, Solomon never contemplated the possibility of judgment without previous sin, nor did he contemplate the possibility of deliverance without confession of sin. Then he prayed "hear Thou in heaven, and forgive . . . that Thou teach them the good way . . . ." He connects famine, pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, caterpillar, siege, plague or sickness with the state of heart of the man or men who are afflicted : "What prayer or supplication soever be made by any man, or by all Thy people Israel, which shall know every man and spread forth his hands toward this house ; then hear Thou in heaven Thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart Thou knowest (for Thou, even Thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men)." Solomon, the wisest of men, full of the knowledge of natural laws and of science, nevertheless recognized God as the first cause at work in famine, pestilence, war, or sickness. In our day men seem to have forgotten there is a God who speaks of these things as His sore judgments ; they are occupied with the discovery of some infallible remedy, which, though it may help in a measure to alleviate the evil, yet cannot touch its real cause which is God's controversy with His creatures. When was an epidemic ever so successfully or so rapidly dealt with as the pestilence was in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite? When was besieged city ever so delivered as was Jerusalem in the time of Hezekiah? When was sickness ever so dealt with as by Jesus, the great Physician, when He healed the multitudes, or by Peter, Acts 5, or Paul, Acts 20? If we want masterly remedies we must deal with first causes.

Solomon, in these his best days, had something of the heart of his God ; and thus he prayed, not only for his own people, but also for "the stranger that cometh out of a far country for Thy name's sake." Tenderly he prayed for the stranger who should hear of the power of the God of Israel, and should come and pray before this house, that God would hear and do all that the stranger should pray, "that all people of the earth may know Thy name, to fear Thee, as do Thy people Israel ; and that they may know that Thy name is called upon this house" (see margin). In the coming of the Queen of Sheba, chapter 10, Solomon's prayer was answered. Again, when the Ethiopian eunuch came up to Jerusalem to worship, God heard and answered this prayer. And undoubtedly these two are but samples of many strangers who met with the true God in that temple at Jerusalem. Solomon's last petition was almost prophetical of the captivity, and most truly did God answer in the revival which took place in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah.

THE FINAL WORDS

of this dedicatory prayer were these, "Now, therefore arise, O Lord God, into Thy resting-place, Thou and the ark of Thy strength. Let Thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let Thy saints rejoice in goodness. O Lord God, turn not away the face of Thine anointed ; remember the mercies of David Thy servant" (II Chron. 6 : 41, 42). It was just like saying "Arise Lord, take possession, take all the charge of this Thy house." Is our body, God's chosen house, a real resting-place for God? Is He at ease and at home there? Are all contingencies which may arise put into His hands, as King Solomon put the care of the children of Israel into His hands? It was a true consecration service—are we fully consecrated?

Solomon held a feast of rejoicing seven days, and on the eighth day he sent the people away, and they blessed the king or thanked the king. But the chief part of the whole proceeding was still lacking, the proof of a prayer is the answer, the proof of consecration is its acceptance. "When Solomon made an end of praying, the fire came down from heaven, and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices ; and the glory of the Lord filled the house. And the priests could not enter into the house of the Lord because the glory of the Lord had filled the Lord's house" (II Chron. 7 : 1, 2).

THE ANSWER HAD COME,

Solomon was accepted, his people were accepted, the temple was accepted, the sacrifices were accepted ! No wonder that all the people fell upon their faces and worshipped the Lord, saying "For He is good, for His mercy endureth forever." There is a certain sense of satisfaction even to an unsaved man when he has prayed, he feels he has done the right thing, and his conscience is easy. But oh how different this is to the abounding, overflowing joy which comes from being really heard and answered by our loving God ! The blessed fact that the Lord of the universe occupies Himself with me is such an overpowering joy and honor.

In addition to this voiceless testimony to his acceptance by fire on the altar, God also spoke to Solomon, and taking up point after point of his prayer, He gave the answer in detail, saying to every petition, "I will." I will hear, I will forgive, I will heal their land. True, all these promises were conditional on the repentance of His people ; but this was all that Solomon asked. The consecrated temple was now sanctified by God's acceptance and by His pledge that His name should be there forever, and His eyes and His heart there continually. Yet at the same time the Lord declared how, if their heart turn away that very temple should become a by-word and should be cast out of His sight. No consecration, no state of sanctification, makes us independent of God for a moment : to the very end faith and obedience will be required of us.

UNIVERSAL COOKING CROCK.— Every housekeeper who desires to excel in the art of cooking should avail herself of every utensil which will contribute to the attainment of this end. The Universal Cooking Crock, which is advertised in another column, is admirable for all kinds of cooking, and the thousands now in daily use are giving entire satisfaction. The Crock is so constructed that its contents cannot burn, and therefore does not require constant watching. Our own experience justifies us in saying that it greatly lessens the labor of cooking and combines more advantages than any culinary vessel of which we have any knowledge. Every housekeeper should procure one.

SEWING MACHINES GIVEN AWAY.—We are informed that good two-thread sewing machines, taken from private families as part payment for the Willcox & Gibbs Automatic, are being given away by the Company to needy and deserving women furnishing satisfactory references. If required to pack or repair, they charge a small sum to cover expenses. Persons desiring further particulars should write to the Willcox & Gibbs S. M. Co., 658 Broadway, New York City.

From a Review of "Songs of Praise and Prayer" in The Independent (New York), Oct. 16, 1884.

"The Rev. Dr. Richards's modestly introduced manual for Sunday-school and conference meetings, after considerable examination and use may safely be pronounced not only the best yet published, but a very close approach to the ideal manual, particularly for the Sunday-school. The hymns are numerous and good. In solidity of evangelical content, seriousness and spirituality, and in beauty, purity and finish of literary form, they are open to but little criticism, and leave almost nothing to be desired.

"The music is, for the most part, well chosen and well adapted. The great thing is that the music is selected on the right principle. It is pure, sweet, strong, and really musical. The rhythm is marked and finished. The melodies do not straggle nor rise into unpractical ranges. And the whole, instead of being something totally unlike church music, is woven of the same elements and forms a proper introduction to the service of song, in the House of the Lord. On the score of simplicity and pleasing attractiveness, and even popularity, we should say that Sunday-schools and leaders need look no further."

A specimen copy of this book, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent to any address, postpaid, on receipt of 60 cents.

THE DOVE OF PEACE.

A GEM OF BEAUTY. An Exquisitely Engraved and Colored Dove floating on the wing, up a deep, blue sky, which forms the background, and with every feather so carefully drawn as almost to deceive into the belief that it is A THING OF LIFE. Upon this background, in choice lettering is the text, "PEACE I GIVE UNTO YOU" etc. Upon the coming light of the morning dawn which brightens up the ground of the picture, in similar letters, is the text, "THE PEACE OF GOD WHICH PASSETH ALL UNDERSTANDING," the whole forming a perfect gem of art. Like all fine works its value consists not in its size 9x10, but in its beauty of detail, and it possesses the great advantage of needing no frame being printed with a gold border upon a heavy card plate, so that it can be placed upon the table or mantel if preferred. If you want a choice ornament for your home, or a remembrance to a friend, especially to one in sickness or trouble, it cannot be equalled, either in beauty or price. REMEMBER IT CAN BE FRAMED OR NOT AS YOU PLEASE. Safely packed, we send it postage paid on receipt of Twenty-Five Cents.

THE social problem is one of the most perplexing, as well as the most dangerous, of all problems. It is not difficult to convince the poor that the good things of this world are very unequally distributed, especially when that happens to be the exact truth. The poor laborer who by his toil, continued from early morning until late at night, can earn barely sufficient to buy food and clothing and pay the rent of the miserable shelter he calls "home," is not likely to see with equanimity men living in luxury possessed of a larger income than they can spend. He wonders why he must see his wife and children pine for lack of necessaries while other men have their hundred million dollars and are greedily adding to the store day by day. It needs only that the millionnaire should oppress the poor for the discontent to become fierce resentment, and the harassed, overburdened toiler is ready to become a disciple of any agitator who will show him the way to have the wealth of the world redistributed. So we have socialistic and the members of which are striving, peaceably as yet, but with a dim consciousness that violence may have to be employed, to cure the anomalies of social position.

In no country have these communistic societies flourished more vigorously than in France. Nowhere have the lower classes been more ready to take up arms to achieve Liberty, Equality, Fraternity or Death. In 1789 it was hunger and misery, endured in sight of arrogance and luxury, that maddened the people and nerved their hands to rear the guillotine. France had driven out some of the Huguenots and massacred those whom she had failed to drive out. The only influence which preserved society—the influence of pure religion—she eliminated. In its place she retained superstition, a very caricature and burlesque of religion, a form out of which the spirit had long departed. In this the people had no faith; they spurned it with contempt, and denying that there was any God, they were ready for deeds of lawlessness. The world shudders now as it thinks of the torrents of blood which deluged the streets of Paris, of the old men and maidens, the refined and the cultured, hurried to a violent death. If there had been no St. Bartholomew there had been no guillotine.

In 1871 the spirit of lawlessness again broke forth, and Paris seemed like the abode of fiends rather than of men.

was applied to her fairest buildings, and some of the noblest of her citizens were massacred in cold blood. It was to these mad desperadoes, these reckless, murderous communists, that a plain, unpretending man went, in the year 1871, in the hour of their humiliation, to preach the Gospel of the Prince of Peace. He had no scheme to propound to them for the rectification of social anomalies; he had no new political nostrum to recommend to them for the acquisition of political power; he simply preached Christ, the poor man's Friend, the Saviour of the lost, the Light and Hope of the world. For thirteen years he has lived among them, quietly laboring, firm in his confidence that the power and spirit of Christ would transform the wild and lawless murderers into men clothed and in their right mind. He has not been disappointed. Huge as were the obstacles in his path, he has triumphed beyond all expectation. God has blessed his efforts, and to-day he rejoices in the knowledge that many a man whose heart was full of hatred and murder, is now, through the power of the Gospel, a child-like follower of the Son of Man.

Mr. Robert Whitaker McAll, whose portrait appears on the first page, is the son of the late Rev. Robert Stephen McAll, LL.D., who was in his day a prominent Congregational clergyman in Manchester, England. Those who remember Dr. McAll speak of his marvellous pulpit power and of the ease with which he could thrill an audience and melt to tears the most hardened of his hearers. His son, the subject of this sketch, inherits much of his father's eloquence and all of his noble faith and indomitable courage and energy. He was born in Manchester in 1827, and is now fifty-seven years of age. He was converted in early life, and in the year 1846 he entered college to prepare himself for

THE WORK OF THE MINISTRY.

For more than twenty years he labored in several large cities successively as a Congregational minister. Wherever he went his ministry was of an aggressive type. He was never content with preaching to ordinary church-goers, but was always endeavoring to reach the poor and those who were out of the way. The writer was once visiting an English cathedral city, where religion is of the most dignified and respectable type, and was astonished to see a large crowd gathered one Sunday afternoon at the corner of its most disreputable street. He heard singing, and, crossing over to see the cause of the unwonted gathering, heard a preacher relating incidents and parables in a most dramatic manner, while "the unwashed" listened breathlessly to his words. Every incident was pointed with a shrewd, penetrating lesson, and the attention of the motley throng was held to the last. An inquiry elicited the information that the preacher was Mr. McAll, who was preaching that day for a brother clergyman in the city, and was thus occupying the brief interval between the services. The aristocratic congregation which listened to him morning and evening heard him with as great delight as did the crowd of miserable poverty-stricken creatures who hung upon his lips at that street corner.

ORIGIN OF THE PARIS MISSION.

In August, 1871, Mr. McAll, worn down by protracted labor, was obliged to seek rest and recuperation. He went to France, which was then emerging from the shadow of the desolating war into which her Emperor had plunged her by his mad attack upon Prussia. After the war had come the excesses of the commune, when murder and fire and riot had made a pandemonium of Paris. Mr. McAll went to Paris, and, being unable in the intense love for men which filled his heart, to spend his time in pleasure and sight-seeing, he went day by day into the poorest quarters, distributing tracts and portions of Scripture in the restaurants and wine-shops and wherever the people could be found. Opportunities for conversation were frequent. The people were so intensely miserable that the kind-hearted stranger who spoke of happiness, peace and a loving Father in heaven found listeners who gave him hearty welcome to their homes. They heard of his approaching departure with sorrow, and eagerly begged him to prolong his sojourn in the city. He stayed on, and finally, finding the work opening before him, returned to England only to resign his charge, relinquish his regular income, and leaving his friends, return to the outcasts of Paris, to whom he consecrated his future years. It was to the focus of all the worst elements of Parisian communism, that Mr. McAll and his devoted wife directed their steps. That suburb of Paris was originally outside the city walls, but now forms the north-eastern part of the city, the circle of fortifications having been so widened as to embrace it. It contains a population of about one hundred thousand. Though inhabited by the poorest classes, it is the most elevated in situation, and about the healthiest quarter of the town. The houses in general are mean, and the streets narrow. The character of the whole district for squalor and crime is so well know in Paris that even to this day the railway offici and cabmen wonder when a stranger on his a rival at the station from the north inquires th way to Belleville. It is in this place, and amon its people, that Mr. McAll for thirteen yea past has been gathering around him men an women whose hands were once red with bloo but who are now, by God's mercy, redeeme and regenerated, helping willingly in the wor of carrying the Gospel to others.

A visitor to Paris shortly after the commenc ment of Mr. McAll's work thus describes wha he saw: "Every night in several stations roomful of men and women can be found liste ing with reverent attention to the preachin and joining heartily in the hymns. The mee ings, which last one hour, are begun with sin ing. A short portion of the Bible follows, the another hymn, and an address limited to ten twelve minutes. After a third hymn and a se ond brief address, the meeting is closed wit singing, prayer, and the benediction. Th style of the addresses is very simple. Nothin difficult is attempted. Controversy is strictl prohibited, and a printed notice to that effect nailed up in the room. The desire is to wi these poor people to Christ. Therefore a plai Gospel address, with a loving invitation to th Saviour, is set before them. To this metho the astonishing progress of the mission is du It cannot be ascribed to the learning or el quence of the workers, for the majority of the are English, and, owing to their imperfe knowledge of the language, cannot venture int learned disquisitions or oratorical flights. Son of them, however, have resided long enough Paris to have acquired great facility in speakin But there is no demand for elaborate discourse The people could not bear them. They are t ignorant of their Bibles, too unintelligent f anything beyond the elementary doctrines the New Testament. The love of God, the li and work of Christ, they can all understan While these grand subjects are unfolded to the they never tire."

THE WORK HAS EXTENDED

far beyond the limits of Belleville. One app cation after another poured in upon Mr. McAl friends who saw his work furnished him wi funds, and he went on in faith, never doubtin Mr. McAll has now stations all through Franc in every large city, besides thirty stations Paris alone. He has also recently opened roo in Corsica and Algiers. His plan was to hi some empty wine-shop, thoroughly cleanse a kalsomine it, put in some benches and a lit reading-desk, and open his meetings. In so places he would have a meeting every night, others twice or thrice a week; but everywhe the meetings are crowded. Nor does the wo end with the services. The people are visit in their homes, habits of thrift and cleanlin are encouraged, and efforts are made to indu every family to buy its own Bible. Mr. Mc has now many helpers, but his own labor is diminished. He maintains a constant oversig of all the stations, and is ever ready with co sel and encouragement. Of his

he says: "Never was willingness to hear m largely evidenced in France, and especially Paris itself, than at present. Although the n elty of our simple and outwardly unattract methods of working has, of necessity, lo passed away, the past season has witnesse marked increase both in the number and se ousness of the listeners in Paris. Through the hot summer months our audiences w maintained, and even increased. And we ha felt that we address those who better understa our aim than formerly, in many of whom death-sleep of conscience has been broken upon, and a sincere desire awakened to ascert 'what is truth.'" are an evidence of the interest felt in the w by our own citizens. In the very first rep issued of the mission, when only fourte months' labor had been given to it, Mr. McAll gratefully acknowledged liberal contributions from America. Seven years later—in 1880—the subscriptions sent to Mr. McAll aggregated in that one year alone $8870. Besides this, one lady here pays one half of the expenses of one station—that in the Boulevard Voltaire. The station at Grenelle is supported entirely by the American Episcopal Church of Paris, and the American Chapel in Paris, of which Dr. E. W. Hitchcock is pastor, supports the station at Les Ternes. There is now a regular McAll Association established, with auxiliaries in all our chief cities, to collect funds for the mission. Mrs. R. B. Hayes is its President. The total contributions received from America in 1883 was $16,755. Besides pecuniary help Mr. McAll expresses his gratitude for active personal assistance rendered by American Christians visiting Paris. The total expenditure of all the mission stations last year was $51,175.

THE AMERICAN STATIONS

Thus one faithful man, laboring in the strength of the Lord, has been the means of commencing and conducting a work which has in it a better hope of redeeming France from the communistic spectre than any legislative enactments that could have been passed, or any political boons that could have been granted. The converted man is never a bad citizen.

A FEW INCIDENTS

will show the character of the work. A hard-working laborer went eagerly to Mr. McAll, saying, "I want to be taught religion. I do not understand it. I want to learn what it is." Another man, addressing a hesitant group of his neighbors at the door of one of the halls, said, "I am a Catholic; but go you in. You will hear only the Gospel there; and there is nothing to pay." One evening when the congregation was dispersing, a man pretending to be a Parisian approached full of self-assertion. After questioning a young English friend at the door, he said, "Ah, this is all very well for the workingmen; it is not the thing for me." A policeman on his beat, hearing this, addressed the Parisian thus: "Sir, it is a very good thing for everybody; it is a good thing for Belleville." (The episode is illustrated in our frontispiece picture.)

There can be no doubt that the Gospel came in between Paris and revolution in the year 1877. "Peace, be still!" has been its political message to the laborers of the French capital. By proclaiming the true "equality" of men in Christ Jesus, it has prevented the proclamation of inequality which would have simply meant plunder, bloodshed, and misrule. But it will not do to be over confident. Romanism shakes its clenched fist at liberty in every form, resolved on exasperating the Republic to deeds of bloodshed; while the latter, though exhibiting in general wonderful self-restraint, sometimes seems on the point of accepting a challenge in which would be the gathering cry. For instance, in April, 1879, a monk preached in a provincial cathedral, and in his sermon attacked lay teaching. A group immediately gathered round him in his church, and began to sing the "Marseillaise." In the midst of the confusion, a voice was heard, "Vive la Commune!" One man lighted a cigar; another shook his fist at the preacher, shouting, "Down with the priests!" An official stepped forward and urgently requested the preacher to stop. The danger of violence was imminent; but the parties seem to have retired darkly scowling at each other. (See frontispiece.)

As Mr. McAll has strenuously endeavored to convey the messages of life, printed and spoken, into all the streets and alleys of Paris, so they have reached all classes and trades—the soldier, the police, the janitor, the ash-barrel-picker, and street-sweeper. The have not been overlooked. Amid the rush of the ever-pouring crowd now flowing out, now in, it is not always easy to get at them. Yet the gift of a tract or book in passing has done its work; and warm thanks have been expressed by these men for the interest thus shown in their welfare. "The evident delight," says a recent report, "with which these men, and keepers of bureaux, cab-drivers, etc., receive the Portions and numbers of "The Household Friend," etc., is most striking. Sometimes all the men in a car depot have rushed out on observing us (see frontispiece), inquiring whether we had a new number of the magazine for them. The boys, too, are remarkably interested in the Bible-class meetings.

"Sir, it was in this room that I found my Saviour," said the father of a family to Mr. McAll at the Grenelle meeting, as he grasped his hand. "I thank you with all my heart," said a laborer of Montmartre, when leaving Paris, "for these reunions. I have attended for a year and a half, and I am a changed man—yes, sir, a changed man." His life showed the nature and reality of the change. In one family the representatives of three generations have come under the power of the Gospel. The utterances of joyful thankfulness by the old grandmother, ninety years of age, are said to be most touching.

A DYING CONVERT.

The La Chapelle station, like most of the others, is surrounded by the houses of the poor. By the side of it was the dwelling of an aged man of seventy-six, who at this advanced time of life was still obliged to work hard for his daily bread. His working hours did not allow him to attend at the beginning of the meeting; but he used to steal in toward the close into a corner and listen. The visitors one day found him on a death-bed, but resting on the one sacrifice of the Son of God for pardon and entrance into the kingdom. "Only one Physician can help me," he said; "but He can do all. No fellow-man can help another to get rid of his sins; God only can." The meeting had not been opened in vain beside the lodging of this stranger. It had been to him the gate of heaven.

During the Exposition of 1878, a large hall, called La Salle Evangelique (Gospel Hall), was opened for preaching the Gospel and the distribution of the Scriptures.

BIBLES AND GOSPELS,

in twenty-two languages, were sold or given away. Among the recipients were French, Germans, Italians, Spaniards, Russians, Dutchmen, Jews, Greeks, Austrians, Bohemians, and people from the Basque provinces. A number of visitors from Japan, Turkey, and Persia, also received the Word of Life. Mr. Frank McKinnon, who took part in the distribution, says: "Who could have remained cold or unmoved while the teeming multitude, like a stream, poured from the principal entrance, and passed by the Bible Kiosque to receive the glad tidings without money and without price? At times it was most difficult to convince the passers-by that the distribution was gratuitous. Many a foreigner would stand and gaze at the pretty building, unable to understand what was being said or done. With curious glance he would scan the invitations, written in various languages, till his eye would see his own; and then, with marked pleasure, he would approach and ask for 'a Russian,' or 'an Italian,' or 'a Spanish,' or 'a Chinese,' as the case might be." (See frontispiece.)

ENCOURAGEMENT TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

From Rev. Dr. Deems's Anniversary Address, in "Christian Thought."

THE excitement of debate has stimulated the activity of production. The last quarter of a century has produced a scientific literature created by men of profound religious convictions; a scientific and philosophical literature surpassing all that has appeared in all the preceding Christian centuries. Associated efforts like those put forth by the Victoria Institute of Great Britain and the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, have brought out papers and lectures exposing the fallacies of the anti-Christians and demonstrating how wholly unhurt was the true faith of simple and child-like men by all the subtle reasonings of those who could see nothing in the great volume of Nature but arguments against the existence of its Author.

In that high and healthy literature, every year commanding more and more attention, several things have been shown. (1) Much that had been assumed to be settled on a scientific basis and to be deadly to Christianity has been shown to have no rational basis whatever. (2) Much other has been shown to be manifestly mere conjecture, which has not yet made good its claim to be considered knowledge, and the assumption of any force it may have against a supernal religion to be puerile. (3) In whatever has been demonstrated to be real science, it has been shown that there is nothing which can reasonably be held to be antagonistic to the religion taught in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. (4) And beyond all that, from the results of scientific research and philosophical examination, there has begun to be gathered a great store of facts and arguments which go to confirm men's faith in revealed truth and to corroborate and illustrate its teaching. So it has come to pass that theoretical religion has to-day a better footing among thoughtful men than it ever had before.

INCREASE OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT.

There seems also to be no diminution of Christian effort, but rather an increase. There are more churches built than ever before; there are more men devoting their lives to the propagation of Christian principles and the extension of Christian work; there are more mission stations in all parts of the world in 1884 than there were in any previous year; there are more Church communicants in Christendom in proportion to population than ever before; there are more persons in attendance on the public services of religion and more children early taught religious truths than ever before; and there are very many more thousands of dollars given for the propagation of the Christian faith than ever found such an outlet since the prophet of Galilee was accustomed to say, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The hold of Christianity upon the minds of young men of culture is, notwithstanding all the active skepticism of the age, stronger than it ever was before. The latest report of the college Young Men's Christian Associations in the United States and Canada gives returns from 170 colleges, embracing nearly 35,000 students and containing all the larger colleges, Harvard alone excepted. 14,000 of this number are church members, and over 1500 have professed conversion during the past college year.

During the last decade Protestantism in this country has contributed for missions, home and foreign, $56,136,636. In the decade beginning with 1810, the amount of contributions for these objects was $206,210. Every ten years show a large and steady increase. Last year the women of the United States gave $600,000 toward Christianizing the heathen. Of this large sum Presbyterian women gave nearly $200,000; Baptist women, $156,000; Northern Methodist women, $108,000; and Southern Methodist women, $26,500. The Methodist Church Extension Board has received $2,500,000 in its twenty years' history, with which it has built 4500 houses of worship, with 1,000,000 sittings, that are now worth $8,000,000.

Attempts have been made by the enemy to disparage the progress of Christianity by striving to create the impression that the opposite state of affairs exists. A resort to statistics shows that the several statements made above are in accordance with the facts. Now, surely if Christian faith and principles were dying out in the world it would be impossible to account for the great, vigorous, living growth of Christian activity,

THE UPPER FORCES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 26, 1884.

"And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."—II. KINGS 6: 17.

Elisha's Supernatural Defenders—Our National Perils—The Divine Rescue—Burning Escapes from Disenthralment—Tribulation the Way to Elevation—The Upper Forces on the Side of the Nation—The Struggle for Independence—The Vision of Washington's Faith—The Deliverance in 1861—The Dark Cloud of 1876—God the Friend of the Nation — Working through Human Instrumentalities—The Registration—Aroused Moral Sentiment—The Moral Lectures of the Campaign—The Joke of Neal Dow's Candidacy—Whom to Vote for—A Platform of Two Planks—What to do with the Surplus—The Lies of the Campaign—A National Religion—An Architect's Imperishable Name—A Sailor's Post-office.

As it cost England many regiments and two million dollars a year to keep safely a troublesome captive at St. Helena, so the King of Syria sends out a whole army to capture one minister of religion—perhaps 50,000 men to take Elisha. During the night the army of Assyrians came around the village of Dothan where the prophet was staying. At early daybreak the man-servant of Elisha rushed in and said, "What shall we do? there is a whole army come to destroy you. We must die, we must die." But Elisha was not scared a bit, for he looked up and he saw the mountains all around full of

and he knew that if there were 50,000 Assyrians against him there were 100,000 angels for him; and in answer to the prophet's prayer in behalf of his affrighted man-servant, the young man saw it too. Horses of fire harnessed to chariots of fire, and drivers of fire pulling reins of fire on bits of fire; and warriors of fire with brandished sword of fire, and the brilliance of that morning sunrise was eclipsed by the galloping splendors of the celestial cavalcade. "And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." For two Sabbath mornings I have spoken of the Assyrian perils which threatened the destruction of American institutions—the bribery, the low morals, the drunkenness, the political abandonment; but this morning I speak of the upper forces of the text that are to fight on our side. If all the low levels are filled with armed threats, I have to tell you that the mountains of our hope and courage and faith are full of the horses and chariots of

DIVINE RESCUE.

You will notice that the Divine equipage is always represented as a chariot of fire. Ezekiel and Isaiah and John when they come to describe the divine equipage always represent it as a wheeled, a harnessed, an upholstered conflagration. It is not a chariot like kings and conquerors of earth mount, but an organized and a compressed fire. That means purity, justice, chastisement, deliverance through

BURNING ESCAPES.

Chariot of rescue? yes, but chariot of fire. All our national disenthralments have been through scorching agonies and red disasters. Through tribulation the individual rises. Through tribulation nations rise. Chariots of rescue, but chariots of fire.

But how do I know that this divine equipage is on the side of our institutions? I know it by the history of the last one hundred and eight years. The American Revolution started from the pen of John Hancock in Independence Hall in 1776. The colonies without ships, without ammunition, without guns, without trained warriors, without money, without prestige. On the other side, the mightiest nation of the earth, the largest armies, and the grandest navies, and the most distinguished commanders, and resources inexhaustible, and nearly all nations ready to back them up in the fight. Nothing as against immensity.

The cause of the American colonies which started at zero dropped still lower through the quarrelling of the generals, and through the jealousies at small successes, and through the winters which surpassed all their predecessors in depth of snow and horrors of congealment. Elisha surrounded by the whole Assyrian army did not seem to be worse off than did encompassed and overshadowed by foreign assault. What decided the contest in our favor? The upper forces, the upper armies. The green and white mountains of New England the highlands along the Hudson, the mountains of Virginia, all the Appalachian ranges were full of re-enforcements which the young man Washington saw by faith, and his men endured the frozen feet, and the gangrened wounds, and the exhausting hunger, and the long march because "the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountains were full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

I do not know how any man can read the history of those times without admitting that the contest was decided by the upper forces.

when our civil war opened, many at the North and at the South pronounced it national suicide. It was not courage against cowardice, it was not wealth against poverty, it was not large States against small States. It was heroism against heroism, it was the resources of many generations against the resources of many generations, it was the prayer of the North against the prayer of the South, it was one half of the nation in armed wrath meeting the other half of the nation in armed indignation. What could come but extermination?

At the opening of the war the commander-in-chief of the United States forces was a dear old man with gout and vertigo and asthma who could not mount a horse, and he rode on the battlefield in a carriage asking the driver not to jolt it too much. During the most of the four years of the contest, on the Southern side was a man in mid-life, who had in his veins the blood of many generations of warriors, himself one of the heroes of Cherubusco and Cerro Gordo, Contreras and Chapultepec. As the years passed on and unrolled, there came out from both sides a heroism and a strength and a determination that the world had never seen marshalled. And what but extermination could come when Philip Sheridan and Stonewall Jackson met, and Nathaniel Lyon and Sidney Johnston rode in from north and south, and Grant and Lee, the two thunderbolts of battle, clashed? Yet, we are a nation, and yet we are at peace. Earthly courage did not decide the conflict. The upper forces of the text. They tell us there was a battle fought above the clouds on Lookout Mountain; but there was something higher than that. The horses and chariots of God came to the rescue of this nation.

IN 1876,

at the close of a Presidential election famous for devilish ferocity,

A DARKER CLOUD

yet settled down upon this nation. The result of the election was in dispute and revolution, not between two or three sections, but revolution in every town and village and city of the United States seemed imminent. The prospect was that New York would throttle New York, and New Orleans would grip New Orleans, and Boston, Boston, and Savannah, Savannah, and Washington, Washington. Some said Mr. Tilden was elected; others said Mr. Hayes was elected; and how near we came to universal massacre some of us guessed, but God only knew. I ascribe our escape not to the honesty and righteousness of infuriated politicians, but I ascribe it to the upper forces of the text. Chariots of mercy rolled in, and though the wheels were not heard and the flash was not seen, yet all through the mountains of the north and the south and the east and the west, though the hoofs did not clatter, the cavalry of God galloped by. I tell you

GOD IS THE FRIEND OF THIS NATION.

In the awful excitement at the massacre of Lincoln, when there was a prospect that greater slaughter would open upon this nation, God hushed the tempest. In the awful excitement at the time of Garfield's assassination, God put His foot on the neck of the cyclone.

To prove that God is on the side of this nation, I argue from the last five great national harvests, and from the national health of the last quarter of a century, epidemics very exceptional, and from the great revivals of religion, and from the spreading of the Church of God, and from the continent blossoming with asylums and reformatory institutions, and from an Edenization which promises that this whole land is to be a Paradise where God shall walk in the cool of the day.

If in two sermons I showed you what was the evil that threatened to upset and demolish American institutions, I am encouraged more than I can tell you as I see the regiments wheeling down the sky, and my jeremiads turn into doxologies, and that which was the Good Friday of the nation's crucifixion becomes the Easter Morn of its resurrection. Of course God works through and this national betterment is to come among other things through a scrutinized ballot-box. By the law of registration it is almost impossible now to have illegal voting. There was a time—you and I remember it very well—when droves of vagabonds wandered up and down on election day and from poll to poll, and voted here, and voted there, and voted everywhere, and there was no challenge; or, if there was, it amounted to nothing, because nothing could so suddenly be proved upon the vagabonds. Now, in every well-organized neighborhood, every voter is watched with severest scrutiny. Just think of it! The record is already made up, and has been made up for nearly a week, although yet the ordeal is nine days off. I must tell the registrar my name, and how old I am, and how long I have resided in the State, and how long I have resided in the ward or the township, and if I misrepresent, fifty witnesses will rise and shut me out from the ballot-box. Is not that a great advance? And then notice the law that prohibits a man voting if he has bet on the election. A step further needs to be taken, and that man forbidden a vote who has offered or taken a bribe, whether it be in the shape of a free drink or cash paid down, the suspicious cases obliged to put their hand on the Bible and swear their vote in if they vote at all. So through the sacred chest of our nation's suffrage redemption will come.

God also will save this nation through an

AROUSED MORAL SENTIMENT.

There has never been so much discussion of morals and immorals as during the present political campaign. Men, whether or not they acknowledge what is right, have to think what is right. We have men who have had their hands in the public treasury the most of their lifetime, stealing all they could lay their hands on, discoursing eloquently about dishonesty in public servants, and men with two or three families of their own preaching eloquently about the beauties of the seventh commandment. The question of sobriety and drunkenness thrust in the face of this nation as never before, and to take a part in the great national contest.

PROHIBITION,

which was only a joke four years ago when Neal Dow ran for the Presidency, no longer a joke, but flushing the cheek of this nation with excitement, and agitating the land from Lake Erie to Mobile Bay, and from Bangor to San Francisco, and will in four years from now decide who shall be the President of the United States. The loud, long laugh at fanatical reformers has caught in the windpipe and turned into a paroxysm of strangulation, and the question of national sobriety is going to be respectfully and deferentially heard at the bar of every legislature and every House of Representatives and every United States Senate, and an omnipotent voice will ring down the sky and across this land and back again, saying to these rising tides of drunkenness which threaten to whelm home and church and nation, "Thus far shalt thou come, but no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

I have not in my mind a shadow of disheartenment as large as the shadow of a house-fly's wing. My faith is in the upper forces, the upper armies of the text. God is not dead. The chariots are not unwheeled. If you would only pray more and rub your eyes from the sleep of indifference and wash them in the cool, bright water fresh from the well of Christian reform, it would be said of you as of this one of the text: "The Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

You ask me whom I will vote for. I reply, it is of very little importance whom I vote for; but it is a matter of vast importance what these throngs and throngs of people shall vote for, and so in these three or four sermons I put before you all the facts and all the principles so that you can intelligently decide.

VOTE FOR THE BEST MEN, vote conscientiously, vote in the fear of God, vote as you will wish you had voted when you can vote no more.

When the army of Antigonus went into battle his soldiers were very much discouraged, and they rushed up to the general and said to him: "Don't you see we have a few forces and they have so many more?" and the soldiers were affrighted at the smallness of their number and the greatness of the enemy. Antigonus, their commander, straightened himself up and said, with indignation and vehemence: "How many do you reckon me to be?" And when we see the vast armies arrayed against the cause of sobriety it may sometimes be very discouraging, but I ask you in making up your estimate of the forces of righteousness—I ask you how many do you reckon the Lord God Almighty to be? He is our Commander. The Lord of Hosts is His name. I have the best authority for saying that the chariots of God are twenty thousand, and the mountains are full of them.

You will take without my saying it that is in Christianity and in the upper forces suggested in the text. Political parties come and go, and they may be right and they may be wrong; but God lives, and I think He has ordained this nation for a career of prosperity that no demagogism will be able to halt. I expect to live to see a political party which will have

A PLATFORM OF TWO PLANKS

—the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. When that party is formed it will sweep across this land, like a tornado I was going to say, but when I think it is not to be devastation, but resuscitation, I change the figure and say such a party as that will sweep across this land like a thousand-spiced gale from heaven.

American politics, you know as well as I do, will never be purified or made decent by anything less powerful than the Christian religion. Take, for instance, the fact that we have now $100,000,000 surplus in the United States Treasury. What is the great anxiety? I think the great question is, with a vast multitude, whether the Democratic party or the Republican party will have the privilege of stealing it. Will anything short of an infusion of Christian principle in this country lead this nation to be honest? There is only with that $100,000,000 of surplus—subtract it from the taxation of this nation next year, letting the people up from this accursed burden of over-taxation. Suppose you overpaid me in a bargain, what is the honest thing for me to do? Pay it back to you. Ought not a nation to be as honest as an individual? Will it be done? No, not unless we have a great revival of religion in Congress and three fourths of the members down on the "anxious seat."

Have you any doubt about the need of the Christian religion to purify and make decent American politics? What is the fact now? Just look at it. We are to have for either a man who has been pictorialized and excoriated as a thief, or we are to have a man who has been pictorialized and excoriated as a libertine. Now that is the simple fact. What a state of things it is! Never such a carnival of mud. All the candidates may have their faults, but I have no doubt great injustices have been done them. The trouble is we have in this country two great manufactories—

MANUFACTORIES OF LIES

—the Republican manufactory of lies and the Democratic manufactory of lies—and they are run day and night, and they turn out half a dozen a day all equipped and ready for full sailing. Large lies and small lies. Lies private and lies public and lies prurient. Lies cut bias and lies cut diagonal. Long-limbed lies and lies with double-back action. Lies complimentary and lies defamatory. Lies that some people believe, and lies that all the people believe, and lies that nobody believes. Lies with humps like camels and scales like crocodiles and necks as long as storks, and feet as swift as an antelope's, and stings like adders. Lies raw and scalloped and panned and stewed. Crawling lies and jumping lies and soaring lies. Lies with attachment screws and rufflers and braiders and ready-wound bobbers. Lies by Christian people who never lie except during elections, and lies by people who always lie, but beat themselves in a Presidential campaign.

I confess I am ashamed to have a foreigner visit this country in these times. I should think he would stand dazed, his hand on his pocket-book, and dare not go out nights! What will the hundreds of thousands of foreigners who come here to live think of us? What a disgust they must have for the land of their adoption! The only good thing about it is, many of them cannot understand the English language. But I suppose the German, and Italian, and Swedish, and French papers translate it all, and peddle out the infernal stuff to their subscribers.

Nothing but Christianity will ever stop such a flood of indecency. The Christian religion will speak after a while. The billingsgate and low scandal through which we have waded for the last three or four months must be rebuked by that religion which speaks from its two great mountains, from the one mountain intoning the command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," and from the other mount making plea for kindness and love and blessing rather than cursing. Yes, we are going to have

A NATIONAL RELIGION.

There are two kinds of national religion. The one is supported by the State, and is a matter of human politics, and it has great patronage, and under it men will struggle for prominence without reference to qualifications, and its archbishop is suported by a salary of $75,000 a year, and there are great cathedrals, with all the machinery of music and canonicals, and room for a thousand people, yet an audience of fifty people, or twenty people, or ten, or two. We want no such religion as that, no such national religion; but we want this kind of national religion—the vast majority of the people converted and evangelized, and then they will manage the secular as well as the religious.

Do you say that is impracticable? No. The time is coming just as certainly as there is a God and that this is His Book and that He has the strength and the honesty to fulfil His promises. One of the ancient emperors used to pride himself on performing that which his counsellors said was impossible, and I have to tell you to-day that are God's easies. "Hath he said and shall he not do it? Hath he commanded, and will he not bring it to pass?" The Christian religion is coming to take possession of every ballot-box, of every schoolhouse, of every home, of every valley, of every mountain, of every acre of our national domain.

One of the seven wonders of the world was the white marble watch-tower of Pharos of Egypt. Sostratus, the architect and sculptor, after building that watch tower cut his name on it. Then he covered it with plastering, and to please the king he put the monarch's name on the outside of the plastering, and the storms beat, and the seas dashed in their fury, and they washed off the plastering, and they washed it out, and they washed it down, but the name of Sostratus was deep cut in the imperishable rock. So across the face of this nation there have been a great many names written, across our finances, across our religions, names worthy of remembrance, names written against the architecture of our churches, and our schools, and our asylums, and our homes of mercy, but God is the architect of this continent, and He was the sculptor of all its grandeurs, and long after through the wash of the ages and the tempests of centuries all other names shall be obliterated, the divine signature and divine name will be brighter and brighter as the millenniums go by, and the world shall see that the God who made this continent has redeemed it by His grace from all its sorrows and from all its crimes.

HAVE YOU FAITH

in such a thing as that? After all the chariots have been unwheeled, and after all the war chargers have been crippled, the chariots which Elisha saw on the morning of his peril will roll on in triumph, followed by all the armies of heaven on white horses. God could do it without us, but He will not. The weakest of us, the faintest of us, the smallest brained of us shall have a part in the triumph. We may not have our name, like the name of Sostratus, cut in imperishable rock, and conspicuous for centuries, but we shall be remembered in a better place than that, even in the heart of Him who came to redeem us and redeem the world, and our names will be seen close to the signature of His wound, for as this morning He throws out His arms toward us, He says: "Behold, I have graven thee on the palms of my hand." By the mightiest of all agencies, the potency of prayer, I beg you to be before God until after the first Tuesday of November.

A SAILORS' POST-OFFICE.

There are 4,600,000 letters in the Dead Letter Post Office at Washington—letters that lost their way—but not one prayer ever directed to the heart of God miscarried. The way is all clear for the ascent of your supplications heavenward in behalf of this nation. Before the postal communication was so easy, and long ago, on a rock one hundred feet high on the coast of England, there was a barrel fastened to a post, and in great letters on the side of the rock, so it could be seen far out at sea, were the words, "Post-office;" and when ships came by a boat put out to take and fetch letters. And so sacred were those deposits of affection in that barrel that no lock was ever put upon that barrel, although it contained messages for America, and Europe, and Asia, and Africa, and all the islands of the sea. Many a storm-tossed sailor, homesick, got message of kindness by that rock, and many a homestead heard good news from a boy long gone. Would that all the heights of our national prosperity were in interchange of sympathies—prayers going up meeting blessings coming down! Postal celestial, not by a storm-struck rock on a wintry coast, but by the Rock of Ages. In the cleft of that rock let this nation hide until all its calamities be overpast.

THE TRIBULATION AND THE ANTICHRIST.

By W. E. Blackstone of Chicago.*

A Cheering Fact—The Tribulation—Revelation of Antichrist—The Culminating Manifestation of Satan—Still Future—His Destruction.

In the coming darkness, so gloomy for the ungodly, there is hope—bright, glorious hope for the faithful. For God always has had, and ever will have a faithful remnant. There were those in blind, unbelieving Israel, who waited for and accepted the Messiah. So there will be those in the Church who will wait for and welcome the coming Bridegroom. And there shall be a remnant in Israel, who, passing through the darkness and fire will yet accept their King. And there shall even be a remnant (residue or remainder) among the Gentiles (ungodly world) who shall seek after the Lord.

Glory to God! the darkness shall yet flee away before the Sun of Righteousness, arising with healing in His wings, when He comes to sit in the throne of His glory. The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established and all nations shall flow unto it during that bright Millennial day of peace and glory, which shall follow "this present evil age" and in which even the creature "shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." But before that time dawns, there will come

THE TRIBULATION.

We use this term to designate the whole period of earthly history, between the Rapture and the Revelation, or between the Church and the Millennial Kingdom. It will not altogether be a time of tribulation; for in it "they shall rejoice and send gifts one to another" (Rev. 11 : 10), and shall say "peace and safety." (1 Thess. 5 : 3.) We believe that it will be comparatively a short season, because the 6000 years, and the times, or year-days, of prophecy, have nearly run out. Doubtless it embraces the last one of Daniel's seventy weeks (Dan. 9 : 27), for the reason that then God begins to deal with Israel again, after He has taken the Church away. (Acts 15 : 13–17.)

It is certain that there will be in it a period of unequalled trial, sorrow and calamity (Dan. 12 : 1; Matt. 24 : 21), spiritual darkness and open wickedness. It is the night of the world. But the true Church which is not of the night, being watchful and prayerful, will be accounted worthy to escape it, by the Rapture, and to stand before the Son of Man while a third part of Israel will be brought through it (Zech. 13 : 9), and for the elect's sake, the days of this culminating tribulation shall be shortened (Matt. 24 : 22), by the revelation of Christ. From Isa., chapters 24 to 28, an idea may be gained of the terrible character of this period, during which Antichrist will also be revealed. Some, especially from the remnant of Israel, will accept of Christ and become His witnesses, and be slain by Antichrist. These we call the tribulation saints who are to be raised at the close of the great tribulation as the gleanings of the great harvest of the first resurrection.

will be fully revealed in that time of terror. This name introduces to us one of the most solemn and foreboding subjects in the Word of God. An Antichrist—one absolutely opposed to Jesus Christ—we are told, shall come. (1 John 2 : 18.) The spirit of Antichrist is already in the world, denying the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh, either in the past (1 John 4 : 3), or in the future (II John 7. Greek, coming in flesh.) This spirit of Antichrist, now possessed by many, will culminate in one person, the Antichrist, who will deny both the Father and the Son. (1 John 2 : 22.)

That he is a single individual is plainly taught in II Thess. 2, where he is called "that man of sin" . . . "the son of perdition"—"that wicked," or properly, "the Lawless one."

As Christ is the express image of God (Heb. 1 : 3), so it appears that Antichrist is the culminating manifestation of Satan, "The prince of this world." (John 14 : 30.) His Coming is "after the working (energy, or inward working) of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders and deceivableness of unrighteousness."

He will be a "strong (or inward working) delusion," to them who believe not the truth. (II Thess. 2 : 9–12.) He will be received even by the Jews (John 5 : 43) who, having returned to their own land and rebuilt their temple, will make a treaty with him, called by the prophet "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." (Isa. 28 : 15–18.) And Antichrist will exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God (the rebuilt temple at Jerusalem) and sheweth himself that he is God. (II Thess. 2 : 4.) Doubtless he is the king described in Dan. 11 : 36, etc., who shall do according to his own will and magnify himself above every god. Again he is seen as the beast described in Rev. 13 : 11–18, whose number is the number of a man, 666, and who performs "great wonders and deceiveth them that dwell upon the earth," by means of His miracles, and has the power to kill those who will not worship the image of the beast. And again he is seen in Lucifer, or the day star, of Isa. 14, of whom the King of Babylon was a type, and who weakens the nations, exalts his "throne above the stars of God," and sits "upon the mount of the congregation."

Such, in brief, is the awful picture which Scripture gives us, of this great opponent of Christ. Many think that he has already been manifested in Antiochus Epiphanes—or the Popes of Rome—or Mohammed and his successors, all of which we regard as erroneous. The Popes have received their exaltation and power, as the pretended vicars of Christ, and not as His opponent. It is a great mistake, therefore, to call them the Antichrist, or the opposing one. Antiochus was doubtless a type of Antichrist. And, in his opposition to the worship of Jehovah, his sacrifice of the hated swine in the temple, and his merciless treatment of the Jews, he has given us a miniature picture of what the final Antichrist will do. But he passed away long before Paul and John wrote of the Antichrist to come. Likewise Mohammed may be in some sense a type, but that is all.

No! Antichrist is

and he will not be manifested until the true Church has been taken away, at the Rapture. For Paul says (II Thess. 2 : 1), "we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him," —that is, by this very fact of the Rapture, of which he had previously written them (1 Thess. 4 : 16–17), and which must first occur before the apostasy should come to the full, and the man of sin be revealed. This is confirmed by verse 7. The Holy Spirit, who, while He is gathering the bride — (1 Cor. 12 : 13; Eph. 4 : 30)—reproves the world of sin, righteousness and judgment (John 16 : 8) will, when He is taken out of the way, catch up the bride to meet the Lord in the air, leaving the apostate Church—adulterous Israel and the ungodly world, to believe a lie (verse 11), and then shall the lawless one be revealed. Praise God that the Church is to be kept from this awful hour of temptation. She shall be with her Lord while the world is ruled by Antichrist.

But, though Antichrist shall so greatly exalt himself and rule over the world with such power, yet "shall he come to his end, and none shall help him." (Dan. 11 45.) The Lord shall destroy him "with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. 2 : 8), literally "will paralyze (him) with the forthshining of His arrival." Yes, he shall "be brought down to hell (sheol), to the sides of the pit." They that see him shall narrowly look upon him and consider him, saying, "is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; that made the world as a wilderness and destroyed the cities thereof?" (Isa. 14 : 15–17.)

We would call special attention to the fact that Antichrist denies the Father and the Son (1 John 2 : 22) and that the Greek words in II Thess. 2 : 7, 8 should be rendered "the mystery of lawlessness"—"the lawless one." This, we think, gives an alarming significance to the atheistic and lawless trio of Communism, Socialism and Nihilism, so rapidly spreading in our day, and which seeks to wipe out all law relating to marriage, property, etc.

It may be that these are the immediate precursors of Antichrist. At any rate, he is surely coming, and sad indeed is the thought of a godless world, rushing on to such a culmination of evil.

NEW BOOKS.

"The Ancient Empires of the East," by A. H. Sayce, published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, price $1.50, is a book of three hundred and one pages, containing much valuable information concerning the Empires of Egypt, Babylonia, and Assyria, the Phœnicians, Lydia, and Persia. The recent discovery of ancient monuments and the deciphering of inscriptions have furnished us with so much new knowledge of the ancient empires of the East, that the standard authorities on the subject now in use have become antiquated. The knowledge obtained from the inscriptions, which, being contemporary records, must be accepted as accurate before all other histories, proves that the historians have erred to a surprising extent. Herodotus, especially, who has been called "the father of history," is convicted by these inscriptions of the grossest blunders, and of having recorded as facts things which he must have merely guessed, or have gleaned from ignorant, gossiping dragomen and travelling merchants. It would be impossible for the ordinary reader to collect from newspapers, periodicals, and college journals the translations of the inscriptions furnished from time to time by Oriental scholars; yet there could be no doubt that our ancient histories were in urgent need of reconstruction in the new light recently thrown upon them. Professor Sayce has performed this work for the five empires mentioned. He has personally examined much of this stone literature, and his history, therefore, is based to a large extent on the statements of the men who actually witnessed the events recorded. The student of the Bible who is desirous of understanding the numerous references in the sacred pages to each of these five empires will turn to Professor Sayce's work with lively interest, and will gain much light from the information therein contained.

THE PENMAN'S ART JOURNAL

is a monthly periodical published at 205 Broadway, New York, at $1 per year. The current number is finely illustrated with specimens of different styles of writing suitable for business and private purposes, with splendid ornamental flourishes and tasteful monograms and single letters. It also contains much practical advice to persons desirous of improving their writing, and also a varied collection of literature bearing more or less directly on the penman's art. These articles contain hints derived from the experience of the best masters of the pen, which may be of service to many who despair of ever writing a graceful, legible hand. The publishers of this periodical offer as a premium to the sender of a club of twelve, an elegant book, entitled "Ames's Guide to Practical and Artistic Penmanship," which contains sixty-two large pages of copies and instruction for plain writing, flourishing, and lettering. The same book is also offered by mail for $4. It is especially useful to teachers of the art of writing, and the amateur student cannot fail to derive benefit from a careful study of its contents.

SONGS OF PRAISE AND PRAYER for the Sunday-school and Social Meeting, compiled and edited by Rev. Charles H. Richrds, D.D., is published by Messrs. Taintor Brothers, Merrill & Co., Astor Place, New York. Price, bound in cloth with red edges, ixty cents; $50 per hundred. It contains three undred and thirty-two hymns and tunes. The ditor, realizing the desire of children and young eople for bright and sparkling melodies, and lso the necessity for their being made familiar vith the grand old hymns and tunes of the hurch, has endeavored in this book to mingle he old and the new, the staid and the stirring n such a way as to meet the needs of both de- artments of Christian culture. He has done o with conspicuous ability and signal success. t combines in nearly equal proportions old ymns and tunes, Gospel melodies and Sunday-chool songs, and the difficult compositions of English authors. Each of these departments is mportant, and each has received its due share f attention. It is rendered more valuable by ts topical arrangement, enabling the preacher r leader of a meeting or Sunday-school super- ntendent to turn at once to a hymn suitable to he subject in hand. The publishers offer to end specimen copies to pastors or superintend- nts; such copies to be returned to them after xamination.

THE PRECIOUS PROMISES;

r, Light from Beyond, by Rev. Cunningham Geikie, D.D., author of "Hours with the Bible," s published by Messrs. James Pott & Co., Astor Place, New York. Price seventy-five cents. Those who have already made Dr. Geikie's ac- uaintance through his published works will not eed to be told how inspiring and encouraging nd elevating are the considerations to be found n these pages. The following extract, how- ver, will in some measure indicate his purpose n writing of "The Precious Promises" and the pirit that has guided him in his labor: "Is our heart tried? Does your faith stagger? et me invite you to the remedy God has pro- ided. The secret of a calm and contented life -a life that will rise superior to all that can appen to you, and keep your heart in perfect eace—is found in His unfailing promises. There is not a leaf of the Bible but has some, so hat you cannot fail to find what will suit you. Does your spirit faint? They are a dropping oneycomb, better than Jonathan's. Dip your ilgrim staff into their richness, and put your and to your mouth, like him, and your faint- ess will pass away. Are you thirsty? They re the flowing stream of the water of life, of hich you may drink by the way, and lift up he head. Are you overcome by the sultry urden of the day? They are as the shadow of cloud to bring down the heat; as the cool hadow of a great rock in a weary land. Have our steps wellnigh slipped? They are a staff n your hand, on the top of which, betimes, like acob, you may lean, and worship God. . . . He needs never be sad who keeps the promises n mind. . . . You need never have a cloud on our joy, for they brighten every foot of your ay, and their light never falls so sweetly as on he eyes of the dying, who look to their Saviour s they pass away."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Cause of a Scotchman's Shame.—A oung Scotchman, who had for several years een a decided Christian, was unexpectedly laid ow with disease, from which the physician said e could not recover. When informed of the edical opinion he cried bitterly, much to the rprise and pain of his father, who said to him, I thought you were a child of God, Henry. Why should you be afraid to die?" "I am not fraid to die," he replied, "but I'm ashamed to ink I have been converted so long and have ever won a single soul for Christ, and must, herefore, appear before Him empty." "But ou have been a Sunday-school teacher, Henry?" Oh, yes, but I've not brought one of my cholars to Christ." He lingered on for a few onths, and became more than ever solicitous or his scholars' salvation; and when, after a short time of additional labor, he was successful in leading one of them to Jesus, he greatly rejoiced, and exclaimed, "Oh, father, God has given me a soul; and now I am ready to go." And recently he passed away, thanking God with his last breath that his life had not been an absolute failure.

A Company of Surprised Chinese.—At a meeting recently held, a deeply interesting and touching statement was made by Miss Carr, who for some time labored in China. Being wrecked while voyaging up the country, and landing in a most unfriendly district, she prayed that if she were to be murdered by the natives, it might be done with as little torture as possible. Meeting, however, with a case of sickness, her medicines were available for healing, and the people flocking around her she dispensed to them healing for both soul and body. They were greatly astonished to hear her speak of the love of God, having before never heard of a God who loved them. Miss Carr assured them it was true, whereupon they exclaimed: "Our gods all hate us, and we are so pleased to hear about a God who loves us. But if your religion is true, why did you not come and tell us about it sooner?" "These words have never been forgotten by me," said Miss Carr, "and I think they never will!"

"There is Plenty of Room."—It is Recorded, as an illustration of the influence of the late Rev. Mr. Pennefather's gentleness, that a children's service was being held at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, one Sunday afternoon. Just in front of the platform, and under Mr. Pennefather's own eye, was a little boy, who could by no means be persuaded to sit still. He seemed possessed by the spirit of restlessness, and would stand up and sit down without any regard to order. For a time Mr. Pennefather took no notice of him, but at last, fixing his eye on the child, he said, in a firm, loving tone, "Dear little boy, sit down; there is plenty of room." Something in the tone and manner fastened itself on the child's imagination; he never forgot it, and was constantly saying to his mother, 'Mr. Pennefather said, 'Dear little boy, sit down; there is plenty of room.'" A few weeks later the lad was laid upon a dying bed, and among his last words were these: "There's plenty of room; Jesus is making room for me, mother, and you must come too." And the mother's after-testimony was, "My little boy's dying words brought me to Jesus."

Scene in a Menagerie.—A Panic Lately Occurred at a menagerie at Wrexham. A keeper named Rice, about twenty-two years of age, was engaged cleaning out and foddering the animals, and when he came to the den occupied by a lion known as "Nero," he playfully tapped his leonine majesty on the nose with his right hand. "Nero" resented the familiarity by at once seizing the hand of the attendant, who endeavored by terms of endearment to make the animal let go. Instead of doing so, however, "Nero" placed one of his immense paws upon the imprisoned arm, and seizing it nearer the elbow with his jaws, he violently dragged the arm further to the bars, and with a jerk bit and tore the limb in twain close to the elbow joint, and then greedily devoured that portion of the arm and hand he had thus obtained possession of. As may be imagined, a scene of the utmost excitement followed upon this shocking accident, and a wild rush for the means of exit took place. Men, women, and children were soon piled up indiscriminately, and must have had their lives crushed out of them had not McLaren, a tall, powerful policeman, exerted himself to keep the crowd back while those who had been knocked down and trampled upon managed to gain their footing. The man had to submit to amputation just below the shoulder.

A Sceptic's Absurd Test.—Lord Shaftesbury, at the close of a meeting, observed: "I remember my father used to tell me oftentimes a story of a gentleman connected with our family, a man of considerable fortune. He had great doubts about the moral government of the world. He found it rather a check on his habits and tastes, and he doubted it; but he put it to a test that he might clear his conscience by the issue. It was at the time that Napoleon was preparing to cross the Alps and enter on that campaign which issued in the battle of Marengo and the overthrow of the Austrian empire. This gentleman said to my father, 'If the First Consul passes the Alps and wins the day, I shall come to the conclusion that there is no God, no moral providence in the world.' Very well. He was a strong politician, and he thought the God he ought to adore would be a person that would act according to his view of politics. Well, Napoleon crossed the Alps and fought the battle of Marengo, and won the day. Then this gentleman renounced Christianity, and to the end of his life he never believed, or rather he never professed to believe, in the moral superintendence of Providence. Because God did not guide the affairs of the world according to the man's idea of right he believed God did not govern at all. If he could have lived until our time he would have seen that in this matter of Napoleon God is governing, ruling, and directing in righteousness."

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

MRS. MARY E. WRIGHT GOODMAN sends to Miss Carrie F. Judd the following

TESTIMONY FROM COLORADO.

It is dated Manitou, Col., August 2d, 1884.

"For about a year and a half I was a sufferer from various serious disorders, which threatened to unfit me for labor or enjoyment in this life; all the time 'suffering many things of many physicians,' and very skilful ones, who helped me a little, but I felt I was gaining no permanent good, although asking God's blessing on mine and their efforts for my recovery.

"While in this disconsolate condition, for I had not learned to 'glory in my infirmities,' our Father led me to a Sunday afternoon meeting at the 'Faith Rest,' Walnut Hills, near Cincinnati. There I first learned that sickness is the work of the devil. Oh wonderful revelation! and how strange that Bible readers and true Christians are, many of them, blind to this blessed fact; for when we realize that suffering ones are 'bound by Satan,' according to Jesus' own word (Luke 13:16), and remember that His mission was to save us from the enemy, is the blessed truth not apparent that He bore our sicknesses on the tree as well as our sins?

"I saw what a wonderful privilege was held out to me, and gladly trusted my body to Him, as I had happily done my soul for some years. I spent the night of February 26th at the Faith Rest where Miss W. J. L. prayed for me. Although I felt no instantaneous healing, as have some, yet since the moment I trusted our Saviour as my Physician, I have considered myself healed, and have increased daily in strength, according to my faith, being now able to undertake many things long denied me. I have used no remedies or appliances of any kind, upon which I was dependent at the time of my healing, and which, I had been told, I would probably have to use two years.

"Several times have the old pains in the head and back, with weaknesses, returned, causing me to falter at first, but I learned from your precious 'Prayer of Faith' how to combat these temptations of the devil; and looking away from self at Him who is 'the Author and Finisher of our faith,' and our 'ever-present help in trouble,' I have been enabled to continue what I was doing, trusting Him for the necessary strength; and it always comes!

"With bodily strength has come to me a clearer vision of 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' and every day I so long to be doing more in His service, that I make the prophet's words my oft-repeated prayer, 'Here am I, send me!'

"For the help of others who are striving to learn 'the way,' I will say I have gained much light and benefit from Dr. A. J. Gordon's book, entitled 'The Ministry of Healing.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Presidential Election will Take Place before the next number of this journal is issued. All the States will on Tuesday next elect Presidential electors. The Electoral College this year will be composed of 401 electors, and 201 will be necessary to a choice. Three States—Florida, New Hampshire, and Tennessee—also elect their respective governors on that day. Nineteen States will also elect their Legislature, and thirty-four will elect Congressmen. The interest of the election of course turns upon the choice of President. It is this year, more than is usually the case, impossible to forecast the result. The organs of the opposite political parties have made canvasses and have arrived at opposite conclusions, and in each case the organs declare themselves sure of victory for the party they respectively represent. The campaign has been one of the most remarkable in our history for the fierce rancor and the bitter personal feeling displayed. Patriotic citizens who, if the country were in danger from a foreign foe, would stand shoulder to shoulder in its defence, are now showering abuse on each other and hate each other as enemies. We trust that as in past times the close of the contest will be the end of this animosity, and that whatever the issue may be, all men, and especially all Christian men, will accept it cheerfully, and remember that they are brethren. May God save and bless the Republic!

Many Citizens who have Read the Extracts from English journals published last week by the daily press are discouraged by the ridicule and ill-natured criticism they contain. There is no need to be disturbed by these English critics. In affecting to pity us because our candidates for the Presidency are not satisfactory to the bulk of the people, the critics overlook the fact that they are in worse case. We have the power to choose the man who will be our chief executive, and the fact of the criticism of the moral character of the men who aspire to the office being so thorough, proves that we are careful on that score. If all that is charged against Mr. Blaine and Mr. Cleveland were true, either of them is a better man and would be a better ruler than men who have sat on the English throne within the memory of men still living. Under monarchical institutions the throne is secured to the heir of the reigning monarch, and the people have no power to prevent him sitting there, though he were proved to be the worst of mankind. Criticism of Republican institutions comes with bad grace from England.

Another Republican Revolt was Declared last week. The Stalwart wing of the party, so far as it is represented in ex-Senator Conkling's district, declares that it will not vote for Mr. Blaine. About sixty of them have signed an address declaring their reasons for separating themselves temporarily from their party. The significance of their attitude consists in the fact that hitherto the Stalwarts, unlike the Independent Republicans, have been remarkable for their loyalty to the party and its candidates. It will be remembered, that in spite of the severe disappointment they experienced at the National Convention of 1880, they turned out and worked for the election of Gen. Garfield, whose nomination was particularly disagreeable to them. Now, however, the Utica men, who are influential with their section of the party, refuse to vote for Mr. Blaine. The reasons they give for their action are the same reasons as those assigned by the Independents, but it is surmised that the real reasons are proofs recently published that Mr. Blaine encouraged the opposition to Judge Folger in 1882, and that he was responsible for certain anti-Stalwart articles published in the Tribune in 1880. The Republican managers aver that the support they are promised from bolting Democrats more than counterbalances the defection of Independents and Stalwarts.

The Hope of an Honest Vote and a Fair count in New York City next Tuesday loses strength by the events of last week. Tammany Hall has put a city ticket of her own in the field, the County Democracy has put a second ticket in the field, and the Republicans have put a third. The returns will be closely scrutinized. There is a strong suspicion that a bargain has been made by which Tammany votes will be given to Blaine in return for Republican votes given to the Tammany candidate for the Mayoralty. It will be very disgraceful if this has been done, and the candidates themselves ought to be the first to condemn the fraud played on the voters. In 1880 there was ground for suspicion that the same trick was carried out; if it is done again this year, Tammany and its "honored leader" will earn the contempt of the whole nation. We are not interested in Mr. Cleveland's election—we do not believe either he or Mr. Blaine is a fit man to be made President of the United States—but we are interested in having honesty at the ballot-box, and we protest against the Presidency being won by a corrupt bargain. Let the Tammany voters look well at their ballots before they deposit them in the box.

A Postal Treaty with Mexico was Signed on October 20th for reduction of rates and improved service. The convention still requires ratification by the Mexican Senate, which is now in session, and approval by the President of the United States. It will, if ratified and approved, of which there is no doubt, go into effect on January 1st. Under this convention the postal systems of the two Republics as to their international postal relations will be unified. United States domestic postage rates and conditions will apply to mail matter for Mexico, except samples of merchandise, ores, etc., packets of which, though liable to the domestic rates, are to be restricted to twelve ounces in weight and twelve by eight by four inches in size.

Gen. Hazen, in his Report to the Secretary of War, refers to the Arctic Relief Expedition, and suggests the propriety of a Congressional investigation. He thinks that the departure of the Yantic, after the loss of the Proteus, from Littleton Island to St. Johns, without leaving provisions, was practically an abandonment of Lieutenant Greely and his party to probable starvation by the officers whose only mission in those waters was to succor them, and therefore displayed a lamentable disregard of grave responsibilities. He holds that if Lieutenant Garlington had insisted upon leaving rations from the Yantic, or if another relief vessel had been sent from St. Johns, as he says he himself urged, loss of life and disaster would have been averted. He therefore trusts "that this whole matter of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, and the expeditions organized for its relief, will be deemed worthy of a thorough investigation by Congress." We are for once in accord with Gen. Hazen, and we hope that if a committee is appointed it will not omit to ascertain whether Gen. Hazen himself did his duty. Twenty-two lives were sacrificed at Cape Sabine, and the six survivors suffered horribly; if a Congressional committee can find out who was responsible for the fatal blunder which entailed consequences so appalling, that man ought to be put in a position in which he can do no further harm to any one but himself.

A Warning to the Commissioners of Emgration has been given by the Treasury Department. It appears that the example of England in sending her Irish paupers here is being followed by Germany. Our consul at Bremen reported last month that one pauper family had already been sent to America by the local authorities at Berhave, and that another pauper criminal had been released from jail after an imprisonment of five years on condition that he emigrated to America. The consul warned the steamship company against carrying him, but an examination of the passengers proved that he was on board, and that, in addition to his passage ticket, he had an order for money on the shipping agents in New York. Other pauper criminals are being sent, and the Commissioners are directed to be on their guard.

The Hundredth Birthday of Sir Moses Montfiore was celebrated on Sunday last by the Jews of America. The venerable philanthropist was born on October 24th, but as the Jewish day commences at sunset, he has always kept the 25th as his birthday. This year the English committee fixed the 26th as the day of celebration, in order to cover differences in the two calendars. The occasion was appropriately celebrated in New York by the opening of a new charitable institution, called the Montefiore Home for Chronic Invalids. Services were held in commemoration in all the synagogues, and several Christian organizations published congratulatory resolutions. The day was similarly observed by the Jews in other American cities.

Half a Millian Dollars have been Given by Mr. William H. Vanderbilt to the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York for the purchase of real estate and the erection of a building which shall enable the institution more successfully to fulfil the purposes for which it was founded. The gift is not intended as an endowment or for the establishment of professors' chairs, but as a building fund; the edifice now occupied by the college being in many respects inadequate. Among many medical men there exists the desire and hope—which are fully shared by Mr. Vanderbilt—that the New York medical school should rank with the schools of Paris and Vienna.

The Prohibitionists have but Little Money to spend in hiring headquarters and in organizing clubs. It may be useful, therefore, to Prohibition voters to learn the names and addresses of gentlemen in their respective States who will supply electoral tickets and give information. The following is the list furnished by the National Prohibition Committee: Arkansas—J. Palmer, Little Rock; California—D. C. Bacock, San Francisco; Colorado—E. S. St. John, Denver; Connecticut—A. R. Heath, Danbury; Indiana—M. E. Shiel, Indianapolis; Iowa—W. Brady, Davenport; Kansas—A. M. Richardson, Lawrence; Kentucky—Green Clay Smith, Louisville; Louisiana—L. Ponsonby Webb, Washington Street, New Orleans; Maine—F. Woodbury, Auburn; Maryland—William Daniel, 34 N. Calvert Street, Baltimore; Massachusetts—Henry H. Faxon, Quincy; Michigan—Samuel Dickie, Albion; Missouri—M. Watson, 513 Chestnut Street, St. Louis; Nebraska—A. G. Wolfenbarger, 1036 O Street, Lincoln; New Hampshire—C. H. Hovey, Manchester; New Jersey—E. Edgar Hunt, Gardner; New York—Frederick Gates, Fraufort; North Carolina—F. S. Blair, Summerfie; Ohio—D. W. Gage, Cleveland; Pennsylvania—D. Swoger, Sixth Street, Pittsburg; South Carolina—T. B. Crews, Laurens, C. H.; Tennessee—R. L. Hayes, Nashville; Texas—E. Dohoney, Paris; Vermont—J. R. Bartlett, Middlesex; Virginia—William Daniel, 34 N. Calvert Street, Baltimore, Md.; West Virginia—Dave Johnson, Parkersburg; Wisconsin—C. Richmond, Madison.

The Extraordinary Session of the British Parliament was opened on October 22d. The Queen's speech was read by proxy. It simply informed the members that the session had been called to deal with the franchise question and to vote an appropriation for the expenses of the Gordon relief expedition. Incidentally it praised Gen. Gordon for his "energy, courage, and resource." Political excitement is at fever heat, as the constitutional question is not settled. It appears certain that Mr. Gladstone will ask the House of Lords to pass the bill extending the franchise to the householders in rural districts. It seems equally certain that the Lords, under the guidance of the Marquis of Salisbury, will refuse to pass the bill until a project for the redistribution of the electoral districts has been introduced. Each house suspects the other of an attempt at gerrymandering. Large and excited meetings are being held in the large cities, the object of which is to induce the government to agitate for the curtailing of the veto power of the House of Lords or to abolish it as a legislative house altogether. The session of Parliament now commenced will be a momentous one unless the Lords yield. Grave constitutional changes seem to be imminent.

The Secretary for Ireland in Mr. Gladstone's cabinet has resigned his office. Mr. Trevelyan, like his predecessors in the office, is extremely unpopular in Ireland. His resignation is believed to be due to the opposition of the Irish members, who are certain to oppose any one appointed to the office. It is stated that Mr. Trevelyan's resignation has been accepted in order to conciliate the Irish in the House of Commons, who will now be expected to support the government in its constitutional struggle. Strangely enough, Mr. Trevelyan's successor is Mr. Bannerman, a Scotchman, who is utterly ignorant of Ireland, and who is comparatively an unknown man. The Parnellites are now agitating for the removal of Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The Berlin Conference on the Congo Question will probably be held in spite of predictions to the contrary. Mr. Frelinghuysen has instructed Mr. Kasson, our Minister at the German court, to represent the United States. The government displaying most reluctance to join the conference is that of England, but it is now stated that English ojections have been overcome. Both Germany and France are in favor of limiting the extent of the British operations in the Congo country. A German newspaper asserts, however, that England will have friends at the conference. It says the American Government has given Germany to understand that it will not sustain the enterprise if directed against England. Portugal sides with England rather than risk her pretension to the possession of the mouth of the Congo. Holland, distrusting Germany, is inclined to see in all action against England a strategic movement, of which the final object is the annexation of Holland. Italy's colonial interests are opposed to those of the French, and she also supports England.

The Claim to the Grand Duchy of Brunswick advanced by the Duke of Cumberland, a cousin of Queen Victoria, has little chance of success. He issued a manifesto last week informing the people over whom he wishes to reign that he intends to demand his rights, and also formally notified the Emperor of Germany that the Duke of Brunswick was dead, and that he, being the legitimate heir to the throne, proposed to take possession. A messenger from Berlin on Saturday arrived in the Brunswick Diet bearing a letter from Emperor William rejecting the claim of the Duke of Cumberland to the Grand Ducal throne, and approving the measures of the Council of Regency against "the Pretender." The Duke of Cambridge, another cousin of Queen Victoria, is, after the Duke of Cumberland, the next heir, but his claims are not more popular. The German press is utilizing the occasion to denounce the system of foreigners aspiring to German thrones. They hint not only at the Duke of Cambridge's claims to the Brunswick succession, but at the Duke of Edinburgh's heirship to the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and intimate that either of the English dukes would find it very difficult to maintain his claims. The English people seem supremely indifferent to the fortunes of their royal dukes. A century ago they would have gone to war on the question, but the dukes are not so important as they used to be.

The Political Ferment in Belgium has Lost none of its virulence. At Courtrai, at Hasselt, and at other places collisions have occurred between the Clericals and the Liberals, and rioting has been the consequence. Shots were fired into a crowd near Malines, which took deadly effect. One person was killed outright, and four others were wounded. The Premier and several members of his cabinet have resigned, but the agitation still continues. The leading journal asserts that the education question, which is the immediate cause of the excitement, will be the subject of concession. The people are determined that the public schools shall not be under the control of the priests, and the new ministry will endeavor to disarm opposition by requiring all schoolmasters, clerical or lay, to be Belgians. The concession, though an important one, is declared by the people to be insufficient.

The Dispute between England and the Boers will, it is hoped, be amicably settled without resorting to extreme measures by the appointment of a British Commissioner, as provided for in the treaty, to delimit and define the boundary of the Transvaal. The Boers deny that there has been any breach of the London convention, and in support of their claim point to the fact that by the terms of the convention the Transvaal Government was to appoint one commissioner and the British Government another to delimit and define the boundary of the Transvaal. The Transvaal Government claims that it could not be held responsible for the actions of the citizens until the limits of the territory were defined.

The Gordon Relief Expedition is Costing an enormous sum of money, owing to the difficulty of sending supplies. The radical members of Parliament are opposed to voting the necessary appropriation, and the cabinet have sent to Lord Wolseley warning him against exceeding the estimated expenses. Lord Wolseley's reply was a threat. He said that if his demands for money and supplies were not granted he should tender his resignation. The Government decided to comply with his wishes.

The Claimant to the Tichborne Estates, whose trial in England in 1873 caused much excitement, was released from prison on October 20th. His friends had planned to give him a welcome at the prison gates and make a demonstration in his honor. The government outwitted them by removing him secretly from the Penitentiary to a prison near London, and there setting him at liberty three days before he was legally entitled to his discharge. A subscription has been raised for him, and he will be enabled to live in comparative comfort. A large number of the workingmen still believe that he is Sir Roger Tichbone, in spite of his failure to bear cross-examination, and his many blunders.

The Work of the Salvation Army in India is criticised in a gentle and Christian spirit by the Indian Witness, which says that the organ of the Army continues to publish glowing reports of the work among the villagers of Gujerat. "We note the language of these reports carefully, and try to form as correct an estimate of the work as possible, but as yet we are in doubt about some of its features. We are fully prepared to hear that many of the converts are unsatisfactory, but even if it should turn out that some of the leaders are bad men, we would not conclude that all had been wrong. We regret, however, to notice that the strife with the missionaries continues, and are waiting to hear that the Salvationists have moved on into a region where no Christians are found, and where there is no missionary to molest them or make them afraid."

THOUGHT-READING EXTRAORDINARY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Lord, Thou hast heard the desire of the humble: Thou wilt prepare their heart, Thou wilt cause thine ear to hear."—PSALM 10: 17.

Faith's Accurate Logic—The Desire of the Humble the Lowliest Form of Prayer—I. May be True and Acceptable—May be Unattended by Speech—Tawdry Prayers—The Praying Man May be Despondent — Better to be Humble than Humbled—II. God Hears it Quickly—A Divine Science—Exercised in all Ages—III. The Heart the Main Matter—A Child Intoning a Request—The Baggage of Prayer—Success Certain—IV. God Prepares the Heart — Restraining Wandering Thoughts—V. Must be Heard.

NOTICE at the outset the logic of this verse. It is very simple, very forcible, very accurate logic. It runs thus: "Thou hast," "thou wilt." "Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the humble; thou wilt prepare their heart." When you know that the Lord God is immutable, "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," you may conclude without mistake that what He has done He is prepared to do again. The argument from the past to the future would be a sorry one if you were dealing with fallible man; for what man has done is no sure guarantee of what he may do; he is such a creature of freaks and whims; but when you have to deal with the Eternal God, who is faithful and true, and changes not, you may reckon with safety that the thing which has been is the thing which shall be. Well did the apostle say, "Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that He will yet deliver us."

Because our Good Shepherd has made us to lie down in green pastures, we argue that there is no cause for fear though we walk through the valley of death-shade, and from that we surely gather that goodness and mercy shall follow us all the days of our lives. Such reasoning is as accurate as the demonstrations of geometry. The Lord will never leave us to be ashamed of our hope. Learn this logic, and it will stand you in good stead in times of distress, when nothing but certainty will sustain you. The Lord is good, and therefore He will be good; He will keep the feet of His saints, and because He will do this we shall enter His palace with joy.

Apply this logic to prayer. God has answered prayer, and therefore He will answer it. Of this first statement many of us are witnesses. The evidences of that truth are with us in daily experience; we have proofs of the power of prayer as innumerable as the stars of heaven. Because the Lord has heard us out of His holy place we infer that He will still hear us, and therefore as long as we live will we call upon Him. This is no casual thing, but it is Jehovah's perpetual name and standing memorial—the God that heareth prayer. Never while the earth endureth will He forsake the throne of grace and turn a deaf ear to the cries of His suppliant Israel.

The subject of this morning is thus introduced to you. It is necessary that you pray, for to their helper; and it is profitable that you pray, for the bosoms of suppliants are filled with benedictions. It is not a vain thing to wait upon God; it is your comfort, your strength, your life. If you seek honor it should be your delight to pray; for nothing is more ennobling than to win the ear of the Lord of all. A man admitted to audience with the Most High is honored in an unspeakable degree.

We shall speak this morning in the way of five observations drawn from our text. May each one be made profitable to us by the power of the Holy Spirit.

I. Our first observation is written upon the surface of the Scripture before us—the lowliest form of prayer may be most

TRUE AND ACCEPTABLE.

And what is that lowliest form of prayer? Is it not described in the text? "The desire of the humble." It is not the prayer of the serene faith of Abraham, nor the wrestling of energetic Jacob, nor the intercession of prevailing Moses, nor the pleading of holy Samuel, nor the commanding cry of Elias shutting and opening heaven; it is only a desire—a motion of the heart toward good things; and yet the Lord hears it. Indeed, the lowliest form of prayer may be the truest; for the essence of all real prayer is desire. Words are but the living tenant is desire. We see from our text that desires are prevailing prayers; for the Lord has made a point of hearing them: "Thou hast heard the desire of the humble." Other forms of prayer may be attractive to man, and yet they may have no influence whatever with the living God; but this manner of supplication has been successful from of old, even as it is written, "He will fulfil the desire of them that fear Him," and again, "The desire of the righteous shall be granted." In fact, prayer is desire, as our poet puts it:

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Utter'd or unexpress'd;
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast."

The lowest form of true prayer secures the ear of the Highest, and what more is needed?

TAWDRY PRAYERS.

Observe, it is only a desire: "the desire of the humble." A desire may be altogether unattended by speech. The suppliant may not be able to put his desire into words at all; he may be too sorrowful, his emotion may choke his utterance; he may be too quiet, and so may be quite unversed in the use of speech. He may be only able to pour forth groanings that cannot be uttered, and tears whose eloquence is silent; yet God is pleased to hear the desire which lacks expression. Many prayers are very prettily expressed; in fact, they are expressed so grandly that their tawdry fineries will not be tolerated in heaven. Those prayers will never enter heaven's gate which are meant to catch the applause of man. God will say, "They were meant for men, and let men have them." He does not stoop to accept man's leavings, and if a prayer is meant to be a feast for man, God will not be a second-rate guest at its table.

On the other hand, many sincere persons condemn themselves because they cannot offer public prayer as their brethren do; they even tremble, perhaps, to pray before their families, and this is a grief to them. I think, if they are men, they should prove their manhood by overcoming such diffidence. I would urge them to make the attempt with much resolution and perseverance; but should they fail in it through positive inability, there will be cause for regret, but no reason for self-condemnation. There may be more prayer in the silent than in the fluent. God has heard prayers which nobody else could possibly have heard, because there was no vocal sound about them. So quick is the ear of God that He heareth that which is not properly the subject of hearing; the true prayer which abides in silence shall not meet with a silent God.

Note again, that this desire may be unaccompanied by any confident expectation. When you pray you ought to believe the promise and expect its fulfilment. It is the duty and the privilege of every suppliant to believe that when he prays in the name of Jesus he must and shall be heard. But sometimes humility, which is a good thing, is attended by a which is an evil thing; and this much hinders prayer. Humility is deceived by unbelief and so it gives way to the dark thought that its poor feeble prayer will not speed with God. I fear that in some cases this want of expectancy is an effectual barrier to prayer, and prevents its being answered; but it is forgiven to naturally despondent, heavily-laden spirits, whose fears are not so much doubts of God as a deeply humiliating judgment of themselves. It is not so much the case that their faith is sinfully defective as that they have a painfully acute sense of their own unworthiness; and so when they cry they hope that the Lord will hear them, and they mean to wait upon Him till He does; but they are sore afraid. My brethren, I would chide your unbelief, but I would still encourage your desires; for that desire which God hears is not to be despised.

This leads me to observe that this commencing form of prayer which the Lord nevertheless hears, is here further described as "the desire of the humble." It has this advantage about it, that it is free from pride. Some men's prayers, if they were to pray them as their foolish heart really desires, would be requests that they might be made famous. Startle not when I say it—I fear that many men proudly ask to be humble; they desire to be humble in order that they may be admired for it. Have we not all found that in the rushing stream of our earnest zeal there will be some back water, which runs not toward God but toward ourselves? Have we not even striven to win souls that we might be notable as soul-winners? "Come with me, and see my zeal for the Lord," has been the language of many a Jehu. Oh, it is HARD TO KEEP OUT PRIDE!

May the Lord keep us humble if we are so, and make us humble if we are not so. I believe every Christian man has a choice between being humble and being humbled. Now, to be humble is a sweet thing; there is no lovelier spot on the road to the celestial city than the Valley of Humiliation; he that lives in it dwells among flowers and birds, and may sing all day long, like the shepherd boy whose song ran thus;

"He that is down need fear no fall,
He that is low no pride;
He that is humble ever shall Have God to be his guide."

"The desire of the humble" is saturated with a Gospel spirit, and therefore is acceptable with the God of all grace. Pride seems born of the law, though I scarce know why it should be; for the law censures and condemns. Humility is the child of the Gospel, and is brought up upon the knees of grace. If thou wouldst be a child of God thou must be lowly in thine own esteem. If thou wouldst be heard in prayer thou must come to God as needy and empty. Let us have done with merits and deserts, and let this be our cry, "For thy mercy and for thy truth's sake, and for thy Son's sake, hear thou the voice of my prayer." This is the proper Gospel spirit; but if we plead in any other fashion, we shall be sent empty away.

Still, this "desire of the humble" is apt to be somewhat restricted and straitened. If we contract our desires to the measure of our deserts, they will shrivel into nothing; for our deserts are less than nothing. It is ill to pray according to your sense of what you have a right to ask. You have a legal right to ask for nothing but justice, and who among us can abide its action apart from Jesus? "If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?" You had better pray according to God's command, and that runs thus: "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." Forget not this first truth—that what seems to be the lowest form of prayer is, nevertheless, true prayer.

II. Our second point is full of comfort to those who have begun to pray.

GOD IS QUICK TO HEAR

the lowliest prayer: "Thou hast heard the desire of the humble." This must be a divine science—this art of hearing desires. We have heard a good deal lately about thought-reading. I give no opinion of that matter among men; but here is a wonderful instance of it with the Lord. "Thou hast heard the desire of the humble." This kind of desire-reading is the prerogative of God alone. He knows our desires even when we do not know them ourselves. Sitting in this Tabernacle you are desiring, but it is quite impossible for the person sitting next to you to know your wishes, and it is quite as well, perhaps, that it is so. You would not like to tell your inward feelings; perhaps your secret is too painful to be told; never mind, God's ear is so quick that He can hear your desires. Wonderful art! We should be very glad if the Lord had promised to hear us when we speak; but He has gone far beyond that, and He hears the unspeakable and unutterable.

It is an art which has been exercised by God in all ages; He does not merely possess the power, but He exercises it. I like my text for putting it in the past tense: "Thou hast heard the desire of the humble." It is a matter of frequent fact, and not merely a possible event. It is not the bare assertion of a power, but the record of a deed. All along through history, wherever gracious men have lived, their hearts have talked with God as well without words as with them. To-day let this be told; it ought not to be buried in ungrateful silence; it is mentioned in the text, let it be mentioned in your conversation.

If some here present had the opportunity, we could tell you how God has heard our desires, and how at times before the desire has actually been formed in the soul the answer has come, according to that word, "Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear." We had a desire laid upon our heart which we never communicated to any living person except the living God, and we carried that desire in our heart for weeks and months, constantly allowing it to burn in our bosom, and frequently letting it break out in groans and broken cries; and in due time our sighing reached the heart of God. As surely as we have sown in prayer we have in due season reaped a harvest of blessing. Our Lord even in Gethsemane was heard in that He feared—sure pledge to all His redeemed that they shall be heard in their hour of darkness. Happy are they who dwell in God, for they may have what they please at the mercy-seat.

Oh, I wish I could be the means of stirring some this morning to pray while sitting here! You may say, "I will pray when I get home." You may do so, if you please; but I am urging you to something more speedy. Remember the publican; it was in God's house that he prayed; though he did not dare to lift his eyes to heaven, yet he sighed in his soul this prayer, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and he went down to his house justified rather than the other. I do not ask you to withhold that prayer till you reach home; would it not be a grand thing to be saved here, and to go home justified? You shall have that unspeakable blessing now if your desire be a true one, and you pour it out at once before the Lord believingly. He has heard the like many times, and is prepared to hear you in the same manner.

III. Thirdly, we will remark that the heart is

THE MAIN MATTER IN PRAYER.

That is clearly shown in the text: "Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the humble." Desires are the fruit of the heart. "Thou wilt prepare their heart." When God comes to deal with men in a way of grace, His first business is to prepare their hearts; so that most assuredly the state of the heart is of prime importance. The heart is the source, the seat, and the essence of supplication. Prayer with the heart is the heart of prayer; the cry of our soul is the soul of our cry.

Without the heart prayer is a wretched mockery. Do not say, "I read my collect this morning;" you may read fifty collects, and be none the better; do not say, "I went through the prayer which I learned from a godly mother;" you may go through it twenty thousand times, and yet never pray once. Unless the heart speaks with God, thou hast done nothing for thine own good with all thy paternosters or other goodly words; nay, thou mayest have done something to thine own hurt in all this pretence of praying. I fear that much so-called public prayer is nothing better than presumptuous sin.

If your child should come to you and ask a favor in an affected voice, would you notice him? If, instead of saying, "Dear father, I want so and so," he should take up a book and intone such words as these, "Dearly beloved father, I have to request of thee that thou in thy great affection wilt give unto me such and such things," you would not regard his nonsense. You would say, "Come, boy, what do you want? Tell me plainly;" and if he continued to intone, you would drive him out of the room, perhaps with the aid of your foot. I fear that this praying in sing-song is the most fearful mockery God ever hears. Fancy Peter, when he was beginning to sink, intoning, "Lord, save me." When the heart really gets to speak with God, it cannot talk in affected tones; it throws such rubbish overboard.

But cannot a man pray with his heart and yet use a written prayer? Certainly he can. Many have done so for years. If you cannot walk without your crutches, I would sooner you walked with them than not at all. Still, it is not the best words put together by the most devout men that ever lived, nor the holiest language composed extemporaneously by yourself, that can make up prayer if the heart be gone. Words are seldom more than

THE BAGGAGE OF PRAYER.

Language at best is but the flesh in which prayer is embodied; the desire of the heart is the life of the prayer. See thou to thy heart, for God sees to it: "Thou wilt prepare their heart." Sometimes the Lord puts words into men's mouths; He says, "Take with you words, and come unto me," and thus He prepares words for their use; but in general the main concern with God is that the heart be prepared to plead with Him.

Success comes to the prayer of a glowing heart. When the soul grows warm, and the spirit is fervent, and desires are strong, then, brother, do not spare thy prayers. Set apart a longer season for private devotion when the soul is all alive and active in it. At another time you may have to try very hard and make but small progress, for the chariot wheels may be taken off; let it not at such a time be a source of regret that you wasted a happier season. Cease not to obtain blessings beyond number both for thyself, for the church, and for a perishing world; but take heed that thy heart be found greatly exercised with longings of soul before God.

IV. Fourthly, God Himself

PREPARES THE HEARTS

of His people. "Thou wilt prepare their heart." I am greatly rejoiced by this statement that God will prepare our hearts to pray, because it is a most important business on which so much depends. On the heart the whole machinery of life depends, and it needs preparing, especially for devotion. You cannot spring out of bed and on every occasion pray in a moment without thought or reflection; you cannot say to yourself, "I have just been listening to ungodly talk; and now I am going to pray." It will be poor, pitiful praying which springs up from the barren soil of thoughtlessness. We need preparation in coming into the courts of the Lord's house; the soul had need put her shoes from off her feet because the place is holy.

But this preparation is often as difficult as it is needful; and therefore it is a great mercy that our God undertakes to work it in us. Surely none but the Lord can prepare a heart for prayer. One old writer says it is far harder work to raise the big bell into the steeple than to ring it afterward. This witness is true. When the bell is well hung you can ring it readily enough; but in that uplifting of the heart lies the work and the labor. Before musicians begin to play, they attend to their strings and see that their instruments are in order; you wish that the operation could be dispensed with, but it cannot be, and it is one of the most needful parts of the musician's work. Until he has learned to tune his instrument, what does he know? Until he has tuned it, what can he do? I wish we were all made ready, as a people prepared for the Lord.

One of the most difficult things in preparation for prayer is the restraining of

LOOSE AND WANDERING THOUGHTS.

I do not know how perfect brethren keep themselves free from every evil thought, for I find myself defeated often when I would shut out these vile intruders. Honestly, I may express my belief that these carnal boasters have as many vain thoughts as other people. The ravenous birds will come down upon the sacrifice, even when Abraham offers it, and it costs infinite pains to drive them away. Intruding thoughts surround us like a plague of flies; they are here, and there, and everywhere. It is well, indeed, that God should prepare our hearts; for in this one point our weakness is complete. "Thou wilt prepare their heart."

Next, the Lord prepares His people's hearts by giving them a deep sense of what they want. I know your grief, and your temptation, and your misery, and the crying out of your spirit under the lashes of conscience; but all this is right, thus you are instructed in the art and mystery of supplication. Nobody cries to Christ so well as the man who is beginning to sink. When a man out of the anguish of his heart cries for mercy, then he begins to search out and lay hold upon the promise. The Lord also works in us strong faith, holy perseverance, and high expectancy, and in all these ways He prepares our hearts to pray. "Thou wilt prepare their heart;" this is wonderful condescension on God's part, and on our part we ought to feel the utmost encouragement to prepare our own hearts for earnest supplication.

V. Lastly, prayer from prepared hearts

MUST BE HEARD.

"Thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear." I wish you would join these two sentences together in your minds, and carry them home with you. Let the two bells ring in harmony. "Thou wilt prepare their heart; thou wilt cause thine ear to hear." Ring them over and over again; and let their blended music linger in your ear. If God has had love enough to prepare your heart to pray, He has grace enough to give you the blessing. The more difficult thing of the two is not to give the blessing, but to prepare your heart to cry for it; if He has done the one He will certainly do the other. Consider the truthfulness, and the faithfulness, and the goodness of God, and you will see that it is not possible that He should teach a man to pray for a blessing which He will not give. I cannot imagine any one of you tantalizing your child by exciting in him a desire that you do not intend to gratify. It were a very ungenerous thing to offer alms to the poor, and then, when they hold out their hand for it, to mock their poverty with a denial. It were a cruel addition to the miseries of the sick, if they were taken to the hospital and there left to die untended and uncared for. Where God leads you to pray He means you to receive. You find a holy desire in your heart; the Lord put that desire into your heart, and for the honor of His infinite majesty, lest He stain His goodness and dishonor His great name, He must hear you.

With what comfort would I address those here who are beginning to pray. I know I speak to some who are uneasy, unrestful; you tell us you are seeking peace, that day and night a desire for salvation occupies the entire chamber of your soul. Well, this did not come from your own nature; neither the devil nor the old Adam has taught you to pray. Dear hearer, be sure that the great Father who is moving you to cry to Him is hearing you—He is inclining His ear to catch the faintest moan of your spirit. Believe that He is hearing you. Cast yourself at the feet of His dear Son. Behold the wounds of Jesus; let these invite you to draw nigh to God. I know of no such eloquent mouths as the wounds of the dying Lord. Let them persuade you to come to Jesus, to trust, to rest at His dear feet; for since He has inclined your heart to pray He is about to hear you and bless you. The Lord be with you for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MISSIONARY TRIUMPHS IN CHINA.

One of the Wesleyan Missionary Society's agents narrates the following:

Ling Seng-Ki is a steward in the Methodist circuit of Hung-ting. One Sunday evening, when returning home from church, he was

WAYLAID BY THREE MEN IN THE VILLAGE.

They took him to the house of one of their number, where they gave him supper, then deliberately led him to the newly-repaired temple, for which he had refused to give aid, and there, in the presence of over twenty villagers, his hands were bound together with a cord behind his back; a rope was then attached to this cord and passed over a beam, by which he was drawn up a foot or more from the ground, and suspended in excruciating torture for more than an hour. He prayed aloud for his persecutors. They continued to demand of him pledges of money. He finally said, "If you want my little property, take it; if you want my life, that, too is in your power." Then they let him down. They did take his property to the amount of half his little all. "I saw Brother Ling a month afterward," writes the missionary, "happy in the love of Jesus, and with no words of bitterness against his persecutors."

A DISTRACTED HUSBAND.

A Chinese woman thus describes her husband's state of mind while under conviction of sin: "In the eighth year of the Emperor Lung Tai (six years ago), first month, twelfth night, I saw my husband in a very wonderful condition. He would cry, then kneel down, get up again, and kneel down again, and so for a long time. Then suddenly he seemed very happy. I did not understand the business at all. Afterward I saw he was very much changed from what he was before. Seeing this I was very glad, but I could not understand why or how he had been changed." She adds a word about herself: "When I saw him reading a book of hymns I read it with him; also the colloquial New Testament. Then I quickly understood the whole, and my heart was very glad and greatly rejoiced to receive the Doctrine Preacher, and trusted Him to teach me how to be saved, how to believe and trust, and how to hope for heaven's happiness. The Holy Spirit made it all plain to me, and showed me Jesus."

In the Ning-Taik district, where the Rev. Ting Sing-ki labors in connection with the Church Missionary Society, Mr. Lloyd notices the baptisms of some leading men of and the consternation thereby caused, and says: "But the most wonderful proof of the power of the Gospel at Ning-Taik has been the conversion of a man sixty-five years of age, who occupies a position somewhat similar to that of a priest among the vegetarians. I first saw him in March at the idol-temple of the vegetarians, outside the North Gate at Ning-Taik, and at that time Mr. Ting and I had some conversation with him and others respecting the doctrine of Jesus; and as we left, we asked him, as we usually do, to come to the chapel when he had leisure. He then seemed to treat the whole matter as a joke, and I was very much surprised when I next visited Ning-Taik, some months later, to hear that he had been present at the services the Sunday before, although he had refused to kneel in prayer with the rest. The following Sunday, when I was present, I was most pleased to see him sitting with the rest and kneeling with us in prayer. The influence of this man has been very great in the neighborhood of Ning-Taik, and he has been the means of persuading over one hundred persons to embrace vegetarianism. These, his children, as they are called, are in great consternation, and know not what to do. We have good reason to hope that many of them will follow the example of their leader and teacher, and become followers of Christ."

OTHER WORKERS IN THE FIELD.

Besides the Church Missionary Society, the agents of the London Missionary Society, the American Board of Foreign Missions, the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Baptists, and last, though by no means least, the China Inland Mission have established stations in the various provinces of China, with gratifying and promising results. The following clearly prove that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth, in China as well as elsewhere.

TESTIMONIES OF CONVERTS

"I am addicted to every sin you can imagine," said Liu Kin Shan to Rev. Griffith John. "I am an opium-smoker, a fornicator, a gambler, a drunkard, an unfilial son, and everything that is bad. Can Jesus Christ save me?' He had strolled into the chapel at Hankow. The preacher said, "Yes." They prayed; an instantaneous conversion followed, and Liu, now fifty years old, is the centre of a Gospel work in his own locality, where previously he was widely known as a notorious libertine.

A PROPRIETOR OF A GAMBLING HELL

in Cheh-Kiang Province heard a Chinese Christian preaching in the streets of his own city. "The Saviour of whom I speak is mighty to save," he said; "He is able to cure the opium-smoker of his opium-smoking; the gambler of his propensities for gambling; the debauchee of his bad habits; and you know very well that it is useless for men who are addicted to these evils to try to cure themselves. But the Saviour whom I preach, Jesus Christ, is mighty to save." The gambling-hell proprietor said: "If this Jesus can save me He shall," and he went home and closed the gambling place; and since then the house has been used for preaching the Gospel.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Poet who was also a Composer Died at Louisville, Ky., on October 7th, under sad circumstances. He was a remarkably gifted man, whose songs are favorites in the music rooms throughout the land. He met with an actress on whom he lavished his love. Whether the actress ever returned his affection is not known. He certainly thought she loved him in return. One day he found out his mistake. He was told that his love was not reciprocated. He immediately began to drink heavily, and from that time to the day of his death he was seldom free from the influence of drink. He obtained a number of engagements on the stage, but broke them all. He could never be trusted to keep sober any length of time. Young in years, but broken down by disease, with shattered nerves and a wrecked mind, for a year or more he might have been seen lying about the bar-rooms, stupid from strong drink, his fine features bloated, and his eyes, that once kindled with the inspiration of song, glazed and heavy. Now and then a lover of music would stop in front of some of his familiar haunts to listen to a waltz or a reverie, played with the skill of a master. Sometimes, when fired by drink, he would sit at a bar-room piano and play some composition of his own with a fervor and a pathos that drew tears from those about him. After a few years he became wholly dependent on charity, and his splendid gifts left him. He sank to an utter wreck and died in a charity hospital. Men exceptionally gifted seem, like Samson and Solomon, to be more prone than ordinary people to fall through misplaced affection (Prov. 7 : 26).

JOHN KING,

The First Pledged Teetotaler.

JOHN KING, whose portrait appears on this page, was born on Christmas Day, 1795, at Walton-le-Dale, near Preston, England. He is, therefore, now in his ninety-ninth year. His parents were members of the Society of Friends. Early in life he took a deep interest in Christian work, and when Preston was divided into districts for Christian and philanthropic effort, John King had a district assigned him. There he saw much of the ruinous influence of intoxicating drink, and often talked with his friend, Mr. Livesey, on the subject.

Mr. Livesey (whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 9th) often related the result of these conversations. He used to say: "Many of us had taken a pledge never to drink spirits, but we soon saw that that was not sufficient. One Thursday (August 23d, 1832) John King was passing my shop in Church Street, Preston, and I invited him in, and after discussing this question, upon which we were both agreed, I asked him if he would sign the pledge of Total Abstinence, to which he consented. I then went to a desk and wrote out one (the precise words of which I don't remember). He came up to the desk, and I said, 'The sign it first.' He did so, and I signed it after him." This first step led to the second, which was taken one week later at a meeting in the Cock-pit, specially called to consider the pledge question, when Mr. Livesey, Mr. King, and five others signed the following pledge: "We agree to abstain from all liquors of an intoxicating quality, whether ale, porter, wine, or ardent spirits, except as medicines."

Mr. King was an enthusiastic temperance worker after this, though continuing in business. In 1869, when he was seventy-four years of age, financial reverses came upon him. He was almost blind, and he was threatened with utter destitution. The fact becoming known to the temperance societies of the United Kingdom made his comfort their charge, and a national penny subscription was started for him. This realized sufficient to purchase an annuity on which he lives comfortably.

Mr. King's most treasured possession is a gold medal presented to him in 1858 by London teetotalers. It bears this inscription: "John King, born December 25th, 1795; Signed the Teetotal Pledge, August 23d, 1832. Presented January 11th, 1858, in St. John's Hall, Clerkenwell, by Teetotal Friends in London, as a token of respect and gratitude to John King, of Preston, who was the First Man that Signed the Teetotal Pledge in England."

THE CONSCRIPT'S SUBSTITUTE.

WHILE the war of 1848 was covering the beautiful hills and valleys of Italy with the dead and wounded, a young man was, by the law of conscription, called to leave his home and his family, to whom he was more than commonly attached, for the perils of the battle-field. The tender affection of his father led him to try every means to procure a substitute. He put advertisements in the papers, made application to the recruiting officers, and offered a bounty of $400, but all in vain.

The day of departure came, and the young soldier, in silent despair, set off with his knapsack on his back, his gun on his shoulder, and filled with grief at being separated from his beloved parents. One of his cousins, who was alone in the world, having neither father, mother, brother, nor sister, was touched at the sight of his deep grief, followed him to the barracks, and having arrived at the conscript's office, he took his hand and said, "Dear Cesare, thy sorrow is worse than death to me. Come in; give me thy uniform; it will fit me as well as it does thee. I will go to the battle-field in thy stead. I am an orphan thou art not. If I should die, only remember that I have loved thee."

The conscript at first refused; he could scarcely believe that his cousin was in earnest; and if so, how could he accept the generous offer? But as the brave fellow persisted in his determination, and pleaded earnestly with him, he succeeded, at last, in persuading Cesare Manati to accept this great proof of his friendship, and they went together to the War Office to settle the substitution. One undressed himself and the other put on the military attire.

Who can tell the admiration of the parents of the redeemed conscript for the generous substitution; and their joy in seeing their beloved son relieved from the danger of dying on the battle-field? In the excess of his gratitude, the conscript's father offered the cousin $500; but he refused it, and said, "I go as a friend, not as a hireling. It is love, not money, which leads me to take Cesare's place." He went—he fought—he died! A grateful heart raised a monument to his memory, with this epitaph: "The redeemed conscript Cesare Manati, to his voluntary substitute, Carlo Donaldi." That memorial of love stood on the field of Solferino, and was battered down in the battle which raged there eleven years afterward.

It was sad that a young man so noble as to offer himself in the place of his cousin should have fallen in battle. We would rather have heard that he was saved and won honor and fame in the war. But he died, as he knew he might do when he volunteered. There was that difference in the act of the divine Substitute. Jesus knew that in becoming the Substitute for man He must die, and He willingly gave up His life. The marvel and the shame is that all that love and suffering should, so far as many are concerned, be useless. They wear the uniform of Satan's conscripts still, and are going on to eternal death unnecessarily. Christ laid down His life that they might be delivered—their deliverance has been purchased—Satan has no right to their services or their lives, but they listen to the story of their purchased deliverance as an idle tale, and are content to remain on the brink of perdition.

THE SCRIPTURE QUILT.

THE following incident of our war has found its way into an English journal. It is related by a member of the Christian Commission, whose name is not given:

"In one of the boxes sent to us by the Sanitary Commission was a patchwork quilt of unusual softness and lightness. When we opened it, we found a note pinned to it. I read as follows: 'I have made this Scripture-quilt for one of the hospital beds, for I thought that while it would be a comfort to the poor body, it might speak a word of good to the precious soul—the words are so beautiful and blessed, and full of balm and healing! May it be blessed to the dear boys in the army, among whom I have a son.'

"It was made of blocks of calico alternated with blocks of white muslin, and on every white block was written some precious Scripture text. On the central block, in letters so large as to catch the careless eye, was that 'faithful saying' in which is all our hope and strength—'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' And below it the prayer we all need to pray: 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' The head border, which should be nearest the sick man's eye, and oftenest read, had the sweetest texts of promise, love, and comfort.

"It was not long before a man sick with pneumonia was brought in, and we put our new quilt on his bed. He noticed nothing at first, he was too ill; but when he grew better, I saw him intent on the texts. 'Handy to have 'em here!' he said, pointing to them as I stood near him.

"'You know how to value them, then!' I said. 'I do,' he answered, with heartiness.

"After that I saw many studying the quilt—almost all who lay beneath it.

"At last came the boy who had best right to the comfort of our Scripture-quilt—the 'son' of whom the good woman who made it spoke in the note attached. It was a strange circumstance that he should have come to lie beneath it, but so it was.

"He had lain there nearly senseless for more than a week, when I saw him kiss the patchwork. I thought he might be wandering, or, if not, had found a text of hope or consolation that seemed to suit his need, and marked with my eye the place he had kissed, to see what it was.

"It was no text, but a calico block, the pattern a little crimson leaf on a dark ground. He kept looking at it, tears in his eyes, and I was almost sure his mind was wandering. Nay, he was most truly in his right mind, and his thoughts were at home with his mother. A bit of the gown he had so often seen her wear had carried him back to her. He kissed it again. I approached him. He looked up, and smiled through his tears.

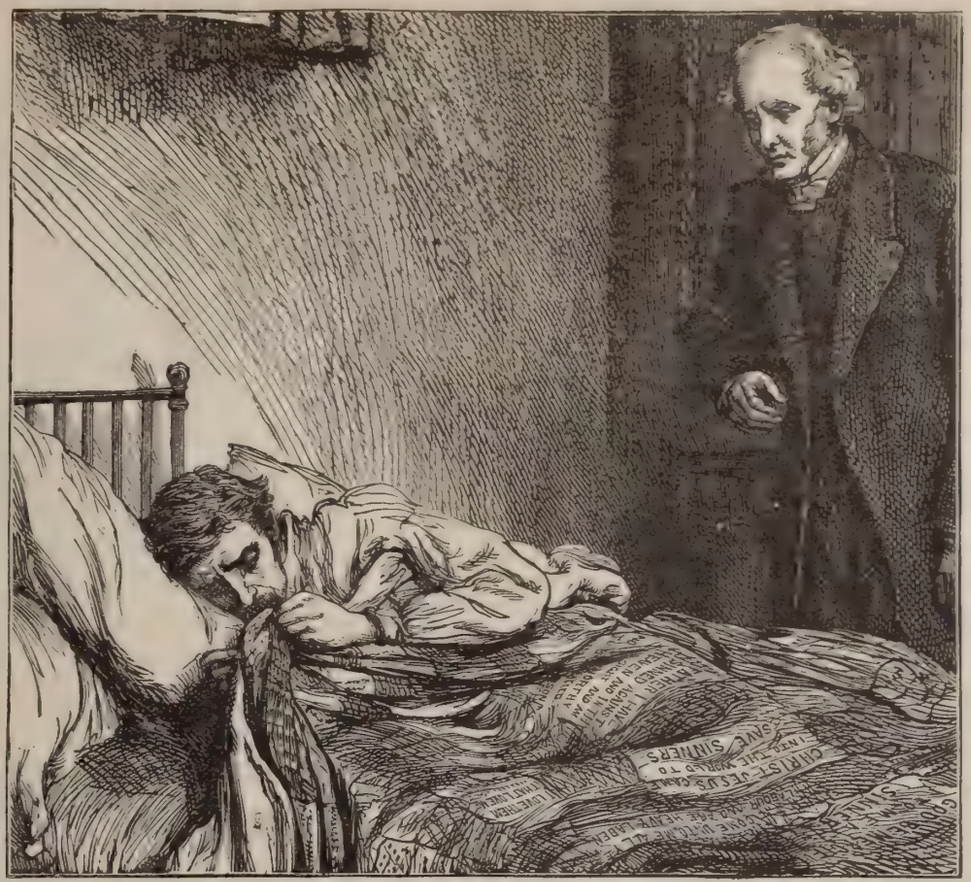
"'Do you know where this quilt came from?' he asked. 'Some good woman sent it to us through the Sanitary Commission.' 'You don't know her name nor where it came from?' 'No; but I saved a note that was pinned to the quilt.' 'Would you be willing to let me see it some time when it's convenient?' 'Oh, yes. I'll get it now.'

"I got it for him; his hand trembled and his lips grew white as he opened it and saw the writing. 'Please read it to me quite slowly,' he said, returning it. I read it. 'It is from my mother; shall you keep it?' 'Yes,' I answered, 'I value it very much, as also the quilt.' He put his hands over his eyes. I thought he wished to be alone, and left him. As I stood by his bed the next day, I was wondering if he had not seen his mother's texts, as well as the bit of her gown. He had, and pointed one out to me. It was 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.' 'I am no more worthy,' he whispered. I put my finger on the next white block, and read aloud, 'When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.'

"A few days after, when he had grown much stronger, he held up to me the text I had shown him; 'I was a great way off,' he said, 'but He has met me, and had compassion on me.'

"'Shall I not write to your mother and tell her that her son who was dead is alive again; who was lost, is found?' 'Will it not be too much trouble?' 'Oh, no; a pleasure instead.'

"I wrote the blessed tidings, making the mother's heart rejoice. And now our Scripture-quilt was even dearer and more sacred than before."



The Scripture Quilt in Hospital.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Another Sufferer.

JOHN MORLEY'S illness, though dangerous, was not of long duration, and he appeared to recover from it perfectly. But the deep fountains of his trouble had been stirred too greatly to subside quickly into their former monotony and stillness. He grew restless and unquiet; the disquietude of a man who is looking for some event to change completely, either for good or ill, the current of his life. In vain Hester sought to soothe this strange mood. Grant bade her desist from all effort to do so. It was, he said, a crisis in his mind's history, from which he might come out a new man, with a hale and happy old age lying before him. There was nothing for them to do but stand aside, and look on at the strange conflict.

"Hester," said John Morley, one evening just before sunset, "bring me my hat. I am going out for a walk."

Hester could scarcely conceal her surprise, but she brought him his hat without venturing a word of comment. He stepped across his threshold, with a dizzy sense of bewilderment, and turned his steps mechanically toward the chapel, feeling his way before him with his stick as if he were blind. The wind played in his long white hair, and breathed coolly upon his fevered face, for there was still a low, subtle fever burning in his veins. At the chapel porch where the doors were closed, he arrested himself, and stood upon the lowest step, looking about him with an air of confusion and questioning. What had he come here for? What was he doing? Where was he going?

He remained just within the portico for some minutes. He had come to the end of the bound he had set for himself and had not passed during many years. Beyond this limit, he could just catch a glimpse of trees, with their green branches waving and beckoning to him with gestures of welcome. He saw the level sunbeams burnishing richly the topmost leaves, and the evening song of the birds reached his ear. He reared his bended figure, and lifted up his snow-white head. Had he been blind and deaf to these things, and was he now going to hear and see once more? Was Christ touching with a divine finger his ears, his eyes, and saying, "Be open?" Was the hand of Christ about to loose his burden, and take it away from him forever?

He felt the wooing of the sunlighted branches and the singing of the birds through every nerve; but he could not break through the unseen barrier stretching between him and them, which he had himself erected in his despair. Until this hour he had not wished to pass beyond it. There was the lost paradise, but he had never turned longing eyes upon the cherubim and the flaming sword which kept the gates. He did so now; he desired ardently to cross the boundary; but whenever he thought of quitting the familiar portico, his feeble limbs trembled, and his sight grew dim. He wished he had brought Hester with him, that he might have leaned upon her arm, and gathered courage from the tender serenity of her face. The passers-by stared curiously at him; but they were few, and did not long interrupt his thoughts. Yet he grew ashamed of being seen there; and when some children turned riotously out of the court opposite, he resolved to retrace his steps homeward.

He said nothing to Hester when he returned, but he went back to his old arm-chair and set a book open before him and ran his paper-knife along the lines, as if, like a child, it was needful to keep the place where he was reading by pointing to it. The depths had closed over him again, after parting and giving him a brief glance of something brighter rising above them. He was laid once more in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps.

What his eyes read he did not know, though the lamp lighted up the page clearly. Hester went in and out, uttering no word to disturb him; but at last he felt her hand upon his shoulder, and he raised his dim despairing face to hers. Her eyelids were red with many tears, and her lips trembled as she spoke very slowly and distinctly, as though what she was about to say would astonish and perplex him.

"Father," she said, "do you think you could do without me for a day or two? I must go to London."

"To London!" he repeated, yet with no more than a vague, listless surprise, amounting almost to indifference, in his manner.

"Yes," she replied. "I cannot tell you why now, but you shall know some day. Carl has written for me to go there quickly. I must go to-morrow morning."

Her abrupt sentences were spoken with difficulty and deliberation, but he scarcely noticed her agitation. He always left Hester to her own judgment, and he did not think of demanding any explanation from her. The authority of a father over a daughter had never been assumed by him, and he had no energy to assume it now.

"I shall see Carl there, perhaps," she said, as if to reassure herself and him; "but I shall come home on Monday. I must be home again on Monday. To-morrow is Saturday, you know, so there will be only Sunday between. I have given Jane all the directions she needs, and Lawson's mother will come down to stay with her. You will not see either of them. It will be exactly the same as if I were here, only I shall be away."

She spoke, however, in a tone of much trouble and anxiety, and her eyes wore a look of uncertainty.

"I am going to see some one who is ill," she continued, and John Morley shrank painfully from her. "You are willing for me to go? You can trust me to do what is right? You will say, 'God bless you, and go with you'?"

"Ah!" he answered, putting his arm round her neck, and drawing down her face to his, "I could trust you with my life, Hester. Do what seems good in your sight, and God bless you and be with you always, my daughter."

"Father," she said eagerly, "I wish I dare tell you all now. Is there anything I must not speak of yet?"

He fell back from her again, holding up his hand, with a gesture of terror. He knew well how he had poured out his heart before her during his illness, but he had drawn into himself once more; and he could not bear to listen to any reference to the past from her lips.

"Spare me," he entreated, "at least to-day. When you come back—when you have been to London and seen her, perhaps then—if she is dead—you may tell me all."

Again Hester hesitated. She longed to disburden her mind of the secret which had weighed heavier since Carl left, but she dared not. She saw that her father believed her journey to London was to see Rose, and to see her as one about to die; and yet there was no softening of his voice or face as he spoke of her. It would be impossible to confess the whole to him at the very moment when she was about to be absent from home. She must wait till the right time came for her to give him the explanation she had promised. Her absence would be but a short one; it could be but short, for there was urgent need for her constant presence at home.

The cause of Hester's hurried journey to London, was a letter which she had received from Carl, telling her of the existence of Rose's child, who had lately broken a blood-vessel, and was lying in a dangerous condition in her dreary school home. True to the large pity and tenderness of her nature, Hester at once resolved to go up to London without inflicting this additional pang upon Rose, and see for herself what could be done for the forlorn little creature. The train by which she travelled left Little Aston at mid-day, but did not reach London until the evening. She had provided herself with the address of a boarding-house kept by a former inhabitant of Little Aston, and had decided to go to it at once for the night. She had Carl's address also, but she could not go to him though her heart sank a little when she found herself alone at the entrance of the busy terminus, with a maze of streets stretching before her.

She reached her destination safely, but worn-out and foot-sore. It was a dingy house in one of those old inns which have now disappeared from Holborn. She entered under a deep archway, shut in at night by large doors and kept by a watchman. Solemn silence reigned inside, and the sky lay low and flat across the roofs of the buildings, which rose to four and five stories. The watchman pointed out the house she wanted, and in a few minutes Hester was received and welcomed with something more than the usual hospitality of a lodging-house landlady. A guest from Little Aston, as she announced herself, in trembling accent, was always doubly acceptable; and very soon she felt more at home than she could have believed possible.

The school where Carl had told her Rose's little girl lived was in a street leading off from Oxford Street; and Carl's chapel lay beyond, near Hyde Park. Hester lay awake almost all night thinking over her plans, and listening to the solemn boom and hum of the great clock of St. Paul's sounding through the stillness, which seemed to her at last to have fallen over the turmoil of the city. She set out again early in the morning, with directions from her landlady.

She reached, after a long walk, the street and the house she sought. It was a dull, dirty dwelling, with the words, "Ladies Seminary," upon the wire blinds of the windows in the second floor. It looked a melancholy place to inclose a child's life; yet it was not more melancholy than the home where she had grown up. Her memory ran rapidly over the past, and her heart melted with tenderness toward the child, who had known the same loneliness and the same desertion from which she had suffered, with the dumb sufferings of childhood. She saw a servant moving about in the underground kitchen, and Hester bent down to the half-open window, and called to her softly. The girl looked out with the weary air of a person who had been sitting up all night, and came to the area steps.

"You have a child here," she said, "who is very ill. Can you let me see her?"

"I don't know," said the girl, with the caution of a town servant. "Where do you come from?"

"From the country," answered Hester; "a gentleman who comes to see her often, sent for me. His name is Bramwell."

"All right!" said the girl; "he promised to send a nurse, or somebody."

She eyed Hester scrutinizingly, nodded her approbation, and then ascending to the street door, admitted her into a narrow passage.

"How is she?" whispered Hester.

"Oh, she'll die!" answered the girl. "If she don't die, I don't know anything about dying; and I've seen three of my own sisters go out like the snuff of a candle. And such a dear little thing as she is, so loving and patient! I've sat up with her all night, and there's nobody belonging to her to be with her at the last. I don't know whatever the world is made of, or what it was made for, or where we are all going to."

"Dying!" exclaimed Hester.

"Yes," she said, vehemently; "and nobody takes any notice, and nobody believes me. They can't bear the trouble and bother of her dying, and they are afraid of it injuring the school; so they just shut their eyes to it. They'll be pretty well taken to when she does die."

"I should like to go to her at once," said Hester, with a sob.

"You can come, and you'll be all by yourselves, I promise you, this morning," she replied; "the young ladies nor my mistress don't get up on a Sunday till it is near time to go to church. Mr. Bramwell said he'd send you; and I'm glad you've come, if nobody else is."

She led the way up two dark flights of stairs and into a small room at the back of the house. It was almost filled up by a large canopy four-post bedstead, with heavy moreen hangings; lying upon which was the small, spare form of a child, with its meagre face and bright eyes turned anxiously toward the door. The forlornness of this little creature, dying alone and unloved, her very death unnoticed, smote Hester to the heart; and she sank down beside the bed, and hid her face from the searching and unquiet eyes of Rose Morley's desolate child.

"It's a good kind nurse as Mr. Bramwell has sent," said the servant; "she's going to read the Bible and pray for you, my poor dear. She'll stay all the morning with you while I'm busy; and you must ask her for anything you want."

"I don't want anything," answered the plaintive voice of the child; and Hester raised her head to look into the white face. There was a profound serenity and patience in it: a look almost of satisfaction. She smiled faintly at Hester, and stretched out her thin fingers to touch her forehead.

"You can go away now, please," she said to the servant; "and then she will begin to read and talk to me."

Hester listened to the servant's retreating steps, and then she lay down beside the child, and took her fondly and gently into her arms.

"I am come instead of your mother," she said, with difficulty restraining her tears; "you may talk to me as if I were your mother."

"Do you know my mother?" she asked.

"Oh, very well indeed, my darling," answered Hester; falling by instinct into the caressing tone and manner of a tender-hearted woman toward a child, though she had had nothing to do with any child before. "Why, she lives with me down at Little Aston; and perhaps some day you may come too, and be my little sister. It will all be as God pleases; He knows best."

"Yes," said the child, smiling; "of course He knows best. But sometimes I think if He'd only let me and my mother live together! I've lived at school all my life, and I've only seen her for a day or two, now and then. Do you know why we could not live together?"

"She was very poor," said Hester, "and she had to work very hard for herself and you."

"And my father must have been very poor, too," continued the feeble voice. "I don't think anybody else in the school was ever so poor, for they all have holidays, and I never have. The girls used to tell me such things they'd done, when they came back to school. Did you used to have holidays?"

"I never went to school," answered Hester.

"Never went to school!" she repeated, raising her feeble head a little to look into Hester's face. "How happy you must have been! But I've been at school all my life; and now I think God will let me go to have my holidays with the other children who are dead. What do you cry for? I don't know what to call you. What is your name?"

"Hester," she replied, pressing her lips upon the little hand. The child's blue eyes glistened, and her mouth quivered with surprise and delight.

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 9, 1 Kings 10 : 1-13. Golden Text, Job 28 : 28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Solomon's Magnificent Gifts—Architect, Poet, Author, and Judge—His Constant Intercourse with God—The Queen of Sheba's Visit—Her Desire for Knowledge—Her Questions Answered—How to Have Problems Solved—No Spirit Left—The Servants of the King—Their Voluntary Service—The Ascent to the House of the Lord—The Ascending Experience—The Queen's Delight and Gratitude.

"BEHOLD, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding." The intellectual gifts with which God endowed Solomon were surprising, but these would not have made him

"WISER THAN ALL MEN"

(1 Kings 4 : 31) except he had known "the fear of the Lord." We have seen him gifted as an architect and also as an administrator, but these were only a part of the wonderful gifts which God had committed to him. As a man of literature and as a poet he is known to this day, and some of his writings are in the Holy Scriptures: "He spake three thousand proverbs: and his songs were a thousand and five." He was versed in botany, for "he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall;" as a naturalist "he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." Added to this he had "wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the seashore" (1 Kings 4 : 29-33). A large heart is always a learning heart, one which has room to admit the contributions of other minds to its store of wisdom. "And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt." Why? He was in continual communion with Him who is the source of wisdom. It is the fashion of the day, especially among the young and inexperienced, to pit their little measure of wisdom against the revelation of Him who gave them their intellect. The man who was confessedly the wisest of men was a little child in the presence of his God; this constituted Him "wiser than all men."

Solomon became a very popular man. "There came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, which had heard of his wisdom" (1 Kings 4 : 34). There was, however, one of these sovereigns who esteemed wisdom as such a precious thing that she trusted no messengers, but came in person to visit Solomon. She had heard his fame

"CONCERNING THE NAME OF THE LORD."

The mention of Solomon was never apart from the mention of his God. It was not the brilliancy of his talents, the magnificence of his surroundings, the compass of his intellectual abilities, which sounded from land to land; it was the fame of "The Preacher" who made known abroad "the name of the Lord." This it was which brought up the anxious, inquiring, and gifted Queen of Sheba to Jerusalem. She came to prove Solomon with hard questions, for she wanted answers. She knew full well there was a craving in her own heart which was not satisfied by any of the superstitions in which she had been educated. It is more than probable that in the "very great train" which she brought with her, there were many inquirers in the same condition, and she longed for them, as well as for herself, to know the truth. She brought with her rich presents for King Solomon—spices, gold, and precious stones. There was no reserve about this heathen but large-hearted woman; "she communed with him of all that was in her heart." Reserve springs from pride; truth, simplicity, and humility make us natural, open, and candid. Very probably this queen had proposed her questions to all the wise men in her own country, but had gained from them nothing that satisfied her—nothing that her heart and conscience could rest upon. But "Solomon there was not anything hid from the king, which he told her not."

How many there are full of questions—reasoning, talking, debating over everything—but they do not imitate the Queen of Sheba, and come face to face with "a greater than Solomon!" There is such solid satisfaction when our blessed Lord makes things clear to us; and there is an end to all controversy. If the many who talk about holiness and faith-healing would go direct to God and commune with Him of all that is in their heart, God would answer them all their questions. But with many these are not heart matters, but only interesting speculations. A doctor in giving a bedside lecture in a hospital to the students, once began: "If the object be cure." May we not raise the question in relation to some of these, "If the object be truth"?

"And when the Queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom, and the house that he had built, and the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, and his cup-bearers, and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord; there was no more spirit in her." Thus it is when we contemplate our King, Jesus, the son of David, the greater than Solomon. First His wisdom, which planned and carried out our redemption, which now upholds us, which makes all things work together for our good; the masterly wisdom, which presides over a measureless universe, and which is faultless in the tiniest detail—equal to the greatest and to the smallest things—contemplating this, there is in us, we are foolishness itself in the light of it! "The house which He had built," "an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. 5 : 1), "an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2 : 22). This again takes from us all the spirit of self-importance. The meat of His table, the bread of life, the water of life, the new wine of the kingdom! Then the sitting of His servants (slaves) and the standing of His ministers (voluntary servants). This is the reverse of the world's way; the man of the world does not say to his servant (slave) when he comes from the field, "Go and sit down to meat," but rather, "Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink" (Luke 17 : 7, 8). But our God bids His working ones rest and be at ease in His presence; He treats servants like children, and yearns for them to take that position. Then, those who are those who are no longer under the "I ought" and "I must" of the law, but in whose hearts the law is written—those who have learned the secret of rest in the Lord, He permits as a privilege, not a duty, the place of waiting, in readiness to do any service which He permits. "And their apparel!" Those garments of salvation, that girdle of truth, those shoes which are the preparation of the Gospel of peace, that overall of humility—in fact, that being clothed with Christ, how glorious is it! and it is ours if we accept it. "And His cup-bearers!" What cup do we give our Lord to drink? He has drunk of shame and sorrow, of sickness and death upon the cross for us; what can we give Him now? Souls and bodies a living sacrifice; hearts and wills made over to Him, that He may use them "in seeking and finding the lost, and wresting the prey from the mighty." And His ascent by which He went up into the house of the Lord." As regards our standing in Christ, we can never be higher than we are the moment we are in Christ. But our knowledge and our personal experience of Him, our measure of conformity to Him are ever on an ascending scale. "The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day" (Prov. 4 : 18). The Queen of Sheba, overcome with all she saw, said to the king, "It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom. Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it: and, behold,

THE HALF WAS NOT TOLD ME."

It is not often that the satiated pleasure-seeker finds ten minutes of any kind of enjoyment to surpass his anticipations. But there is not one among the numberless children of God whose expectation is only from Him, but finds ground to cry continually, "The half was not told me."

The Queen of Sheba could congratulate the servants of Solomon who stood before him and heard his wisdom; what would she have said had she known Jesus? Her very word, "Blessed be the Lord thy God" looks as though she had come to faith in God, and she added, "Because the Lord loved Israel forever, therefore made He thee king." "The Lord!" Surely this was an indication that God was her Lord. The queen gave Solomon rich presents of gold, spices, and precious stones; "and King Solomon gave unto the Queen of Sheba all her desire, whatsoever she asked, besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty." Our blessed Lord gives us whatsoever we desire, as we accept by faith. With His royal bounty He has given us Himself, the Father hath given us His Son (John 3 : 16)! But over and above this royal bounty He has given assurance upon assurance that whatever we ask, believing, we shall receive. The queen turned and went to her own country, there to report what she thought of Solomon. In our country, in our father's house, what report are we giving of Jesus?

A REMARKABLE BOOK.

THE WONDERS OF PRAYER

A Book of Well Authenticated and Wonderful Answers to Prayer.

THE MOST WONDERFUL BOOK OF MODERN TIMES

To a greater extent than any other book, and in an extraordinary recital of facts, with over five hundred interesting incidents, it fully answers that all-important question, "DOES GOD ANSWER PRAYER?"

It also shows that the promises of the Bible are absolutely true, and faithfully fulfilled in the daily lives of those who are constantly trusting in the Lord, and ask His help in their daily anxieties and experiences. It is a book of great comfort and encouragement to Christians, in their doubt, fear, sorrow, or trouble, to trust Him more fully in faith, and shows how He who delivered others in times of distress, peril, or solicitude, can hear and deliver them also.

To those who are not Christians, it is a record of undoubted facts from the experiences of individuals now living, proving the real existence and power of God, in controlling circumstances, directing human wills, and all things of earth, showing His nearness and power in daily events of life, and demonstrating that He is not a distant Creator, but ever near at hand.

CONTENTS.

This volume contains several hundred instances where Prayer has been heard and answered in the following circumstances of life: Healing; Recovery from severe Sickness; Delivery from Death; Delivery in Perilous Situations; Miraculous Cures of Diseases and Deformed Persons; Help in Poverty; Relief from Starvation; Insanity Cured; All Appetite for Sensuality Removed; Evil Habits Overcome; Drunkenness Cured; Appetite for Tobacco and Liquors taken wholly away; Souls Converted and Saved; Bad Men Confounded; Oppressors and Wrongdoers Punished; Wonderful Revivals; Proofs of the Existence of the Holy Spirit; Timely Help in Financial Danger and Need; How Liberal Gifts to the Lord and the Poor have been Blessed; How the Sick, Poor, Afflicted, and Helpless, have been cared for constantly; How Work and Employment have been Obtained; How Lives have been Saved from Accidents and Death; How Plans in Life have been wholly Frustrated and Changed for the Better; How the Schemes of Bad Men have been Spoiled; How the Lord has Controlled the Natural Elements of Earth, the Winds, the Waves, the Lightning, the Rain, Tempests, Snow and Hail, stopped their work of destruction, to Aid, Benefit, Relieve, Help, or Deliver some poor Christian who has cried to Him in Prayer.

A multitude of such instances are given, all from experiences of individuals of the present day, still living, which fully satisfy any one that the same God who did wonders in the days of Abraham, Joseph, Jacob, Joshua, David, Elijah, and Hezekiah; the same Lord who walked in Palestine, healing the sick, curing the blind, lame, and halt, raising the dead, performing miracles, is still, though unseen, with us this very day, performing as many wonders and miracles as in the days of old. By strong faith, Christians who have laid hold of the promises, and trusted in their unseen Lord, pleading to Him in their extremities of life, here give their testimonies that they have found their God faithful.

Being a book of facts only, of most positive authenticity, it most practically sets at naught all the modern books of Science, Speculation, Philosophy, and Human Reason, which would try to build the world without a Creator. Neither does this book depend upon history, but is a record of occurrences of the present day, and from facts of Answered Prayer proves that there is a Superior Power, a living God, and that all contained in the Bible is true, because its promises have been actually fulfilled.

This book should be in every Christian home, it is invaluable to all Sabbath-school teachers and scholars. It should be given to every child, for it contains pure and healthful instruction to encourage the faith of every one, and aims to lead all to come with more willing minds to learn of the Great Comforter.

It contains no philosophies, no denominational discussions, tenets, or principles; is not issued in connection with any religious society; is not an advocate of any isms, nor a record of peculiar superstitions, nor fanatical thoughts, theories, or imaginations. It is a simple, humble, candid book of honest facts and experiences connected with daily practical Christian life, and answers those important questions: "Will God even now answer?" "Whose Prayers will He answer?"

PRICES: Full cloth, $1.50; full morocco and gilt, $2.50. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of Price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

COLONEL STEWART, Supposed to have been Murdered in the Soudan—Navigating the Cataracts of the Nile.

COLONEL STEWART.

General Gordon's Companion at Khartoum.

The Three Englishmen in Khartoum—The Recapture of Berber—Stewart Sent to Dongola—Reports of Casualty to his Steamer, and Massacre—Incidents of the Siege—Passing the Cataracts—Valuable Aid from the Canadian Contingent.

A MONTH ago we mentioned in our news columns the murder of Colonel Stewart and his party in the Soudan. Since that time many telegrams have been received, some of which contradict the report, while others confirm it. It is an ominous fact that no intelligence has been sent from Colonel Stewart himself. His silence and his non-arrival at Dongola are strong confirmation of the fear that he is dead.

The saddest feature of the narrative is that Colonel Stewart did not fall in fair fight, but was TREACHEROUSLY MURDERED.

He accompanied General Gordon in his expedition from Khartoum to Berber, when that general, finding his assailants at Khartoum had raised the siege, determined to resume offensive operations. The attack on Berber was entirely successful, and General Gordon appears to have thought the opportunity a good one, being so far on the way, to send a communication to Dongola, the ruler of which is friendly to him, and where there is an English force. General Gordon's provisions were running short, and he doubtless hoped that by sending news that the country was clear to Khartoum, he would obtain aid in the shape of men and provisions. Colonel Stewart was selected for this mission. General Gordon returned to Khartoum, and Colonel Stewart proceeded northward to Dongola. He was accompanied by forty men.

The party was conveyed up the Nile on a small steamer. At the cataract of Wady Garna the steamer was stranded and they were unable to get her off. It was, however, but a short distance from the shore, and three natives came on board and told Colonel Stewart that he was very near Merawee, and could easily reach that village on foot, and there obtain assistance to get the steamer off. They offered to guide him, and, unsuspicious of treachery, he landed, and, accompanied by two of his men only, set out with them. No sooner had he passed round the headland out of sight of the steamer than a number of men sprang out from an ambush, and, with the guides, fell upon Colonel Stewart and his followers, and murdered them. They then attacked the steamer, which they captured, killing all on board, with the exception of four men. The murderers were not, it is thought, the Mahdi's men, but were simply robbers, who murdered the colonel for the sake of the money and arms he had with him. That is the report sent, which, as we have already stated, is contradicted in later telegrams, but which there is reason to believe is too true.

The deceased soldier, whose portrait appears on the first page, was a comparatively young officer, being only forty years of age. He was as are many of the ablest and bravest officers in the British army. He was the son of the late J. T. Hamill Stewart, of Ballyatwood, Ireland. He was educated at Cheltenham College, and afterward entered the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, whence he graduated with considerable distinction in September, 1865. He was shortly afterward gazetted to a cornetcy in the 11th Hussars. On their return from foreign service in India, he, in May, 1879, was appointed vice-consul in Anatolia, where he remained till October, 1882. He was then ordered to Egypt on special service, and at the conclusion of the late war with Arabi he was directed to proceed to Khartoum, to prepare a report on the condition and statistics of the Soudan, which publication recently made its appearance before the public. Colonel Stewart was a well-known Oriental traveller and an accomplished linguist.

A correspondent of an English journal, who made Colonel Stewart's acquaintance in Egypt, bears witness to of the dead officer. He writes: "Among those who knew Colonel Stewart there can be but one opinion as to the wisdom of the selection made in sending him to Khartoum, and one feeling concerning his death. Truly, such men are few, and his place cannot easily be filled. He was a tall, slight, gray-eyed man, young looking for his age, with the quiet manner and watchful eye of one conscious of his own power, but not anxious to impress others with his importance. A cheerful disposition he had, a gentle smile, and the bearing due to an honest, kindly heart. A man, moreover, for whom hardship and privation had no terrors, who could groom his own horse and sleep in a tree or on the ground. Wherever he went he carried with him the goodwill and esteem of all who met him, and he was regarded by the ablest men among his seniors as standing perhaps first among the younger generation of soldiers."

When the history of the gallant defence of Khartoum comes to be written, we shall probably have one of the most fascinating and romantic narratives in history.

GORDON AND STEWART,

with Mr. Power, the correspondent of the London Times, were the only three Englishmen in Khartoum during those long months of anxiety and constant danger. The city was surrounded with hosts of the Mahdi's soldiers, well armed and drilled, and nerved with the enthusiasm of fanaticism. Within the city the Egyptian soldiers on whom the English officers had to depend for their defence were known to be cowards, and were suspected of being treacherous. Happily for them there were a considerable number of negro soldiers, who were brave and faithful. The inhabitants of the city were, it is believed, as we should say, "on the fence." They were ready to hurrah with the victors, whether victory fell to the Mahdi or to General Gordon. They were afraid to declare themselves, though there is every reason to believe that if they could have chosen for themselves they would have preferred the Mahdi.

It may be supposed that General Gordon's mission to Khartoum was based on a misapprehension of the circumstances. The accounts sent from the Soudan represented the people as being oppressed by the Mahdi and his army and as being anxious to remain under Egyptian government if they could be assured of protection General Gordon, remembering the love and devotion manifested toward him in 1877, when he was Governor of the Soudan, believed that his appearance in the Soudan would be sufficient to rekindle that affection, and that he could at once restore peace and order, and put an end to anarchy. He rode without an escort to Khartoum, firm in his faith in God and relying for protection upon Him, as he has done throughout his romantic career. Soon afterward the city was encircled by the besieging force, and though Gordon sent out many messengers with despatches, not one in twenty succeeded in making a passage through the enemy's lines. Some vivid pictures of were, however, carried through and arrived safely in England. They were written by the correspondent of the London Times, and show how terrible was the struggle maintained by General Gordon, Colonel Stewart, and their negro troops. Under date of April 28th, Mr. Power wrote this despatch, which did not reach London until September 29th: "We have been almost daily engaged with the rebels, who now thoroughly surround Khartoum. General Gordon is busily engaged laying out mines in front of the works in all directions. Yesterday and to-day the rebels came down to a village opposite and fired heavily on the palace. We returned the fire with artillery and musketry, and on both occasions the Arabs soon retreated. There was no loss on our side. The town is quiet. Over half the population before the siege began went over to the rebels, thus weeding out all bad characters.

"General Gordon is issuing

RATIONS TO THE POOR.

Food is very dear. We have corn and biscuits for about four months. General Gordon has issued paper money, as our treasure is still at Berber. The merchants accept it as money, and all the arrears to the soldiers can be thus paid off. General Gordon has sent emissaries to offer to all the slaves of the rebels their freedom if they abandon their masters and come in. The General has hired the large mission premises on the river, and has moved all the ammunition there; in case of attack with artillery on the fortifications it will be perfectly safe.

"The health of the town is excellent, and we three Englishmen here are well and hopeful. There are now around the lines, in addition to all other obstacles, such as crowsfeet, broken glass, wire entanglements, and chevaux de frise, three lines of land torpedoes or percussion mines. They are enormously powerful, and are much feared by the Arabs. We have no news whatever of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. We learned to-day that a man with a post from Berber was taken by the rebels and killed."

On July 30th Mr. Power wrote: "We have been now five months closely besieged and can at best hold out but two months longer. The soldiers and people live in as since last May there are daily reports of English advancing from Dongola and Kassala. The Arabs have strong forts with cannon along the river, and they push the siege as vigorously as ever. General Gordon has protected all the steamers with bullet-proof plates of soft wood and iron, and on the six armored barges has put up castles twenty feet high, giving a double line of fire. The troops to be loyal must be paid, and General Gordon is badly off for money, none of that which left Cairo for his use ever having reached Khartoum. He has issued $250,000 worth of paper money. Food is daily distributed to the poor.

"Since March 23d the following are the chief events of the siege:

"March 23d.—Hassan and Seyid Pashas were put to death for treachery in the battle of the 16th, in which we lost three hundred and fifty killed and wounded.

"April 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th.—Attacks by the rebels on the palace from the villages opposite. Fearful loss of life to the Arabs from mines put down by General Gordon.

"May 1st.—The officer commanding engineers, having put down a mine of seventy-eight pounds of power, trod on it, and with six soldiers was blown to pieces.

"May 7th.—Great attack from a village opposite; nine mines were exploded there, and we afterward heard that they killed one hundred and fifteen rebels. The Arabs kept up a fire all day. Colonel Stewart, with two splendidly directed shots from a Krupp 20-pounder at the Palace, drove them out of their principal position. During the night the Arabs loopholed the walls, but on the 9th we drove them out. They had held the place for three days.

"May 25th.—

while working a mitrailleuse at the Palace by the rebel fire, but he is now quite well.

"During May and June steamer expeditions were made daily under Saati Bey. Our loss was slight, and much cattle were captured.

"July 29th.—We beat the rebels out of Buri, on the Blue Nile, killing numbers of them and capturing munitions and eighty rifles. The steamers advanced to El Efan, clearing thirteen rebel forts and breaking two cannon. Since the siege began our loss has been under seven hundred killed.

"July 31st.—This is the end of the fifth month of the siege. Yesterday I sent you viâ Kassala a despatch giving the situation here and the chief incidents of the siege since March 23d. I wrote you several times each week up to April 23d, when all hopes of men getting through to Berber had ceased. For the last five months the siege has been very close, the Arab bullets from all sides being able to fall into the Palace.

THE COST OF FOOD.

"Since March 17th no day has passed without firing, yet our losses in all at the very outside are not seven hundred killed. We have had a good many wounded, but as a rule the wounds are slight. Since the siege General Gordon has caused biscuit and corn to be distributed to the poor, and up to this time there has been no case of any one seriously wanting food. The price of everything is thirty times the ordinary price, and meat is, when you can get it, eight or nine shillings an ober.

"Since the despatch which arrived the day before yesterday all hope of relief by our government is at an end, so when our provisions, which we have at a stretch for two months, are eaten we must fall, nor is there any chance, with the soldiers we have, and the great crowd of women, children, etc., of our being able to cut our way through the Arabs. We have not steamers for all, and it is only from the steamers we can meet the rebels.

EGYPTIAN COWARDICE.

"One Arab horseman is enough to put two hundred of the bulk of our men to flight. The day Saati Bey was killed eight men with spears charged two hundred of our men armed with Remingtons. The soldiers fled at once, leaving Saati and his Vakeel to be killed. A black officer cut down three of the Arabs, and the other five chased our men. A horseman coming up rode through the flying mass, cutting down seven. Colonel Stewart, who was unarmed, got off by a fluke, the Arabs not having seen him. With such men as these we can do nothing. The negroes are the only men we can depend upon.

"The attack made by the Soudani troops under Mehemet Ali Pasha, on the 28th of this month, was most successful; the Arab loss must have been very heavy. As General Gordon has forbidden the soldiers to bring in the heads of rebels they kill, it is now hard to know the exact number. We captured that day sixteen shells and cartouches for mountain gun, a quantity of rifle ammunition, seventy-eight Remingtons, a number of elephant and other rifles, nearly two hundred lances, sixty swords, and some horses. Our loss was four killed and some slightly wounded. This action has cleared away the rebels, who day and night have been firing into our lines at Buri, on the Blue Nile.

A NAVAL BATTLE.

"The following day (29th inst.) a flotilla of five armored steamers and four armored barges with castles on them went up to Gareff, on the Blue Nile. I went with them. On the way up we cleared thirteen small forts, but at Gareff found two large strong forts—earthworks riveted with trunks of palm-trees. There were two cannons in one. For eight hours we engaged these forts, and with the Krupp 20-pounder disabled their two cannons. The Arab fire was terrific, but, owing to the bullet-proof armor on all the vessels, our loss was only three killed and twelve or thirteen wounded. Toward the evening we drove the rebels, who were in great numbers, out of the forts.

"In three days General Gordon will send two steamers toward Sennaar. It is hoped they will retake the steamer Mehemet Ali, which the rebels took from Saleh Bey. General Gordon is quite well, and Colonel Stewart has quite recovered from his wound."

Since these despatches were written General Gordon attacked and recaptured Berber, and the melancholy event occurred which we have already described. Colonel Stewart's mother is still living, and she and the family still cling to the hope that he may have escaped.

represents the arduous work of hauling a boat up one of the cataracts or rapids of the Nile. Much delay and trouble has been caused by the desertion of the native boatmen. But for the help rendered by the difficulties would have proved insurmountable. The operation is similar to that frequently witnessed by tourists in Upper Egypt at the First Cataract, between Assouan and Mahattah, not far from the Isle of Philæ. Several hundred Arabs or Nubian negroes are employed with ropes to tow a vessel through the intricate and winding passages among the granite rocks that lie in the bed of the river. Three or four ropes are generally attached to the bow of the vessel, and each is held by a special gang of haulers, who take their stand at different points, and with much shouting to each other contrive by joint action to bring her head this way or that, in the direction of safety and forward progress. Some of them are on the river's bank; others get upon the rocks in mid-channel, wading or swimming to and fro; but for the Englishmen and others who had to cross the river at a wider part, a hawser was stretched right across, fastened to the shore at each end, and a boat, with some running tackle laid on the hawser, was used to ferry them over. The Nassif-Kheir, General Wolseley's boat, arrived at Semneh on September 28th, and was hauled up in just the same way. Just as she reached the upper end of the rapids, one of the hawsers parted, and the boat was swept down the western channel. The crew were obliged to cut the remaining hawsers, and the steamer had a narrow escape of being dashed to pieces. The second attempt to ascend the rapids was successful; but several of the floats of the port paddle were smashed by striking some rocks.

MISSION WORK IN JAPAN.

DR. MURRAY MITCHELL, who has recently returned from an extended tour in India, China and Japan, gives cheering accounts of Christian progress in all those lands.

IN JAPAN

he had seen mission work at Yokohama, Osaka, Tokio, Kobe, Kiyoto, and Nagasaki. Japan was opened to Western nations in July, 1853. Since then it has passed through immense changes. The government has to a large extent followed the example set by the great civilized nations in their naval and military organizations, schools, postal service, railways, banks, jurisprudence, etc. But the most important change is of religion.

Protestant missions in Japan began in 1859. But for several years hardly any evangelistic work could be done. The government was hostile; and was death. Missionaries studied the language, and did all they could in the way of education. The first Protestant church was opened in March, 1872, in the city of Yokohama.

In February, 1873, the edicts against Christianity which were publicly posted up were removed. Since that time the progress has been rapid. At the end of last year the communicants amounted to 6598, of whom more than 1600 had been gathered in during the year. These estimates are under-statements of the truth; for the statistics are not quite complete. The entire Christian community, including children, exceeds 30,000. One remarkable thing is that in several places native churches are springing up that have had no connection with any foreign society.

More cheering than even these numbers is

THE CHARACTER OF THE CONVERTS.

There is a spirit of beautiful harmony and love among them. No sectarian controversy has as yet arisen. They belong to different missions, but appear as a band of brothers. They are occupied with the essential truths of the Gospel, and they have no time to fight about points of minor importance.

The missionaries themselves connect with this unity of spirit the remarkable revival of religion that has lately been witnessed in Japan. There was a deep impression made during the week of united prayer in the beginning of 1872; but the hearts of all were still more profoundly stirred during the week of prayer in January, 1883. When the first week was over, a second was set apart for earnest supplication, and from that time there have been great awakenings at many places.

A VENERABLE AMERICAN MISSIONARY

says he never witnessed in his native land any renewal of spiritual life more remarkable than that which has lately been experienced in Japan. The hearts of multitudes were so enlarged that they felt as if they had received a second conversion—a fresh baptism of the Holy Ghost. There is a branch of the Evangelical Alliance in Japan, which is flourishing.

The native churches are zealous in evangelization, and they contribute for this and the support of ordinances among themselves more liberally than Christians in Europe or America. The difficulties in the way of evangelization are less than in many other countries. There is only one language. They are to a great extent an educated, reading people. Being debarred from political discussion, they eagerly turn to science, history, and religion. They have no caste—that great curse of India. They are a homogeneous people.

THREE PAGAN RELIGIONS

exist in Japan—viz., Shintoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. None of them are strong. Shintoism, the original faith of Japan, is a vague system of spirit-worship, with no definite doctrines and few definite rites. It is shadowy and powerless. Buddhism has greatly degenerated. It has split into at least eight sects, of which only one seems to have any life. Confucianism is a system of morality and nothing more. It cannot satisfy the human heart. The Gospel comes to supply the void.

The government is entirely tolerant. The leading officials probably wish Christianity to spread. For the government is uneasy at the reception it meets—or fancies it meets—from the great Christian powers; and the Japanese believe they would be received into the comity of civilized nations if they were Christians. The government quite possibly may soon declare itself Christian; and if so, the heathen systems will quickly disappear.

Many things seem to indicate that the fulness of time has come to the "Land of the Rising Sun." The Japanese Christians say they are praying and working that their country may be wholly Christian by the year 1900. Let us unite our efforts and prayers with theirs!

And yet, while there are cheering grounds of hope, undoubtedly there is

CAUSE FOR ANXIETY.

Japan is rushing into the forms of Western civilization. She is now demanding representative institutions, and the government, while afraid to grant, cannot venture to refuse them. Can Japan bear our civilization without accepting the religion on which that civilization entirely rests? Can we have the fruits without the roots? We think not. Now, at present, nearly all the education given by government is wholly secular. At the same time, agnostic and materialistic treatises are passing into Japan from Europe and America, partly sought by the Japanese, partly sent to them unsought. Tom Paine, of whom we seldom now hear in the West, is an authority in the farthest East.

HEATHENISM IS DYING, and will die out in a generation; but the tremendous question is, Shall it be succeeded by secularism or Christianity? The answer depends on the Christian Church. Will she put forth far greater efforts than she is yet doing on behalf of Japan? Will she pray far more, and give far more, and work far more, for that most interesting, but greatly imperilled land? If not, the consequences may be fearfully disastrous.

The Japanese are not naturally religious; they are a fickle people; one, therefore, is filled with anxiety as he tries to forecast the possible future. God grant that the Christian Church may awake to the solemnity of the position, and rise to the height of the great occasion!

MORAL CHARACTER OF CANDIDATES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 2, 1884.

The Ten Commandments.—EXODUS 20: 1-17.

The First Law Library—The Cradle of all Right Laws—The Ten Words the Pillars of Society—All of the Same Calibre—The Test for Candidates—Perfection not Expected—One Standard for the Distinguished and the Obscure—The Decalogue not to be Fixed for the Candidates—Sin Weakens the Conscience—Be Cautious in Accusing Men of Sin—Possibility of Repentance—A Slander on Society—Sins of the Accusers—All are Imperfect—Society Needs Toning up—The Cost of a Bad President—The Ten Tonic Drops—A Higher Mountain—The Divided Flames—The Gospel Life Boat.

THE lightnings and earthquakes united their forces to wreck a mountain of Arabia Petræa in olden time, and travellers to-day find heaps of porphyry and greenstone rocks, bowlder against bowlder, the remains of written, not on parchment or papyrus, but on shattered slabs of granite. The corner-stones of all morality, of all wise law, of all righteous jurisprudence, of all good government, are the two tablets of stone on which were written the Ten Commandments. All Roman law, all French law, all English law, all American law that is worth anything, all common law, civil law, criminal law, martial law, law of nations, were rocked in the cradle of the twentieth chapter of Exodus. And it would be well in these times of great political agitation if the newspapers would print the Decalogue some day in place of the able editorial.

The fact is that some people suppose that the law has passed out of existence, and some are not aware of some of the passages of that law, and others say this or that is of the more importance, when no one has any right to make such an assertion. These laws are and if you remove one pillar you damage the whole structure. I have noticed that men are particularly vehement against sins to which they are not particularly tempted, and find no especial wrath against sins in which they themselves indulge. They take out one gun from this battery of ten guns, and load that, and unlimber that, and fire that. They say, "This is an Armstrong gun, and this is a Krupp gun, and this is a Nordensfeld five-barrelled gun, and this is a Gatling ten-barrelled gun, and this is a Martigny thirty-seven-barrelled gun." But I have to tell them that they are all of the same calibre, and that they shoot from eternity to eternity.

To-day, in this brief course of sermons I am preaching on national affairs, and within two days of the Presidential election, I propose to test the character of persons nominated for office in city, State, and nation, and to test them by the Decalogue. Many of the clergymen have gone on the political platform in these times—and I have no criticism to offer in regard to them—some going on one political platform and some on the opposite political platform. I hope they are all better than I am, yet I have not felt called of God to copy their example, but rather in a few Sabbath morning sermons, omitting all personalities, to lay down certain the test of the Judgment Day. The Decalogue forbids idolatry, image making, profanity, maltreatment of parents, Sabbath desecration, murder, theft, incontinence, lying, and covetousness. That is the Decalogue by which you and I will have to be tried, and by that same Decalogue you and I must try candidates for office.

Of course we shall not find anything like perfection. If we do not vote until we find an immaculate nominee we will never vote at all. We have so many faults of our own we ought not to be censorious or maledictory or hypercritical in regard to the faults of others.

THE CHRISTLY RULE

is as appropriate for November as any other month in the year, and for the fourth year as for the three preceding years: "Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

Most certainly are we not to take the statement of red-hot partisanship as the real character of any man. From nearly all the great cities of this land I receive daily or weekly newspapers, sent to me regularly and in compliment, so I see both sides—I see all sides—and it is most entertaining, and my regular amusement, to read the opposite statements. The one statement says the man is an angel, and the other says he is a devil; and I split the difference, and I find him half way between. There has never been an honest or respectable man running for the United States Presidency since the foundation of the American Government, if we may believe the old files of newspapers in the museums. What a mercy it is that they were not all hung before inauguration day! If a man believe one half of what he sees in in these times, his career will be very short outside of Bloomingdale Insane Asylum. I was absent during this last week, and I was dependent entirely upon what I read in regard to what had occurred in these cities, and I read there was a procession in New York of five thousand patriots, and a minute after I read in another sheet that there were seventeen thousand; and then I read in regard to another procession that there were ten thousand, and then I read in another paper that there were sixty thousand. A campaign orator in the Rink or the Academy of Music received a very cold reception—a very chilling reception—said one statement. The other statement said the audience rose at him; so great was the enthusiasm that for a long while the orator could not be heard, and it was only after lifting his hand that the vociferation began to subside! One statement will twist a letter one way, and another statement will twist a letter another way. You must admit it is a very difficult thing in times like these to get a very accurate estimate of a man's character, and I charge you, as your religious teacher, I charge you to caution and to mercifulness and to prayer.

I warn you also against the mistake which many are making, and always do make, of applying of character for those in high place and of large means from the standard they apply for ordinary persons. However much a man may have, and however high the position he gets, he has no especial liberty given him in the interpretation of the Ten Commandments. A great sinner is no more to be excused than a small sinner. Do not charge illustrious defection to eccentricity, or chop off the Ten Commandments to suit especial cases. The right is everlastingly right and the wrong is everlastingly wrong. If any man nominated for any office in this city, State, or nation differs from the Decalogue, do not fix up the Decalogue, but fix him up. This law must stand whatever else may fall.

I call your attention also to the fact that you are all aware of, that the breaking of one commandment makes it the more easy to break all of them, and the philosophy is plain. Any kind of

and if the conscience is weakened, that opens the door for all kinds of transgression. If, for instance, a man go into this political campaign wielding scurrility as his chief weapon, and he believes everything bad about a man, and believes nothing good, how long before that man himself will get over the moral depression? Neither in time nor eternity. If I utter a falsehood in regard to a man I may damage him, but I get for myself tenfold more damage. That is

A GUN THAT KICKS.

If, for instance, a man be profane, under provocation he will commit any crime. I say under provocation. For if a man will maltreat the Lord Almighty, would he not maltreat his fellow-man? If a man be guilty of malfeasance in office he will, under provocation, commit any sin. He who will steal will lie, and he who will lie will steal.

If, for instance, a man be unchaste, it opens the door for all other iniquity, for in that one iniquity he commits theft of the worst kind, and covetousness of the worst kind, and falsehood—pretending to be decent when he is not—and maltreats his parents by disgracing their name, if they were good. Be careful, therefore, how you charge that sin against any man either in high place or low place, either in office or out of office, because when you make that charge against a man you charge him with all villainies, with all disgusting propensities, with all rottenness.

A LIBERTINE IS A BEAST,

lower than the vermin that crawl over a summer carcass—lower than the swine, for the swine has no intelligence to sin against. Be careful, then, how you charge that against any man. You must be so certain that a mathematical demonstration is doubtful as compared with it.

And, then, when you investigate a man on such subjects, you must go the whole length of investigation, and find out whether or not he has repented. He may have been down on his knees before God and implored the divine forgiveness, and he may have implored the forgiveness of society and the forgiveness of the world; although if a man commit that sin at thirty or thirty-five years of age there is not one case out of a thousand where he ever repents. You must in your investigation see if it is possible that the one case investigated may not have been the glorious exception. But do not chop off the seventh commandment to suit the case. Do not change Fairbanks' scale to suit what you are weighing with it. Do not cut off a yardstick to suit the dry goods you are measuring. Let the law stand, and never tamper with it.

A SLANDERER.

Above all, I charge you do not join in the cry that I have heard—for fifteen, twenty years I have heard it—that there is no such thing as purity. If you make that charge you are a foul-mouthed scandaler of the human race. You are a leper. Make room for that leper! When a man, by pen or type or tongue, utters such a slander on the human race that there is no such thing as purity, I know right away that that man himself is a walking lazaretto, a reeking ulcer, and is fit for no society better than that of devils damned. We may enlarge our charities in such a case, but in no such case let us shave off the Ten Commandments. Let them stand as the everlasting defence of society and of the Church of God.

The committing of one sin opens the door for the commission of other sins. You see it every day. Those Wall Street embezzlers, those bank cashiers absconding as soon as they are brought to justice, develop the fact that they were in all kinds of sin. No exception to the rule. They all kept bad company, they nearly all gambled, they all went to places where they ought not. Why? The commission of the one sin opened the gate for all the other sins. Sins go in flocks, in droves, and in herds. You open the door for one sin, that invites in all the miserable segregation.

THE CAMPAIGN ORATORS

this autumn, some of them, bombarding the suffering candidates all the week, think no wrong in riding all Sunday, and they are at this moment, many of them, in the political headquarters calculating the chances. All the week hurling the eighth commandment at Mr. Blaine, the seventh commandment at Mr. Cleveland, and the ninth commandment at Mr. St. John—what are they doing with the fourth commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"? Breaking it. Is not the fourth commandment as important as the eighth, as the seventh, as the ninth? Some of these political campaign orators, as I have seen them reported, and as I have heard in regard to them, bomparding the suffering candidates all the week, yet tossing the name of God from their lips recklessly, guilty of profanity. What are they doing with the third commandment? Is not the third commandment, which says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain"—is not the third commandment as important as the other seven? Oh yes, we find in all departments men are hurling their indignation against sins perhaps to which they are not especially tempted—hurling it against iniquity toward which they are not particularly drawn.

I have this book for my authority when I say that the man who swears or the man who breaks the Sabbath is as as either of those candidates is culpable if the things charged on him are true. What right have you and I to select which commandment we will keep and which we will break? Better not try to measure the thunderbolts of the Almighty, saying this has less blaze, this has less momentum. Better not handle the guns, better not experiment much with the divine ammunition. Cicero said he saw the Iliad written on a nut-shell, and you and I have seen the Lord's Prayer written on a five-cent piece; but the whole tendency of these times is to write the Ten Commandments so small nobody can see them. I protest this day against the attempt to revise the Decalogue which was given on Mount Sinai amid the blast of trumpets and the cracking of the rocks and the paroxysm of the mountain of Arabia Petræa.

I bring up the candidates for city, State, and national power—I bring them up, and I try them by this Decalogue. Of course, they are imperfect.

WE ARE ALL IMPERFECT.

We say things we ought not to say, we do things we ought not to do. We have all been wrong, we have all done wrong. But I shall find out one of the candidates who comes, in my estimation, nearest to obedience of the Ten Commandments, and I will vote for him, and you will vote for him unless you love God less than your party; then you will not.

SAFE SAILING.

Herodotus said that Nitocris, the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, was so fascinated with her beautiful village of Ardericca, that she had the river above Babylon changed so it wound this way and wound that, and curved this way and curved that, and though you sailed on it for three days every day you would be in sight of that exquisite village. Now, I do not care which way you sail in morals, or which way you sail in life, if you only sail within sight of this beautiful group of divine commandments. Although they may sometimes seem to be a little angular, I do not care which way you sail, if you sail in sight of them you will never run aground and you will never be shipwrecked.

I never felt more impressed from God than I do this moment of the importance of what I am saying to this audience.

SOCIETY NEEDS TONING UP on all these subjects. I tell you there is nothing worse to fight than the ten regiments, with bayonets and sabres of fire, marching down the side of Mount Sinai. They always gain the victory, and those who fight against them go under. There are thousands and tens of thousands of men being SLAIN BY THE DECALOGUE.

What is the matter with that young man of whom I read, dying in his dissipations? In his dying delirium he said: "Now, fetch on the dice. It is mine! No, no! It is gone, all is gone! Bring on more wine! Bring on more wine! Oh, how they rattle their chains! Fiends, fiends, fiends! I say you cheat! The cards are marked! Oh, death! oh, death! oh, death! Fiends, fiends, fiends!" And he gasped and was gone. The Ten Commandments slew him.

Let not ladies and gentlemen in this nineteenth century revise the Ten Commandments, but let them in society and at the polls put to the front those who come the nearest to this God-lifted standard. On Tuesday morning next read the twentieth chapter of Exodus at family prayers. The moral or the immoral character of the next President of the United States will add seventy-five per cent unto or subtract seventy-five per cent from the national morals. You and I

the young men of this country cannot afford to have a bad President; the commercial, the moral, the artistic, the agricultural, the manufacturing, the religious interests of this country, cannot afford to have a bad President; and if you, on looking over the whole field, cannot find a man who, in your estimation, comes within reasonable distance of obedience of the Decalogue, stay at home, do not vote at all.

I suppose when in the city of Sodom there were four candidates put up for the mayoralty, and Lot did not believe in any of them, he did not register. I suppose if there came a crisis in the politics of Babylon, where Daniel did not believe in any of the candidates, he stayed at home on election day, praying with his face toward Jerusalem. But we have no such crisis, we have no such exigency, thank God. But I have to say to you to-day that the moral character of a ruler always affects the ruled; and

I APPEAL TO HISTORY.

Wicked King Manasseh depressed the moral tone of all the nation of Judah, and threw them into idolatry. Good King Josiah lifted up the whole nation by his excellent example. Why is it that to-day England is higher up in morals than at any point in her national history? It is because she has the best ruler in all Europe, all the attempts to scandalize her name a failure. The political power of Talleyrand brooded all the political tricksters of the last ninety years. The dishonest Vice-Presidency of Aaron Burr blasted this nation until important letters were written in cipher, because the people could not trust the United States mail. And let the court circles of Louis XV. and Henry VIII. march out, followed by the debauched nations.

The higher up you put a bad man the worse is his power for evil. The great fabulist says that the pigeons were in fright at a kite flying in the air, and so these pigeons hovered near the dovecote; but one day the kite said, "Why are you so afraid? why do you pass your life in terror? make me king, and I'll destroy all your enemies." So the pigeons made the kite king, and as soon as he got the throne his regular diet was a pigeon a day. And while one of the victims was waiting for its turn to come, it said: "Served us right!" The malaria of swamps rises from the plain to the height, but moral malaria descends from the mountain to the plain. Be careful, therefore, how you elevate into authority men who are in any wise antagonistic to the Ten Commandments.

As near as I can tell,

THE MOST IMPORTANT THING

now to be done is to have about forty million copies of the Sinaitic Decalogue printed and scattered throughout the land. It was a terrible waste when the Alexandrian library was destroyed, and the books were taken to heat four thousand baths for the citizens of Alexandria. It was very expensive heat. But without any harm to the Decalogue, you could with it heat a hundred thousand baths of moral purification for the American people.

I say we want a tonic—a mighty tonic—a corrective—an all-powerful corrective—and Moses in the text, with steady hand, notwithstanding the jarring mountains and the full orchestra of the tempest and the blazing of the air, pours out the ten drops—no more, no less—which this nation needs to take for its moral convalescence.

But I shall not leave you under the discouragement of the Ten Commandments, because we have all offended. There is in sight, and while one mountain thunders the other answers in thunder; and while Mount Sinai, with lightning, writes doom, the other mountain, with lightning, writes mercy. The only way you will ever spike the guns of the Decalogue is by the spikes of the cross. The only rock that will ever stop the Sinaitic upheaval is the Rock of Ages. Mount Calvary is higher than Mount Sinai. The English Survey Expedition, I know, say that one Sinaitic peak is 7000 feet high and another 8000 and another 9000 feet high, and travellers tell us that Mount Calvary is only a slightly raised knoll outside of the wall of Jerusalem; but Calvary in moral significance overtops and overshadows all the mountains of the hemispheres, and Mount Washington and Mount Blanc and the Himalayas are hillocks compared with it. You know that sometimes one fortress will silence another fortress. Moultrie silenced Sumpter; and against the mountain of the law I put the mountain of the cross. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," booms one, until the earth jars under the connonade. "Save them from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom," pleads the other, until earth and heaven and hell tremble under the reverberation. And Moses, who commands the one, surrenders to Christ, who commands the other.

"Once by the law our hopes were slain,
But now in Christ we live again."

Aristotle says that Mount Etna erupted one day and poured torrents of scoria upon the villages at the base, but that its flame and made a lane of safety for all those who came to rescue their aged parents. And this volcanic Sinai divides its fury for all those whom Christ has come to rescue from the red ruin on both sides. Standing as I do to-day, half way between the two mountains — the mountain of the 20th of Exodus and the mountain of the 19th of John—all my terror comes ino supernatural calm, for the uproar of the one mountain subsides into quiet, and comes down into so deep a silence that I can hear the other mountain speak—ay, I can hear it whisper: "The blood, the blood, the blood that cleanseth from all sin."

The Survey Expedition says that the Sinaitic mountains have wadys, or water-courses—Alleyat and Ajelah—emptying into Feiran. But those streams are not navigable. No boat put into those rocky streams could sail. But I have to tell you this day that comes right up amid the water-courses of Sinaitic gloom and threat, ready to take us off from under the shadows into the calm sunlight of God's pardon and into the land of peace. Oh, if you could see that boat of Gospel rescue coming this day, you would feel as John Gilmore, in his book, "The Storm Warriors," says that a ship's crew felt on the Kentish Knock Sands, off the coast of England, when they were being beaten to pieces and they all felt they must die! They had given up all hope, and every moment washed another plank from the wreck, and they said, "We must die, we must die!" But after a while they saw a Ramsgate lifeboat coming through the breakers for them, and the man standing highest up on the wreck said: "Can it be? Can it be? It is, it is, it is, it is! Thank God! It is the Ramsgate lifeboat! It is, it is, it is, it is!" And the old Jack tar, describing that lifeboat to his comrades after he got ashore, said: "Oh, my lads, what a beauty it did seem, what a beauty it did seem coming through the breakers that awful day!" May God, through the mercy in Jesus Christ, take us all off the miserable wreck of our sin into the beautiful lifeboat of the Gospel!

THE COMING OF THE LORD, PERSONAL AND PRE-MILLENNIAL.

By the Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

Two Greek Words—The New Testament Full of the Doctrine—Christ's Return Certain—Will Come in Person—Emphatically and Explicitly Promised—The Bride's Personal Union—It may be Near—Will be before the Millennium—False Professors will be Living—The Millennium will Surely Come.

THERE are two Greek terms which are both translated in the New Testament coming—Erkomai, a verb, and Parousia, a noun. "Verily I say unto you, there are some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Matt. 16 : 28). And in a short time Christ took a part of His disciples up into the mountain, and was transfigured before them. Peter says, "This was the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Peter 1 : 16, 17). "What shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world" (Parousia) (Matt. 24 : 3)? Also see Matt. 24 : 27-30, 37-39, 26 : 64 ; Mark 13 : 26, 14 : 62 ; Luke 19 : 23, 12 : 45, 21 : 27 ; Acts 7 : 52 ; 1 Cor. 1 : 7, 15 : 23 ; 1 Thess. 2 : 19, 3 : 13 ; James 5 : 7, 8, etc.

Thus the New Testament is

of Christ's coming, and it is presented over and over again under many figures. He leaves His Church, but only to return to it. "The Son of man is as a man taking a far journey who left his house." He leaves the world and ascends to heaven. "Whom the heaven must receive (retain) until the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of His holy prophets since the world began." The prophecies are being fulfilled, and Christ, in due time, is

SURE TO RETURN to His house—His Church.

The second coming of Christ, as was the first coming, will be personal, or in a bodily form. In person He comes but twice. "Unto you that look for Him will He appear the second time." "And every eye shall see Him." When He ascended He was seen by His disciples. They gazed up into heaven until the cloud received Him out of their sight. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." He ascended in person, and "this same Jesus," said the two angels, "shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." No language can be more explicit in stating the fact of the personal coming of Christ. If His second coming is not personal, how can we make plain such Scriptures as, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints to execute judgment upon all." "The Lord my God shall come, and all His saints with Him." "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints." "He shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels."

It is evident from the whole tenor of Scripture that Christ will return to this world in person, of His humanity. As He said, "I will come again." "Every eye shall see me." Can it be possible that this coming is not visible, or that there is no coming at all—only a mere act of the will, or Providence, or some operation of spiritual power? When Christ says, "I will come again and receive you unto myself," He means that He will come in person, in power and glory, to complete the work of redemption, to establish His kingdom in the earth, and give all His people "an abundant entrance into this everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

"The Bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with Him to the marriage, and the door was shut." This will be a

PERSONAL UNION OF THE BRIDE

—the Church—with the Bridegroom—the Lord Jesus Christ. Then the believers will enter upon the full realization of their union with Christ. This coming of Christ is pre-millennial, or before the thousand years of Christ's reign with the saints on earth.

As to the time of Christ's coming no man can tell. There may be signs which indicate that

IT IS NEAR.

As Christ says, "When the fig tree putteth forth her leaves, ye know that summer is nigh ; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." But the Bible clearly teaches that Christ will come at the commencement of or

BEFORE THE MILLENNIUM.

If there is to be a spiritual millennium before the coming of Christ, why are the people of God commanded to watch for His coming? So far from a period of peace and rest before Christ's coming, the nations will remain alien to God and His people ; and Christ "comes to take vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." He destroys the man of sin by the brightness of His coming. "As the days of Noah, so also shall the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark." Hence it will be a time of great wickedness.

Mankind have no reason to comfort themselves with the thought of a good time coming before the close of the mediatorial dispensation. The world will continue to be devoted to the cares of this life, regardless of Christ's coming. "Wicked men and seducers will wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." "The wheat and the tares will grow together until the harvest, and the harvest is the end of the age." "At the last day (not before) the Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity."

The intermixture of the righteous and the wicked will continue to the end of the present economy. Christ asks, "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" The kingdom of heaven—the Church at that time—"will be likened unto ten virgins, who took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom ; and five of them were wise and five were foolish." Equally divided between true and

FALSE PROFESSORS.

Paul declares the same truths. "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God ; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." This is the state of society in the last days. The moral aspects of the world now look as if we were living in the last days. Peter agrees with Paul. He says, "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, 'Where is the promise of His coming?" Hence, when Christ comes, the world will be struck with consternation and dread. "All kindred and tribes of the earth shall wail because of Him."

But some may ask, Will not the prophecies of a future glorious time on earth be fulfilled? "When all shall know the Lord, from the least even to the greatest." 'When Christ shall reign from sea to sea." "When nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks." "When Christ's kingdom and His will shall be done in earth as it is done in heaven." "When the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord." Most certainly such a time will come. All the prophecies relating to the future will be fulfilled. But different theories on this subject make a difference in the time of the fulfilment. We claim that this glorious time will be after the second coming of Christ, and not before. In the thirty-seventh Psalm it is said : "For evil-doers shall be cut off, but those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth." "But the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." "The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever." When the wicked are cut off, when they are driven away in their wickedness, and when shall appear the new earth wherein shall dwell righteousness, then will come the glorious time on earth. Then

> "Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
> Doth his successive journeys run :
> His kingdom stretch from shore to shore ;
> 'Till moons shall wax and wane no more."

THE BELIEVER'S STATE

in the present world is one of expectancy and not of attainment. If he attained here all that is promised, the future would cease to be a matter of hope, for what is realized cannot be hoped for. His hope looks beyond the bounds of time, and he longs to realize his hopes. "For in this we groan, desiring to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven." The full realization of the believer's hope will not take place till Christ is revealed from heaven, and the vile body of the saint is fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body.

NORTH SEA STORIES.

THE following incidents are related by a Christian gentleman who spent some time on board the mission ship sent out by the Thames Church Mission to evangelize among the fishing fleet in the North Sea :

THE BIGGEST DRUNKARD.

"I was the biggest drunkard in the fleet ; every one knew me, knew what I was, and, thank God, they know what I am." This testimony was borne by a quiet, simple-hearted fisherman, whose past history is matter of common knowledge, while his present life and conduct is the amazement of all. "How did it come about?" I ventured to ask. "Well, you see this here Ensign a'comes to our fleet, and the skippers were all talking 'bout it. I was fonder a deal of the cooper* than of any Gospel ship, and I laughed as loud as any of the lot when we met on board the cooper and talked over our grog 'bout the new-comer. I vowed I'd never set foot on her deck.

"Howsomever a few weeks after the Ensign got in company with my smack, I didn't like it a bit, and tried to beat off from her, but she stuck to me. By and by the skipper sang out wouldn't I come aboard and have a cup of coffee? I didn't like to say no, it looked surly like ; and so I went, but determined to hear nothing 'bout religion. We had a comfortable enough chat over the coffee ; then I said I'd better be off. I was afeared what was to come. 'No,' says he, 'we don't do it that way on board this ship. We won't have any leave without a word of prayer.' Whether or no I had to consent, and nearly for the first time in my life I joined in Christian prayer.

"I got off pretty quick after prayers I can tell you, but the words I heard read from the Book stuck to me. Next day he wanted me to come aboard again, but I said 'I don't want to go. I was miserable enough last night.' I did go though after all, for somehow I felt as if the Book that had hurt me might help me. That day I was more miserable than ever, and when I got back to my own ship I vowed I'd drop the drink. For nearly a week I was to windward of the Gospel ship, and she didn't get near me. I tried hard to keep my word about the grog, but one day the cooper got in company with my smack, and I couldn't resist. I got on board, and was soon as drunk as ever

"I soon got on my old ways, and was bad as could be, and you may be certain sure I gave the mission ship a wide berth. Don't know how it happened, it must have been the Lord's doing, but at daylight one morning I found Budd in the mission smack right close by. After he'd put his fish on the carrier, he come aboard, and talked straight to me. I had to give in, and go on board the Ensign. I'd been miserable all the time I'd been drinking, and so when I heard them read 'bout Christ died for sinners, and how He'd save the worst, I said, 'That's me,' and broke down like a child. 'If He'll save me, here goes, I'm in for it.' And I tell you He did; not as I deserved it, for I was a reg'lar bad 'un, but He did, bless His name. Now, thank God, the whole of my crew are saved men; and besides there's my son and his son—three generations of us, and we're all serving the Lord."

THE BACKSLIDER'S RETURN.

"In my youth I was converted," said a "splendid" fisherman (the adjective is not my own; it was spontaneously uttered by one who met him in my company), "but I wandered far from God, and the reason was I forgot to pray. If there is one danger to Christian life it's neglect of secret prayer. God was merciful to me, and called me a good many times, but I refused. Last time He let the capstan knock my eye out, and I fell overboard. I was picked up, and no sooner had I got below than I vowed, God helping me, I'd never be drunk again. If I was to be drowned, it would be sober. I'd always kept well to the leeward of the Ensign, so's she could catch me, though I'd had tracts sent aboard I couldn't help reading.

"The next Sunday we got out the boat, the lads a-thinking it were for the cooper. But no; after we got in I says, 'Pull for the mission ship. I'm minded to go on board a bit.' We did, and if the gentleman as was speaking didn't read God's Word, 'O Israel, return unto the Lord thy God, for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity. . . . I will heal their backsliding. I will love them freely; for Mine anger is turned away from him." I knew 'twas God's message for me. I never doubted it, and could not resist a moment longer. All these years I'd been a-sinning and He had been bearing with me. I got into a dark corner of the hold, and cried to God, and there and then He took me back; and He's been rare good to me since. By His grace I will never leave Him."

FOUR DARK DAYS.

"Hallelujah! long may she reign!" shouted a tall, burly fisherman as he sprang over our bulwarks and hastened to join the praying company in the hold. At the close of this meeting we had a "testimony service," and our friend, familiarly known as "Darkie," said: "Thank God I signed the pledge in the hold of the dear old Ensign. The pledge didn't save me and never you think, mates, that if you're teetotalers you're all right. You may be the stanchest temperance men and go straight to hell.

"What did the signing the pledge do for me then? Well, I'll tell you. If I hadn't signed the pledge I'd never a bin sober to hear the Word of God. I was a drinking, swearing, gambling, fighting fellow, and little cared I for religion. 'Only for a lot of muffs,' I thought. Though I'd signed the pledge I didn't want to be converted. I was terribly frightened I should, so I sailed as far off as I could from the mission ship. However, I'd been accustomed to go to the cooper of nights, and now I couldn't do that: so I fretted what to do to pass the time. And when the missionary pulled alongside my ship and pitched a couple of books on board and begged me to come with him to the Ensign, I said I would, but I determined I'd take care of myself and not get religious.

"I sat the service out pretty comfortable, and thought I was all right, when one of the Ensign lads gets alongside of me and says straight, 'Bill, you ain't on the Lord's side yet.' 'No, I ain't and don't want to.' 'Don't want to! That's 'cause you don't know how good it is. Come, let's pray about it.' I was that mad I could have struck him, but for all that I let him pray, and by the end I was crying like a girl. However, I wouldn't yield, and got back to my ship. I was four days and four nights under conviction, and I wouldn't pass through these days again not for worlds. God brought me back to the Ensign, and there and then He gave me peace, 'cause His blessed Son had died for me. 'Bless His name He set me free,' and now I'm happy all the day and mean to serve Him while I live. I thank God the mission ships ever came to the North Sea; they've brought life to hundreds of dead souls in the fleets. God bless them and send more of them. There are fleets with thousands of fishermen as has never seen the blue flag yet, and have never heard the message of life."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Schoolboy's Sudden Death.—"A Lad about fifteen years of age, in a school of which I had charge, went home one afternoon. When he arrived, he did not feel very well, and went upstairs to a neighbor, and asked her to give him a drink of water. When he got the tumbler in his hand, he looked up into her face and said, 'I am dying,' and with these words he fell down at her feet quite dead. He died without a moment's warning. Many of his companions came and looked at the dead body, and said: 'Thank God that was not me, for I am not ready to go; but he loved Jesus, and is now in heaven, of which he often spoke to us.'"

Bernard Palissy, the Potter, after he Had been sentenced to death was visited in his cell by Henry III., of France, anxious to save the only man in the country who could make Majolica ware, and to persuade him to abjure Protestantism. "If you will not, Palissy," said he, "I shall be compelled to let your sentence take its course." "Sire," replied Palissy, with dignity, "have I heard the King of France say 'I am compelled?' I am a poor potter, one of the meanest of your Majesty's subjects, but no power on earth can compel me to violate my conscience. You are one of the greatest monarchs on earth, and you say 'I am compelled!' Sire, which of us is the king and which is the potter?"

A Chinese Martyr.—A Poor Chinaman, after he was converted not long ago, went about the town in which he was living with two large placards, one in front and the other on his back, with affectionate texts from God's Word, inviting sinners to come to Jesus. He was beaten and knocked down, but rose quietly without any attempt to retaliate. Many were induced through his instrumentality to cry, 'What must we do to be saved?" The number of these increased, so that the government became alarmed. He was apprehended, ordered to recant, and deny Jesus. He steadfastly refused, and was beheaded. All over China they openly worship evil spirits and excuse themselves by saying, "Oh, Jesus is kind, and never did any one any harm, so we need not mind Him; but we must propitiate the bad spirits."

A German Baron and his Countess.—Mr. Denham Smith made the acquaintance of a German baron and his countess in Italy. They were a genial, wealthy, and accomplished couple, advancing in years, but still able to travel about from place to place, with all the attendants suitable to their position and rank. Mr. Smith never had any direct spiritual conversation with them till they were about to part; when, seizing the hand of the baron, he said, "Good-by, I hope we shall meet again." "Many thanks, sir," said the baron; "but at my time of life it is scarcely possible we shall ever meet again; if you come back to this neighborhood, the probability is that I shall be gone." "Yet I hope we shall meet again." "Ah, sir, you mean in heaven." "I do, indeed." "Ah, I shall never meet you there," replied the baron; "I am too great a sinner ever to meet you there." The aged couple were deeply affected, and the countess said, "Sir, what would you do with one like me? I was religiously brought up, and over in England I attended the ministry of a Protestant clergyman; but since those years I have wandered away from God, and amid the pleasures and excitements of the world I have forgotten what I used to know. What would you do with a child who had left her father's house?" "Do?" replied Mr. Smith, "I would put her into the fifteenth chapter of Luke;" and opening that chapter, and putting it into the hands of the countess, he asked her to read it. She read it until tears dropped from both her own and her husband's eyes. Coming to the verse which describes the prodigal coming to himself, she said, emphatically, "Is that me?" "Oh, yes, it is you." Again she read on till she came to the father clasping in his arms the returning prodigal. Said the baron, "Is that God? is that father, God?" "Yes, and with His arms around that bundle of rags." "Oh, will you stop a minute?" he cried, and pulling out his note book, said, "Let me write that down." The two trusted in Christ, believed the Gospel, and were made happy.

The Evidence of "Hard Cash."—A Lady whose work for Christ costs a large sum every year, and who derives it all through faith and prayer, says: "I was once confronted with an infidel who demanded what proof we have that there is a God, or rather that we could know that there is a God. I replied, 'If you had made an appeal to a person whom you had never seen, and of whose existence you only knew by report, for a thousand pounds, and if he had responded to your appeal by sending you the money by the hand of some friend, would you not know that such a person must be a living reality?' 'Yes,' he said, with an incredulous smile, 'I should think I should; hard cash is pretty strong evidence!' 'Well,' I said, 'I made an appeal to God for that very sum toward purchasing a house by the seaside for the benefit of His servants; and He gave me the exact amount I asked for by the hand of a friend, without my having to appeal to any one else but Himself. I therefore claim to know that He exists.' The man changed countenance, and turned away without answering. And so I would say to wavering Christians, that when I have often, in answer to prayer, when no one but myself and the living God knew of the straits into which I have sometimes been brought, received 'hard cash,' sent in every variety of form—sometimes a few stamps, sometimes a hundred pounds, at other times three hundred, and five hundred, and a thousand, I think I have a tangible proof that the God whom Jesus Christ came to reveal as the Father is indeed, to all who seek Him, 'a living, bright reality.'"

A Materialist in a Gin-Mill.—Mr. Dunn, who for some years was a missionary to saloons in London under the auspices of the London City Mission, recently told an incident illustrative of the way in which he met objectors and secured a hearing for the Gospel message. One day in a saloon a man said to him. "What book is that you have got?" "The Bible." "Oh, I don't believe in that." "I did not say you did What do you believe in?" "I am a materialist; I believe in nature, and nature's laws." "Well, what is nature?" "Nature! Why, nature is nature, of course." "I believe you are right. Well, what is the first law of nature?" After some shuffling and haggling, the answer given was, "Why, to take care of yourself." "May I ask if you keep that law?" The man evidently had no shirt on, and his toes were peeping through his boots. The others who stood by and listened understood the point of the question, and they said, "Tom, put that in your pipe and smoke it." The man could not but admit that I was better fed and clothed; so I said, "Then I am the best materialist. Now I will tell you how that is. This book has taught me how to be a good materialist. Let me read a little bit to you: 'Godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.'" The result was that I was able to preach the Gospel to them. Tom shook me by the hand and said, "I shall not forget what you said. You touched a chord in my heart when you spoke to me about home; if ever there was a good man, it was my father."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Presidential Election is not known at the time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press. But, unless some untoward event occurs, such as that of 1876, our readers will have learned before they peruse these lines which of the candidates has been chosen by the people for this high and honorable office. We have been told by the speakers of both parties that the election of the man to whom they are opposed would be disastrous to the nation; but let not the faithful Christian be disquieted by those predictions. God rules over all, and will overrule all events to the nation's good. It may be that the only way in which the nation can be purified is by disaster, and, if so, we can bear it for the sake of the blessing it will bring. Of one thing we may be assured: God, whose minute care takes in a falling sparrow, has not allowed this national crisis to pass by unheeded. Even those who will wonder that He has not answered prayers offered for the success of a candidate who did not succeed, may, having done their duty conscientiously, now leave the result in perfect confidence in the hands of Him who "ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will."

The Campaign which Closed Last Week was remarkable for the intense personal hostility manifested toward each of the two chief candidates. Both Mr. Blaine and Mr. Cleveland were denounced on personal grounds. In both cases the nomination produced dissatisfaction in the parties they respectively represent, and an animosity has been displayed toward them on the part of the dissatisfied, as bitter as that which always arises when there is a quarrel among members of the same family. Now that the struggle is over, we may hope that the acrimony engendered will disappear. The successful candidate is placed in a position in which he will need all our prayers. It is the highest and most honorable position in the whole world, but its responsibilities are of the gravest. Even those who worked to prevent the election of the man who is now President-elect should pray for him. Indeed, they have the most reason to pray because they have the deepest conviction that he is unfit for the office which the votes of the people have confided to his keeping. For the sake of our national honor, which we hope he will keep untarnished—for the sake of the morals of our nation and our young people, whom his example will surely influence, prayer should be offered that God will give him wisdom and strength that he may be able to resist temptation and live righteously before God and the people.

Another Change in the Cabinet was Made last week. The President, on October 28th, appointed as Secretary of the Treasury the Hon. Hugh McCulloch, who was appointed to the same office by President Lincoln in March, 1865. Mr. Gresham, who has held the office since September 24th, has accepted the appointment of Circuit Judge of the Seventh Circuit in the room of Judge Drummond, who resigned. The new Secretary is seventy-three years of age. He is a native of the State of Maine, but has spent most of his life in Indiana, where he became President of the State Bank. He resigned that office in 1863 to become Controller of the Currency under Secretary Chase, whom two years afterward he succeeded at the Treasury. When General Grant became President, Secretary McCulloch went to England, where he engaged in banking business. He returned to America in 1874, but has taken little part in public life since that time. Secretary McCulloch is opposed to the compulsory clauses of the Coinage Act.

The Exact Deficiency in the Postal Department for the last fiscal year was $3,593,137. In the previous year there was a surplus of $2,653,189. The loss was due to the reduction in the rate of domestic postage from three to two cents. The expenditure for the year was $46,411,772, and the receipts $42,818,635. The money-order revenue, amounting to about $400,000, is not included in this statement. That amount will go to reduce the deficiency.

The Liquor Question in Ohio Assumes a new shape in consequence of a decision of the Supreme Court, pronounced on October 28th. Three judges affirm and two dissent from the judgment. By it the law known as the Scott Liquor Law is declared unconstitutional. The ground taken by the court is that the act is in effect a license law within the inhibition of the eighteenth section of the schedule to the Constitution, which provides that "no license to traffic in intoxicating liquors shall hereafter be granted in this State," and is therefore void. A despatch from Cleveland states that in the first year of the law $200,000 was raised in that county alone from the tax. The Hon. O. J. Hodge, Speaker of the Ohio House of Representatives that passed the Scott law, and who gave the casting vote necessary to its passage, said to a correspondent of the New York Times that the decision of the court throws the whole liquor question wide open again, and the result will be greater excitement upon the temperance question than ever before, and ultimately at an early day complete prohibition of the traffic. Besides this, he says, thousands of new drinking places will now be opened, and these will be of the lowest kind, doing infinite harm to the better class of dealers.

An Obstruction to the Enforcement of the Prohibition Amendment in Iowa has been raised by a district judge of that State. In a charge to the grand jury at Muscatine, the judge instructed them that while the selling of liquor is an indictable offence, they must also regard the buyer of liquor as being equally with the seller a party to the infraction of law. Those, too, who testified to having purchased liquor he declared to be subject to indictment. Judge Hayes still further charged the jury, that if any person should, encouraged or incited thereto by any organized body or association, buy liquor for the purpose of criminating the seller, such buyer would be indictable, and such society or organization would be guilty of conspiracy, and should be indicted for that crime. The Legislature of Iowa will doubtless take note of this ruling, and pass a law protecting witnesses and societies, or the amendment will not be enforced.

A Disastrous Fire Consumed a Whole Village in New York State on October 20th. The prosperous town of Carthage, N. Y., was the scene of the calamity. The fire began in a row of manufacturing buildings, on the west side of the Black River, and the heavy wind blew sparks for half a mile, across the river to the two islands which were filled with manufacturing institutions. Everything on the islands was burned, and the fire struck into the resident part of the town and swept the buildings from about seventy-five acres. One hundred and sixty dwellings were burned beside the manufacturing institutions, and the Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Disciples churches, town hall, academy, and all other school buildings. The fire spread so rapidly that very little household goods could be saved. One hundred dwellings were burning at the same time. The people were panic-stricken; and hundreds of them were roaming the streets, or lying in spots which the fire had not touched, every place of shelter in the village being filled with women and children. Strong men were weeping and women and children were crying as they realized that everything they possessed was being swept away. The manufacturers cannot resume without outside help. People are thus thrown out of employment, with the loss of all they had, and they will have to suffer, unless aid is rendered. A subscription has been commenced for them, and money is being liberally contributed.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Conducted a Convention of Christian Workers, last week, at Worcester, Mass. The sessions were held in the Mechanics' Hall, which was crowded to its utmost capacity. On November 1st an interesting address was delivered on "How to Conduct Prayer-Meetings," by the Rev. J. L. Withrow, D.D., of Boston, and "What Does the Church Owe the Young Converts?" by the Rev. A. H. Plumb, D.D., of Boston. A question drawer was conducted by Mr. Moody, and Mr. Sankey conducted the singing. An address was given at the evening meeting on "The Holy Spirit for Service," by Mr. Moody. The convention held four meetings on Sunday. It is announced that similar conventions will be held in the following places: Troy and Albany, November 6th to 9th; Utica, 9th to 11th; Rome, 12th and 13th; Syracuse, 14th to 16th; Rochester, 17th and 18th; Buffalo, 19th and 20th; Detroit, 21st to 23d, and Elmira, 25th.

Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Eloquent Scottish evangelist, commenced a series of services in Paterson, N. J., on Sunday, October 26th. The services were held in the Paterson Avenue Church every night last week, and Miss McLatchie has consented to continue them during this week. The Sunday services were crowded to the utmost capacity of the church, even the aisles being filled by eager and attentive hearers. During the week, notwithstanding the political excitement, the processions, and speeches by noted politicians, large audiences were drawn to hear the gifted lady's addresses. We are thankful to learn that the Holy Spirit is blessing her labors, and that many persons have come forward desiring to confess Christ before men, as the result of God's blessing on her appeals. We trust that many churches in this country may have reason, in revived spiritual life and in numerous additions to their membership, to bless God that His honored servant crossed the Atlantic.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness, having arranged the transfer of the Congo Mission—the business which brought them to this country—took passage for England yesterday on the Servia, of the Cunard line. They were speaking nearly every night last week in the churches of New York to attentive audiences. On Tuesday, October 28th, Mrs. Guinness spoke on the subject of our Lord's second coming. Her address was earnest and energetic, and was much enjoyed, despite the curious blunders into which the good lady occasionally fell. They were evidently due to the superficial character of her knowledge of the subject, to which probably her ceaseless activity in the noble cause of Christian missions has prevented her giving much attention. Both she and her husband have received a warm welcome in America. That is peculiarly gratifying to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which, as its readers are aware, has been more active than any journal in the United States in setting forth the value of the work in which our English visitors are engaged, and in doing its utmost to assist them by enlisting the sympathies of the public in their behalf. The Congo Mission will in future be under the charge of the American Baptist Missionary Society, and we would commend the claims of the mission to the notice of our liberal friends with increased earnestness, now that it has passed from English to American hands.

The Agitation in England against the House of Lords continues. It appears that in that country, which is apt to hold itself up as a model to the world of religious observance, they permit political demonstrations on Sundays. One of those demonstrations took place in Hyde Park on October 26th. Over one hundred thousand persons were present. A long procession, with bands, flags, etc, marched through the principal streets. The marchers groaned while passing the headquarters of various conservative clubs at the West End. Many banners were displayed, bearing such inscriptions as "Down with the Lords!" and "The Lords are opponents of civil and religious liberty, and must be abolished!" Speeches were delivered from nine platforms. Resolutions were passed declaring that the House of Lords is useless and dangerous, and ought to be abolished. Had such a scene been witnessed in an American city, John Bull would have been horrified at "the degradation of American politics."

The Object of Lord Wolseley's Expedition to the Soudan is explicitly defined in government papers published last week. The letter of instructions from the government to General Lord Wolseley, which is one of the papers, stated that the object of the expedition was to bring General Gordon and Colonel Stewart back from Khartoum. No further offensive operations than should prove necessary to secure this end would be permitted. Neither the English nor the Egyptian Government was prepared to assume the responsibility of the government of the Nile Valley beyond Wady Halfa, though they would be glad to see an independent government established at Khartoum, which would keep peace with Egypt, would encourage commerce, and prevent the slave trade. A report was current in London on Thursday that Khartoum had fallen, and that General Gordon was killed. It is hoped that the report is untrue, but there seems now little chance of the expedition reaching Khartoum in time to save it, if the Mahdi is threatening it. At last accounts the provisions were almost exhausted in the city. General Wolseley is still delayed by the collapse of his commissariat service. Immense quantities of unnecessary articles have arrived, but of medicines and surgical appliances there is a dearth. It is stated that it cannot reach Khartoum before December 15th.

France has Encountered an Unexpected difficulty in her Chinese operations. Her government notified the other European powers that a blockade of Formosa was established. England, Germany, and Russia declare that the blockade can only be recognized by the understanding that France is at war with China. There would appear to be no doubt of the fact, but France is unwilling to make the admission, because she is coaling and victualling her ships at the treaty ports, which she would not be allowed to do if war had been formally declared. It would embarrass the French admiral if he were refused admission to Shanghai and the other stations where he can purchase supplies from the English merchants.

The Maasdam, a Steamer of the North German Lloyd's line, was burned at sea on October 24th. News was cabled to New York on October 28th that the Oder, of the same line, had passed the burned vessel three days before, on her eastward trip. Much excitement was caused in this city by the report among people expecting friends by the Maasdam. Happily, the apprehensions were dispelled on Saturday by the arrival of all the passengers and crew on board the steamer Rhein. The captain said that the Maasdam left Rotterdam on October 18th with a crew of forty-five men and one hundred and eighty-six passengers. They encountered stormy weather during the first few days, but on the 23d all was clear. It was then discovered that a large tank, holding one hundred and fifty gallons of high test kerosene oil, and situated in a room adjoining the engine-room, had been wrenched so badly by the working of the ship that it was leaking. Three engineers took a lamp and went into the engine-room to explore. The flame of the lamp ignited the gases which came from the oil, and there was a loud explosion. Two of the engineers were burned about the face and hands, but all got out without serious injury. The passengers helped the crew to extinguish the fire, which was accomplished in about six hours. The discovery was then made that the red-hot plates had kindled a fire in the coal bunkers and also started a blaze among the merchandise in the hold. The men worked on until the fire destroyed the suction hose of the pumps, when it was decided to abandon the ship and take to the boats. Soon after all the passengers and crew had made their escape the Rhein hove in sight and took them on board.

The German Elections Held Last Week Show a decided increase in the Socialist vote. In Berlin alone they have gained 38,000 votes, and number nearly one half of the electorate. There were many indecisive elections, no choice having been reached, and a fresh ballot will be required. Eight parties are represented by the successful candidates. It is believed that Bismarck may count on the support of about one hundred and seventy members of the Reichstag. He will need thirty more to give him a majority. Some further concessions to the Roman Catholics will give him that number, if he is willing to make them. The difficulties in the way, however, may dispose him to dissolve the Reichstag and hold a fresh election. The conservatives and the clericals appear to have maintained their strength, the Socialist gains being made at the expense of the Liberals.

The Berlin Congress on the Congo Question is definitely summoned for November 12th. The assistant delegates will hold a preparatory sitting on the 8th of November. England, France, and Germany have already agreed upon the leading points of the programme, and the adhesion thereto by the other powers is expected to be obtained without any prolonged discussion. Prince Bismarck will preside at the opening and closing of the Conference, but will not be present during the debate that may arise. Italy is going to send cruisers to the Congo.

The One Hundredth Birthday of Sir Moses Montefiore was celebrated at his residence in Ramsgate, England, on October 27th, with much enthusiasm. The eminent Jewish philanthropist appeared in excellent health and spirits. A religious service was conducted in the synagogue on his estate by Chief Rabbi Adler. Sir Moses insisted upon standing through the entire service, at the conclusion of which he said, in a very strong voice: "I cannot tell a thousandth of a ten thousandth part of what I feel to-day, when, by the blessing of the Almighty, I have arrived at so full an age. I thank Him for His merciful providence, and I thank all my friends for their great kindness." A reception was subsequently held. Sir Moses was in excellent spirits. During the day he received more than eight hundred letters and six hundred telegrams, besides numerous addresses and bouquets. The anniversary was celebrated throughout Europe. The Empress of Germany sent a telegram to Sir Moses Montefiore, congratulating him.

A Panic in a Theatre at Glasgow on Saturday last involved the death of sixteen persons and serious injuries to many others. Two thousand people were in the theatre, when some one raised the cry of "Fire." A general rush was made to the stairways, and a fearful block ensued. Loud cries of distress and shouts for help arose from the mass of frightened, panic-stricken, and struggling humanity. The crowd was adjured by the officers of the theatre and by the police to hold back, but the warnings and appeals were unheeded. The crazed people frantically rushed toward the outlets, trampling and jumping over each other until they reached the street. When the theatre was finally cleared sixteen corpses were found on the stairs leading from the gallery, and twelve persons were so badly injured that they only gave evidence that life was not extinct by their piteous moanings.

JEHOVAH-JIREH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah jireh: as it said to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen."—GENESIS 22: 14.

A Quietus to Mistrust—A Prophetic Word—A Memorial Word—A New Prophecy—The Provision Typical—I. It Comes in Man's Extremity—Isaac Very Near to Death—The Extremity of Mankind—Christ's Deliverance—II. It was Spontaneously Made—Unsought by Abraham—Unexpected—III. Made by God Himself—Never Interfere with the Provision—The Odds and Ends Provided—IV. It was Gloriously Made—V. Made Effectively—VI. For Every Believer—VII. Guarantees all Other Provision.

"ABRAHAM called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh," or "Jehovah will see it," or "Jehovah will provide," or "Jehovah will be seen." We are offered a variety of interpretations, but the exact idea is that of seeing and being seen. For God to see is to provide. Our own word "provide," is only Latin for "to see." You know how we say that we will see to a matter. Possibly this expression hits the nail on the head. Our heavenly Father sees our need, and with divine foresight of love prepares the supply. He sees to a need to supply it; and in the seeing He is seen, in the providing He manifests Himself.

I believe that the truth contained in the expression "Jehovah-jireh" was ruling Abraham's thought long before he uttered it and appointed it to be the memorial name of the place where the Lord had provided a substitute for Isaac. It was this thought, I think, which enabled him to act as promptly as he did under the trying circumstances. His reason whispered within him, "If you slay your son, how can God keep His promise to you that your seed shall be as many as the stars of heaven?" He answered that suggestion by saying to himself,

"JEHOVAH WILL SEE TO IT!"

As he went upon that painful journey, with his dearly beloved son at his side, the suggestion may have come to him, "How will you meet Sarah when you return home, having imbrued your hands in the blood of her son? How will you meet your neighbors when they hear that Abraham, who professed to be such a holy man, has killed his son?" That answer still sustained his heart—"Jehovah will see to it! Jehovah will see to it! He will not fail in His word. Perhaps He will raise my son from the dead; but in some way or other He will justify my obedience to Him, and vindicate His own command. Jehovah will see to it." This was a quietus to every mistrustful thought. I pray that we may drink into this truth, and be refreshed by it.

Observe as you read this chapter that this was not the first time that Abraham had thus spoken. When he called the name of the place Jehovah-jireh he had seen it to be true—the ram caught in the thicket had been provided as a substitute for Isaac; Jehovah had provided. But he had before declared that truth when as yet he knew nothing of the divine action, when he could not even guess how his extraordinary trial would end. His son Isaac had said to him, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" and the afflicted father had bravely answered, "My son, God will provide." In due time and then Abraham honored Him by saying the same words, only instead of the ordinary name for God he used the special covenant title—Jehovah. That is the only alteration; otherwise in the same terms he repeats the assurance that "the Lord will provide."

GOD DID PROVIDE,

That first utterance was most remarkable; it was simple enough, but how prophetic! It teaches us this truth, that the confident speech of a believer is akin to the language of a prophet. The man who accepts the promise of God unstaggeringly, and is sure that it is true, will speak like the seers of old; he will see that God sees, and will declare the fact, and the holy inference which comes of it.

True faith not only speaks the language of prophecy, but, when she sees her prophecy fulfilled, faith is always delighted to raise memorials to the God of truth. The stones which were set up of old were not to the memory of dead men, but they were memorials of the deeds of the living God; they abundantly uttered the memory of God's great goodness. Abraham on this occasion did not choose a name which recorded what he had done, but a name which spake of what Jehovah had done. I like that self-ignoring; I pray that we, also, may have so much strength of faith that self may go to the wall.

Note yet further, that when faith has uttered a prophecy, and has set up her memorial, the record of mercy received becomes itself a new prophecy. Abraham says, "Jehovah-jireh—God will see to it;" what was he doing then but prophesying a second time for future ages? He bids us know that, as God had provided for him in the time of his extremity, so for all them that put their trust in Him. The Lord is the Preserver of men and the Provider for men. I long for all of us to get this truth firmly fixed in our hearts, and therefore I shall try to show that God's provision for Abraham and Isaac typified the far greater provision by which all the faithful are delivered from death; and that God, in providing in the mount, has given us therein a sure guarantee that all our necessities shall be provided for henceforth even forever.

Consider, then, that the provision which God made for Abraham was symbolic of the greater provision which He has made for all His chosen in Christ Jesus. "Jehovah-jireh" is a text from which to preach concerning providence, and many have been the sermons which have been distilled from it; but I take the liberty of saying that providence, in the ordinary sense of the term, is not the first thought of the passage, which should be read with some sort of reference to its connection, and the more so because that connection is exceedingly remarkable.

I. When Abraham said "Jehovah will provide," he meant us, first of all, to learn that the provision will come

IN THE TIME OF OUR EXTREMITY.

The provision of the ram instead of Isaac was the significant type which was before Abraham's mind; but our Lord tells us, "Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad;" and surely if ever Abraham saw the day of Christ, and was beyond measure glad, it was at that moment when he beheld the Lord providing a substitute for Isaac. At any rate, whether Abraham understood the full meaning of what he said or not, he spoke not for himself, but for us. Every word he uttered is for our teaching, and the teaching is this: that God, in the gift of His Son, Jesus Christ, made the fullest provision for our greatest needs; and from that we may infer that whatever need shall ever occur to us, God will certainly provide for it; but He may delay the actual manifestation thereof till our darkest hour has come.

"Just in the last distressing hour
The Lord displays delivering power;
The mount of danger is the place
Where we shall see surprising grace."

The Lord gave our Lord Jesus Christ to be the Substitute for men in view of the utmost need of our race. Isaac was hard pressed when God interfered in his behalf. The knife was lifted up by a resolute hand; he was within a second of death when the angelic voice said, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad." God provided instantly when the need pressed urgently. Beloved, was Isaac nearer to death than sinful man was near to hell? Was that knife closer to the throat of the beloved Isaac than the axe of the executioner was near to the neck of every sinner, ay, to the neck of the whole race of man? We have so sinned and gone astray that it was not possible for God to wink at our transgressions; He must visit our iniquities with the just punishment, which is nothing less than death eternal. If the gift of the loving Father had not been bestowed, if Jesus had not condescended to die in our place, we must have been left for execution by that law which will by no means spare the guilty.

God not only interposed when the death of Isaac was imminent, but also when the anguish of Abraham had reached its highest pitch. The patriarch's faith never wavered; but we must not forget that he was a man like ourselves, and no father could see his child offered up without an inward agony which surpasses all description. He must have been wound up to a fearful pitch of anguish when he lifted up the knife to slay his son; but just then the angel arrested his hand, and God provided the ram as the substitute in the moment of his utmost misery. Surely the world had come to a great state of misery when at last God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, that He might become the sacrifice for sin. At any rate, this I know, that as a rule men do not see Christ to be their substitute nor accept Him as their Redeemer till they feel that they lie at hell's door, and till their anguish on account of sin has become exceeding great. I remember well when I first beheld the lamb of God who suffered in my stead. I had often heard the story of His death; I could have told it out to others very correctly; but then I did not know my own pressing need, I had not come to feel nor was I about to die; and therefore my knowledge was a cold, inoperative thing. But when the law had bound me, and given me over to death, and my heart within me was crushed with fear, then the sight of the glorious Substitute was as bright to me as a vision of heaven.

II. Secondly, upon the mount the provision was for Abraham, and so was the provision which the Lord displayed in the fulness of time when He gave up His Son to die. The ram caught in the thicket was a provision which on Abraham's part was quite unsought. He did not fall down and pray, "O Lord, in thy tenderness provide another victim instead of my son, Isaac." Probably it never entered his mind. But God spontaneously, from the free grace of His own heart, put the ram where Abraham found it. You and I did not pray for Christ to die. He died for us before we were born, and if He had not done so it would never have entered into our mind to ask for so great a gift. Until the Lord sought us we did not even seek to be saved by Christ, of the fact of whose death we had been made aware. Ours is the wandering, but the laying of those wanderings upon Jesus is of the Lord alone; we neither bought it, nor sought it, nor thought it.

In Abraham's case I believe it was AN UNEXPECTED THING.

He did not reckon upon any substitute for his son; he judged that he would have to die, and viewed him as already dead. As for ourselves, if God had not revealed the plan of salvation by the substitution of His only-begotten Son we should never have dreamed of it. Remember that the Son of God is one with the Father; and if the Holy Ghost had not revealed the fact that the offended God would Himself bear the penalty due for the offence, it would never have occurred to the human mind.

III. But, thirdly, we ought to dwell very long and earnestly upon the fact that for man's need the provision was MADE BY GOD HIMSELF.

The text says, "Jehovah-jireh," the Lord will see to it, the Lord will provide. None else could have provided a ransom. Neither on earth nor in heaven was there found any helper for lost humanity. What sacrifice could be presented to God if a sacrifice could be accepted? "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins." Men may themselves die, but in death each man who dies only pays his own debt to nature; there is nothing left for another. "None can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him." The provision was made by God Himself, since none other could provide. God alone could say, "Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom."

But was it not singular that the Lord Jehovah should provide it? When law has been broken, and its honor has to be retrieved, it would not be judged likely that the aggrieved party should make the sacrifice. That God, against whom all the blasphemy and sin and wickedness of a ribald world was aimed, shall He Himself make expiation? Shall the judge bear the penalty due to the criminal? "Lay it on the sinner; for it is his due;" so justice cries aloud, "Lay the penalty on the transgressor;" but if a substitute can be permitted, where can one be found able and willing to become surety for the guilty? Found upon the throne! Found in the majesty that is offended! Brethren, I am beaten down by my subject; forgive me that I cannot speak of it as I would desire. There is no room here for words; it is a matter for silent thought.

I will only interject this thought here—let none of us ever interfere with the provision of God. If in our dire distress He alone was our Jehovah-jireh, and provided for us a Substitute, let us not think that there is anything left for us to provide. Oh, sinner, do you cry, "Lord, I must have a broken heart"? He will provide it for thee. Do you cry, "Lord, I cannot master sin, I have not the power to conquer my passions"? He will provide strength for thee. Do you mourn, "Lord, I shall never hold on and hold out to the end. I am so fickle"? Then He will provide perseverance for thee. Dost thou think that after having given His own dear Son to purchase thee He will let that work fail because thou canst not provide some to complete the work? Oh, dream not so; dote not on such a folly. Whatever thou wantest, poor sinner, if thou believest in Christ the Lord's provision of a Saviour in Christ warrants thy believing that God will provide it. Salvation begins with Jehovah-jireh, the cross and the bleeding Saviour; dost thou think it will afterward drivel down into thy providing this and that? Oh, thy pride! Thy insane pride! Thou art to do something, art thou? Thou to help thy God to provide! Get thee out of the way, and be nothing; then shall God come in and be everything. Sink! It is the Lord that must rise. He shall be seen in the mount, and not thy self. Hide thy self, and let the glory of the Lord be manifested in thee. I wish that every troubled one here could catch this idea, and hold it fast.

IV. But I must pass on. That which God prepares for poor sinners is

A PROVISION GLORIOUSLY MADE.

God provided a ram instead of Isaac. This was sufficient for the occasion as a type; but that which was typified by the ram is infinitely more glorious. In order to save us God provided God. I cannot put it more simply. He did not provide an angel, nor a mere man, but God Himself. Come, sinner, with all thy load of sin; God can bear it; the shoulders that bear up the universe can well sustain thy load of guilt. God gave thee His Godhead to be thy Saviour when He gave thee His Son.

But He also gave in the person of Christ perfect manhood—such a man as never lived before, eclipsing even the perfection of the first Adam in the garden by the majestic innocence of his nature. When Jesus has been viewed as man, even unconverted men have so admired His excellence that they have almost adored Him. Jesus is God and man, and the Father has given that man, that God, to be thy Redeemer. For thy redemption the Lord God has given thee the death of Christ; and what a death it was! Bethink thee that to save thee He must hang naked to His shame between heaven and earth, rejected of both; must cry, "I thirst," and receive nothing but vinegar wherewith to moisten His burning lips. Jesus must "pour out His soul unto death" that we might live. He must be "numbered with the transgressors" that we might be numbered with His saints in glory everlasting. Was not this a glorious provision? What greater gift could be bestowed than one in whom God and man are blended in one?

V. Fifthly, the provision was MADE EFFECTIVELY.

Isaac did not die; the laughter in Abraham's house was not stifled; there was no grief for the patriarch; he went home with his son in happy companionship, because Jehovah had provided Himself a lamb for a burnt offering. The ram which was provided did not bleed in vain; Isaac did not die as well as the ram; Abraham did not have to slay the God-provided victim and his own son also. No, the one sacrifice sufficed. Beloved, this is my comfort in the death of Christ—I hope it is yours—that He did not die in vain. I have heard of a theology which, in its attempt to extol the efficacy of Christ's death, virtually deprives it of any certain efficiency; the result of the atonement is made to depend entirely upon the will of man, and so is left to hap-hazard. Our Lord, according to certain teachers, might or might not see of the travail of his soul. I confess that I do not believe in this random redemption, and I wonder that any persons can derive comfort from such teaching. I believe that the Son of God could not possibly have come into the world in the circumstances in which He did come, and could not have died as He did die, and yet be defeated and disappointed. He died for those who believe in Him, and these shall live, yea, they do live in Him.

VI. Turn we then, sixthly, to this note, that we may well glorify Jehovah-jireh because this provision was MADE FOR EVERY BELIEVER.

The provision on the Mount of Moriah was made on behalf of Abraham; he was himself a man of faith, and he is styled the "father of the faithful;" and now every faithful or believing one may stand where Abraham stood, and say, "Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will provide." Remember, however, that our faith must be of the same nature as that of Abraham, or it will not be counted to us for righteousness Abraham's faith worked by love; it so worked in him that he was willing to do all that the Lord bade him, even to the sacrifice of his own dear son. You must possess a living, working, self-sacrificing faith if you would be saved. If you have it, you may be as sure that you are saved as you are sure that you have sinned. "He that believeth on Him is not condemned," because Christ was condemned for him. "He that believeth on Him hath everlasting life;" he cannot die, for Christ died for him.

The great principle upon which our security is based is the righteousness of God, which assures us that He will not punish the substitute and then punish the person for whom the substitute endured the penalty. If Jesus bore the wrath of God for me, I cannot bear that wrath; it were contrary to every principle of a just moral government that the Judge should cast our Surety into prison and exact the penalty of Him, and then come upon those for whom the suretyship was undertaken. By this Gospel I am prepared to stand or fall; yea, by it I will live or die; I know no other. Because I believe it, I this day cry from the bottom of my heart, "Jehovah-jireh," the Lord has provided an effectual redemption for all those who put their trust in Him whom God has set forth to be a propitiation. It is true, as it written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." It is true that the faith which worketh by love brings justification to the soul.

VII. But now I close with a remark which will reveal the far-reaching character of my text. "Jehovah-jireh" is true concerning all necessary things. The instance given of Abraham being provided for shows us that the Lord will ever be a Provider for His people. As to the gift of the Lord Jesus, this is a provision which

GUARANTEES ALL OTHER PROVISION.

"He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" Abraham learned that; for, as soon as he had slaughtered the ram, the covenant was repeated in his ears, and repeated as he had never heard it before—accompanied with an oath. God cannot swear by any greater than Himself, and so He said, "By myself have I sworn." Thus was the covenant ratified by blood and by the oath of God. Oh, that bleeding Sacrifice! The covenant of God is confirmed by it, and our faith is established.

Where will He provide? He will provide for us in the mount—that is to say, in the place of our trial. When we reach the place where the fatal deed of utmost obedience is to be wrought, then God will interpose. You desire Him to provide for you when you lift up your eyes and see the mount afar off. He does not choose so to do; but in the mount it shall be seen, in the place of the trial, in the heat of the furnace, in the last extremity Jehovah will be seen, for He will see to it, and it shall become a proverb with you—"In the mount

JEHOVAH SHALL BE SEEN."

That is to say, when you cannot see, the Lord will see you and see to your need; for His eyes are upon the righteous, and His ears are open to their cry. As soon as the Lord has seen our need, then His provision shall be seen. You need not climb to heaven or descend into the deep to find it; the Lord's provision is near at hand—the ram in the thicket is behind you though you see it not as yet. When you have heard God speak to you, you shall turn and see it, and wonder you never saw it before. You will heartily bless God for the abundant provision which He reveals in the moment of trial.

You will soon die, and perhaps in dying you will be troubled by the fear of death; but let that evil be removed by this knowledge—that the Lord will yet be seen, and when He shall appear you shall be manifested in His glory. In the day of the revelation of the Lord Jesus your body shall be raised from the dead, and then shall the divine provision yet more fully be discovered. "In the mount it shall be seen," and there shall God Himself be manifested to you, for your eyes shall behold Him and not another.

There is a rendering given to my text which we cannot quite pass over. Some read it that "in the mount the people shall be seen"—in that mount in years to come the multitude would gather to worship God. God's presence was in the temple which was built upon that spot, and thither the tribes went up, the tribes of the Lord to worship the Most High. I dwell in a house not made with hands, but piled by God of solid slabs of mercy. He is building for me a palace of crystal, pure and shining, transparent as the day. I see the house in which I am to abide forever gradually growing around me. Its foundation was laid of old, in eternal love—"in the mount it shall be seen." The Lord provided for me a Covenant Head, a Redeemer, and a Friend, and in Him I abide. Since then, course upon course of the precious stones of lovingkindness has been laid, and the jewelled walls are all around me. Has it not been so with you?

By and by we shall be roofed in with glory everlasting, and then as we shall look to the foundations, and the walls, and to the arch above our head, we shall shout, "Jehovah-jireh"—God has provided all this for me! How we shall of the divine building! How will our memory think over the method of the building! On such a day was that stone laid, I remember it right well: "I was sore sick and the Lord comforted me." On such a day was that other stone laid—I was in prison spiritually, and the heavenly visitor came unto me. On such another day was that bejewelled course completed, for my heart was glad in the Lord and my glory rejoiced in the God of my salvation. The walls of love are still rising, and when the building is finished and the topstone is brought out with shoutings of "Grace, grace, unto it!" we shall then sing this song unto the Lord—JEHOVAH-JIREH! The Lord has provided it. From the beginning to the end there is nothing of man and nothing of merit, nothing of self, but all of God in Christ Jesus, who hath loved us with an everlasting love, and therefore hath abounded toward us in blessing according to the fulness of His infinite heart. To Him be praise world without end. Amen, and Amen.

THOMAS CARLYLE

A BOOK was issued last week by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, of New York, which is having an immense circulation. It is the concluding volume of the life of Thomas Carlyle, by the great historian, James Anthony Froude. Two circumstances combine to make the book eagerly read. The first is the ability of the author, who is widely known and admired on both sides the Atlantic as probably the greatest living writer of English; the second is that Thomas Carlyle was in his day regarded as one of the greatest public teachers.

It is important that readers of this book, who doubtless comprise the great bulk of the reading public, read it in the right spirit. There is probably no book in circulation now which more clearly shows the value of religion in the heart by the sad picture painted of its subject. He was possessed of magnificent gifts, clear insight, vigorous logical power, and the ability to express his thoughts in language of marvellous incisiveness and force. His learning was profound, and his moral character irreproachable. Yet, with all these gifts, every page of his life shows that his life was a miserable one. It also shows that of men and things he took a prejudiced, jaundiced view. Of the charity that is kind, that thinketh no evil, that believeth all things, and that hopeth all things, he appears to have had none. The love of Christ, which causes us to love our brother, also had no place in his heart, and, as a consequence, he railed at his best friends, and was a weary, discontented, unsatisfied man.

Thomas Carlyle was born within half a mile of the village of Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire, on December 4th, 1795, and about eight months before the death of Robert Burns. James Carlyle, the father of Thomas, was a stonemason and architect at the time of his birth, but subsequently became a tenant of Scotsbery, a farm of two or three hundred acres, now occupied by Mr. Carlyle's youngest brother. James Carlyle was a man of uprightness, integrity, and genuine worth, possessing no small share of Scotch shrewdness and energy. His wife was in all respects worthy of her husband, and was never mentioned by her illustrious son but in words of affectionate reverence. Carlyle learned to read and write in the parish school of Hoddam, where he remained until his ninth year. His father's friend, the parish minister, taught him the elements of Latin, and in due time he entered the Burgh School of Annan, six miles distant, where he met that Edward Irving whose genius and eloquence in after years made him so celebrated. The warm friendship thus begun between the two youths proved a lasting and most honorable attachment.

At the age of fourteen Carlyle entered the University of Edinburgh, which at that time boasted a body of professors "of European reputation." The quiet and reserved, but gifted lad, however, seems to have had a keen eye for their weak points, and formed an opinion of them (with one exception) by no means flattering. Nevertheless, Carlyle profited greatly by his four years' University course. His favorite study was that of mathematics, but his scholarly tastes and well-directed industry enabled him to lay up a stock of general erudition, which his extraordinary talents soon turned to account. His father's great wish was that he should be a Presbyterian minister; but Thomas, having some doubts as to certain doctrines held by orthodox Presbyterians, felt he could not comply with that desire.

Whatever regret may be felt that the pulpit thus lost the services of one so gifted, it is impossible not to admire the courage, honesty, and conscientiousness with which the young man acted at a time of great difficulty. For about two years after this he earned his bread as a teacher of mathematics in the burgh school of Annan, where he had been a pupil, and subsequently became teacher of mathematics and classics in the burgh school of Kirkcaldy.

His next removal, two years later, was to Edinburgh, where his career as a writer of books may be said to have begun. Among his earliest literary efforts were a number of articles, chiefly biographical, contributed to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." Though these sketches afford hardly any indication of the great powers afterward developed by their writer, they are examples of good work well done, and show no little diligence and accuracy. About this time he married Miss Welsh, the only daughter of Dr. John Welsh, of Haddington, a descendant of John Knox.

Soon after his marriage Carlyle went to live at Craigenputtock, a moorland farm near Dumfries, which belonged to his wife's mother. He had abandoned teaching, and was hoping, though not with much confidence, to gain a livelihood by literature. His life in that farmhouse was solitary almost beyond conception. "It was," Mrs. Carlyle said, in a letter to a friend, "sixteen miles distant on every side from all the conveniences of life, shops, and even post-office. Further, we were very poor."

For seven years the Carlyles lived at Craigenputtock, often not seeing a human being for days together. Meanwhile Carlyle was working hard at his books and laying the foundation of his literary fame. Contributions to literary reviews, notably the Foreign and the Edinburgh sufficed to supply their simple wants and to leave them a small surplus, which they used in assisting needy relations.

It was in 1834, Carlyle then thirty-nine years of age, that he and his devoted wife left Craigenputtock and took up their residence permanently in London. They took the house No. 5 Cheyne Row, a picture of which appears on this page. Carlyle hoped that once in London some editorial chair or some other congenial work would have been offered him, but he was disappointed. He worked on in poverty for two years, not knowing whether he would ever be able to earn a living by his pen. During all that time he seriously contemplated abandoning literature as a profession and coming to America to become a farmer or a lecturer or teacher. He was, however, persuaded to remain in England, and when, in 1838, his book on the French Revolution appeared, his financial position became assured. He was also invited to deliver lectures in London, and he derived from his first course the sum of one thousand dollars. From that time forward the fear of poverty tormented him no longer.

He wrote regularly, with untiring diligence. The best known of those he produced subsequent to that on the French Revolution were: "The Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell, with Elucidations;" "Lectures on German Literature;" "The History of Literature;" "The Revolutions of Modern Europe;" "Heroes and Hero-Worship;" "Life of John Sterling;" his last great work being "The History of Frederick the Great," in ten volumes.

Carlyle's position in the world of letters was a proud one. The greatest minds of the day honored him and gave him precedence. Dickens, Thackeray, Mill, Sidney Smith, Macaulay, and Jeffreys esteemed him highly, while lords and ladies showed him hospitality, and were proud to be called his friends. He died February 5th, 1881, aged eighty-six.

We are indebted to Mr. J. A. Froude for the most ever written of a great man. Mr. Froude admits that it would have been a more pleasant task to have left unpublished much that appears in these volumes. But he scorned to keep back any of the truth, or to represent his friend as other than he really was. Carlyle's faults were grievous. He seemed to be full of scorn for the whole world. Even the friends who reverenced him did not escape. In his diary he draws their characters with a pen dipped in gall. To the wife whom he deeply loved he was harsh and unsympathetic. So that his comfort was secured, he did not appear to care whether she was working herself to death or not. A word of appreciation, of gratitude, and of love would have filled her heart with joy, but he gave it not. He neglected her, treated her with coldness, was exacting, always ready to find fault, and though after her death he bemoaned his faults, he could not atone for the miseries he had caused her. Nothing of this is concealed in Mr. Froude's narrative. Knowing well that Carlyle hated lying, and especially that form of lying which consists in giving to the world a partial and therefore false estimate of any man or thing, he presented Carlyle in his book just as he was, concealing no defect, softening no harshness, but doing his work faithfully.

For the first time the world knows from this volume exactly what were the religious principles of the great master of literature. It was known that Carlyle had a pious mother, and that, proud as she was of her son, she was disappointed in him on account of his lack of Christian faith. Now, we know from her letters printed here how deep was that sorrow and how earnestly she strove, until the day of her death, to lead him to her Saviour. He told his mother, and he so continued to tell her to the day of her death, that their belief was essentially the same, although their language was different. But he told Irving, his most intimate friend, that he did not believe, as Irving did, in the Christian religion, and it was vain to hope that he ever would so believe. Both statements were true as Carlyle understood them, but they could not be true in the light which every converted man has. Of the existence of God, of the responsibility of man to his Maker, he never entertained a doubt. But when his mother and Irving and John Sterling came to speak to him of man's fallen nature, of the need of the new birth, of salvation through the death of Christ, of the utter hopelessness and helplessness of man out of Christ, he denied each and every proposition. The Jews, he believed, were endowed by God with wonderful gifts and insight into spiritual truth, and in the course of ages worked out for themselves convictions about God and the universe far in advance of the philosophy existing all around them. These convictions, he believed, were not revelation from God, but the result of God-given faculties. Christianity he regarded as an evolution from Judaism — something far higher and better, but still of human origin. He leaned thus upon his own understanding, and did not seek the gift of the Holy Spirit. Thus we miss in his writings that love of mankind, which is one of the first-fruits of the Spirit. He fulminated against sin and wrong-doing with all the earnestness of an ancient prophet. Like Isaiah and Jeremiah and Ezekiel, he told the world that the consequence of sin is death, that men who live in sin would be miserable here and hereafter, that God would punish sin, and that the world, by its lies and hypocrisies, was tending to destruction, and so he did a good work. But he knew nothing in his own soul of the light and life which Jesus came to proclaim; he knew nothing of the regenerating power of the Gospel; he had not experienced the joy of union with Christ and reconciliation with God through the cross; and so, though he could warn the world, he could not point it to the way of salvation. Never was there a more conspicuous instance of the incapacity of man at his very best to find the way to God apart from revelation. His writings and his life show that, had he humbly sought God through Christ, he would have been a happier man and a more useful teacher. Missing that he was miserable, despairing, unloving, and in many respects unlovable.

Unexpected News for a Weary Seeker.

THE ORDER OF JESUS CHRIST.

AN eminent Christian, now laboring for the salvation of souls in benighted China, relates the following incident, which occurred when he was spending a brief period of rest in the South-east of Ireland:

"It was my habit to walk every evening along a stretch of road passing above the valley of the Suir, commanding an unrivalled view of woodland and meadow and in the far distance the silver line of the sea. One evening as I was strolling on my accustomed beat, enjoying the balmy air and the glorious prospect, my attention was arrested by the voice of an old man by the wayside, who asked for alms. Turning my look toward him, I was much struck with his tall and dignified appearance, as he stood with staff in hand, his snow-white beard flowing down his breast.

"'My friend,' I said, 'if I may judge from your appearance you are a very old man—the snows of many years are upon your head and bosom.'

"'You may well say that,' he replied; 'only last week I completed my threescore and eighteen years. Strange things have I seen in my day—more changes than I could tell, and the real old times seem to have slipped away altogether.'

"'Yes; and old men like you love to linger upon the past. I hope, however, you have not neglected to think upon the future. In the course of nature you must expect soon to pass from this world. What are your prospects, and what preparation have you made for the life to come?'

"'Oh,' he answered, 'I have not forgotten the care of my soul. What of this world's good have I ever known to make me heedless of the concerns of eternity? I have labored hard, sir, to make my peace with God, and have followed the advice of my church in all her holy requirements. Poor and despicable though I seem, I am a member, sir, of the blessed order of St. Francis, and of the blessed order of St. Benedict, and of the blessed order of St. Joseph, and I hope soon to belong to the order of the Holy Virgin, "blessed above all women;" but it takes a large sum for one such as I am, besides long penance, to secure the means of admission. However, I am glad to be able to say the greater part of the penance I have performed, and the money I have nearly gathered. When once I enter that high and sacred order I hope to be ready for God's summons from this life.'

"'I am glad,' I said, 'that you have not been heedless of the great interests of the other world; but I am a member of a far higher order than any of those which you have mentioned.'

"'Pray, sir, what order is that?'

"'I am a humble, unworthy member of the order of the Lord Jesus Christ.'

"'I never heard of that order,' said the old man; 'it must, however, be in truth a high one; for Jesus Christ' (bowing) 'is above all. But how did you gain admission into it? You are a much younger man than I; you must have paid a very large sum for the privilege.'

"'You are right as to the greatness of the order—"for a Christian is the highest style of man"—but completely wrong as to the difficulty of becoming a member of it. I paid nothing for the safety and the honor. Upon application I was received, and at once, "without money and without price;" and you, my friend, may also be numbered among its happy members with a similar ease and promptitude, and upon the like terms as I was.'

"'Can it be possible? I never heard before of religious privileges without a payment. I should like to be a member of the order of the blessed Saviour. Tell me, sir, what must I do to obtain admission? What did you do?'

"My emotions were stirred, and I spoke earnestly, as God gave me utterance. With all the clearness, simplicity, and loving pathos I could command I set before the aged man the Gospel of the Son of God—told him of the fulness and freeness of the salvation which was purchased on the cross, and how no qualification was required from the sinner who penitently received it. To illustrate the facility and speed of the divine remedy, I employed many of the phrases and figures of speech of the Bible, especially the typical act of Moses in raising, amid the camp of Israel, the brazen serpent, upon which whoever looked, lived, though he had been in the last agony of death.

"As I proceeded, the expression of the old man's face changed from curiosity to wonder, and from wonder to awe. The tears coursed each other rapidly down his flushed and furrowed cheeks, while he sobbed out, 'Thank God, sir, that ever I saw your face or heard your voice. Oh, sir, you have been as an angel of God to me! Long have I been hungering and thirsting for such news as you have brought to my ears. It is as the soft, fresh rain of heaven to my perishing soul. What you say, sir, must be true—that God's own heart and hand are plainly to be seen in such a way of salvation; it never could have come from the grasping and selfish thoughts of man. It is indeed God's own Gospel; and long as eternity shall I have to bless you for making known to me its precious truths.'"

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Paradise Lost.

HESTER was holding the poor suffering child tenderly in her arms as she heard and answered her questions. A deep sea of pity was stirred in her heart for the neglected little one, doomed to suffer for sins not her own. When would the bitter consequences of that dreadful wickedness cease to be felt? Robert Waldron, by his vicious conduct, had caused misery which appeared endless. There was Rose, cowering in shame at home; there was John Morley's desolated life, her own dreary childhood, and now this tender little lamb bleating out its flickering life in solitude. Oh, sin is a bitter thing!

When Hester told the child her name, the little head was raised with an amused expression in the eyes.

"Why, that is my name!" she cried. "You never can be the good Hester, the dear, beautiful Hester I'm called after! Oh, are you that Hester? My mother used to cry ever so when she talked about her. Are you the very same Hester?"

"Yes, my darling little Hester," she sobbed; "I was her little girl once."

"Then we are both Hesters!" said the little girl, with a playful smile. "How droll that is! How old are you?"

"I am ten years older than you," she answered.

"And perhaps you will live to be very old, and I shall die soon," said the child. Are we alike, big Hester?"

"Yes; I used to be a very lonely little girl like you," said Hester pitifully; "nobody ever used to nurse me or play with me like other children. My mother was dead."

"Had you a live father?" asked little Hester.

"Yes," she answered.

"Then we are not alike in that," went on the child; "I never had a father. He died before ever I was born. If he had been alive he would have worked and worked to get money that we might not be so very poor, and for me to have some holidays. Did you know my father, Hester?"

"Dear child, yes!" she murmured, sadly.

"Oh, tell me about him. Tell me what he was like. My mother always cried if I spoke about him ever. I dream of him so often; every night now, I think. Do you think he will know me in heaven?"

"Your Father in heaven will know you," answered Hester.

"Yes, God," said little Hester, with a simple confidence. "I shall see Him and know Him. But shall I see my father who was my father here?"

"My darling," she replied, "it will be all as God chooses for us."

She nestled down contentedly for some time in Hester's arms; not sleeping, for her eyes were wide open, but with a restfulness more full of pleasure than sleep.

"Did you love my father when you knew him?" she asked after a long silence.

"When I was as old as you I loved him very much," answered Hester, with a faltering voice; "he used to read to me sometimes while I sat on his knee."

"But he never nursed me on his knee!" cried the child, with a sudden passion of tears. "He never saw me, and we never knew one another."

She wept bitterly for some time leaning against Hester, who soothed her with fond words and caresses, until she grew calm again, and lay down upon the pillow exhausted, with her face as white as the cover upon which it rested.

"Tell me what he was like, while I lie quiet," she whispered, almost inaudibly.

"He was tall and very handsome," said Hester.

"Very handsome," repeated his little daughter, with lips that could scarcely speak.

"And he had a very pleasant voice," continued Hester.

"A very pleasant voice," echoed the child's faint tones.

"Oh, my darling!" cried Hester, "I cannot tell you any more. Be quiet now. You will hurt yourself by talking."

"The doctor told me I wasn't to talk at all," she said; "but I can't help talking to you. I like to hear your voice speaking. You shall read to me, if you please."

Hester read to her in soft, low tones for some time, until she fell asleep, holding her hand fast. By and by there came in the lady of the house, a tall, gaunt, weary-looking woman, with all the airs and affectations of the mistress of a cheap boarding-school. She acknowledged Hester's presence by a stiff courtesy, and stood at the foot of the bed regarding the child with an air of cold anxiety.

"What do you think of her?" she asked, in a low voice.

"I think she will never get well," whispered Hester, with tears in her eyes.

"Dear! dear! But that is very trying," she replied, "especially in a school. The parents might think it was measles or small-pox. She must be taken away at once."

"I will speak to Mr. Bramwell about it," said Hester. "To-night I shall go to his church, and then I shall see him. She shall be removed to-morrow, if possible."

"Is there no immediate danger?" she asked.

"I should think not," answered Hester; 'but the doctor will tell you when he comes."

When he came, the doctor, who was merely a young medical assistant to an older man, gave it as his opinion that the child might rally and live through the summer, but would certainly "be cut off" at the approach of winter. Hester stayed beside her all day, and only in the evening left her in order to go to Carl's church, which was about two miles away. As she stooped over to kiss her the little Hester put her arm feebly round her neck and looked up beseechingly into her eyes.

"You will not be away long?" she murmured.

"I am sure to come back very soon," she said; "and perhaps I shall bring Mr. Bramwell back with me. You are fond of him?"

"Oh, very fond!" whispered the child.

Kissing her again affectionately, Hester went out to find the church where Carl was preaching. As she plodded along the streets, somewhat dazed at first by the hurrying stream of people, her thoughts flew to Little Aston, to her father and her step-mother dwelling so strangely under one roof. She was not distressed or anxious about them, for her arrangements for their comfort seemed to her perfect. Could she have known at that moment that those loving plans had miscarried, and that all her schemes had been thwarted, she would not have been in that peaceful, contented frame of mind.

Hester's departure seemed to have been like the removal of a blessed presence, and had been followed by a revel of malign influences which, had she been there, would have been held in check. When her father saw her go he became the prey of morbid and despairing thoughts. The stillness of his home was more profound than ever, now that he had lost the soft footstep of his daughter moving about his room, and her low, caressing voice speaking to him from time to time. Lawson entered the room once, after knocking loudly at the door and receiving no answer; he found his beloved employer lying half across his desk, so absorbed in reverie as to be unconscious of his presence until he touched him on the shoulder. Then he lifted up his face, grayer and more haggard than ever, with eyes burning more deeply in their sockets, while his head trembled as if with palsy. It was the last interruption but one which broke in upon his melancholy memories.

This other interruption was the entrance of the young maid-servant, who, with a tearful face, came to tell her master that a brother of hers was coming home to pay his last visit there before emigrating to Australia. If he could only spare her till Monday evening, Lawson's mother had promised to look after the house and wait upon him. John Morley said "Go," almost impatiently. It signified nothing to him who performed the small services he required.

Madame Lawson had promised Hester to go about nine o'clock, or a little later, after her son's comfort had been provided for, and to stay all night and the next day in John Morley's house. The girl wanted to leave at four, and it seemed but a small thing to her to ask the poor woman her mistress gave a shelter to to fill up the space between her own departure and the arrival of Madame Lawson. She asked Rose boldly, and Rose seized the chance with the passionate eagerness of one who has long waited for the moment when they can do something, anything, for their beloved. She would have waited upon her white-headed, poverty-stricken, deserted husband on bended knees, with deep abasement and trembling devotion. But all her duties would be to prepare his tea and summon him to it, keeping herself unseen.

She stole up-stairs with a noiseless step, into his chamber, and arranged the bed again, which had been roughly and hastily done by the servant, making it as soft and full of comfort as tender hands could make it. Then she looked out the clothes he would need for the Sunday, lingering over her work with a frightened ecstasy.

When the hour for tea came, she set the tray and his chair near the fire, in a room adjoining his sitting-room, and put his slippers on the hearth. Would he need anything she had not placed upon the table, and ring for her, so giving her some chance of hearing his voice and looking furtively into his face? Whether she dreaded or hoped for this most she could not tell, while she stood at the kitchen door, with her hands pressed against her heart, as she listened to his movements about the other room. But he did not ring; and, after a brief meal-time, she heard him go back to his own sitting-room. He remained there till seven o'clock, when he went out to attend some meeting at the chapel.

She was alone in the house once her own, quite alone. She could venture into John Morley's desolate parlor, which she had seen so often from without. How well she remembered the old days passed in it! Here was the carpet she had chosen herself, faded and threadbare, with one long, narrow, bare strip, which his feet had worn in his restless pacings to and fro. The scarlet baize she had nailed with brass nails along the edge of the book-shelves, in order to brighten up the dingy rows of books, was a deep, dull red now, and the nails no longer glistened in the firelight. She began to wonder how the room overhead would look—her room, which she had locked up herself, and the key of which was still safe in her keeping.

She knew herself to be absolutely alone, with no fear of interruption for another hour to come. Lingering for a few minutes in a tremor of nervous hesitation, she could not succeed in shaking off the feverish desire to see it once again, during this absence of Hester, which made it possible to do so. She flew back to her refuge, and sought for the key at the bottom of the box which held her scanty possessions. It had accompanied her in all her wanderings—this key which she had turned upon the paradise she despised, and could never more re-enter. She hastened with it—for her time was not long—up the staircase again, which she had so often trodden with a light step and lighter heart; past Hester's little room, so severe, so simple, so bare of all the common luxuries of girlhood; past her husband's chamber. Beyond stood the door which no hand had opened since she herself had closed it. The key was not rusty, but the lock was, and it grated harshly, and the hinges creaked as she pushed open the door. Then she stood inside.

Just as she had left it! She had remembered to bring a candle with her, though it was still daylight in the other rooms, and its faint light was insufficient to make manifest all the ravages of time. There were the books she had been reading, after her fitful fashion, still scattered on the table, with a man's glove lying among them; she recollected it in an instant, it was one of Robert Waldron's. There was her fanciful little couch of blue damask drawn up to the fireside, and the chair beside it where he had been sitting, and Hester's low hassock between her seat and his. The piano was still open, and a yellow page of music, no doubt some song she had been singing to him, was upon the stand.

A gray dust and tarnish had fallen upon all, but she scarcely saw it. It seemed to her as if it could only have been yesterday, last night, when she locked it up, and she had been passing through some horrible dream. This sharp martyrdom of repentance was no more than a trick of her forewarning conscience. The utter stillness and solitariness of the house was but an accident of the passing hour. Hester must be asleep in her little bed and her husband would come in soon from chapel. When she saw Robert again she would bid him come near her no more.

Rose stood in the middle of the room gazing vacantly about her. It seemed as if after a mighty tempest, after a strong flood of great troubles and sins which had tossed her feeble soul from billow to billow, she had been brought suddenly home again to the haven where she could cast anchor in still, smooth water. She had been very happy to-day. She felt like a child whose face is hidden in the close embrace of its mother, and who sees no longer the terrors which have driven it to that refuge. She was vaguely, childishly happy again for a moment. Everything evil was apparently drawing near to an end. The night was almost past, and the day was at hand. Even here, in the place which should have upbraided her most loudly, she saw sadness indeed, but not hopelessness. Her sins, which were many, had been pardoned.

She crossed the room slowly to the piano, and stooped down to look at the music-sheet on it. It was no song, but a chant—"I will arise and go to my Father." She remembered now that it was to her husband, not to Robert Waldron, she had sung it; and he had stood beside her, his hand resting upon her shoulder, and his voice, a low, weak, yet sweet voice, joining with hers. Was it not a token for good, finding this sacred chant still open? Then she had known nothing about going to the Father. Now she had arisen, with all her sins and unfaithfulness, and gone to Him, and He had seen her afar off, and had received her gladly. Would it not be the same with her husband? She sat down and ran her fingers absently along the discolored keys. The jarring, jingling tones, which had lost all harmony, brought her back sharply to the full reality of her position. She could dream no more. The small mirror, which she had had set over the piano, reflected from its dulled surface a faded, stricken, withered face, instead of the bright, laughing features of the young, proud mistress of a new home. She was Rose Morley, the guilty wife of a dishonored husband.

John Morley had meanwhile returned to his home. He had been to the chapel, and after waiting there some time, and finding no other member of the small church was coming, he went back directly to his house. All day he had been the prey of vehement agitation, and the approaching return of night did not tend to allay it. He let himself into his lonely dwelling, and stood upon the threshold for a minute, with the door half open in his hand, listening for some sound to break the stillness of his home. A craven fear of being quite alone was at work within him for the first time in his life; his flesh crept and his nerves tingled. But he had no resource, there was no means of escaping from this new and panic dread.

He closed the door and went on, stopping to change his boots for the slippers he found put ready for him. He entered his own parlor and lit his lamp; but this attack upon his nervous system continued to gather strength. His hands trembled until he could not turn over the leaves of his book. A vague, indescribable impression was produced upon his mind by something in the aspect of his room, that his lost wife had been there a few minutes ago—had but just quitted it. He fancied more keenly than ever that he could almost see her and hear her. An agony of mingled despair and tenderness shook his soul to the centre.

It might have been but a day or two since Rose had forsaken him; it might have been the very night when he had aroused his little girl from her sleep, telling her it was better to die than to live. There was something unutterably mournful in this strong, unwitnessed, insupportable anguish which mastered John Morley, and brought the past before him a hundredfold more vivid than the present.

Upon this paroxysm of his soul, which just now was bearing him rapidly to the verge of insanity, there fell suddenly the shrill, false jangle of the piano in the room overhead. He lifted himself up, and hearkened with a ghastly face. The discord ran through his fevered brain once, and then ceased; the house was plunged again into the dreariness of an unbroken silence.

SOLOMON'S SIN.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 16, 1 Kings 11 : 4 13. Golden Text, Prov. 4 : 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Condition of Solomon's Privileges—The Hearing Heart Still Necessary — No Innate Strength—Safe while he Trusted—Seeking his own Way—Procuring Prohibited Pleasures —No Spiritual State Independent of God's Help—Sanctified Souls Dependent Still—A Sad Story — The Beginning of Defection—Open Insults to God—The Joyful Canticles —The Utterance of a Restored Backslider.

No blessing which God can give to us makes us independent of Him. True, the Lord had given Solomon "a wise and an understanding heart;" but this heart had no power in itself to keep him from sin. It was a "hearing heart," capable of receiving and of understanding the thoughts of God, and capable of reciprocating them. But God never meant to deliver him, or any other of His children, from the necessity of trusting Him at all times and about all circumstances.

In the early part of his reign, conscious of his own nothingness, he sought and found guidance from God, and there was a loveliness and dignity about the young king so gifted, yet so little in his own eyes. But as time went on, he began to and do according to his own will, until by his own actions his wisdom became turned into foolishness.

Centuries before he came to the throne God had made provision for the kingdom and rules to be observed by whosoever He should choose to be His people's king. "He shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses" (Deut. 17 : 16). Nevertheless, Solomon disobeyed this command; "he had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen" (1 Kings 4 : 26). "And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen. . . . And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt" (1 Kings 10 : 26, 28). "Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away." In this still more Solomon sinned against the declared will of God, and also against his own strong convictions (Prov. 5 : 3–23; 6 : 24–26; 7 : 5–27), "for he loved many strange women." His life was a sad witness against God's ordinance of marriage, "a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh" (Gen. 2 : 24; Matt. 19 : 5).

What a lesson this is for us! Solomon sought an understanding heart for his people's sake, but he sought horses, wives, gold and silver for himself.

GOD HAD FORBIDDEN SELF-SEEKING

in these things; but Solomon went into every kind of self-seeking, until he could say with Coheleth, "Whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, I withheld not mine heart from any joy" (Eccl. 2 : 10). But in self-seeking there is no satisfaction, and the disappointed man had to say that all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun. It is a common idea that if we can only get into some state of holiness, we shall be invulnerable to all attacks of Satan; that we have only to get into that state, and the state will necessarily keep us. Some imagine conversion to be such a state, and are sorely disappointed when they find that the same old heart responds to sin still. Some imagine sanctification to be a state which will keep us in spite of ourselves, if we can only get into it; some imagine that if once the Lord heals them of any disease, no pain or disease is ever to touch them again. But this would be to make conversion, sanctification or healing a Saviour instead of Christ, and we could then say it is conversion saves us, or sanctification saves us, or healing makes us whole, while all the time it is Jesus Himself who does all. Some imagine that one who has come into great blessing of soul or body needs Jesus less than one who has been less blest. The exact reverse is the case, for the more we are blest of God the more do we become dependent upon Him

TO KEEP US BLEST.

Solomon, when his wives turned away his heart, went to great lengths in the terrible sin of idolatry. None fall so low as they who have lived very near to God, and who have become backsliders. Truly we need the exhortation, "Be not high-minded, but fear" (Rom. 11 : 20). None are so sad as they who have known the deepest communion of soul with Him, and who seek in vain to fill the void of their hearts with something less than Himself. It is a sad story. "Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites." Is it conceivable that a man with the breadth of mind which Solomon possessed could actually come down to the absurdities of idolatry? Yes, it was even so. The heart was wrong, the warped judgment followed after, and there is little doubt that at this time his gigantic intellect was frittered away in the miserable attempt to justify himself. Perhaps he prided himself on not being narrow, perhaps he satisfied himself by saying it was the only way to preserve household peace. Alas! it might be said of him more truly than of Saul, "How are the mighty fallen" (II Sam. 1 : 19)!

The defection of Solomon began first in private; but once on the downward course, and he became bold in his idolatry, and built idol shrines for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, and Molech, the abomination of the Ammonites, and so for all his strange wives which burnt and sacrificed to their gods. Some of the faithful servants of God who had rejoiced when Solomon served Him so faithfully in the outset of his reign must have been nearly heart-broken as these open witnesses of insult to God appeared in different parts of Jerusalem. David had deeply sinned, but he as deeply repented, and received pardon; but with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father. . . . And Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord, and went not fully after the Lord, as did David his father. . . . And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice, and had commanded him concerning this thing, that he should not go after other gods; but he kept not that which the Lord commanded."

When God gave Solomon a hearing heart it was in order that he might hear His voice, but Solomon turned away and listened to his own will, and then became the slave of heathen women. When the Lord blesses us, it is always that we may make use of that blessing for Him, and be more ready to His hand that He may make us a blessing to others. We do not hear of one good work done by Solomon in the latter years of his reign. The honor in which he had been held diminished, his power over his people declined, his own intellect very evidently was enfeebled, and the Lord spoke to him of judgment, declaring that He would rend the kingdom from him, not in his days, but in his son's days. From this time peace was at an end, rebellion began to stir, and the man who had been "a man of rest" was so no more.

Why did not Solomon at once seek the face of the Lord? He is "plenteous in mercy and of great kindness." Thank God, Jesus is not only the Way to God, but the Way back when His children have wandered. Perhaps the king had to be humbled in the dust, and if the Song of Solomon was written in his later years, then it may have been the joy of one who in soul had passed through death to real union with the Lord. Sin is an awful thing, but, thank God, not irremediable when put into the hands of our Almighty Saviour. Let us take the warning from this painful history, and rest neither in great gifts nor in blessed experience, but only and always in the living God, present with us, dwelling in us, if we belong to Him.

THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE,

Governor-General of Canada.

An Ancient Family—Its First Distinguished Representative—The First Marquis a Friend of the Thirteen Colonies—The Marquis's Birth and Early Life—High Official Position—Surrendered on Principle—His Appointment—Farewell at Londonderry—Reception at Quebec—Sworn in—Reply to Address of Welcome.

THE Governor-General of Canada, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, belongs to a family which has been for more than a century distinguished in public affairs. The first of his ancestors who is known to fame was William Petty, the son of a Hampshire clothier. The clothier was prosperous, and gave his son a university education, which the lad turned to good account. He became a physician, and secured an appointment in Ireland under the government. That was in 1651. In the time of the confiscations he supervised the making of a survey of the island, rendered necessary by the wholesale redistribution of the property. He received a percentage on the value of the estates surveyed, which amounted to so large a sum that he acquired fifty thousand acres of land in Kerry County, Ireland, which still form part of Lord Lansdowne's estates. He made his peace with the King when Charles II. was placed on the throne of his father, and received grants of more land, and was knighted.

The son of this Sir William Petty was made Baron Shelburne, and he, dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother, who was made Earl Shelburne. He too died without issue, and was succeeded by his nephew, John Fitzmaurice, from whom the Marquis of Lansdowne is a lineal descendant.

The first Marquis of Lansdowne deserves special mention, as he was at a time when our fathers sorely needed friends. When the thirteen colonies revolted, the Marquis of Lansdowne, then Earl Shelburne, was the colleague of Fox, and when all the foremost men of the day were clamoring for war, and supporting the Tory Government in its effort to reimpose the English yoke on the colonists, Shelburne earned a great deal of unpopularity by denouncing the attempt. He stood prominent in the ranks of those who unceasingly advocated peace, and was one of the authors of the famous treaty. He was raised to the Marquisate as the first Marquis of Lansdowne. He was the great-grandfather of the present Marquis.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

The Right Hon. Henry Charles Keith Petty Fitzmaurice, Marquis of Lansdowne, is the eldest son of Henry, fourth Marquis, K.G., by marriage with the Hon. Emily Jane, in her own right Baroness Nairne, and was born January 14th, 1845. He is therefore now thirty-nine years old—just the same age as the Marquis of Lorne, whom he has succeeded. A curious incident is related of his early years. The heir to the ancient name and large estates of the Lansdownes was, when a child, so scrupulously tended by a doting young mother that neither cream nor butter was allowed to pass the infant's lips lest it should mar a delicate complexion. The natural result was a debility and sickly paleness, which warranted invoking the advice of the Queen's physician, Sir Benjamin Brodie. This eminent practitioner immediately created a revolution in the nursery by prescribing rich cream and fresh butter without stint. The nurse was instructed to allow the little fellow to steep his chubby fists and arms to the elbows, if the nascent lord should feel so disposed, so that grease might enter the system at every pore. The sequel showed a healthy, bouncing lordling.

As soon as he was old enough he was sent to Eton, and thence, in due course, to Oxford. In 1866, at the age of twenty-one, he succeeded to the title, for in that year his father died. He took his seat in the House of Lords, and at once began to take an active part in the business of the House, and in a very short time became officially connected with the Liberal Government of the day. A Lord of the Treasury from 1869 to 1872, he was then appointed Under-Secretary for War, and held that office till the fall of the Gladstone Government in 1874. In 1880, after the Liberal victory, he was made Under-Secretary for India, but in a few months he found that he could not support the Irish policy of the government, and resigned. His doing so showed his fidelity to principle. It is seldom that so young a man is placed in so high an office as he held, and he had good reason to hope that soon he would have been promoted to the rank of a Cabinet Minister. His position and prospects he surrendered rather than support a policy which he did not approve.

There can be no doubt that he has been a considerable sufferer both by the Irish Land Act and, still more, by the Anti-rent agitation which preceded and accompanied that measure, and even the stoutest sympathizer with Ireland will admit that his original secession was natural, and that his subsequent refusal to do more than criticise was patriotic and statesmanlike.

Lord Lansdowne remained out of office until the term of the Marquis of Lorne as was drawing to a close. His younger brother, however, was honored by Mr. Gladstone by an offer of the Under-Secretaryship in the Department of State. Probably the Premier desired to show in that way his respect for the conscientious act of the Marquis of Lansdowne. There was some talk of the Queen's youngest son, the Duke of Albany, succeeding his brother-in-law, the Marquis of Lorne, but the wishes of the young man and his mother were quietly but firmly set aside by the Premier, and the Marquis of Lansdowne received the appointment.

The appointment received the approval of the English press. The Daily Telegraph, one of the most influential journals, said: "The magnificent dominion in the North and West of America will, in Lord Lansdowne, obtain a guide and counsellor who will bring to the conduct of public business great talents, strong principles, and excellent training, which may be fairly said to date from his distinguished career at Oxford. The various and complicated questions which have to be dealt with now or hereafter in Canada will be handled by a statesman who has cultivated his mental endowments, acquired a profound knowledge of political, economic, and social facts, and who has learned in the best school those habits of courtesy and consideration for others which exert so powerful and beneficial an influence in smoothing away asperities and imparting a large and liberal tone to public life. The emigration schemes now afloat will certainly find in him a judicious and powerful friend, and we trust that it may be his lot to give an impetus to Canadian progress, while at the same time he assists in leading to prosperous homes families who now exist on the threshold of distress and poverty. Lord Lansdowne has had able predecessors in Lord Dufferin and Lord Lorne; but, looking to his English career, whether in or out of office, we can have no doubt that he will not fall below the high standard set by the eminent men who have gone before him in fulfilling the delicate and responsible functions which belong to the post of Governor-General in British America." The Irish journals, however, deprecated the appointment of an Irish landlord to a post in which he would necessarily have to govern men who had fled to Canada from a life made intolerable by the exactions of Irish landlords.

DEPARTURE FOR CANADA.

Lord Lansdowne sailed from Ireland October 12th, 1883, for Quebec. A great meeting was held in the City Hall of Londonderry to bid him farewell, and the demonstrations of affection and respect surprised many who imagined that Lord Lansdowne was unpopular in Ireland. It was stated then, and confirmed by the testimony of Howard Evans, who is a warm sympathizer with the Irish tenants and a genuine hater of lords, that on no estates do the tenants occupy so good cottages or enjoy better privileges than on those of Lord Lansdowne. He on October 22d. The following morning, at nine o'clock, the new Governor-General and his party landed at Queen's Wharf, where a brilliant military staff awaited them, and a battery with a band was drawn up as a guard of honor. Meanwhile a brilliant gathering was assembling in the library of the Provincial Government Building, on Grande Allée, to witness the inauguration. The walls were hung with bunting, and the throne was covered with crimson cloth and surmounted by a canopy. Behind the single seat placed upon the dais were the crests and mottoes of the Lorne and Lansdowne families. In the centre of the room was placed a long table, at which sat the federal Cabinet Ministers, a number of whom were in the Windsor gold lace uniform. At the foot of the table sat John J. McGee, Esq., Clerk of the Privy Council, having in his keeping the great seal of the Dominion of Canada, the Minute Book of the Privy Council, and the Bible to be used in the inaugural ceremony. On either side of the dais was placed a row of chairs, that on the right occupied by Lieutenant-Governor Robitaille, of Quebec, and party. The seats on the left were reserved for the judges of the Supreme Court, who wore their rich robes of scarlet and ermine, which formed a beautiful contrast to the gold and lace of the Windsor uniforms and the uniforms of the military staff.

SWORN INTO OFFICE.

On their arrival at the department buildings, Grande Allée, the new viceregal party was received by a guard of honor of the garrison artillery. Lord and Lady Lansdowne entered the buildings, and took the places assigned for them on the right of the throne. Lord Lorne, who had been waiting for some little time, stepped on the dais in front of the throne to receive the distinguished party. As soon as all had taken their places Lord Melgund rose and read the royal commission appointing the Most Honorable the Marquis of Lansdowne to the Governor-Generalship of Canada in place of His Excellency the Marquis of Lorne. This done, the clerk of the Privy Council, John J. McGee, approached the head of the table with a Bible in his hand, and Sir William Ritchie, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, advanced toward the new Governor, bowing separately to Lord Lorne and Lord Lansdowne, and placed before the latter the oath of office as Governor-General of Canada, and His Excellency the Marquis of Lansdowne took his seat at the head of the table and subscribed his name to the same, after which the Chief Justice and all the judges of the Supreme Court present affixed their names as witnesses.

AN ADDRESS OF WELCOME

was subsequently presented to him by the mayor and citizens of Quebec, to which the Marquis replied: "MR. MAYOR AND GENTLEMEN: I have listened with feelings of the utmost gratitude to the courteous and hospitable terms in which you have been pleased to welcome our arrival on Canadian soil. I thank you for the reception you have given me. I shall not easily forget it, and I trust that I may regard it as a happy augury of the relations which will henceforth exist between myself and the citizens of Quebec. I accept the address which His Worship the Mayor has handed to me in the name of the illustrious sovereign whose commission I have the honor to hold, and toward whom the people of the Dominion entertain feelings of loyalty and of devotion not less profound than those of her subjects on the other side of the ocean which we have traversed. I accept it also in the name of the people of England, who are united to you by a patriotism which alike inspires you both and by feelings of mutual consideration and esteem which you entertain toward each other. Of myself, sir, I will say but this—that I feel only too well the disadvantage under which I shall labor in following the two distinguished men who have been my predecesrs and whom you have spoken of in language once appreciative and just. If I do not rink from the responsibilities which attach to e high office to which I am called, if I can im any qualifications for a position so honor- e, it is because I undertake its duties with a cere admiration of the qualities which have rned for the people of the Dominion so con- cuous a place among the civilized communi- s of the world."

THE CITY OF QUEBEC.

THE ancient city, one aspect of which is rep- ented on the first page, has a population of 446. The city is thus humorously described Mr. Woods:

"Take a large part of Malta, mix it up with Peter's at Guernsey, add a few of the old uses at Abbeville, strew it here and there with houses, roof it over with tin, pave roads and ths with wooden logs, put an immense citadel the top, cover the streets rather profusely h dirt, and stick the whole on one of the hills er Milford Haven, with an English Govern- nt and d then you have Quebec. Everything there ems in an anomalous state—the footpaths are lders, and the roads are slides. There are od squares, which are always empty, and nar- w, difficult flights of streets, which are always l."

Quebec is never so bright as in the gloom of nter. The bright, clear atmosphere, however arp, is a great advance upon London fog; ile the consciousness that the busy workman s able to save out of his big wages in summer, minishes one's regret at the suffering which nter brings to the poor. The Canadian cli- te may be severe, but it is healthful, and to ny very enjoyable. It has the cold of Rus- with the warmth of Italy.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT HOUSE,

ere the dynamite explosions took place on tober 11th, is a noble-looking building, and is air type of Canada itself—simple in its grand- r, solid in its construction. There is good rk of an enduring kind, as there are good es of enduring prosperity. Admirably placed an elevation, a grand view is obtained from roof or towers, above four stories of rooms. ing in a so-called low part of the town, the fice has removed a mass of squalid-looking odes, and brought respectability into a dis- utable quarter of the town.

Champlain, after whom a street is named, is servedly honored in Quebec. He was more n the founder of Canada. He was the prime ver in all that concerned its welfare, and the ginator of many important schemes. After e of his visits to France he brought back a ttle and beautiful young wife, e devoted herself to the Indians, learning ir language, and teaching their children the ristian faith. The rude forestmen almost rshipped her. As she wore, according to the hion of the day, a small mirror in her girdle, which persons could see themselves reflected, became a saying among the red people that ery one who came near her was received into heart.

Champlain was at the head of the great trad- company, though busied in political affairs. was eminently pious, according to the prac- e of the times, and a benefactor to his urch. In his last testament he forgot his iable wife, willing all his considerable prop- y to the Jesuits. He was just to the Indians, erful with his friends, loyal to his king. A ef once said to him, at a conference, "We rely love you; all that you say is true." So norable a testimony may well embalm his mory. Champlain has left his name in eet, river, lake, town; but his good deeds are nembered in affectionate reverence by French nadians.

THE GAMBLERS' PARADISE.

A STRONG effort has been made during the past year to suppress the gambling institution of Monte Carlo, which flourishes in Monaco, a small principality near Nice, on the borders of France and Italy. The effort has been aided by the force of public opinion aroused by the numerous suicides of ruined gamblers which have taken place there. The following narrative has recently been issued by the Christian association organized to suppress the place:

If any one who is familiar with the course of events in Europe for the last decade and a half were to be asked, What is its greatest plague spot? he would, without hesitation, answer, "Monte Carlo." For that period or more the public gaming-tables of Monaco have been the source and centre of a that has turned one of the fairest spots on earth's surface into a hissing and a reproach throughout the civilized world. Viewed as it came from the hands of its Creator, it is "a veritable paradise." Through the perverted ingenuity of bad men it has become a devil's sanctuary—"a golden hell," as a recent Italian writer tersely and truthfully describes it. Mr. Spurgeon, in an article in the Sword and Trowel, calls it "the serpent in Paradise."

Last year upward of four hundred thousand railway tickets to Monaco were sold. Apart from its charming situation by the sea, and its natural beauties, now enhanced by art, the human propensity for gambling at Monte Carlo is increased by the fact that public gaming tables have been suppressed in all other parts of Europe. This liliputian state is thus enriched by the plunder of foreigners, some of whom, resorting thither for the restoration of their health, too often end by sacrificing their lives and fortunes. Nowhere does suicide leave such sanguinary traces, both publicly and privately, as at Monte Carlo. As many as have occurred in one week. During last season forty-two cases were recorded.

We hope we are not over sanguine in describing Monte Carlo as "a doomed institution." The wonder is that the collective moral sense of Europe has not long ere now taken some form or other that would have consigned it to condign destruction, as the Alpine avalanche wipes out of existence the remote mountain village that lies in its course. The history of Monte Carlo, comparatively short though it be, has been written in dissipated fortunes, in tears and anguish, in broken hearts and worse than wasted lives, exceeding all human computation. The marvel is, we repeat, that such a baleful upas tree should have flourished, and claimed its yearly holocaust of victims, so long. We rejoice to believe that ere many months go by, the death-warrant of this unspeakable institution will have been signed and sealed—perhaps put into execution. There will be joy in many hearts and homes—without presumption we may say there will be joy in the presence of the angels of God—when that auspicious moment arrives.

The mandate may, it is hoped, soon proceed from the French Executive for the abolition of this "golden hell" within its borders. Nothing can be clearer, from an impartial view of the facts, than that Monaco is under the jurisdiction of France. That nation, to its credit be it said, was the first to suppress public gambling in Europe, some half century ago. It remains for it now to crown the work by doing for Monte Carlo what Germany did some years since for Wiesbaden and Homburg and Ems, greatly to the real prosperity of these popular resorts.

Denunciations of the place have appeared in the public journals of Italy, France, Germany, England, and America. The writers of these articles condemn the place and its ways with one consent. They seem almost to have exhausted the entire vocabulary of strong and expressive epithets, in passing indignant sentence upon this gilded charnel-house. One calls it and doubtful women." There are graphic portrayals of the play, and its strangely fascinating hold upon those who once put themselves under its magic spell. One gifted French writer, Gabriel Charmes, says of it in the Journel Des Debats: "Often women are seen rushing out of the casino, inflamed with the passion of gambling, to their hotels, to cast into the hands of the usurers the ornaments with which they are bedecked. They would play away their hats, their dresses, all their clothes, if the rigid police of Monte Carlo allowed it. Men give up their watches, their studs, and their scarf-pins. In a sale at Monte Carlo fifteen hundred and sixty scarf-pins were offered, which had been taken from the necks of ruined men, who thus were enabled to try their luck once more."

The annual income of the gaming establishment is stated on the best authority to be somewhere about thirty millions of francs ($6,000,000,000)! But of this, large sums are, of course, disbursed for expenses, including bribes to such of the French, and some few papers in other countries, as are amenable to that species of argument, and who pay for this complicity by observing a discreet silence with respect to the numerous suicides and other scandals of the place. It is an open secret that the broad sheet of the boulevards accepts from Monte Carlo, as the price of its guilt, an annual subvention of one hundred and fifty thousand francs.

It will be understood that it has been no easy task to fight such a powerful and moneyed establishment, and to bring to bear upon it the united condemnation of Europe. This result has, however, at great cost, been achieved by the International Association for the Suppression of the Gaming Tables. For five years this body of earnest-minded Christian gentlemen have been struggling to put an end to the legalized iniquity of Monte Carlo; now, happily, success seems within reach. To create and sustain the requisite public opinion papers and pamphlets containing the true state of the case have been strewn over Europe by the thousand.

The Spread of Doctrines Dangerous to Society is lamented by European journals. As an illustration of the way in which the mystery of lawlessness doth already work, a workingman sends to an English newspaper an account of a lecture he recently attended, delivered by a Mr. Hyndman. The subject was "Law; or, How the People are Legally Robbed." The lecturer contended that all law, human and divine, should be overturned, especially the Decalogue, and urged that as a result great ease and pleasure would be enjoyed by the masses. The marriage tie could then be broken at the desire and will of either party, and social communism of the true type be introduced. This is a line of teaching which is being extensively promulgated all over Europe, and the pauperized multitudes are receiving it only too readily. The promulgation of such doctrines cannot be regarded too seriously or deprecated too earnestly.

Political Testimony to the Effects of Prohibition was given recently in the columns of a prominent journal. The secretary of the United States Brewers' Association, in the course of an interview as to the power held by the branches of that association in the respective States and how it would be used, bore doleful testimony to the efficacy of the amendments. Being asked about Kansas, he said: "In Kansas the Prohibition system has been in operation for two years, and all the brewers are ruined. No organization, therefore, exists in that State." Speaking of Iowa, he said: "The Prohibition law which has recently gone into operation there has made terrible havoc among the brewers, and many of them are completely ruined. As a consequence their political influence has been greatly diminished." This is significant in the face of the assurances both the political parties are continually giving that Prohibition is a failure, and that the consumption of liquor does not decrease under it.

THE MOTHER OF ALL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 9, 1884.

"And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof. And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made He a woman, and brought her unto the man."—GEN. 2 : 21, 22.

IT is the first Saturday afternoon in the world's existence. Ever since sunrise Adam has been watching the brilliant pageantry of wings and scales and clouds, and in his first lessons in zoology and ornithology and ichthyology he has noticed that the robins fly the air in twos, and that the fish swim the water in twos, and that the lions walk the field in twos, and in the warm redolence of that Saturday afternoon he falls off into slumber; and as if by allegory to teach all ages that the greatest of earthly blessings is sound sleep, this paradisaical somnolence ends with the discovery on the part of Adam of just landed on the new planet. Of the mother of all the living I speak—Eve, the first, the fairest and the best.

I make me a garden. I inlay the paths with mountain moss, and I border them with pearls from Ceylon and diamonds from Golconda. Here and there are fountains tossing in the sunlight, and ponds that ripple under the paddling of the swans. I gather me lilies from the Amazon, and orange groves from the tropics, and tamarinds from Goyaz. There are woodbine and honeysuckle climbing over the wall, and starred spaniels sprawling themselves on the grass. I invite amid these trees the larks, and the brown thrushes, and the robins, and all the brightest birds of heaven, and they stir the air with infinite chirp and carol. And yet the place is a desert filled with darkness and death as compared with of the text, the subject of my morning story. Never since have such skies looked down through such leaves into such waters! Never has river wave had such curve and sheen and bank as adorned the Pison, the Havilah, the Gihon and the Hiddakel, even the pebbles being bdellium and onyx stone! What fruits, with no curculio to sting the rind! What flowers, with no slug to gnaw the root! What atmosphere, with no frost to chill and with no heat to consume! Bright colors tangled in the grass. Perfume in the air. Music in the sky. Bird's warble and tree's hum, and waterfall's dash. Great scene of gladness and love and joy.

Right there under a bower of leaf and vine and shrub occurred

THE FIRST MARRIAGE.

Adam took the hand of this immaculate daughter of God and pronounced the ceremony when he said: "Bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh."

A FORBIDDEN TREE

stood in the midst of that exquisite park. Eve sauntering out one day alone looks up at the tree and sees the beautiful fruit, and wonders if it is sweet, and wonders if it is sour, and standing there, says: "I think I will just put my hand upon the fruit; it will do no damage to the tree; I will not take the fruit to eat, but I will just take it down to examine it." She examined the fruit. She said: "I do not think there can be any harm in my just breaking the rind of it." She put the fruit to her teeth, she tasted, she invited Adam also to taste of the fruit, the door of the world opened, and the monster Sin entered. Let the heavens gather blackness, and the winds sigh on the bosom of the hills, and cavern and desert and earth and sky join in one long, deep, hell-rending howl:

"THE WORLD IS LOST!"

Beasts that before were harmless and full of play put forth claw, and sting, and tooth, and tusk. Birds whet their beak for prey. Clouds troop in the sky. Sharp thorns shoot up through the soft grass. Blastings on the leaves. All the chords of that great harmony are snapped. Upon the brightest home this world ever saw our first parents turned their back and led forth on a path of sorrow the broken-hearted myriads of a ruined race.

Do you not see, in the first place, the danger of a poorly regulated

INQUISITIVENESS?

She wanted to know how the fruit tasted. She found out, but six thousand years have deplored that unhealthful curiosity. Healthy curiosity has done a great deal for letters, for art, for science and for religion. It has gone down into the depths of the earth with the geologist and seen the first chapter of Genesis written in the book of nature illustrated with engraving on rock, and it stood with the antiquarian while he blew the trumpet of resurrection over buried Herculaneum and Pompeii, until from their sepulchre there came up shaft and terrace and amphitheatre. Healthful curiosity has enlarged the telescopic vision of the astronomer until worlds hidden in the distant heavens have trooped forth and have joined the choir praising the Lord. Planet weighed against planet and wildest comet lassooed with resplendent law.

HEALTHFUL CURIOSITY

has gone down and found the tracks of the eternal God in the polypi and the starfish under the sea and the majesty of the great Jehovah encamped under the gorgeous curtains of the dahlia. It has studied the spots on the sun, and the larva in a beech leaf, and the light under firefly's wing, and the terrible eye glance of a condor pitching from Chimborazo. It has studied the myriads of animalcule that make up the phosphorescence in a ship's wake, and the mighty maze of suns, and spheres, and constellations, and galaxies that blaze on in the march of God. Healthful curiosity has stood by the inventor until forces that were hidden for ages came to wheels, and levers, and shafts, and shuttles—forces that fly the air, or swim the sea, or cleave the mountain until the earth jars, and roars, and rings, and crackles, and booms, with strange mechanism, and ships with nostrils of hot steam and yokes of fire draw the continents together.

I say nothing against healthful curiosity. May it have other Leyden jars, and other electric batteries, and other voltaic piles, and other magnifying glasses with which to storm the barred castles of the natural world until it shall surrender its last secret. We thank God for the geological curiosity of Professor Hitchcock, and the mechanical curiosity of Liebig, and the zoological curiosity of Cuvier, and the inventive curiosity of Edison; but we must admit that unhealthful and irregular inquisitiveness has rushed thousands and tens of thousands into ruin.

Eve just tasted the fruit. She was curious to find out how it tasted, and that and blasted all nations. So there are clergy in this day inspired by unhealthful inquisitiveness who have tried to look through the keyhole of God's mysteries, mysteries that were barred and bolted from all human inspection, and they have wrenched their whole moral nature out of joint by trying to pluck fruit from branches beyond their reach, or have come out on limbs of the tree from which they have tumbled into ruin without remedy. A thousand trees of religious knowledge from which we may eat and get advantage; but from certain how many have plucked their ruin! Election, free agency, trinity, resurrection—in the discussion of these subjects hundreds and thousands of people ruin the soul. There are men who have actually been kept out of the kingdom of heaven because they could not understand who Melchisedec was not!

Oh, how many have been destroyed by an unhealthful inquisitiveness! It is seen in all directions. There are those who stand with the eye-stare and mouth-gape of curiosity. They are the first to hear a falsehood, build it another story high and two wings to it. About other people's apparel, about other people's business, about other people's financial condition, about other people's affairs, they are over anxious. Every nice piece of gossip stops at their door, and they fatten and luxuriate in the endless round of the great world of tittle-tattle. They invite and sumptuously entertain at their house Colonel Twaddle and Esquire Chitchat and Governor Smalltalk. Whoever hath an inuendo, whoever hath a scandal, whoever hath a valuable secret, let him come and sacrifice it to

THIS GODDESS OF SPLUTTER.

Thousands of Adams and Eves do nothing but eat fruit that does not belong to them. Men quite well known as mathematicians failing in this computation of moral algebra: good sense plus good breeding, minus curiosity, equals minding your own affairs!

Then, how many young men through curiosity go through the whole realm of

to see whether they are really as bad as moralists have pronounced them! They come near the verge of the precipice just to look off. They want to see how far it really is down, but they lose their balance while they look, and fall into remediless ruin; or, catching themselves, clamber up, bleeding and ghastly, on the rock, gibbering with curses or groaning ineffectual prayer. By all means encourage healthful inquisitiveness, by all means discourage illy regulated curiosity.

TREACHEROUS FRUIT.

The subject of the morning also impresses me with the fact that fruits that are sweet to the taste may afterward produce great agony. Forbidden fruit for Eve was so pleasant she invited her husband also to take of it; but her banishment from Paradise, and six thousand years of sorrow, and wretchedness, and war, and woe paid for that luxury. Sin may be very sweet at the start, and it may induce great wretchedness afterward. The cup of sin is sparkling at the top, but there is death at the bottom. Intoxication has great exhilaration for a while, and it fillips the blood, and it makes a man see five stars where others can see only one star, and it makes the poor man rich, and turns cheeks which are white red as roses; but what about the dreams that come after, when he seems falling from great heights, or is prostrated by other fancied disasters, and the perspiration stands on the forehead, the night dew of everlasting darkness, and he is ground under the horrible hoof of nightmares shrieking with lips that crackle with all-consuming torture? "Rejoice, oh young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment!"

SWEET AT THE START,

horrible at the last. Go into that hall of revelry where ungodly mirth staggers and blasphemes. Listen to the senseless gabble, see the last trace of intelligence dashed out from faces made in God's own image.

"Aha! aha!" says the roystering inebriate, "this is joy for you; fill high your cups, my boys. I drink to my wife's misery and my children's rags and my God's defiance." And he knows not that a fiend stirs the goblet in his hand and that adders uncoil from the dregs and thrust their forked tongues hissing through the froth on the rim.

PERDITION BOUGHT FOR A SIXPENCE.

The Philistines jeered and laughed and shouted at Samson. Oh, they wanted him to make sport for them, and he made sport for them

How bright and gay was the scene for a little while! After awhile the giant puts one hand against this pillar, and the other hand against this pillar, and bows himself, and three thousand merry-makers are mashed like grapes in a winepress. Sin rapturous at the start, awful at the last.

That one Edenic transgression did not seem to be much, but it struck a blow which to this day makes the earth stagger like an ox under a butcher's bludgeon. To find out the consequences of that one sin, you would have to compel the world to throw open all its prison doors and display the crime, and throw open all its hospitals and display the disease, and throw open all the insane asylums and show the wretchedness, and open all the sepulchres and show the dead, and open all the doors of the lost world and show the damned. That one Edenic transgression stretched chords of misery across the heart of the world and struck them with dolorous wailing, and it has seated the plagues upon the air and the shipwrecks upon the tempest, and fastened like a leech famine to the heart of the sick and dying nations. Beautiful at the start, horrible at the last. Oh, how many have experienced it!

Are there here those who are

VOTARIES OF PLEASURE?

Let me warn you, my brother. Your pleasure boat is far from shore, and your summer day is ending roughly, for the winds and the waves are loud voiced, and the overcoming clouds are all writhe and agleam with terror. You are past the "Narrows," and almost outside the "Hook," and if the Atlantic take thee, frail mortal, thou shalt never get to shore again. Put back, row swiftly, swifter, swifter! Jesus from the shore casteth a rope. Clasp it quickly, now or never. Oh, are there not some of you who are freighting all your loves and joys and hopes upon a vessel which shall never reach the port of heaven? Thou nearest the breakers, one heave upon the rock. Oh, what an awful crash was that! Another lunge may crush thee beneath the spars or grind thy bones to powder amid the torn timbers. Overboard for your life, overboard! Trust not that loose plank nor attempt the move, but quickly clasp the feet of Jesus walking on the watery pavement, shouting until He hear thee, "Lord, save me, or I perish." Sin beautiful at the start—oh, how sad, how dismessful at the last! The ground over which it leads you is hollow. The fruit it offers to your taste is poison. The promise it makes to you is a lie. Over that ungodly banquet the keen sword of God's judgment hangs, and there are ominous handwritings on the wall.

HIDEOUS ATTRACTIVENESS.

Observe also in this subject how repelling sin is when appended to great attractiveness. Since Eve's death there has been no such perfection of womanhood. You could not suggest an attractiveness to the body or suggest any refinement to the manner. You could add no gracefulness to the gait, no lustre to the eye, no sweetness to the voice. A perfect God made her a perfect woman, to be the companion of a perfect man in a perfect home, and her entire nature vibrated in accord with the beauty and song of Paradise. But she rebelled against God's government, and with the same hand with which she plucked the fruit she launched upon the world the crimes, the wars, the tumults, that have set the universe a-wailing.

A TERRIBLE OFFSET

to all her attractiveness. We are not surprised when we find men and women naturally vulgar going into transgression. We expect that people who live in the ditch shall have the manners of the ditch; but how shocking when we find sin appended to superior education and to the refinements of social life. The accomplishments of Mary Queen of Scots make her patronage of Darnley, the profligate, the more appalling. The genius of Catharine II., of Russia, only sets forth in more powerful contrast her unappeasable ambition. The translations from the Greek and the Latin by Elizabeth, and her wonderful qualifications for a queen, made the more disgusting her capriciousness of affection and her hotness of temper. The greatness of Byron's mind made the more alarming Byron's sensuality.

Let no one who hears me this day think that refinement of manner or exquisiteness of taste or superiority of education can in any wise apologize for ill-temper, for an oppressive spirit, for unkindness, for any kind of sin. Disobedience Godward and transgression manward can give no excuse. Accomplishment heaven high is no apology for vice hell deep.

My subject also impresses me with the regal

INFLUENCE OF WOMAN.

When I see Eve with this powerful influence over Adam and over the generations that have followed, it suggests to me the great power all women have for good or for evil. I have no sympathy, nor have you, with the hollow flatteries showered upon woman from the platform and the stage. They mean nothing; they are accepted as nothing. Woman's nobility consists in the exercise of a Christian influence, and when I see this powerful influence of Eve upon her husband and upon the whole human race, I make up my mind that the frail arm of woman can strike a blow which will resound through all eternity down among the dungeons, or up among the thrones.

Of course, I am not speaking of representative women—of Eve, who ruined the race by one fruit-picking; of Jael, who drove a spike through the head of Sisera the warrior; of Esther, who overcame royalty; of Abigail, who stopped a host by her own beautiful prowess; of Mary, who nursed the world's Saviour; of Grandmother Lois, immortalized in her grandson Timothy; of Charlotte Corday, who drove the dagger through the heart of the assassin of her lover, or of Marie Antoinette, who by one look from the balcony of her castle quieted a mob, her own scaffold the throne of forgiveness and womanly courage. I speak not of these extraordinary persons, but of those who, unambitious for political power, as and sisters and daughters, attend to the thousand sweet offices of home.

When at last we come to calculate the forces that decided the destiny of nations, it will be found that the mightiest and grandest influence came from home, where the wife cheered up despondency and fatigue and sorrow by her own sympathy, and the mother trained her child for heaven, starting the little feet on the path to the celestial city; and the sisters by their gentleness refined the manners of the brother; and the daughters were diligent in their kindness to the aged, throwing wreaths of blessing on the road that leads father and mother down the steep of years. Need I go into history to find you illustrations? Ah no; in your own memory there was at least one such! When I come to speak of womanly influence, my mind always wanders off to the aged one who, twenty years ago, we put away for the resurrection. About eighty years ago, and just before their marriage day, my father and mother stood up in the old meeting-house at Somerville, New Jersey, and took upon them the vows of the Christian. Through a long life of vicissitude she lived harmlessly and usefully, and came to her end in peace. No child of want ever came to her door and was turned empty away. No one in sorrow came to her but was comforted. No one asked her the way to be saved but she pointed him to the cross. When the angel of life came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to rejoice at the incarnation. When the angel of death came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to robe the departed for the burial.

We had often heard her, when leading family prayers in the absence of my father, say: "O Lord, I ask not for my children wealth or honor, but I do ask that they all may be the subjects of thy comforting grace!" Her eleven children brought into the kingdom of God, she had but one more wish, and that was that she might see her long-absent missionary son; and when the ship from China anchored in New York Harbor, and the long-absent one passed over the threshold of his paternal home, she said: "Now, Lord, lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." The prayer was soon answered.

It was an autumnal day very much like this when we gathered from afar and found only the house from which the soul had fled forever. She looked very natural, the hands very much as when they were employed in kindness for her children. Whatever else we forget, we never forget the look of mother's hands. As we stood there by the casket, we could not help but say: "Don't she look beautiful?" It was a cloudless day when, with heavy hearts, we carried her out to the last resting-place. The withered leaves crumbled under hoof and wheel as we passed, and the sun shone on the Raritan River until it looked like fire; but more calm and beautiful and radiant was the setting sun of that aged pilgrim's life. No more toil, no more tears, no more sickness, no more death. Dear mother! Beautiful mother!

> "Sweet is the slumber beneath the sod,
> While the pure spirit rests with God."

I need not go back and show you Zenobia or Semiramis or Isabella as wonders of womanly excellence or greatness, when I in this moment point to your own picture gallery of memory, and show you the one face that you remember so well, and arouse all your holy reminiscences, and start you in new consecration to God, by the pronunciation of that tender, beautiful, glorious word, "Mother! mother!"

The Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B., Sailed for England on October 22d in the Aurania of the Cunard line. In the course of an interview on board the vessel, Mr. Hall expressed himself delighted with the results of his visit. He said: "I have been in America since August 18th, and have preached fifty sermons, delivered ten addresses, and travelled four thousand miles since that time. My church at home has not been closed during its pastor's holiday. Where have I been on my trip? In Yonkers, Mohonk Lake, Saratoga, Niagara, Canada, the White Mountains, Boston, Philadelphia, and Washington. I have been struck everywhere with the beauty and grandeur of the houses and public buildings." Mr. Hall was courteously received by the President, and informed him that every Sunday prayers were offered for him in Mr. Hall's church in London as for the Queen of England.

The Ex-Empress Eugenie, the Widow of Napoleon III., and at one time the leader of the fashionable world of Europe, has paid a visit to the French capital. Her appearance is thus portrayed by the Paris correspondent of London Truth: "Her general attitude appears to have been, as she visited the scenes of her former triumphs, that of one who through much suffering has come to be almost insensible. Her complexion is bleached as her hair. The eyes of pale blue have lost the faculty of lighting up. It would be hard to say whether they express indifference to most things or resignation, but they look as if they had cried so much that no more tears were left in them. Her figure has lost all flexibility, and she has the stiff walk that rheumatism or the weight of years gives. The outlines of the shoulders, however, retain some of their former elegance. She lives altogether at Farnborough in the past, and among objects reminding her of the departed glories of the Emperor and of her son, the Prince Imperial, of whom she can now speak without falling into paroxysms of grief. Her old vivacity has died out, the inner woman is chastened by affliction, and the outer woman faded. To her few friends she frequently mentions with bitter remorse the part she took in instigating the Franco-Prussian war of 1870."

"BRIGHTER BRITAIN."

Lecture in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's Son, the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, of Auckland, New Zealand.

MR C. H. SPURGEON occupied the chair, and introduced his son as the lecturer, in a few very well chosen and pithy remarks. The Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, on rising, said: "Dear father, and dear Christian friends, I remember to have heard of a certain lecturer who, before the commencement of his oration, said that, with the chairman's permission, he would say a few words before he began to speak. I sympathize with him to some extent, for before we deal with 'Brighter Britain' I should like to say a few introductory words. I have two objects in lecturing here to-night. (1) To tell you what I have gleaned by residence in New Zealand. (2) That you may give me some money to aid in building the Auckland Tabernacle. I am not here to urge you to pack up and be off to New Zealand, but simply that I might speak of what I saw in that distant land, 'Brighter Britain.'

"A little craft of three hundred and seventy tons burden is ploughing the waves of the Pacific Ocean, and the briny spray is lashing the bows. The captain and trusty crew are preparing to pass the day as they have passed so many before, but something more than want and woe are to be recorded in that day's log book—the rush and excitement of discovery. The master of that little vessel is and he is about to confer another honor upon his country by placing the British flag on fresh soil, that should yield bread for British mouths and happy homes for British hearts. He first discovered Poverty Bay, New Zealand, which, singularly enough, is the richest part of the country. Captain Cook made for the shore, and saw the king of the native cannibals, who, for some reason or other, did not put the white man to the test, or rather to their taste, or they would not have hesitated to cook Captain Cook. Captain Cook, we read, made it a rule to carry with him seeds, that he might scatter them in any new-found country, forgetting not 'to do good and communicate' and 'scatter seeds of kindness' for this own and others' 'reaping by and by.'

"Captain Cook sailed away up the straits that now bear his name, and was so impressed with the beauty of the country that he determined to revisit it, and we find him many times revisiting the New Zealand coast. He took some of the natives out to sea with him several times. We don't read that they suffered from sea-sickness so much as from home-sickness, which is the worst, and that is my apology for my presence here to-night. Captain Cook was not the

FIRST DISCOVERER OF NEW ZEALAND.

He was the first European to set foot on its shores, but Abel Tasman was its first explorer, from whom is derived the name Tasmania. England and New Zealand are not so very far apart, if we could only go straight through the earth to it. In fact, if the underground railway between England and New Zealand should ever be open, I would have a season ticket on it, so as to see you more frequently. At Christ Church, the English rose blossoms at its own sweet will, while all over the shamrock flourishes even better than in its native soil, for every side of civilization is with us in town and country—jails and policemen, pianos and sewing machines, steam-cars and and the young Albion in the Antipodean world rejoices in a plentiful supply of British birds, beasts, and fishes. The skylark there sings his glorious lay. Never shall I forget a namesake of the great discoverer—Joseph Cook, of Boston—with what joy, when climbing with me one of Brighter Britain's mountains, he said, 'Hark to the fellow, and see how long he keeps that wondrous tune agoing!' How they rise and rise, ever singing as they go, until they get as near the throne of God as wings can carry them, and then pour their praises at His feet! I say it was grand to stay awhile and see the joy of Boston's famous citizen as he stood entranced by young New Zealand's song.

"We are rather free from reptiles in Brighter Britain; they are so familiar as to sleep on the doorstep, that we forget to treat them as such. As to mosquitos, I must not utter one word against them for their very mildness of disposition. On one occasion and, after a search, saw her skeleton leaning against a tree, and a mosquito of extraordinary size sitting on a bough of the tree above, generously picking one of its bones; so tender are they in their dealings with the animal kind.

"The scenery of Brighter Britain is certainly brighter, and not darker, than that of the land I left behind me, especially in the sense that the land is essentially lovely and full of bright colors as the inhabitants are loyal. The British flag floats in the breeze from Government House, and love for Victoria Regina dwells in all the hearts of the colonists, and the day of her birth is especially loved by a people who are ever ready for a holiday. England and Scotland are still called 'Home' by those who left it forty years ago, and the colonists have drifted into the same habit of calling Brighter Britain 'Home.' I must admit that those born colonists are tempted to be constituted like young ministers, especially if they happen to be the sons of celebrated men, like colonists in England, London, and Scotland, who consider that St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey are only second in importance to their parish church, or village chapel, so great does the love of country become.

"I remember looking at a photograph shown me by a friend, who lived near the Canterbury plains in the north-west. I said it is

A BEAUTIFUL PLACE.

'Yes,' said a friend, who knew it well, and had not learned to let well alone, 'but the photograph does not show the north winds that sweep through the place at certain seasons of the year.' In the south it is often cold for days together. Auckland, the city of my adoption, in the north, is genial and well suited to persons of delicate health. The island runs north and south for more than twelve hundred miles, and a breadth of over two hundred miles. Those who emigrate for their health should find out what part is suited to their disease, and the stage of the disease from which they suffer. For twelve months round there is summer sun in Auckland. There is often a scarcity of rain. A squatter lately leaped for joy as he and all his family stood in the rain after a long drought. He suddenly said, 'We must not be out here in the rain; we must let the earth have every drop.' When the rain does come it fills the rivers and plains to overflowing."

The lecturer here told of a cold-water victory in Auckland, where in each ward, except one, temperance men had been returned to the Council Chamber, and liquor-saloons closed on Sundays, and that the eminent American lecturer and temperance worker, has promised to visit the city to preach and lecture in the very Tabernacle for the building of which subscriptions and gifts would be asked from the friends in the Metropolitan Tabernacle. A vivid description of the beauty of the country scenery of New Zealand was given by the lecturer, and of the customs of the Maoris, the original natives of the soil.

He tendered to his hearers his sincere thanks for helping him to build the tabernacle out there, in which they worshipped, and for the good which, under God, it had enabled him to accomplish. "The light of the glorious Sun of Righteousness had arisen in New Zealand, even in the remote parts of the country; and as we prayed for them, so they prayed for us, and our prayers were ever answered, for the sun has shone into many a dark heart there, and was still rising. Soon that happy eternal Sabbath should begin which never ends, and all should meet around the throne of God. Good-night God bless you." The chairman said there was no need of a vote of thanks, and the pronouncing of the benediction brought the meeting to a close.

[New Zealand consists of three islands, known respectively as North Island, South, or Middle Island, and Stewart's Island. The area of North Island is 44,750 square miles, or about the same size as the State of Pennsylvania; South Island is a little larger, and the area of Stewart's Island is 1300 square miles, a little larger than Rhode Island. The total population of New Zealand at the last census, in 1881, was 534,008, of whom about 44,000 were Maories or natives.—ED.]

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Scared by the Cholera.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Kennedy related: "Down in the place that I came from, when the cholera was there some years ago, the seats and passages of the church were always crowded at every service. Any time the minister liked to ring the bell the people flocked out to take part in the meeting and listen to the Gospel. They were scared by the ravages of the cholera. Some of us run to Christ when there is danger threatening, but when all is peace and quiet we think we can get on very well without Him; but that is the time when Christ is most needed."

"A Condemned Murderer was in his Cell.—A Christian called to see him. On entering the cell he found the poor creature in a dreadful state of agony. 'What is the matter with you?' he inquired; 'do try and keep yourself calm.' 'Oh,' he said, 'it is not the thought of being hanged before my fellow-creatures, nor of the losing of my life; I know I deserve all that, but it is the thought that I have to meet God to-morrow morning at eight o'clock, that makes me tremble!' His visitor lovingly pointed him to Christ as his only refuge, and assured him that he could be washed in Christ's blood even yet and be made pure in God's sight. The Holy Spirit blessed the message to the man's soul, and he found rest by putting his faith in Christ.

Death of an Infidel's Daughter.—A Christian gentleman said: "A young lady was lying on her death-bed. Her father was an infidel, and she was brought up with the thought that there was no God and no hereafter. Poor child! How her eyes were blinded! Though living in a Christian land, she had never seen a Bible. Turning round, she said to her sister, who was sitting beside her, 'Will you get me something to read? I am very weary.' While her sister was away in search of a book, her nurse, bending over her, said, 'May I read something to you out of this book?' 'What is it?' she asked. 'It is God's holy book,' was the reply. 'I never heard anything about it before; read a little of it, please.' And the good old Christian nurse opened the book and read in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. The dying girl listened until the chapter was finished, and then tearfully exclaimed, 'Oh, that I had known all this sooner!' and just then her spirit passed away.

A Shoeseller's Prayer for Customers.—Mr. McBryde related: "I was visiting some children one stormy night last winter. I knocked at a door, and when I entered I could see that it was a long narrow room, and by the dim light I noticed that the walls were very black, and sitting in the furthest end of the room was an old woman, with a large Bible lying before her. I found that woman in great want; she had not tasted food for three days, and yet she looked happy and contented. I learned from her that she went about selling shoes, and that very often she did not get a sale for them, and frequently went without her supper, but she did not mind that when Jesus was with her. I said to her, 'What do you do when you fail to get your shoes sold?' She replied, 'Any time that ever I asked Jesus to send purchasers for my goods He always did it; He never once disappointed me, and He never will so long as I put my trust in Him. Jesus is always with me: I will never leave nor forsake me.' Believe me when I say that I went away from that place thinking, 'What an example of childlike trust in the Lord that woman presents to many professing Christians!'"

"Just What I Expected."—Mr. Kennedy observed: "One day a little boy ran to his mother, and said, 'Mother, I want a piece of bread.' The mother told him, with a very sorrowful heart, that she had nothing to give him. The boy, seeing his mother weeping, said, 'Never mind, mother, I will ask Jesus to send me a loaf.' He got up very early the next morning, and the first thing he thought of was the loaf. Going to the pantry, he looked in, and turned away, saying, 'Just what I expected!' He got what he expected; he did not expect the bread to be there, or the Lord would have sent it. 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.' A little girl whose father and mother had just died, was taken by some kind friends to live with them. The first night she entered that strange house, she prayed: 'O Lord, make these people as good to me as my father and mother were,' and looking up, she said, in a more earnest voice, 'and I know you will do it.' She also got what she expected."

A Troublesome Old Man.—Mr. Vans, Speaking at a recent meeting of the struggle every Christian has to keep down the old nature, said: "A cousin of mine was converted to Christ some time ago. After she had given herself to the Saviour she thought, 'Now I am done with sin, I'll not be troubled with the old Adam any more!' But, as multitudes of others have done, she very soon found out her mistake. Evil thoughts entered her mind unbidden, and she again reflected, 'I thought I was free from my old nature, and that the old Adam was dead. These evil thoughts will come into my mind. I cannot help the thoughts entering my mind, but, God helping me, I will not give them a lodging-place.' Kneeling down she asked God to give her strength to resist temptation when it came. She did not pray in vain. 'Where sin abounded grace did much more abound.' She is now able to exclaim, 'Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!'"

The Beacon of Warning.—At Saltcoats, not very far from the shore, stands a beacon in the winter. If you were to ask any one who belongs to that place why it is there, you would be told this story: "A merchant from Glasgow, with his family, was residing there for the summer months. One morning the merchant went out to bathe before breakfast, and he thought he was quite safe as long as he kept near the shore. But there was a pit there which he did not know anything of, and into this pit he fell, and nothing more was seen or heard of him. After this accident a beacon was put up as a warning to all others to keep from the spot." What were the feelings that prompted people to put this beacon up? It must have been feelings of love to keep all others from danger. And it was also the deep love which God has for sinners that makes Jesus Christ warn us that there is a hell, when He tells us of the rich man in hell who lifted up his eyes, being in torments. Christ put up this beacon as a warning to all to beware of the pit of perdition and eternal death.

Archie, the Dying Miner.—Mr. Kennedy Related: "A medical friend of mine went to visit a miner who was dying. Seeing that the man had not more than a few weeks to live, he said, 'Archie, are you prepared to meet God?' 'No! I am not,' was Archie's rather blunt reply. The doctor told him that he had not long to live, and tried in every way to let him see his great need of a Saviour, but Archie remained unmoved. The second time the doctor called he put the Gospel before him in every different light he could think of, but with the same unsatisfactory result. A few days afterward the doctor called a third time, and said, 'Now, Archie, I have tried to put the Gospel in every possible way, and I want you to do me a favor before I go away.' The doctor had been very kind to Archie, and he promised he would do anything the doctor wished. He then said, 'Well, Archie, say this after me, Christ for me,' and Archie repeated, 'Christ for me.' 'Again, Archie,' said the doctor, and again the man repeated it. 'Now, Archie, let these words lie in your mind, and put every other thought from you. He promised to do so, and the doctor took his leave. A few days afterward, when my friend again visited him, Archie's face was bright and shining. On entering, he said, 'Oh, Archie, what has come over you, what are you looking so happy about?' 'Christ for me has done it, sir; I see Christ now, and that is what is making me so happy. I will not have to go out of the world alone, because Christ will be with me.' Archie went into the valley of the shadow of death with these words on his lips, 'Christ for me.'"

ANTICHRIST: HIS TIMES AND HIS SPIRIT.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.

IT would be profitable at the present juncture to consider the character of the Antichrist, "the lawless one," and the times of his coming.

That the Antichrist will come is an obvious fact. The Apostle Paul declares emphatically: "That that wicked," lawless one, "shall be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. 2 : 8).

That the Antichrist will be the representative head of all unrighteousness and sin, of all wickedness and delusion, is another fact which cannot be contradicted, because he shall be the last and the great enemy, in human nature, of Christ and His Church, who shall wage the great and the last conflict on earth to get the ascendency and power; and so great shall be his wickedness and iniquity that the Lord Christ will come personally "and destroy him with the brightness of His coming."

That that lawless one will deny the existence of Jehovah, the Creator of all things, is plainly recorded in Rev. 14 : 7. He will elevate human nature and reason as the ideal of all beauty, and will worship self as the idol, "exalting himself above all that is called God" (II Thess. 2 : 4); and that this will be the character of the last days is said in II Tim. 3 : 1–5.

That the Antichrist will yet go further on is plainly told by the apostle, "shewing himself that he is God," making himself a Deity; and that will be the highest degree of human wickedness and depravity. Alexander called himself only a son of the gods, but Antichrist will place himself in the place of God, and receive divine honors. It is appalling to think that ever such a delusion could lay hold on educated nations; yea, it is more appalling to know that it will become cosmical, and debase all the nations of the earth (Rev. 13 : 8; Dan. 7 : 23), that they shall worship as "God" a person calling himself the God of this world; and this strong delusion Jehovah shall send that they should believe a lie" (II Thess. 2 : 11). Thus, it will take hold on the human mind by degrees.

That the coming of this lawless one will be of Satan to get the victory over the Son of God (Matt. 4 : 8) is plainly said in the words of the apostle (verse 9): "Whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs and lying wonders." So that the Antichrist shall perform "great wonders, making fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men" (Rev. 13 : 13). This gives a glimpse how this lawless one will be an expert in the sciences and inventions of the age; how those sciences will improve in a most extraordinary degree, and how that the powers of hell will make a combination of everything which can be advantageous to their design and purpose.

That this embodiment of evil and iniquity "shall sit as God on the temple of God," is told by the apostle in II Thess. 2 : 4. That temple is at Jerusalem (John 2 : 20; Matt. 26 : 61; Rev. 11 : 1). He shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the mountain of delight of holiness" (margin; Dan. 11 : 45), and in this respect the coming Antichrist stands in close connection with the return of the unconverted Jews to Canaan, which he will probably promote, and the solving of the Eastern question (John 5 : 43).

Having observed the character of "that wicked one," we desire to contemplate and to point out that the present time already manifests some signs of the existence of the Antichristian spirit among the nations.

The prophet Daniel says of that lawless one: "That he shall think to change times and laws, and that they shall be given unto his hand" (Dan. 7 : 25); and every close observer of the signs of the times must acknowledge that the present time has many forebodings of such a change. To contemplate a few of those changes may give us a true insight of the condition in which we are living and the times which we are approaching.

The first organic law given to mankind is the law of being subject to higher power. This law is called in question everywhere. The spirit of rebellion, freedom, libertinism, and a demand for equal rights has become predominant, and this spirit has already permeated the families, the government of the churches, the State, and the world, so that every one is doing his own pleasure, not respecting superiors or old age. This cosmical spirit maintains that man has grown into manhood, and that he can rule himself. Self-esteem and sophistry have taken the lead in all deliberations, and the word of God is no more the rule of conduct. Conscience is no more the criterion, monitor, and guide of actions; it is rather consequences that are weighed and feared only.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE

repudiates by degrees the sanctity of marriage—a union which was in existence before the fall of Adam. The idea that marriage is a civil contract has changed the very nature of that union. The engagement, as well as the easy law of divorce, is in accordance with that spirit.

The spirit of Antichrist is that human nature is so elevated that it can take care of itself, possessing the means for its well-being in the time present and the time to come, and the consequence is that the organic law of the Sabbath, given to man in the example of His Maker before sin came into the world, is repudiated, or scarcely observed, and the teachings of the word of God are disregarded.

FREQUENCY OF SUICIDE.

The spirit of Antichrist maintains that man is his own master, and that he can dispose of his body and mind as he wishes, and from this has arisen the idea that man can take his life by suicide—poison or other means. This spirit becoming general, is repudiating the organic law, "Thou shalt not kill" (Gen. 9 : 5, 6). Another ruling idea undermining the very basis of society is to advocate "women's rights being equal with men's." It destroys the standard which God has set in the Garden of Eden and the place which He has assigned to His creatures.

It is the spirit of the age to advocate that it is cruelty to have capital punishment executed on a culprit. It is a fact that several States and kingdoms have repudiated this law of the Bible, "that life can only be redeemed by life" (Gen. 9 : 5, 6).

The spirit of

communism, and other isms are also in their nature Antichristian spirits. They advocate a theory which is in open antagonism with the Bible, denying the Lord Jesus Christ, and they are preparing for an open rebellion. And, finally, the very character of the organization and rites of some secret societies, in which a Buddhist, Mohammedan, and Christian can join in one brotherhood, is Antichristian in principle, and are means to prepare the coming of the lawless one.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Exceedingly Close Vote in New York State left the result of the Presidential election in doubt until almost the close of last week. Until Saturday both parties claimed the State, and even on that day, the New York Tribune refused to believe that Mr. Cleveland had received its electoral vote. The official returns, however, gave him the vote of New York by the small plurality of 1280. A careful scrutiny will doubtless be made, but at present there appears little probability of the official figures being materially affected. Accepting them as correct, Mr. Cleveland has carried twenty States, which give him 219 votes in the Electoral College—that is, eighteen votes more than are necessary to his election. They were the whole of the Southern States, and New Jersey, Indiana, Connecticut, and New York. The last three were in 1880 carried by Garfield. Mr. Blaine carries eighten States, whose aggregate vote in the Electoral College is 182. Among them is California, which in 1880 elected only one Republican elector. It will be seen that, as in 1880, the vote of New York decides the election. Garfield carried it by a plurality of 21,033. This change invites analysis, which shows the forces that have been at work. This year the counties which continued to give Republican pluralities gave smaller ones, while the Democratic pluralities increased, and, in some cases, counties which went Republican in 1880 went Democratic this year. Kings County (Brooklyn) increased its Democratic plurality from 9311 to 15,756; Westchester from 491 to 1238; and Oneida, which gave Garfield a plurality of 1946, gave this year a plurality of 69 for Cleveland. This Oneida vote shows that we were not wrong when, before the election, we pointed out the significance of the attitude of ex-Senator Conkling's friends. They appear to have attributed Mr. Conkling's fall to Mr. Blaine, and to have taken this way of resenting it. If Oneida County had voted in 1884 as she voted in 1880 Mr. Blaine would have been elected.

The Issue which Decided the Presidential election was, after all, not that of the tariff. The returns prove that Mr. Cleveland could not have been elected by Democratic votes alone. It was only by the aid of the dissatisfied Republicans that he has carried the Northern States, whose votes were necessary to his election. Though many of his Republican supporters favor a reduction of the tariff, none of them assigned that reason for quitting their party and voting the Democratic ticket. The issue with them was distinctly a personal one. The Tribune and other Blaine organs called them "mugwumps, dudes and Pharisees;" but the returns prove that, whether they deserved those names or not, their votes have contributed to Mr. Blaine's defeat. As we pointed out when the nomination was made, the Convention incurred a certain risk in setting at defiance the opposition of an influential section of the party. The last two Presidential elections proved that the Republican party could only hope for success when it was united, and union could not be secured by the nomination of Mr. Blaine. The opposition to Mr. Blaine appeared to his friends unjust and unreasonable; but as it existed, it was folly to ignore it or defy it. A candidate who would have united every section of the party would have had a better chance of election. The event proves that we were right. Many of the discontented Republicans voted for Cleveland, and every vote so cast counted as two; others who could not bring themselves to vote the Democratic ticket voted for St. John, and each one was one vote lost to the party.

The Election Teaches a Lesson which the politicians may study with advantage and which may well encourage Christian patriots of all parties. It proves that, in spite of "the degradation of American politics," about which our foreign critics are so eloquent, the people are not indifferent to the moral character of the men who seek their votes; morality does count for something in a Presidential election. In 1882 Mr. Cleveland was elected governor of New York State by a plurality of 192,834, and an absolute majority of 167,071. This year, since the publication of the scandal on his moral character, his plurality in the State has sunk so low, that there is even now a bare certainty that it exists at all. Of course, other causes operated to reduce it, but no one could be in New York City without being aware that the argument which was the most potent weapon used against the governor was that of his immorality. So with Mr. Blaine. No one disputed his magnificent talents, his brilliant statesmanship, and few could resist his courteous, genial manner. He would have polled almost every Republican vote, and have been triumphantly elected, if he could have proved to the satisfaction of some twenty thousand doubters that he was an honest man. It is not for us to say in either case whether the charges were true or false; all that we wish to notice now is that the fact of people believing them to be true sufficed to determine their votes, and the election. The fact is commended to the attention of all whom it may concern.

A Grievous Disappointment will be Widespread if, as seems certain, it is decided that Mr. Blaine is defeated. It will need all the forbearance and manliness religion gives, to support many who have prayed and worked and voted for the success of the Rupublican candidate. To them may be commended the words of the Albany Evening Journal, a newspaper which has been one of the most earnest of Mr. Blaine's advocates. In a recent issue, after reminding its readers of its strong partizanship, it "reluctantly states that the election has been decided differently from its desire, because it believes that the prompt recognition of the will of the majority is essential to the maintenance and preservation of American institutions." It then defines its attitude as follows: "Many of Governor Cleveland's official acts have been severely and, we believe justly censured. In many things, however, he has been more conservative and prudent than most of those who lead his party, and this fact, if anything, reconciles us to the result. While he has kept silent concerning what we deem to be all the important issues of the canvass, it is fair to assume that he is in accord with the dominant political sentiment of New York State on all questions of finance and banking, and on essential matters relating to the industries of the country. If this assumption is not well founded, then it will fare ill with his Administration and ill with the country. Whatever his preferences and opinions may have been during the canvass, every true American sincerely hopes for the success of President Cleveland's Administration."

The Next House will be Under Democratic control. The majority, however, will not be so large as in the present House. At the close of last week the figures were not definitely ascertained, several elections being disputed, and both Republican and Democratic journals claiming men who ran as Independents. The most reliable figures give a Democratic majority of thirty-five, though Democratic journals claim that it will be forty. So far as can be learned, the 325 members, of which the House in the Forty-ninth Congress will consist, will be 180 Democrats and 145 Republicans. In the Forty-eighth Congress the House contained 198 Democrats, 124 Republicans and 3 Independents; Democratic majority, 71. In the Senate the Republican majority will, it is expected, be increased by one or two. At present there are 39 Republican Senators, 36 Democrats and 1 vacancy. If the figures from Illinois are correct, Senator Logan is likely to have a Democratic successor, the Lower House of the State Legislature being Democratic.

President Arthur's Thanksgiving Proclamation is as follows: "The season is nigh when it is the yearly wont of this people to observe a day appointed for that purpose by the President, as an especial occasion for thanksgiving unto God. Now, therefore, in recognition of this hallowed custom, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, do hereby designate as such day of general thanksgiving Thursday, the 27th day of this present November. And I do recommend that throughout the land the people, ceasing from their accustomed occupations, do then keep holiday at their several homes and their several places of worship, and with heart and voice pay reverent acknowledgment to the Giver of all good for the countless blessings wherewith He hath visited this nation."

Prohibition in Canada is Making Progress. The Scott Act, which prohibits absolutely the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, has been adopted by forty-seven counties. The question of its adoption is submitted to the popular vote, and if successful it remains in force until reversed by another popular vote, which cannot be taken until three clear years have expired. Of fifty-six contests, forty-seven have resulted in the adoption of prohibition. Two counties have had a three years' trial of the law, and a second vote which renewed the law.

Miss Laurie McLatchie has been Holding services in Paterson, N. J., during the past week with continued success. Reports reach us from that city of remarkable results following addresses of wonderful power. One of her hearers stated in this office that an address on the Parable of Dives and Lazarus which he heard the Scottish evangelist deliver, was so graphic and was given with so much unction that he thought it impossible for any unconverted person to hear it unmoved. This week Miss McLatchie is holding services at the Seventh Street Methodist Episcopal Church, in New York, between Second and Third avenues, of which Dr. A. C. Morehouse is pastor.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes has Temporarily Undertaken the evangelistic work in Cooper Union, New York. During the alterations now in progress in that building, the meetings are being held in the Annex Hall on the opposite side of Fourth Avenue. Services are held every Sunday evening and on Monday, Tuesday and Friday nights. It is a remarkable evidence of God's providential care that just at the time the Cooper Union meetings were in urgent need of a leader Mr. Oakes should have been in the city. His intimate acquaintance with the class of people who wander along the Bowery and stroll into the Cooper Union meetings—an acquaintance derived from long and successful work at the Bowery Branch of the Y. M. C. A.—renders him singularly well adapted for the position, and he will have many prayers for God's blessing on his efforts. The church at Pueblo, Col., accepted his resignation with profound regret, and presented him with a series of resolutions acknowledging the lasting benefits, spiritual and material, which it had derived from his ministry. Only Mr. Oakes's strong desire for evangelistic work and the clear indications of the Lord's providential leadings reconciled them to the painful separation.

Lord Wolseley's Expedition to Relieve General Gordon makes exceedingly slow progress The Canadians declare that the boats sent by the English Government for the navigation of the Nile are clumsy and unsuited to the work. They are now using native boats, which, though smaller than those of English manufacture, can be drawn over the cataracts. But for the assistance of the Canadians the expedition by the Nile route must have been abandoned. As it is, there is but little probability of its reaching Khartoum this year unless the difficulties farther on have been exaggerated. Lord Wolseley has reached Dongola, where he will await the arrival of his troops. They are likely to be much delayed, as a complete break-down has occurred in the navigation service. The Canadian boatmen expect that the passage of the Bahr-el-Hajar cataract will be a very serious and arduous undertaking, and much harder to accomplish than they expected. They do not think the troops can be taken up that cataract without a serious accident.

Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet Appears Unable to agree on a scheme of redistribution of the English constituencies, and the Conservatives are unwilling to extend the franchise until such a scheme has been formulated. Their reason is that, as the franchise is at present fixed, rural citizens of the poorer class are prevented voting at the election of members of Parliament, and the wealthier voters being chiefly conservative, nearly all the rural constituencies are represented by Conservatives. If the poorer classes are permitted to vote, as Mr. Gladstone proposes, they will probably vote for Liberals, and many Conservative members will lose their seats. The Conservative party are now preparing a scheme of their own, the primary object of which is to eliminate small towns from the rural constituencies. They propose to group them together, so that one member may be allotted to every district of about fifty thousand inhabitants. This scheme would not materially change the balance of parties in the House. It will not be acceptable to Mr. Gladstone's Radical followers, but the cablegrams indicate that the Premier may adopt it to break the deadlock existing between the two Houses.

The Second Ballots for the German Reichstag show further socialist gains. The elections are regarded with alarm throughout Europe as an evidence that socialistic doctrines are spreading, and that they will cause trouble in Hungary, France, Russia and England. The agitation has been stimulated in Germany by the harsh treatment of a party of soldiers who, being unjustly oppressed by their officers, laid their grievances before the Emperor. Instead of investigating the affair he denounced their appeal as a crime, and ordered them to be prosecuted. They were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, some of them as long as eight years. Plots are being discovered. Eight anarchists, who were charged with the attempted blowing up of the Niederwald monument, have been removed from the prison at Elberfeld to the prison at Leipsic. A plot was discovered to force the prison at Elberfeld and release the culprits. Several arrests have been made of persons implicated.

Cholera has Reappeared in France. Several deaths have taken place at Nantes, a city of one hundred and seventeen thousand inhabitants, near the mouth of the Loire. The exact number is unknown, as the authorities are desirous of avoiding a panic. There has also been an outbreak in Paris itself. The French correspondent of the New York Times, who has visited the city, says: "The infected quarters are Stanteine and Menilmontant, but cases are reported from points near the Bourse and elsewhere. The chief centre is a vile little street running out of the Faubourg St. Antoine, about half way between the Bastile Square and the Place de la Nation. The earliest deaths were almost entirely among the ragpickers. In this little street there are fifty-eight rag houses and thirty-three saloons of the lowest description. Thus far there has been no panic among the poorer classes, but it is said that many of the wealthy guests of hotels are leaving. On November 4th I drove through the squalid quarters between Père la Chaise and the village of St. Denis, and in many places the stench and filth rivalled what I saw in Marseilles. There has been much rain during the last few weeks. This will be of the greatest aid to the pest." M. Bronardel, Vice-President of the Paris Council of Hygiene, pronounces the cholera now prevalent in France as of the genuine Asiatic type. The first victims were rag-pickers, who became infected from imported rags. He predicts that the present epidemic will not be severe, and that it will be thoroughly repressed by the coming colder weather and rigid sanitary precautions.

Offers of Mediation between China and France have been made by England, Germany and Japan. China, however, is averse to any proposal involving the payment of an indemnity, while France insists upon that condition. Desultory fighting still goes on at the Tonquinese frontier, the Chinese acting with the Tonquin troops. Sir George Bowen, Governor of Hong Kong, has been ordered by the British government, by telegraph, to refuse permission to any French men-of-war to refit or to ship contraband of war stores within the limits of that colony.

Henry Fawcett, the English Postmaster-General, died on November 6th. He was one of the most remarkable of living statesmen, by reason of his total blindness. He met with an accident when a young man, while out with a shooting party. One of his companions discharged his gun full in Fawcett's face, and though his life was saved, he lost the sight of both eyes. He was at that time preparing for the career of a barrister-at-law, but he abandoned that profession when he became blind, and set himself to the study of political economy. A manual on the subject from his pen brought him fame, and he was elected to a professorship in the University of Cambridge. He entered Parliament in 1865 after several unsuccessful efforts, and at once took a prominent part in the debates. In May, 1880, Mr. Gladstone offered him the post of Postmaster-General, which he held until his death last week. He was fifty-one years of age when he died.

An Instance of Eviction of Irish Tenants by their English landlord is quoted by the European correspondent of the New York Times as a specimen of the practices which have aroused in the breasts of the Irish so strong an antipathy to English rule. He states that the Hon. Rowland Warin has just evicted fifty-two families from their wretched huts on the bleak Glenbeigh coast for their inability to pay accumulated rents three times greater than the valuation of the land; and, as the circumstances were of peculiar brutality, and some of the children thus turned out on the mountain side are said to have died, the radical English papers have taken the thing up, and they protest vigorously against officially bolstering such abuses. Mr. Labouchere says the remedy is an Irish Parliament to deal with such cruel and scandalous landlords. It is a fact, also, that the Wasp, a government gunboat, was on an evicting mission when she was wrecked, and the radical papers sternly ask why a man-of-war should be employed to drive sixteen miserable families off an ocean rock because the crops are not big enough to pay an exorbitant rent.

The Colony of Refugee Jews in Palestine is prospering. It has already a considerable settlement at Artuf, near Jerusalem. A property of 2500 acres has been bought, and nearly 200 Jews have been maintained thereon under Christian teaching and supervision, and are really showing some aptitude for agricultural work. The first crops went mainly to the fellahin who had planted them, and a good deal of labor and expense will be necessary before the work will be thoroughly remunerative. The Jews, however, are hopeful and persevering, and it is believed that in time the colony will be self-supporting.

OBADIAH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth."—1 KINGS 18 : 12.

Obadiah a Quiet Believer—Undervalued by Elijah—A Place for all God's Servants—A Horrible Abode for a Believer—Special Standard-Bearers Early Prepared—Approaching Spiritual Night—I. Obadiah's Early Piety—How it Might be Accounted for—Marks of Genuineness—Fearing the Lord—Reverence a Good Sign—Not Shown in Brass Bands—II. Persevering Piety—Not Disturbed by Fashion—Held a Difficult Position—III. Eminent Piety—IV. Comfortable Piety—The Worst Kind of Rogue.

I SUSPECT that Elijah did not think very much of Obadiah. He does not treat him with any great consideration, but addresses him more sharply than one would expect from a fellow-believer. Elijah was the man of action—bold, always to the front, with nothing to conceal; Obadiah was true and steadfast, but in a very difficult position, and therefore driven to perform his duty in a less open manner. His faith in the Lord swayed his life, but did not drive him out of the court. I notice that even after Elijah had learned more of him at this interview, he speaks concerning God's people as if he did not reckon much upon Obadiah, and others like him. He says, "They have thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away." He knew very well that Obadiah was left, who, though not exactly a prophet, was a man of mark; but he seems to ignore him as if he were of small account in the great struggle.

I suppose it was because this man of iron, this prophet of fire and thunder, this mighty servant of the Most High, set small store by anybody who did not come to the front and fight like himself. I know it is the tendency of brave and zealous minds somewhat to undervalue quiet, retired piety. True and accepted servants of God may be doing their best under great disadvantages, against fierce opposition, but they may scarcely be known, and may even shun the least recognition; therefore men who live in the fierce light of public life are apt to under-estimate them. These are lost in the brilliance of the man whom God lights up like a new sun to flame through the darkness. Elijah flashed over the sky of Israel like a thunderbolt from the hand of the Eternal, and naturally he would be somewhat impatient of those whose movements were slower and less conspicuous. It is Martha and Mary over again, in some respects.

The Lord does not love that His servants, however great they are, should think lightly of their lesser comrades, and it occurs to me that He so arranged matters that Obadiah became important to Elijah when he had to face the wrathful King of Israel. The prophet is bidden to go and show himself to Ahab, and he does so; but he judges it better to begin by showing himself to the governor of his palace, that he may break the news to his master, and prepare him for the interview. Ahab was exasperated by the terrible results of the long drought, and might in his sudden fury attempt to kill the prophet; and so he is to have time for consideration, that he may cool down a little.

Elijah has an interview with Obadiah, and bids him go and say to Ahab, "Behold Elijah." It may sometimes be the nearest way to our object to go a little roundabout. But it is remarkable that Obadiah should thus be made useful to a man so much his superior. He who never feared the face of kings nevertheless found himself using as his helper a far more timid individual. The Lord may put you, my dear brother, who are so eminent, so useful, so brave, perhaps, so severe, into a position in which the humbler and more retiring believer, who has not half the grace, nor half the courage that you have, may, nevertheless, become important to your mission ; and when He does this He would have you learn the lesson, and learn it well, that the Lord has a place for all His servants, and that He would not have us despise the least of them, but value them, and cherish the good that is in them. Elijah must not deal harshly with Obadiah. I would that Obadiah had had more courage ; I wish that he had testified for the Lord, his God, as openly as Elijah did ; but still every man in his own order ; to his own master every servant must stand or fall.

We learn further from the narrative before us, that God will never leave Himself without witnesses in this world. Ay, and He will not leave Himself without witnesses in the worst places of the world. What for a true believer Ahab's court must have been ! If there had been no sinner there but that woman Jezebel, she was enough to make the palace a sink of iniquity. That strong-minded, proud, Sidonian Queen twisted poor Ahab round her fingers just as she pleased. He might never have been the persecutor he was if his wife had not stirred him up ; but she hated the worship of Jehovah intensely, and despised the homeliness of Israel in comparison with the more pompous style of Sidon. Yet in that very court where Jezebel was mistress, the chamberlain was a man who feared God greatly. Never be surprised to meet with a believer anywhere. Grace can live where you would never expect to see it survive for an hour.

Joseph feared God in the court of Pharaoh, Daniel was a trusted counsellor of Nebuchadnezzar, Mordecai waited at the gate of Ahasuerus, Pilate's wife pleaded for the life of Jesus, and there were saints in Cæsar's household. Think of finding diamonds of the first water on such a dunghill as Nero's palace. Those who feared God in Rome were not only Christians, but they were ensamples to all other Christians for their brotherly love and generosity. Surely there is no place in this land where there is not some light ; the darkest cavern of iniquity has its torch.

I notice that these witnesses for God are very often persons converted in their youth. He seems to take a delight to make these His in the day of battle. Look at Samuel ! When all Israel became disgusted with the wickedness of Eli's sons the child Samuel ministered before the Lord. Look at David ! When he is but a shepherd boy he wakes the echoes of the lone hills with his psalms and the accompanying music of his harp. See Josiah ! When Israel had revolted it was a child, Josiah by name, that broke down the altars of Baal and burned the bones of his priests. Daniel was but a youth when he took his stand for purity and God. The Lord hath to-day—I know not where—some little Luther on his mother's knee, some young Calvin learning in our Sunday-school, some youthful Zwingle singing a hymn to Jesus.

This age may grow worse and worse ; I sometimes think it will, for many signs look that way ; but the Lord is preparing for it. The days are dark and ominous ; and this eventide may darken down into a blacker night than has been known before ; but God's cause is safe in God's hands. His work will not tarry for want of men. Put not forth the hand of Uzzah to steady the ark of the Lord ; it shall go safely on in God's predestined way. Christ will not fail nor be discouraged. God buries His workmen, but His work lives on. If there be not in the palace a king who honors God, there shall yet be found there a governor who fears the Lord from his youth, who shall take care of the Lord's prophets, and hide them away till better days shall come. Wherefore be of good courage, and look for happier hours. Nothing of real value is in jeopardy while Jehovah is on the throne. The Lord's reserves are coming up, and their drums beat victory.

Concerning Obadiah I wish to speak with you this morning. His piety is the subject of discourse, and we wish to use it for stimulating the zeal of those who teach the young.

I. First, we shall notice that Obadiah possessed

EARLY PIETY—

"I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth." Oh, that all our youth who may grow up to manhood and womanhood may be able to say the same ! Happy are the people who are in such a case ! How Obadiah came to fear the Lord in youth we cannot tell. The instructor by whom he was led to faith in Jehovah is not mentioned. Yet we may reasonably conclude that he had believing parents. Slender as the ground may seem to be, I think it is pretty firm, when I remind you of his name. This would very naturally be given him by his father or his mother, and as it signifies "the servant of Jehovah" I should think it indicated his parents' piety. In the days when there was persecution everywhere against the faithful, and the name of Jehovah was in contempt because the calves of Bethel and the images of Baal were set up everywhere, I do not think that unbelieving parents would have given to their child the name of "The servant of Jehovah" if they themselves had not felt a reverence for the Lord. They would not idly have courted the remarks of their idolatrous neighbors and the enmity of the great.

If he had no gracious parents, I cannot tell how Obadiah came to be a believer in the Lord in those sad days, unless he fell in with some kind teacher, tender nurse, or perhaps good servant in his father's house, or pious neighbor, who dared to gather little children round about him and tell of the Lord God of Israel. Some holy woman may have instilled the law of the Lord into his young mind before the priests of Baal could poison him with their falsehoods. No mention is made of anybody in connection with this man's conversion in his youth, and it does not matter ; does it ? You and I do not want to be mentioned if we are right-hearted servants of God. Not unto us be the glory.

GO ON, DEAR TEACHERS ;

since you have been called to the sacred ministry of instructing the young, do not grow weary of it. Go on, though you may be unknown, for your seed sown in the darkness shall be reaped in the light. You may be teaching an Obadiah, whose name shall be heard in future years ; you are providing a father for the church and a benefactor for the world.

If it was not in this way that Obadiah was brought to fear the Lord in his youth, we may think of methods such as the Lord deviseth for the bringing in of His banished. I have been very pleased lately, when I have been seeing inquirers, to talk with several young persons who have come out from utterly worldly families. I put to them the question, "Is your father a member of the Christian Church ?" The answer has been a shake of the head. "Does he attend a place of worship ?" "No, sir, I never knew him to go to one." "Your mother ?" "Mother does not care about religion." "Have you any brother or sister like-minded with yourself ?" "No, sir." "Have you any single relative who knows the Lord ?" "No, sir." "Were you brought up by any one who led you to attend the means of grace and urged you to believe on the Lord Jesus ?" "No, sir, and yet from my childhood I have always had a desire to know the Lord." Is it not remarkable that it should be so ? If that is your case, dear friend, magnify the sovereignty of God and adore Him as long as you live, for "He will have mercy on whom He will have mercy." Still, I take it, the major part of those who come to know the Lord in their youth are persons who have had the advantage of godly parents and holy training. Let us persevere in the use of those means which the Lord ordinarily uses, for this is the way of wisdom and duty.

This early piety of Obadiah's had special about it. The way in which he described it is, to my mind, very instructive, "I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth." I hardly remember in all my life to have heard the piety of children described in ordinary conversation by this term, though it is the common word of the Scriptures. We say, "The dear child loved God." We talk of their "being made so happy," and so forth, and I do not question the rightness of the language ; still, the Holy Spirit speaks of "the fear of the Lord as the beginning of wisdom." We cannot consider the exhilaration with which hearts receive the novelty of the Gospel to be the very best and surest sign of grace.

MARKS OF GENUINENESS

There is a growing flightiness about the religion of the present day which makes me tremble. I cannot endure the religion which swims only in boiling water and breathes only in heated air. To me the whisper of the Spirit has no relationship to a brass band, much less does godliness treat the great God and the Holy Saviour as matters for irreverent clamor. The deep-seated fear of the Lord is what is wanted, whether in old or young ; it is at the word of the Lord, and to bow before the infinite majesty of divine love, than to shout one's self hoarse. Obadiah had early piety of the right kind.

Beloved, you do not need that I should at this point speak to you at large upon the advantages of early piety. I will, therefore, only sum them up in a few sentences. To be a believer in God early in life is to be saved from a thousand regrets. Such a man shall never have to say that he carries in his bones the sins of his youth. Early piety helps us to form associations for the rest of life which will prove helpful, and it saves us from those which are harmful. The Christian young man will not fall into the common sins of young men, and injure his constitution by excesses. He will be likely to be married to a Christian woman, and so to have a holy companion in his march toward heaven. He will select as his associates those who will be his friends in the church and not in the tavern ; his helpers in virtue, and not his tempters to vice. Depend upon it, a great deal depends upon whom we choose for our companions when we begin life.

II. Youthful piety leads on to

PERSEVERING PIETY.

Obadiah could say, "I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth." Time had not changed him ; whatever his age may have been, his religion had not decayed. We are all fond of novelty, and I have known some men go wrong as it were for a change. It is not burning quick to the death in martyrdom that is the hard work ; roasting before a slow fire is a far more terrible test of firmness. Obadiah was not affected by the lapse of time ; he was found to be when old what he was when young.

Nor was he carried away by the fashion of those evil times. To be a servant of Jehovah was thought to be a mean thing, old-fashioned, ignorant, a thing of the past ; the worship of Baal was the "modern thought" of the hour. All the court walked after the God of Sidon, and all the courtiers went in the same way. My lord worshipped Baal, and my lady worshipped Baal, for the queen worshipped Baal ; but Obadiah said, "I thy servant fear Jehovah from my youth." Blessed is the man who cares nothing for the fashion, for it passeth away. If for awhile it rageth toward evil, what hath the believing man to do but to abide steadfastly by the right ?

Added to this, there were the difficulties of his position. He was chamberlain of the palace. If he had pleased Jezebel and worshipped Baal he might have been much easier in his situation, for he would have enjoyed her royal patronage ; but there he was, governor in Ahab's house, and yet fearing Jehovah. He must have had to walk very delicately, and watch his words most carefully. I do not wonder that he became a very cautious person, and was a little afraid even of Elijah, lest he was giving him a commission which would lead to his destruction. He came to be extremely prudent, and looked on things round about so as neither to compromise his conscience nor jeopardize his position. It wants an uncommonly wise man to do that, but he who can accomplish it is to be commended. He did not run away from his position, nor retreat from his religion.

Obadiah was a man who did in truth "hold the fort," for he felt that when all the prophets were doomed by Jezebel it was his part to stay and save the lives of at least a hundred servants of God from her cruel power. If he could not do more he would not have lived in vain if he accomplished so much. I admire the man whose decision was equal to his prudence, though I should greatly fear to occupy so perilous a place. The part of Elijah is much safer and grander. The prophet's course was plain enough; he had not to please, but to reprove Ahab; he had not to be wary, but to act in a bold, outspoken manner for the God of Israel. How much the greater man he seems to be when the two stand together in the scene before us. Obadiah falls on his face and calls him "My lord Elijah;" and well he might, for morally he was far his inferior. Yet I must not fall into Elijah's vein myself, lest I have to pull myself up with a sharp check. It was a great thing for Obadiah that he could manage Ahab's household with Jezebel in it, and yet, for all that, win this commendation from the Spirit of God, that he feared the Lord greatly.

He persevered, too, notwithstanding his success in life; and that I hold to be much to his credit. There is nothing more perilous to a man than to prosper in this world and become rich and respectable. Of course we desire it, wish for it, strive for it; but how many in winning it have lost all, as to spiritual wealth! The man used to love the people of God, and now he says, "They are a vulgar class of persons." As he has filled his pocket he has emptied his brains, and especially emptied his heart. He has got away from truth and principle in proportion as he has made an advance in his estate. This is a mean business, which at one time he would have been the first to condemn. There is no chivalry in such conduct; it is dastardly to the last degree. God save us from it; but a great many people are not saved from it. This is an age of meannesses disguised under the notion of respectability. God send us men of the stuff of John Knox, or, if you prefer it, of the adamantine metal of Elijah; and if these should prove too stiff and stern we could even be content with such men as Obadiah. Possibly these last might be harder to produce than Elijahs; with God all things are possible.

III. Obadiah, with his early grace and persevering decision, became a man of

and this is the more remarkable considering what he was and where he was. Eminent piety in a Lord High Chamberlain of Ahab's court! This is a wonder of grace indeed. This man's religion was intense within him. If he did not make the open use of it that Elias did, he was not called to such a career; but it dwelt deep within his soul, and others knew it. Jezebel knew it, I have no doubt whatever. She did not like him, but she had to endure him; she looked askance at him, but she could not dislodge him. Ahab had learned to trust him, and could not do without him, for he probably furnished him with a little strength of mind. Possibly Ahab liked to retain him just to show Jezebel that he could be obstinate if he liked, and was still a man. I have noticed that the most yielding husbands like to indulge in some notion that they are not quite governed by their spouses, and it is possible that on this account Ahab retained Obadiah in his position. At any rate, there he was, and he never yielded to Ahab's sin, nor countenanced his idolatry. Account for it how you may, it is a singular circumstance that in the centre of rebellion against God there was one whose devotion to God was intense and distinguished.

And his eminent piety was very practical; for when Jezebel was slaying the prophets he hid them away from her—one hundred of them. I do not know how many servants of the Lord any of you support, but I have not the privilege of knowing any gentleman who sustains a hundred ministers; this man's hospitality was on a grand scale. He fed them with the best he could find for them, and risked his life for them by hiding them away in caves from the search of the queen. He not only used his purse, but staked his life when a price was set upon these men's heads. How many among us would place our lives in jeopardy for one of the Lord's servants? At any rate, Obadiah's fear of the Lord brought forth precious fruit, and proved itself to be a powerful principle of action. Sunday-school teachers, you may be training to-day the men who will keep the truth alive in this land in years to come, the men who will take care of God's servants and be their best allies, the men and women who will win souls to Christ. Go you on with your holy work. You do not know whom you have about you.

IV. Obadiah's early religion became to him afterward. A servant who has been with his master from his youth ought not to be turned adrift when he grows gray. A right-minded master respects the person who has served him long and well. Suppose you had living in the family an old nurse who had nursed you when you were a child, and had lived to bring up your children, would you turn her into the street when she was past her work? No; you will do your best for her; if it is in your power you will keep her out of the workhouse. Now, the Lord is much more kind and gracious than we are, and He will never turn off His old servants. I anticipate the time when I shall not be able to do all I do now. You and I may look forward a little to the nearing period when we shall pass from middle life to declining years, and we may be assured that our Lord will take care of us to the last. Let us do our diligence to serve Him while we have health and strength, and we may be sure that He is not unrighteous to forget our work of faith and labor of love. It is not the way of Him. "Having loved His own which were in the world He loved them to the end."

Dear young people, if any of you are living in sin I do pray you to recollect that if you are seeking the pleasures of this world to-day by and by. Rejoice in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee therein; but for all this the Lord will bring thee into judgment. If thy childhood be vanity, and thy youth be wickedness, thy after-days will be sorrow. Oh, that thou wouldest be wise and offer to Christ thy flower in its bud with all its beauty upon it! Thou canst not be too soon holy, for thou canst not be too soon happy. A truly merry life must begin in the great Father's house.

And you, teachers, go on teaching the young the ways of God. In these days the State is giving them secular instruction all the day long, six days in the week; and religious teaching is greatly needed to balance it, or we shall soon become a nation of infidels. Secular teaching is all very well and good; we never stand in the way of any sort of light; but teaching that has not religion blended with it will simply help men to be bigger rascals than they would be without it. A rogue with a jimmy is bad enough, but a rogue with a pen and a set of cooked accounts robs a hundred for the other's one. Instead of relaxing Sabbath-school efforts, we shall be wise to increase them greatly.

As to you that have grown old in sin, I cannot talk to you about early piety; but there is a passage of Scripture which ought to give you great hope. Remember how the householder went out at the third, the sixth, the ninth, and at last at the eleventh hour, and found some still standing in the market-place idle. It was late, was it not? Very late. But, blessed be God, it was not too late! They had but one hour left, but the master said, "Go, work in my vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give thee." Now, you eleventh-hour people, you people of sixty, sixty-five, seventy, seventy-five, eighty—I would go on to one hundred if I thought any were here of that age—you still may come and enlist in the service of the gracious Lord, who will give you your penny at the close of the day even as He will give to the rest of the laborers. The Lord bring you to His feet by faith in Christ. Amen.

ON the next page is a picture of Mr. Ira D. Sankey presiding at his organ. We have already given his portrait and biography, but as he is now once more laboring among us, and purposes visiting all our chief cities, it is probable that this picture, representing him in an attitude which is familiar to thousands, will be prized by many of our readers. For the benefit of those who do not know the facts, we briefly recapitulate the leading events of his life.

He was born in the city of Edinburgh, Penn., in 1840, and is now forty-four years of age. His father, who died only a few months ago, was a member of the Legislature of the State, and a generous, useful, and influential member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which his mother was also identified.

In 1856 the family removed to Newcastle, in the same State, where Mr. Sankey's father had become president of a bank, and the lad was sent to an adjacent academy to complete his education. When he was fifteen years old, the future colleague of Mr. Moody was the subject of religious impressions, and very soon Ira was brought to the Saviour. While little more than a child he rendered good service in singing at various religious services to which his father took him. He also taught in the Sunday-school, and became prominent in the service of song. He trained the children of the school in singing, and conducted the service of praise in the church. His clear, melodious voice, distinct enunciation of the words sung, and rich emotional tones soon attracted attention, and he was often invited to musical circles and to conduct the singing at public meetings and conventions.

Before he was twenty-one he was elected superintendent of the Sunday-school, and it was here that he and which from the first proved very attractive. Largely on this account the school was filled to overflowing, not only with children, but with their parents, who came on purpose to listen to the songs and hymns which Mr. Sankey rendered with such sweet impressiveness. He was also a very active worker in Young Men's Christian Associations. His cheerful disposition, frank manners, and power of rendering sacred song made him everywhere a welcome guest. His singing often touched the heart, and souls were won by it to Christ.

In 1871, at a National Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations at Indianapolis, Mr. Moody first heard Mr. Sankey, and was impressed with the remarkable adaptation of his voice and style of singing to awaken the emotions and carry home religious truth to the heart. On conferring together, they found that their love of mission-work and desires for extended usefulness were mutual, and they agreed to labor together in evangelistic services, which they did in New York, Boston, and elsewhere, with results that seemed to many miraculous.

Shortly before leaving America, in 1873, Mr.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey.

One of Moody and Sankey's English Converts.

Sankey had pressing invitations to spend six months in a tour with Mr. Philip Phillips, through the cities on the Pacific coast, to sing sacred songs. But, after seeking divine direction, he was convinced that it was his duty to accompany Mr. Moody to Great Britain ; and the results abundantly demonstrated the wisdom of his decision. The events of their second tour in Great Britain, which commenced in April, 1883, are already well known to our readers. They are now holding a series of conventions in our large cities, with the object of stirring up the churches to renewed effort and giving them the benefit of their counsel and experience.

THE CONVERTED KNIFE-GRINDER.

(See Illustration.)

AMONG the converts whom the ministrations of Messrs. Moody and Sankey have brought into the kingdom by the blessing of God during their recent visit to Great Britain is one of whom an English journal tells an interesting story. It appears that the man was an infidel, and wherever he stopped in his itinerant business he was busy in promulgating atheistical opinions and disseminating atheistical publications. The man is a sturdy thinker, and many an argument on religious subjects has taken place in the inns where he stayed, in which the knife-grinder was the victor. He was something of a politician, too, deeply read in Hume and Cobbett, and a fierce hater of the aristocracy.

He was induced, much against his will, to attend the Moody and Sankey meetings, and there the grace of God laid hold of him. The change in the man is marvellous. It is a miracle. A more humble, devoted worker is not to be found. The rampant, discontented, rebellious spirit is completely taken out of him, and he is intent only on doing good. He finds opportunity, too, where it might seem impossible. He has had a little box fitted to the side of his lathe, in which he carries a supply of religious tracts, which he distributes wherever he goes. Those who have come in contact with him, and who knew him before the change, say that they have never seen so marked an instance of the power of the Gospel to revolutionize the heart of man.

MR. BOOTH'S PROTÉGÉ.

IN an old-fashioned restaurant in one of the down-town streets of New York a number of merchants and brokers were gathered after business one winter evening. The restaurant was a favorite resort of such men, for, in spite of its clinging to the style of a past generation, and although the elevated railroad clattered within a few inches of its upper windows and a double line of wagons to and from the docks on the west side made ceaseless din as they rattled over the stones, the place had fascinating associations with the merchant princes of the past, and was, notwithstanding its old-fashioned ways and old-fashioned furniture, a place where an excellent meal could always be obtained. The men on this particular evening were standing in groups, talking genially of the state of trade, the prosperity of the country, and political prospects. There was a disposition to stay later than usual that evening, for there was a drizzling rain falling, and it was beginning to freeze on the sidewalks, giving them an icy covering. It was a most uncomfortable night outside, rendering the light and warmth within more than usually pleasant. But the weather must be braved, and the first of the group to venture out was Mr. Booth, a substantial merchant of middle age. He wished his friends good-night and stepped out into the rain. Five minutes afterward he returned, accompanied by a figure such as was seldom seen within those walls. It was that of a young man of most miserable appearance. His hair was long and uncombed, his face hollow and pale, his eyes fierce and hungry looking, and his clothes thin and tattered. A pair of old shoes, worn to their last extremity, only partially protected the bare feet from the cold and wet. A wretched object truly, and the warmly-clad guests looked on with amazement as they saw him eat ravenously the substantial meal and drink the cup of hot coffee which were placed before him by Mr. Booth's directions.

No sooner was the meal disposed of and another cup of hot coffee provided, than the young man began to talk excitedly. "I feel better now," he said, "thanks to your charity. You have fed me, and you have a right to know who it is you have befriended. I am a miserable, befooled man, sir, and was on my way to become a desperate man when you spoke to me just now. You have saved me for this night at least from a prison. Do you not think society is in a bad state when a man of good education, and who is willing to work, has to go around in rags like these and beg or steal or die of hunger? That is my case, sir. Work is refused me everywhere—am I to starve to death?"

"What can you work at?" Mr. Booth asked.

"I can write a good hand, I am quick at figures, understand book-keeping of all kinds, and am conversant with all the details of banking business."

Mr. Booth shook his head sorrowfully. A thousand men might be found any day in New York streets unemployed who have the same qualifications. "I would rather you had told me," he said, "you could neither read nor write, but could build a wall, or set a stove, or make a window-frame. You are not an American I perceive by your accent ; why did you come here?"

"That is what I meant when I spoke of myself as befooled," said the miserable man. "Across the Atlantic we hear continually that America is the place to get on. Poor clerks who toil at starvation wages, and may lose even those any day, listen eagerly to American visitors, who boast that no man need starve in the United States. They told me and others over and over again that any honest, industrious man could get on in the land of freedom. I was three years saving enough to pay my passage over, and I came full of hope ; but I have never done a day's work here."

"Would it help you if I could get you sufficient money to pay your passage home?" Mr. Booth asked, with true pity in his heart.

"I think not, sir. My place is filled up there. My employers had, I believe, five hundred applications for it the day after I resigned, and my successor is working for less money than they paid me. It seems to me I am not wanted in the world, and that I should relieve it of a burden by quitting it. Yet I want so little, and I could earn it if I had the opportunity. There seems to be plenty of money here. Will you not let me live?"

Mr. Booth looked distressed. It was not the first time that such a problem had been thrust under his notice. Often had the kind-hearted man taken into his employ men whom he did not want, rather than see them starve or drift into the criminal classes. Already he had more clerks than he needed, and he knew his friends were in like case. Yet the man's demand for bread was reasonable enough. The mischief was further back. He was silent.

A Knotty Question.

"Can you blame me," the man went on, "that when I have been suffering the pangs of hunger and cold I have been tempted to crime? I have seen your millionaires in their carriages—one of them was pointed out to me yesterday who is said to have two hundred million dollars in his possession—and I have wondered whether the little I want might not righteously be taken from men that have more than they can use. Life is as sweet to me as to them, and I tell you, sir, I am entitled as a man to my share of the world's wealth. There is plenty for us all. Why have some greedily absorbed so much that there is not enough to buy bread for the others? I was brought up a God-fearing man. I came here prepared to obey the laws and to work honestly for a living, but in these two years that I have been here I have seen so much selfishness on the one hand, and misery on the other, that I am ready now, when the rising of the poor and desperate comes, to do my share toward rectifying the anomalies of society. I take my stand where the rich men of the world have placed me; I am with the poor, and when you have laid the last straw on our burdens, when you have made even existence in misery impossible, then, sir, you and your friends must look out—you will have to face desperate men."

The poor half-starved fellow unconsciously raised his voice as he dwelt on the miseries of himself and his fellows, and the gentlemen around turned to listen to what he was saying. They, like Mr. Booth, had a supreme contempt for socialists and for the agitators who excited the working men; but here they were face to face with the problem which lies at the base of the agitation. This was no born revolutionist, no lover of anarchy, but he was material out of which grim poverty was fashioning a weapon that might be used at no distant day to aid in overturning society. In Europe men can charge the royalties, the aristocracies with responsibility for their misery; but here it seemed the same misery existed, though there is neither king nor lord. What was to be done with this man and the thousands he represented? Starve a few of them might, but would the bulk of them lie down resignedly and die while riches were being ostentatiously displayed within their reach, and while men were feasting in their sight or hoarding their wealth for their sons? It was useless to tell this man he ought to have learned a trade. They had all been prominent in demanding education for the poor. They had preached up education as a cure for all social evils, and this man was the product of the system. He had the education for which they had been contending, and here was the result—a man for whom society had no use. More than one man sympathized with him as Mr. Booth did, and at last one of them came forward and, giving the man his card, said: "If you will come to me at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, I will see if I can help you."

"May God bless you, sir," said the poor fellow, reverently, and the tears softened the eyes a moment before blazing with the fire of despair. "I want to live honestly and peaceably, I want to work, and I will do anything I can get to do, if you will give me bread. You shall not find me ungrateful."

They gave him a dollar to secure a home for that night, and the poor fellow departed with a heart full of gratitude. It was a serious discussion that arose after he left. Every one was impressed by the despair he had witnessed. There could be no dispute as to the facts. The question they had to consider was, whether as Christian men, followers of Him who was the Friend of the poor, they were, in the light of their knowledge, fulfilling their duty in the world. They were prosperous men, eager to get rich, concentrating all their energies on their business, and intent on increasing their possessions; yet they were charitable men, too. More than one had given largely to churches and charitable institutions, but until now not one had ever considered that it was his duty to give to the cause of the poor the thought and study which in his own business had been so successful. It was with new thoughts and new ideas of duty that they separated that night.

The miserable creature who had so impressed them kept his appointment the following morning, and was given employment and suitable clothing. He kept his promise, and no employer in the city has a more faithful clerk. But the problem is still unsolved. What are Christians doing for the daily increasing masses who are living on the brink of starvation? A gift here and there—fifty dollars to this and that charity, but what to raise them out of their misery and give them a chance to live honestly? The world is pressing eagerly forward in the race for wealth, and says, "Am I my brother's keeper?" but is that the right attitude for the Christian? As we look at the carriages of the wealthy as they roll to and from the fashionable churches on Sunday, we may well wonder whether a little of the ability, the sagacity, the energy which have gone to make the fortunes the owners possess, might not have been wisely devoted to devising some scheme which would have given to some half-starved creatures the chance of earning their daily bread.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Flight.

JOHN MORLEY started at the sound of the piano in the empty house. His thoughts all day had been with his sinful wife, and it seemed to him as though her spirit had come to visit him. He trembled from head to foot.

Was there any other sound to be heard, or was it his fancy that now a stealthy step, scarcely louder than the passing of a breath of wind through the house, was creeping across the floor overhead? The moisture stood in large drops upon his forehead; and his face grew set and pallid as the face of a corpse. He tried to speak aloud, if only to dispel the awful stillness about him, but his throat was dry and his tongue parched. At length there came to his ears a shrill cry and a smothered sob—a strange, terrible, inexplicable sound, which made him deaf for a minute or two to every other noise. When that surging in his brain was over, and his dimmed sight grew clear again, he laid a stern hold upon his fleeting courage, and with slow steps ascended to the floor above.

His own chamber was the first upon the landing, and he had scarcely ever been beyond it. He passed Hester's open door, and glanced round the room, but there was no sound or sight of horror there. Farther on, a fringe of light glimmered in the dusk from under the door of the locked-up drawing-room. His footsteps faltered and were arrested for an instant. A light there! What then could there be within that room? His failing and reluctant feet carried him to the very door-sill.

He pushed the door with his hand, and looked in. The one candle burning upon the table left the corners of the room in obscurity, but there fell enough light upon the piano to disclose to him the form of some woman, slight and slender like her, with a pale gray shawl wrapped about her, leaning forward, or rather lying against the piano before which she sat. The attitude was utterly helpless and inanimate, as if she had fallen there fainting. Her long fair hair had dropped down about her shoulders. He held himself back, quivering with passion, and gazing at her with steadfast and flaming eyes. It was indeed Rose, whether in the body or out of the body he could not tell; it was his wife, whom he had loved so fondly, and whom he had loved more, he knew it now, since she left him than while she was still with him.

He raised his hand to his burning head, and pressed it across his eyes, but the apparition remained there in its attitude of motionless despair. Once he thought it moved, but it was only the flicker of the candle in the draught from the open door which set the shadows about her fluttering. He heard in the distant part of the house, where the workrooms were, the shutting of some door and the turning of a lock, and he knew it was Lawson going away from his work. He was late to-night, he thought; turning the words over and over again in his mind, as if glad to get some common, every-day idea into his brain. The candle was burning low, and would not last many minutes longer. In a short time he would be alone in the darkness, with this awful and speechless form. He must needs speak; he must enter; he must perhaps touch this strange shadow. With a sudden shrill cry of a man's most terrible anguish, which awoke hollow echoes through the empty house, John Morley entered the gloomy room before him.

Ten minutes later he came out again, with a face from whose veins all the blood seemed to have gone, but with a stain of deep crimson upon the palms of his hands, at which he looked again and again with eyes of horror. He went hesitatingly down-stairs into his own parlor, and opened his desk, and a drawer within it where he kept his money. He took out a roll of notes, and spread them before him with an air of bewilderment, resting his forehead upon his hand, which stained his white hair with clammy clots of blood. He sat there a few minutes only, but he fancied these were hours; and the soft, pure gray of the evening sky, with a few rosy clouds floating over it, he took for the dawn of the morning. He roused himself, shuddering; and lifting his bloodshot and heavy eyes to the dying light in the heavens, he muttered aloud in the silent room, "I must flee to Hester."

He went up-stairs to put together a few clothes in a valise, with a confused notion of preparing for a journey. Then he caught sight of his blood-stained hair in the glass, and shivered and moaned like a frightened child. He washed it and his hands again and again, as if he could see the stain long after it had been washed away. After this he took up his valise and left the house unlocked and empty; strode quickly up the street, past the chapel, under the trees, and along the lanes which had invited him in vain only yesterday. He walked all night swiftly, with perplexed and wandering thoughts; and when the dawn came he inquired of the first person he met where the nearest station was, and there he took the earliest train for London. Arrived there, with a true instinct he sought the church where Carl preached, knowing that if he did not find Hester there he could learn from Carl where she might be found.

But Hester was there. Two hours ago she had entered the porch of Carl's chapel. Already the fashionably-dressed congregation were beginning to arrive, and she heard his praises spoken as she waited to be put into a seat. She was at last conducted to an obscure place in one of the galleries, where, though she could see the pulpit well, it was not probable that Carl could recognize her face amid the number surrounding him. Hester was content, however; she would hear him again, and when the service was over she would go to speak to him in the vestry about little Hester.

Carl appeared at the appointed minute, and she trembled nervously as he glanced round the crowded chapel. Then followed an hour of intense happiness—that of a woman whose most devout worship is led by the being she loves the most. Hester's whole soul was in that brief, fleeting season of worship; an interval so short, that when the mass of people rose to go away, she looked about her in amazement. Carl seemed to have caught her eye then, for he stood a moment before leaving the pulpit, gazing toward her.

It was some time before she could get down the crowded staircase, and when she did so the chapel-keeper told her the best way to get to the minister's vestry was to go round on the outside of the building. She passed on with the throng, but just as she was about to turn the corner of the chapel, she felt her hand suddenly seized and herself drawn rapidly down toward the street. It was her father who had taken hold of her and was hurrying her toward a hack, which was waiting at a little distance. But what could bring her father there? What terrible calamity could have driven him so far adrift from his fixed habits? Had Rose persisted in discovering herself to him; and had some catastrophe been the result? He did not speak to her, and when she spoke he appeared deaf to her voice. He sank down into a corner of the cab, covering his face with his hands. Once he looked up, and there was a gleam of light, not quite sane, in his sunken eyes.

"What is the matter, father?" she ventured to ask.

"Not yet!" he cried, shrinking back again; "not yet, Hester! I am not quite ready yet."

They drove rapidly to some station, and he sent her on to the platform while he bought the tickets. A train was on the point of starting, and he hurried her into a carriage. It never occurred to her to suppose that they were going anywhere but back to Little Aston; and by the speed at which they travelled, she judged that they would soon be there. This was as they passed somewhat slowly through a station (for they stopped at none), and she saw by the clock there that it was after eleven. She wondered how little Hester would bear the disappointment of not seeing her again; and the tears she could not keep back, and which she would not wipe away lest her father should see them, stole down her cheeks. Presently the train slackened speed, and in a few minutes came to a stand-still. There was no station near, and it was as dark as it ever is during the early nights of June.

"What can be the matter?" she exclaimed to herself, involuntarily. Their fellow-passengers were collecting together their cloaks and parcels, and preparing to leave the carriage. The gentleman who was next to her caught her half-audible exclamation.

"There is nothing the matter," he answered, pleasantly; "the train runs alongside the vessels, and we have nothing to do but embark immediately. Your luggage will be quite safe."

"This young lady is my daughter," said John Morley, jealous with morbid jealousy of any one coming between him and the being on whom he leaned for support. "She is my daughter, and I will take care of her."

Hester looked out, and saw an utterly inexplicable and unfamiliar scene. There lay just before her the black outlines of a steamer, and beyond them a dark tossing plain, with a faint suggestion of light upon it, as if it had not yet quite lost the lustre of the sunset. A confusion of strange cries and voices surrounded her, amid which she heard her father whisper, "For mercy's sake be silent, and follow me." Almost before she could recover from her amazement she found herself on the deck of one of the steamers, which soon began to move slowly away from the pier.

The other passengers had hurried down into the cabin to secure berths for the night; and the deck was deserted by all except the captain and his crew, who were busy in getting safely out of port. John Morley led his daughter to a seat removed from every danger of being overheard, and sat down close beside her, shivering with excitement as much as from the chilly air of the sea.

"Hester," he whispered, in a hollow, tremulous voice, "I am fleeing to a city of refuge."

"What is it, father?" she asked, in steady and tender tones. "Tell me all that has happened to you."

He was silent for some time, his eyes fixed upon the dark line of shore they could yet see as they were leaving it behind them. Hester asked herself if all this was true—that they, her father and herself, were travelling secretly by night from England, where only a few hours ago she had been listening to Carl in his own chapel. It was all too real, astounding as it was, for her to doubt its truth; it was too wild to be a trick of her sleep. The great sea spread around them—the sea she had never seen, which she would never see again without remembering this night, indelibly stamped upon her brain. Without moving or speaking, she sat beside her father, waiting for him to break the silence.

"I scarcely know how it all happened," he said at last, in the tone of one thinking aloud. "Rose was there—not her ghost; it could not have been that, for the stain of blood came off upon my hands, and my hair was reddened with it. She was dead when I went into the room—murdered; but who could have murdered her? I would not have touched a hair of her head. Such pretty hair it used to be, as golden as the sunlight. But then, you see, nobody would have believed that I was not the murderer. I do not know myself who could have been so cruel, so fierce; and she had harmed no one as she had harmed me. All the world would have said I was guilty; and if they had not hanged me, they would have imprisoned me as mad, though I should swear I did not do it. So I said I will flee—I will escape from my country while there is time. It would be a most horrible thing for my daughter if her father was hung as a murderer or shut up as a madman."

Hester's heart had grown faint and sick as she listened to her father's almost unconscious and delirious sentences. But at this moment the captain came up to ask them if they would not go below, and she had to control herself to answer him quietly.

"My father is ill," she answered, "and we would rather stay here a little while. By and by we will go down."

He stayed beside them for a few minutes, making some observations which she scarcely heard, though she exerted herself to reply to them; and then he left them once more to themselves.

"Father," she said, earnestly, "answer me a question or two. How did you find out she was at home?"

"I came in from chapel at twenty minutes to eight," he said, "and sat down in my own chair; but I could not read. All at once I heard the sound of her piano, and, some minutes after, a strange noise between a scream and a sob. Then, just as the clock was striking eight, I went up-stairs, and there was a light shining in her room, and I went to look in, and Rose was there—Rose herself; not her spirit."

"Did you speak to her?' asked Hester.

"No," he answered; "my tongue refused its office. I went up to her and laid my hand upon her, but she never moved. Then I saw her hair all clotted with blood, and I lifted up her head and found that she was gone far away from me, where no man knows love or hatred. She was dead—murdered, and could never be pardoned by me."

"But how could it be?" cried Hester, who could scarcely realize the fact that Rose was dead, in the horror of hearing that she had been murdered."

"I know nothing," said John Morley, gloomily. "We were alone in the house. It was I who found her. My hands and hair were stained with her blood. If I had given myself up, they could have done nothing else but punish me for the crime. But I am innocent, Hester; as innocent as yourself."

"And did you leave her there?" she asked.

"I carried her to the sofa," he said, "and laid her down gently. She was dead, and I could kiss her again. I covered her over with a gray shawl which was stained red. The candle was almost burned out, and I could stay no longer. Yes, I left her there; and she lies there now, perhaps. They may not discover I am gone very quickly, for nobody goes into that room. I think I have been almost mad all day, but I am better now with you, Hester. Oh, Hester, be very pitiful toward me!"

He broke out suddenly into low, smothered moans and wailings, and put his arms round her, resting his head upon her shoulder, while she pressed her lips again and again to his face, and told him that she was his daughter, his child, who could never forsake him, never feel anything but love and pity for him. So she soothed him, crushing down the grief and terror of her own heart, and seeking the most tender expressions of her affection for him. He grew calm at last, calmer than he had been for many days.

"Did I do right in fleeing?' he asked, anxiously. "I could bear it no longer. My dishonor has been a burden as heavy as I could bear; and this would have been too much. I must have lost my reason, if they had not made it seem that I had lost it before. Do you think me mad, Hester?"

"No, my dear," she answered. He clung so much to her like a child, that unconsciously her voice and expression were those of one who talks to a child. There were many things she wanted to learn yet, and she must keep him as calm as possible.

"But I am almost mad," he said. "I have neither a sound mind nor a sound body. I have destroyed them both. Oh, my God! what is to become of us?"

PROVERBS OF SOLOMON.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 23. Prov. 1 : 1–16. Golden Text, ver. 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Object of the Book—To Give Knowledge—Perception—Develop a Receptive Spirit—Wisdom or Subtilty—The Teachable Man the Best Teacher—The Beginning of Wisdom—Warnings against Special Sins—Avarice—Uncleanness—Idleness—Drunkenness—A Fool's Portrait—An Atheist—Doing Mischief—Empty Loquacity.

IN his introduction to the Book of Proverbs, of the chief part of which he is the author, Solomon speaks of the PURPORT OF THE BOOK.

First, "to know wisdom and instruction;" secondly, "to perceive the words of understanding;" thirdly, "to receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, and judgment, and equity;" lastly, "to give subtilty to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion." Before we can impart wisdom to others, we must know, perceive, and receive it ourselves. God's wisdom is communicated 'not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (1 Cor. 2 : 13); and none can teach that which he has not received. "A wise man will hear, and will increase learning."

Our blessed Lord set us an example when He was in the temple, in the midst of the doctors. "hearing them, and asking them questions" (Luke 2 : 46); God though He was, and the very yet as Man taking the place of the learner. The Apostle James exhorts us, "Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak" (James 1 : 19). None are so teachable as those who are advanced in knowledge, for they know how much remains to be learned. "Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser; teach a just man, and he will increase in learning" (Prov. 9 : 9). Those who are wise know the value of wisdom; they do not care to be thought wise, but to be so. Those who are apt to teach but slow to learn are preparing the way for a fall. While the unteachable are giving out what they know, and are gaining nothing more, the teachable are continuing to make quiet progress; and when comes, both will be proved, and the true state of the case revealed. In a public meeting, where many prominent and noted preachers were present, there was who had found "the one thing needful," who "sat at the feet of Jesus, and heard His Word." The speeches were all arranged, and everything was to be according to method and plan. The young man was to take one of the prayers. He had quietly put the whole gathering into the hands of God to be quickened into life, and it was no hindrance to him that the Spirit of God was not given the lead. He prayed at the time appointed by the committee, and immediately the whole meeting became a Bochim; anxious souls came forward to seek Jesus without being invited, and the young man who had been a listener—outwardly to man, but inwardly to God—was the only one found there who understood the leadings of the Spirit enough to take control of the meeting under Him.

Solomon teaches that "the fear of the Lord is or wisdom" (Prov. 9 : 10). Modern teachers would have it that human wisdom, civilization, and education are to lead up to God; but Solomon exactly reverses the order, and puts the fear of God first. Indeed, this wisest among men actually says, "Fear God, and keep His commandments; for this is the whole duty of man" (Eccl. 12 : 13). His own experience taught him that wisdom, even exceeding that of any other man, and the making of many books, was vanity without the fear of God (Eccl. 1 : 17, 18, 12 : 12). The preacher teaches that wisdom is the gift of God, "the Lord giveth wisdom" (Prov. 2 : 6), just as does the Apostle James, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him" (James 1 : 5).

Solomon not only shows the blessedness of walking with God, especially in chapters 2 and 3, but also gives the strongest and wisest warnings against special kinds of sin.

"THE GREEDY OF GAIN."

He "troubleth his own house" (Prov. 15 : 27), "Their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood. . . . They lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives." What a picture! A curse to themselves and a curse to others! Then there are the unclean, including fornicators, adulterers, and the terribly large class of such as secretly sin against themselves.

These sins are so frightfully on the increase, even among believers, that it is time things were called by their names, and we have but to read Prov. 2 : 16–19; 5 : 3–23; 6 : 24–35; 7 : 5–27 in connection with 1 Cor. 6 : 9–20 to see the mind of God about these sins of uncleanness. If, indeed, our body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, then every member of our body is an instrument of righteousness, at the disposal of the Holy Ghost, and not at the disposal of carnal lust and passion. But also our body is the beloved charge of the Holy Ghost, whose blessed office it is to guide us into all truth, and to keep us from all evil, by revealing Jesus as our great Deliverer. Temptation is never too strong for Him, and He fighteth for us, as well as careth for us. When we recognize that we are both the property and the care of another, then temptation is at once referred to Him, and He undertakes it and delivers us.

Solomon also has solemn words for and the sluggard; "the slothful shall be under tribute" (12 : 24), never independent; he "roasteth not that which he took in hunting" (12 : 27); perhaps he has let the fire go out, and will not take the trouble; and thus his day's work is lost. His "way is as an hedge of thorns" (15 : 19); he makes no way forward, and gets so helpless that he "hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again" (19 : 24), and his desire "killeth him, for his hands refuse to labor" (21 : 25). He is full of fears, and makes difficulties at every turn. He says, "There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets" (22 : 13). "No great loss," some might say. His property deteriorates, and all goes to ruin (24 : 30, 31). If he is sent on an errand he sets his employer's teeth on edge, or makes his eyes smart (10 : 26). As far as himself is concerned, he desires and has nothing (13 : 4); he is unwilling to plough in winter, and thus if he does exist till the next harvest, it is only by begging (20 : 4). Notwithstanding all this, the poor, pitiable, contemptible creature "is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason" (26 : 16). God's antidote to this unenviable condition is "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1 : 24).

The preacher also draws a picture of

THE DRUNKARD.

He says that "the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" (23 : 21), and that "wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging" (20 : 1). Then he thus photographs the drunkard in the sunlight of God: "Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things. Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not: when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again" (23 : 29–35). Who that has looked on the horrors of delirium tremens, or has seen much of the miserable homes of drunkards, can fail to recognize this perfect portrait?

Solomon also draws the portrait of

THE FOOL.

The distinctive mark by which a fool is known is briefly told us in two of the Psalms: "The fool hath said in his heart, No God" (Ps. 14 : 1; 53 : 1). "It is as sport to a fool to do mischief" (10 : 23), the extent of his capability is to do injury to others, and nevertheless his "way is right in his own eyes" (12 : 15). It does not take much to make a fool (i.e., a man who does not recognize God) angry, but he cannot keep it to himself, his "wrath is presently known" (12 : 16), for he "rageth, and is confident" (14 : 16), and so "layeth open his folly" (13 : 16). Fools despise wisdom and instruction(1 : 7), "hate knowledge" (1 : 22), and "a fool despiseth his father's instruction" (15 : 5)—in fact, he thinks he knows better than his father. He "has no delight in understanding" (18 : 2). His folly is most observable in his conversation, his "lips enter into contention," and his "mouth is his destruction" (18 : 6, 7); he "uttereth all his mind" (29 : 11); he "is full of words" (Eccl. 10 : 14), and his "voice is known by multitude of words" (Eccl. 5 : 3). "Delight is not seemly for" him (Prov. 19 : 10), "wisdom is too high for him" (24 : 7), and "honor is not seemly for" him (26 : 1). He has no concentration of thought or purpose, his "eyes . . . are in the ends of the earth" (17 : 24). Such is the man who says, "No God." Such are they who would shut God out of politics, out of business, out of domestic life, out of their own hearts. These are they who think they can get on well enough without God; and He who knows the hearts of all men sees them in some point or other like this portrait drawn by the Spirit of God through the wisest of His creatures. Thank God, He can deal with the fool, the drunkard, the slothful, the unclean, the greedy of gain; yes, He knows how to take "the beggar from the dung-hill, to set . . . among princes, even the princes of His people" (1 Sam. 2 : 8; Ps. 113 : 7, 8).

THOUGHTS BETWEEN THE LINES.

BY O. F. IRELAND.

"Jesus, lover of my soul,"
Who on the cross such love displayed,
"Let me to Thy bosom fly,"
There I cannot be dismayed.
"While the nearer waters roll,"
Alone I cannot breast the wave;
"While the tempest still is high,"
Thy protecting arm can save.

"Hide me, O my Saviour, hide!"
Blessed thought, to hide in Thee
"Till the storm of life is past,"
And from dangers we are free.
"Safe into the haven guide," Haven of eternal rest;
"O receive my soul at last,"
There to be forever blest!

"Other refuge have I none,"
And none other is complete;
"Hangs my helpless soul on Thee,"
Here it finds a safe retreat.
"Leave, O leave me not alone,"
In this wild and lonely place;
"Still support and comfort me"
With Thy rich, abounding grace.

"All my trust on Thee is stayed,"
Thy rich promises are sure;
"All my help from Thee I bring,"
All Thy gifts are rich and pure.
"Cover my defenceless head"
With Thy benedictions mild;
"With the shadow of Thy wing"
Overspread Thy trusting child!

"Plenteous grace with Thee is found;"
None may want who trust in Thee;
"Grace to cover all my sin"
Thou wilt not withhold from me.
"Let the healing streams abound," Flooding now my waiting soul;
"Make and keep me pure within,"
Pure and every whit made whole.

"Thou of life the fountain art,"
Coming from the Father's throne;
"Freely let me take of Thee,"
That I Thy righteousness may own.
"Spring Thou up within my heart," Blessing all my future days;
"Rise to all eternity,"
And I will sing Thy endless praise.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND.—Revelation vii., 4.—And there were sealed 144,000 of all the (12) Tribes of the children of Israel. According to I. Kings, Chapter xii., the 12 tribes were divided—The Kingdom of Juda (called Jews), 2 tribes, and the Kingdom of Israel, 10 tribes. These 10 tribes were carried away captive (for their idolatry, II. Kings, xvii., 11, 12); through marriage they became mixed among the heathens (Judges iii., 6; Luke xix. 2, 9), they turned 'ater with them to Christianity, and out of these the Lord God is about to gather and seal his elect, as also out of the 2 tribes—the Jews; (Matt. xxiv., 31). These will stand with Jesus on Mount Zion (Rev. xiv., 1; Isaiah xxxv., 10), they having kept both law and Gospel as Jesus their Example has done. These 144,000 will not die, they being God's elect (Thess. iv., 15, 16, 17.) Books (two kinds) containing this doctrine will be sent by mail for 12 cents each. Address J. WIFLE, 143 North Sixth street, Brooklyn, N. Y. See advertisement of Oct. 2.

WHEN, on May 22d last, Dr. Hays, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (North), welcomed to the Assembly, then in session at Saratoga, N. Y., Dr. Stratton, of Natchez, Miss., the delegate of the Southern General Assembly, he referred to the fence described by Dr. Jessup, which Arabs had built to divide a pool of water that belonged to two parties. That fence, he said, was an illustration of the dividing line between North and South; only that the fence is getting old, the sides are off the top, and the ground rail rotten, and ministers and members were getting over and under and through and around; and it is not very important whether it stays up or tumbles down. "The time is coming," he said, "when, one in Christ Jesus and in the fulness of His Spirit, we shall stand together to do battle against all that is wrong, and be friends of all that is Christlike. Representing the Church in the North, with all my heart I give you my hand and my prayers."

Nor was Dr. Stratton less cordial in his utterances as a delegate representing the Southern Assembly. He said: "Mr. Moderator, I have crossed two thousand miles to bring to you to-day. I have sometimes thought that if there had been in the way two thousand of those beings of whom Martin Luther spoke on his way to Worms, I would still have passed through them all with the olive branch in my hand. Only a few years ago it seemed that barriers insurmountable surrounded the spot where I stand. I certainly never expected to see them removed in my day. But to-day the barriers are gone, and these hands may be locked together without one vestige of the old alienation to cool and weaken the warmth and pressure of the grasp. Just when the vapors were hanging so dark on the sky, and when neither north winds nor south winds could dissolve them, suddenly, as with a touch of God, the rainbow sprang up and spread its glorious belt across the field of vision. One foot of it, and the initial one, rested in the Southern Assembly at Atlanta, and the other on your Assembly in the western capital of Springfield. A year ago the arch widened its circle, and stretched from Lexington to Saratoga. To-day the arch has widened its sweep still further—the southern foot is at Vicksburg on heights that have been made historic. Once it was beleagured with armies; the shot fell like rain day and night for months, and the inhabitants sought shelter in the hills. There in that nerve-centre of all the passions engendered by war, this bow takes its spring to-day, and traversing a continent, plants its other foot in the midst of the health-giving fountains of Saratoga. The hand of God has been in all this. There had been too much diplomacy in our negotiations, but when we ceased from diplomacy the Holy Spirit brought about these results.

"My commission charges me to convey to you the most cordial Christian and fraternal salutations of the Southern Presbyterian Church. These salutations are most cordial, because I assure you the heart of our people is in them. We are twins; and that word 'twin' recalls Thomas, called Didymus, and you know he was for a long time a doubter; and so we have been doubting sisters for years. But we are twins, locked in each other's arms, and embraced together in the loving arms of Jesus Christ. I present you these salutations in perfectly good faith. Words in form, they are spirit and life. They carry with them fraternal sentiments. The very terms of their salutations are the result of careful and mature deliberation. Every word has been deliberately adopted as the utterance of that Assembly."

Probably few outside the circle of the Presbyterian Church can understand, in all its significance, the message so gracefully expressed. It is not our purpose to travel backward over the record which rendered such a message welcome to the hearts of those who heard it. In this case it is better that "the dead past bury its dead" and our faces be steadily set toward the future; and, "forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, we press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The misunderstandings and the estrangements of the dark past may well be lost sight of in the blessed light of the Sun of Righteousness and under the benign influence of the Prince of Peace.

The Assembly from which Dr. Stratton was sent with "the olive branch" met at Vicksburg, Miss., on May 15th, and Dr. Thomas D. Witherspoon, of Louisville, Ky., was ELECTED MODERATOR.

The election caused some surprise. It was not that Dr. Witherspoon was unknown to fame. His scholarship, his eloquence, his sterling Christian character and his many and varied gifts, which have rendered his ministry so precious to the churches of the South, have combined to render his name familiar throughout the land, while those who have never had the privilege of listening to his thrilling words have read, with profit and pleasure, the excellent volumes produced by his able pen. But people who were familiar with the history of the Assembly, while recognizing Dr. Witherspoon's eminent fitness for the high and honorable position, were nevertheless surprised, because the Assembly has hitherto usually reserved this honor for men of venerable age. That this year it should have placed in the Moderator's chair a comparatively young man is therefore a tribute to his character and abilities of no slight significance. The portrait we now give of Dr. Witherspoon, and a brief sketch of his life, will be very welcome to all our readers, especially to those who have long desired that fraternal relations between the two sections of the church be re-established.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

In the year 1836 there resided in the village of Greensboro, Ala., a godly family, whose lineage was illustrious in the best sense of the word. Robert Franklin Witherspoon and Sarah Agnes, his wife, could look back to their ancestry with honest pride. Mr. Witherspoon was a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church, and his ancestors for five generations had held the same honorable office. In the great day of the founding of the nation John Witherspoon had set his name to the Declaration of Independence, and still further back the godly elder loved to point to one illustrious name from whom he could trace his descent—the intrepid Elijah of Scotland, whose name the whole Christian world will treasure while the world stands—John Knox. If pride in illustrious descent is ever justifiable, it was so in this case.

Mr. Witherspoon was a planter in the neighboring "canebreaks" of Marengo County. He was a man of ardent piety, deeply read in theological lore, and very fond of theological inquiry. It was in that godly home that the future Moderator was born, on January 17th, 1836. Dr. Witherspoon is now, therefore, in the forty-ninth year of his age. The good elder was an ardent admirer of Timothy Dwight, and Dwight's "Theology" was his favorite text-book. In honor of his favorite author he gave his boy the name of Thomas Dwight.

A CHRISTIAN MOTHER.

Four years afterward the godly father fell asleep in Jesus. The boy's training devolved on his mother, happily a devoted Christian woman, of rare intelligence, sagacity and consecration. Her impress, more than that of any other human being, has been upon his whole after life. It pleased God to spare her life until a few years ago, so that she was permitted to reap the fruit of her early and assiduous care in his mental and religious training.

EARLY CONVERSION.

Under the fostering care of such a mother, his religious experiences were very early developed, and in 1846, at the age of ten years, the boy made confession of Christ during the progress of a meeting conducted by the Rev. Robert Nall, D.D., the evangelist of the Synod of Alabama, and was admitted to the communion of the Mt. Zion Presbyterian Church, near Greensboro.

In 1853, at the age of seventeen, he entered of Alabama as a student in the Sophomore Class; but in the year following changed to the University of Mississippi, from which institution he was graduated in June, 1856, with the highest honors of his class. In the fall of the same year (1856) he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., completing the course and receiving his theological diploma in May, 1859.

On the 6th of June, 1859, he was licensed as a probationer for the Gospel ministry by the Presbytery of Chickasaw, of the Synod of Memphis, and on the 13th day of May, 1860,

HE WAS ORDAINED

by the same Presbytery to the full work of the ministry, and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Oxford, Miss., the site of the university from which he had recently graduated. It was in this, his first church, that a characteristic of Dr. Witherspoon's ministry was first noticed, which has been observed ever since, wherever he has preached. His teaching has always been especially attractive to young men. There was a warm sympathy in his manner, and a simple, direct, manly force in his words which went straight to the hearts of the young, and he succeeded, by rare tact, in winning their attention to the things which make for their peace. God abundantly blessed him, notably in this sphere of labor, which is, more than any other, a source of strength to the Church.

But this useful work was rudely interrupted.

THE OUTBREAK OF THE WAR

occurred early in Dr. Witherspoon's settlement at Oxford. It was not likely that a congregation such as that he had gathered around him would be indifferent to the issues which were agitating the country from end to end. The young men who looked up to their pastor for spiritual guidance were deeply moved by the events of that sad time. They were true to their principles, and thoroughly in earnest in their convictions of the justice of their cause. When, leaving their homes and their families to take up arms in that bitter struggle, they marched to the field of battle, Dr. Witherspoon marched with them, claiming no exemption as a privilege of his profession, but ready to fight and die with his friends as their comrade. He enlisted as a private in the Lamar Rifles of the Eleventh Mississippi Volunteers, and served in that capacity through the first year of the war. Later, his services were needed so sorely in the capacity in which they were most effective, but they were never remitted. He acted as chaplain to the regiment, sharing in its hardships, fatigues and dangers, and remained steadfast in that service until, at Appomattox Court House, he received his parole in the final surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia.

ANOTHER ORDEAL.

Dr. Witherspoon's courage had been tested on the battle-fields of that long and heart-breaking struggle, and it was to be still further tested by another ordeal, in which even the bravest soldiers have often succumbed. He accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, of Memphis, Tenn., where he settled in August, 1865. The war and the miserable time which followed it had reduced the church to a very pirited and enfeebled condition. Under a nistry of five years, through epidemics of lera and yellow fever, the church grew with h rapidity that it became and continues to be strongest and most influential of that de- mination in the city.

His health giving way under the influence of essive labor in a malarial climate, he was ced to resign his pastorate amid the tears of people, in August, 1870, and to seek recuper- on in the mountains of Virginia, spending e year very pleasantly as supply of the moun- n church of Christiansburg, Va. In 1871 he s called for a two years' term to the chap- ncy of the University of Virginia, where two the happiest and most useful years of his life re spent.

EUROPEAN TRAVEL.

During the summer of 1873 a further relief m labor became indispensable. He therefore ssed the Atlantic, and travelled extensively Europe. After a few months of change he nd his health so far restored as to be able on return to resume regular work; and so, in tober, 1873, he became pastor of the Tabb reet Presbyterian Church, in Petersburg, Va., e of the largest and most influential churches the State. Here he remained greatly en- ared to the people until the fall of 1882, en, having received a unanimous call to the st Presbyterian Church of Louisville, Ky., he t it his duty to sever the delightful relations at had existed for nine years, and enter the ger and more vigorous city of the West.

Here he is now serving this important church, d with the superabundant energy which char- erizes him and the strong appetite for labor at seems to be a part of his being, he accept- the office of Chairman of the Synod's Com- ttee of Evangelistic Labor, having oversight of at extensive work, in which more than twenty ngelists are employed, and as the result of ich over fifteen hundred communicants were ded last year to the roll of the Synod.

Few men of Dr. Witherspoon's age have ared more of ere are few of the prominent pulpits of the uthern Church to which he has not at one de or another, when vacant, been asked to vote his pastoral services. He has been time d again solicited to take the presidency of lleges and universities. Various chairs in eological seminaries have been tendered him. t he has felt that his one mission in life was to each, the Gospel and nothing has ever turned m aside from this work.

HIS PREACHING,

we have said, is simple, earnest and direct. is in the only true sense of the word extempo- neous. Though he prepares, with most care- mental elaboration, he never writes before eaking, and therefore, of course, never has y notes with him in the pulpit. His sermons, tures, literary addresses, etc., are all prepared thout putting pen to paper, the thoughts be- all carefully elaborated, but the language left the inspiration of the moment.

The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him 1867, at the age of thirty-one, by the Univer- y of Mississippi, and the degree of LL.D., by e same institution, at the age of forty-eight— ly a few months ago.

Dr. Witherspoon is of delicate stature, but pable of undergoing an incredible amount of rk, and his ministry thus far has been sig- lly blessed in the addition of souls to the urch.

Among the publications from his pen may be ted the following: "The Appeal of the South its Educated Men" (1866); "Children of the venant" (1873); "Materialism in its Relations Modern Civilization" (1878), and "Letters on manism" (1882). The second of these has ssed through several editions, and has elicited e highest praise as a book of encouragement r parents and instruction for the young.

As an illustration of the position Dr. Wither- oon holds in the esteem of his Northern brethren, we may say that in the course of an interview with recently, he said, referring to the subject of our sketch: "I am glad that you are going to give a biographical sketch and portrait of Dr. Witherspoon in your paper. He is one of the grandest and best men in the South. He wields a large influence, and it is always on the right side. I rejoiced with many when I saw that the Presbyterian Church honored itself by selecting him as Moderator of General Assembly."

SCEPTICAL NEIGHBORS.

A STORY IN TWO PARTS.

By the Rev. Charles Courtenay.

PART I.

It was commonly said of Tom Shooter that when he wasn't in the gutter he was very near it. And it wasn't very far from the truth, for of all tipplers Tom was the acknowledged king.

A most unpromising customer. Teetotalers found him the very hardest nut they had ever attempted to crack. Every kind of teetotaler tried him, from every society in the neighborhood, but without the slightest success. I dare say more arguments and appeals had been emptied on Tom's devoted head than on any man's living.

No wonder that after a time they gave him up as a bad job. Tom wouldn't even listen with patience. As soon as ever the assault commenced, he would snort, and angrily shout, "I won't," immediately posting off to the nearest grocery, as though the very sound of the word "teetotalism" had only whetted his thirst for more drink.

Imagine, then, the thrill of amazement when one day it was reported that Tom Shooter had signed the pledge. At first, folks would not believe it; but when they saw the pledge paper, with Tom Shooter's only half legible signature upon it, they were obliged to believe it. It was one of the most staggering wonders of the season. It was far more than a nine days' wonder. It was at least a nineteen days' wonder. People seemed never tired of discussing it.

But how did it come about? Who was the man so fortunate as to extract from him his so stubbornly withheld signature? What was the particular argument which in the midst of such a multitude of misses hit the mark? People were greatly curious to know.

But the answer returned only whetted their curiosity the more, for it seems that no particular person and no particular argument had anything to do with Tom Shooter's reformation. All that was known was that Tom had suddenly appeared before the secretary's door, had demanded in a most determined manner a pledge paper, and had then and there sat himself down and signed it. Having done which he had taken up his hat which he had thrown on the ground, and refusing to enter into any conversation with the inquisitive secretary, had bolted as precipitately as he had entered.

As for the secretary, he publicly confessed afterward that all he could do was to go down on his knees, and thank God again and again that so bad a drunkard had embraced teetotalism.

Like every other place, Linfield had its race of sceptics, wiseacres who always knew that a reformation would not hold, and Tom Shooter's reformation made a capital text for their prophecies. Some of these Linfield prophets very rarely expressed themselves in words. That would be committing themselves too much, so they dealt largely in expressive signs, such as nodding the head, compressing the lips, and sundry others of a similar character.

It was this class of prophets who shook their heads violently when they heard of Tom's change, and this, combined with the forming of their right hand into a cup-like shape, and at the same time elevating it to their mouth, sufficiently showed that it was their firm conviction that Tom Shooter's teetotal craze would be a remarkably short one.

The less mysterious of the prophets uttered their predictions in a very loud tone, and with abundant emphasis. "Tom Shooter signed the pledge, did you say? Depend upon it he'll never keep it. He'll not keep it for a week. Take my word for it, he'll be drunk before long, dead drunk. If Tom Shooter stands, I'll eat my hat—there.'

Others, however, contented themselves with less decisive prophecies, darkly hinting that folks would probably have their eyes opened before long, that human nature was weak, and that Tom Shooter was only a man, after all. For their part, they said, they hoped they might not see what they half expected, though they would be only too glad if they should be in the wrong, and other expressions of a like kind.

Now, these prophets, I need not say, were not teetotalers, and I cannot help suspecting that they would not be over sorry should they hear that their prophecies did prove true. No prophet likes to be in the wrong. It isn't in human nature to like it. And apart from this general principle, I thought I could detect in the tones of voice and the expressions of countenance a sort of evidence that "the wish was father to the thought."

THE SHADOW ON THE BLIND.

It was a market night. Many people were about. It was the busiest night in all the week. Being dark, but still early, there were of course lights in most windows. And Tom Shooter's lower windows were no exception. Suddenly, rising high above the noise of the traffic, the shrill cry of a woman was heard. Accompanied as it was by a sound of heavy blows, it would have been surprising if folks had not been startled. And when, almost at the same moment, a terrible shadow was projected on Tom Shooter's blinds, the consternation may be better imagined than described.

The shadow told its own story. Indeed, it seemed to most that there could be only one version of it. It was the shadow of a man's hand grasping a thick stick, his arm upraised to strike. Besides this there was visible the form of a woman as though in headlong flight.

Again and again the stick fell, and again and again the shrill scream rent the now silent air. Now the shadow of the man was seen. Now that of the woman. And sometimes the shadows of both were visible on the blind. Terrible was the excitement in the street without. The crowd grew larger and larger every moment, and, as may be imagined, before very long their feelings found vent in words.

"Oh, the willin!" screamed one woman, "he's beatin' his wife. That's what he's after. The willin!"

"He'll kill her afore he's done with her," was the equally emphatic opinion of a second.

More than one voice was heard to shout, "Run for the perlice. He'll finish her right off if somebody don't run for the perlice."

"Ah! I knew how it would all turn out, I did," said one small man with a port-wine nose. "I knew it all along. Didn't I say Tom Shooter wouldn't never stand? See there, if I didn't say true."

"Yes," said another battered-looking individual, "you're right enough there. He's dead drunk, that's what he is. He ain't got no control over hisself. Old Tom's as mad as ever."

Meanwhile the blows went on; indeed, they seemed to become quicker and more violent than before. But it was thought by most that the screams were decidedly more faint.

"Break open the door," was the most common utterance, a running fire of this piece of advice being kept up from the outside and middle of the crowd.

The man's shadow was now seen to give one tremendous blow with all the force of his two arms, and then to throw himself nearly exhausted into a chair. The shadow of the woman was quite lost to view,

ABOVE ALL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 16, 1884.

"He that cometh from above is above all."—JOHN 3 : 31.

The Most Conspicuous Figure in History—The Alpha and the Omega—What it Means—I. Above all in Preaching—His Illustrations—No Need of Hackneyed Phrases—A Large Vocabulary Needed—Full Liberty for the Preacher—Individuality to be Preserved—The Costly Robe of Demetrius—Luther's Exclamation to Staupitz—What you Need—Christ in Sorrow—II. Above all in Dying Alleviations—Saladin's Ridiculous Command—Two Styles of Departure—The Death Hour of Famous Men—Coronation or Banishment—III. Above all in Heaven—The Ascriptions of the Redeemed—John Bunyan's Glimpse of Heaven.

THE most conspicuous character of history steps out upon the platform. The finger which, diamonded with light, pointed down to Him from the Bethlehem sky, was only a ratification of the finger of prophecy, the finger of genealogy, the finger of chronology, the finger of events—all five fingers pointing in one direction. Christ is of all time. He is the vox humana in all music, the gracefullest line in all sculpture, the most exquisite mingling of lights and shades in all painting, the acme of all climaxes, the dome of all cathedralled grandeur, and the peroration of all splendid language.

The Greek alphabet is made up of twenty-four letters, and when Christ compared Himself to the first letter and the last letter, the alpha and the omega, He appropriated to Himself all the splendors that you can spell out either with those two letters and all the letters between them. "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." Or, if you prefer the words of the text, "above all."

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

It means, after you have piled up all Alpine and Himalayan altitudes, the glory of Christ would have to spread its wings and descend a thousand leagues to touch those summits. Pelion, a high mountain of Thessaly, Ossa, a high mountain, and Olympus, a high mountain; but mythology tells us when the giants warred against the gods they piled up these three mountains, and from the top of them proposed to scale the heavens; but the height was not great enough, and there was a complete failure. And after all the giants—Isaiah and Paul, prophetic and apostolic giants; Raphael and Michael Angelo, artistic giants; cherubim and seraphim and archangel, celestial giants—have failed to climb to the top of Christ's glory, they might all well unite in the words of the text and say, "He that cometh from above is above all."

I. First, Christ must be above all else

IN OUR PREACHING.

There are so many books on homiletics scattered through the country that all laymen, as well as all clergymen, have made up their minds what sermons ought to be. That sermon is most effectual which most pointedly puts forth Christ as the pardon of all sin and the correction of all evil, individual, social, political, national. There is no reason why we should ring the endless changes on a few phrases. There are those who think that if an exhortation or a discourse have frequent mention of justification, sanctification, covenant of works and covenant of grace, that therefore it must be profoundly evangelical, while they are suspicious of a discourse which presents the same truth, but under different phraseology. Now, I say there is nothing in all the opulent realm of Anglo-Saxonism or all the

that we inherited from the Latin and the Greek and the Indo-European but we have a right to marshall it in religious discussion. Christ sets the example. His illustrations were from the grass, the flowers, the spittle, the salve, the barnyard fowl, the crystals of salt, as well as from the seas and the stars; and we do not propose in our Sabbath-school teaching and in our pulpit address to be put on the limits.

I know that there is a great deal said in our day against words, as though they were nothing. They may be misused, but they have an imperial power. They are the bridge between soul and soul, between Almighty God and the human race. What did God write upon the tables of stones? Words. What did Christ utter on Mount Olivet? Words. Out of what did Christ strike the spark for the illumination of the universe? Out of words. "Let there be light," and light was. Of course, thought is the cargo and words are only the ship; but how fast would your cargo get on without the ship? What you need, my friends, in all your work, in your Sabbath-school class, in your reformatory institutions, and what we all need is to enlarge our vocabulary when we come to speak about God and Christ and heaven. We ride a few old words to death when there is such illimitable resource. Shakespeare employed fifteen thousand different words for dramatic purposes; Milton employed eight thousand different words for poetic purposes; Rufus Choate employed over eleven thousand different words for legal purposes; but the most of us have less than a thousand words that we can manage, less than five hundred, and that makes us so stupid.

When we come to set forth the love of Christ we are going to take wherever we find it, and if it has never been used in that direction before, all the more shall we use it. When we come to speak of the glory of Christ, the Conqueror, we are going to draw our similes from triumphal arch and oratorio and everything grand and stupendous. The French navy have eighteen flags by which they give signal; but those eighteen flags they can put into sixty-six thousand different combinations. And I have to tell you that these standards of the cross may be lifted into combinations infinite and varieties everlasting. And let me say to these young men who come from the theological seminaries into our services every Sabbath, and are after a while going to preach Jesus Christ, you will have the largest liberty and unlimited resource. You only have to present Christ

IN YOUR OWN WAY.

Jonathan Edwards preached Christ in the severest argument ever penned, and John Bunyan preached Christ in the sublimest allegory ever composed. Edward Payson, sick and exhausted, leaned up against the side of the pulpit and wept out his discourse, while George Whitefield, with the manner and the voice and the start of an actor, overwhelmed his auditory. It would have been a different thing if Jonathan Edwards had tried to write and dream about the prlgrim's progress to the celestial city, or John Bunyan had attempted an essay on the human will.

Brighter than the light, fresher than the fountains, deeper than the seas are all these Gospel themes. Song has no melody, flowers have no sweetness, sunset sky has no color compared with these glorious themes. These harvests of grace spring up quicker than we can sickle them. Kindling pulpits with their fire, and producing revolutions with their power, lighting up dying beds with their glory, they are the sweetest thought for the poet, and they are the most thrilling illustration for the orator, and they offer the most intense scene for the artist, and they are to the ambassador of the sky all enthusiasm. Complete pardon for direst guilt. Sweetest comfort for ghastliest agony. Brightest hope for grimest death. Grandest resurrection for darkest sepulchre.

OH, WHAT A GOSPEL

to preach! Christ over all in it. His birth, His suffering, His miracles, His parables, His sweat, His tears, His blood, His atonement, His intercession—what glorious themes! Do we exercise faith? Christ is its object. Do we have love? It fastens on Jesus. Have we a fondness for the church? It is because Christ died for it. Have we a hope of heaven? It because Jesus went ahead, the herald and forerunner.

The royal robe of Demetrius was so cost so beautiful, that after he had put it off no ever dared put it on; but this robe of Chri richer than that, the poorest and the wan and the worst may wear. "Where sin abound grace may much more abound."

"Oh, my sins, my sins," said Martin Lutl to Staupitz, "my sins, my sins!" The fact that the brawny German student had found Latin Bible that made him quake, and nothi else ever did make him quake; and when found how, through Christ, he was pardoned a saved, he wrote to a friend, saying: "Co over and join us great and awful sinners sav by the grace of God. You seem to be onl slender sinner, and you don't much extol mercy of God; but we that have been such v awful sinners praise His grace the more n that we have been redeemed." Can it be t you are so desperately egotistical that you f yourself in first-rate spiritual trim, and that fr the root of the hair to the tip of the toe y are scarless and immaculate?

WHAT YOU NEED

is a looking-glass, and here it is in the Bit Poor, and wretched, and miserable, and bli and naked from the crown of the head to sole of the foot, full of wounds and putrefy sores. No health in us. And then take fact that Christ gathered up all the notes agai us and paid them, and then offered us the ceipt.

And how much we need Him in our sorrov We are independent of circumstances if we h His grace. Why, He made Paul sing in dungeon, and under that grace St. John fr desolate Patmos heard the blast of the apo lyptic trumpets. IN DYING ALLEVIATIONS.

I have not any sympathy with the morbic abroad about our demise. The Emperor Constantinople arranged that on the day of coronation the stonemason should come consult him about the tombstone that afte while he would need. And there are men are monomaniacal on the subject of depat from this life by death, and the more they th of it the less they are prepared to go. Thi an unmanliness not worthy of you, not wor of me.

Saladin, the greatest conqueror of his d while dying, ordered that the tunic he had him be carried after his death on a spear at head of his army, and that then the soldier, e and anon, should stop and say, "Behold, all t is left of Saladin, the emperor and conquer Of all the states he conquered, of all the wea he accumulated, nothing did he retain but t shroud." I have no sympathy with such havior, or such absurd demonstration, or w much that we hear uttered in regard to dep ure from this life to the next. There is a c mon-sensical idea on this subject that you I need to consider—that there are only

TWO STYLES OF DEPARTURE.

A thousand feet underground, by light torch toiling in a miner's shaft, a ledge of r may fall upon us, and we may die a min death. Far out at sea, falling from the slipp ratlines and broken on the halyards, we may a sailor's death. On mission of mercy in l pital, amid broken bones and reeking lepro and raging fevers, we may die a philanthropi death. On the field of battle, serving God our country, slugs through the heart, the carriage may roll over us, and we may di patriot's death. But, after all, there are t two styles of departure; the death of ghteous and the death of the wicked, and we want to die the former.

God grant that when that hour comes you ay be at home! You want the hand of your ndred in your hand. You want your children surround you. You want the light on your llow from eyes that have long reflected your ve. You want the room still. You do not int any curious strangers standing around itching you. You want your kindred from ir to hear your last prayer. I think that is e wish of all of us. But is that all? Can rthly friends hold us up when the billows of ath come up to the girdle? Can human ice charm open heaven's gate? Can human nd pilot us through the narrows of death o heaven's harbor? Can any earthly friendip shield us from the arrows of deaths and in e hour when Satan shall practise upon us his fernal archery? No, no, no, no!

ALAS! POOR SOUL

that is all. Better die in the wilderness, far m tree shadow and from fountain, alone, ltures circling through the air waiting for our dy, unknown to men, and to have no burial, nly Christ could say through the solitudes, I will never leave thee, I will never forsake ee." From that pillow of stone a ladder uld soar heavenward, angels coming and ing; and across the solitude and the barrenss would come the sweet notes of heavenly nstrelsy.

FAMOUS DEATH-BEDS.

Gordon Hall, far from home, dying in the or of a heathen temple, said: "Glory to ee, O God!" What did dying Wilberforce y to his wife? "Come and sit beside me, d let us talk of heaven. I never knew what ppiness was until I found Christ." What d dying Hannah More say? "To go to aven, think what that is! To go to Christ, o died that I might live! Oh, glorious grave! , what a glorious thing it is to die! Oh, the e of Christ, the love of Christ!" What did r. Toplady, the great hymn-maker, say in his t hour? "Who can measure the depth of the rd heaven? Oh, the sunshine that fills my ul! I shall soon be gone, for surely no one n live in this world after such glories as God s manifested to my soul."

What did the dying Janeway say? "I can easily die as close my eyes, or turn my head sleep. Before a few hours have passed I all stand on Mount Zion with the one hundred d forty and four thousand and with the just en made perfect, and we shall ascribe riches, d honor, and glory, and majesty, and domin- unto God and the Lamb." Dr. Taylor, conmned to burn at the stake, on his way thither oke away from the guardsmen and went unding and leaping and jumping toward the e, glad to go to Jesus and to die for Him. r Charles Hare, in last moment, had such oturous vision that he cried: "Upward, up- rd, upward!" And so great was the peace one of Christ's disciples that he put his gers upon the pulse in his wrist and counted and observed it; and so great was his placidity at after a while he said: "Stopped," and his e had ended here to begin in heaven. But nder than that was the testimony of the worn- t first missionary, when, cried: "I am now ready to be offered, and e time of my departure is at hand; I have ght the good fight, I have finished my urse, I have kept the faith; henceforth there aid up for me a crown of righteousness, which e Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me in at day, and not to me only, but to all them at love His appearing!" Do you not see that rist is above all in dying alleviations?

Toward the last hour of our earthly residence are speeding. When I see the sunset I say,

"ONE DAY LESS TO LIVE."

hen I see the spring blossoms scattered, I say, Another season gone forever." When I close is Bible on Sabbath night, I say, "Another bbath departed." When I bury a friend, I say, "Another earthly attraction gone forever." What nimble feet the years have! The roebucks and the lightnings run not so fast. From decade to decade, from sky to sky, they go at a bound. There is a place for us, whether marked or not, where you and I will sleep the last sleep, and the men are now living who will, with solemn tread, carry us to our resting-place. Ay, it is known in heaven whether our departure will be

A CORONATION OR A BANISHMENT.

Brighter than a banqueting hall through which the light feet of the dancers go up and down to the sound of trumpeters will be the sepulchre through whose rifts the holy light of heaven streameth. God will watch you. He will send His angels to guard your slumbering ground, until, at Christ s behest, they shall roll away the stone.

III. So also, Christ is ABOVE ALL IN HEAVEN.

The Bible distinctly says that Christ is the chief theme of the celestial ascription, all the thrones facing His throne, all the palms waved before His face, all the crowns down at His feet. Cherubim to cherubim, seraphim to seraphim, redeemed spirit to redeemed spirit shall recite the Saviour's earthly sacrifice.

Stand on some high hill of heaven, and in all the radiant sweep the most glorious object will be Jesus. Myriads gazing on the scars of His suffering. in silence first, afterward breaking forth into acclamation. The martyrs, all the purer for the flame through which they passed, will say: "This is Jesus for whom we died." The apostles, all the happier for the shipwreck and the scourging through which they went, will say: "This is the Jesus whom we preached at Corinth, and at Cappadocia, and at Antioch, and at Jerusalem." Little children clad in white will say, who took us in His arms and blessed us, and when the storms of the world were too cold and loud, brought us into this beautiful place." The multitudes of the bereft will say: "This is the Jesus who comforted us when our heart broke." Many who wandered clear off from God and plunged into vagabondism, but were saved by grace, will say: "This is the Je-us who pardoned us. We were lost on the mountains, and He brought us home. We were guilty, and He has made us white as snow. Mercy boundless, grace unparalleled. And then, after each one has recited his peculiar deliverances and peculiar mercies, recited them as by solo, all the voices will come together into a great chorus, which shall make the arches echo and re-echo with the eternal reverberation of gladness and peace and triumph.

"THIS IS THE JESUS

Edward I. was so anxious to go to the Holy Land that when he was about to expire he bequeathed $160,000 to have his heart, after his decease, taken to the Holy Land in Asia Minor, and his request was complied with. But there are hundreds to-day whose hearts are already in the Holy Land of heaven. Where your treasures are, there are your hearts also. Quaint John Bunyan, of whom I spoke at the opening of the discourse, caught and in his quaint way he said: "And I heard in my dream, and lo! the bells of the city rang again for joy; and as they opened the gates to let in the men I looked in after them, and lo! the city shone like the sun, and there were streets of gold, and men walked on them harps in their hands, to sing praises with all; and after that they shut up the gates, which when I had seen I wished myself among them!"

AN INCIDENT OF THE McALL MISSION IN PARIS.

ONE evening I went to the meeting in the Rue de Rivoli, and found a large "queue" formed at the door waiting to go in, so I walked round the houses, and was accosted by three persons also waiting the opening of the doors. "Oh, c'est Monsieur," said one, "we have been looking for you, and had I known your address we should have come to see you." There was something so warm, so cordial in my reception, that it caused me to say, "I have not the pleasure of remembering you." "Oh," she said, "it was last Wednesday I resolved to be of your religion; since then I have been so happy, and I wanted to speak to you about it."

Let us give her own story as illustrating God's work. They had come from Monte Video, South America, to form in Paris a financial enterprise for that town, hoping to return before the winter. One evening they were walking about in the Square St. Jaques, when they made the acquaintance of who pressed them to come to the meeting. The husband yielded, saying, "It will pass an hour, let us go." They found it pleasant from its novelty; but the following evening the story of Christ's dying on the Cross was told; the hymns were all about His Cross. "I had never heard Jesus spoken about in this wise," she said; "my heart was touched, and I cried. So I got a Bible, and began to pray from my heart. Then on Wednesday I was thinking, Ought I to leave my religion? When I went to the meeting, and the address was on the text, 'How long halt ye between two opinions,' as the speaker proceeded, I could hesitate no longer. I resolved to serve God, and to trust alone in the sacrifice of Jesus and His mediation, and

THEN I WAS FILLED WITH JOY."

She began to weep. Her outward tears were a witness of her inward joy. She added: "We are on the eve of returning to America." We knelt down in their lodging to praise God that He had revealed in her His Son Jesus, and to pray that her husband might be made partaker of the same faith. Her progress has been rapid; and a few weeks afterward she expressed a wish to go to the Lord's table. I was surprised to find her views so clear, so spiritual—surely she was taught of the Spirit—and her German friend had helped her in the study of the Bible. On the first Sabbath in October she was received as a member of the Lutheran Church, Rue des Billettes. She soon became anxious for

THE SALVATION OF HER HUSBAND

—she wanted him to share her faith, to be a partaker of her joy; and God has given to her the desire of her heart. One Sunday she spoke at our fraternal meeting, giving public testimony to the great change wrought within her, and praising God for what He had done. At the close of the meeting she requested that prayer should be offered for herself and husband at the special service at the Oratoire at night.

At the close of the service she came to me with a face radiant, as I had seldom seen, with inward joy. Her husband was with her. "My husband is decided, he is convinced, he has given himself to the Saviour; is it not so, my friend?" To this appeal he answered, with quivering lips and moistened eyes, "Oh, yes! thank God!"

They still linger in Paris, tried, but filled with joy. "Our financial loss has been great," she said, "but no material loss can be compared with our spiritual gain; no sacrifice too great, in view of what we have found in Paris." So they will return to South America poorer in pocket, but rich in heart, for they have found what is more precious than rubies.

Christian Work in Spain is Making Encouraging progress. A new opening has presented itself in Pentevedra, through the efforts of a Christian couple who have gone there to labor on their own account. Gospels and tracts have been freely distributed, and some cottage meetings held, much desire being shown by the people to know the truth. A remarkable movement is taking place also among the children of the schools in Seville. They have formed themselves into a Children's Missionary Society, for the purpose of attracting to Christ the uncared-for children of the city.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wild Bird on the Wing.—Mr. McKeith said, at a recent meeting: "The other day, when I was at the sea-side, I stood watching a wild sea-bird. It was far above the din and turmoil of this world; it was rapidly skimming through the clear air, resting on the wing. As I looked at it, I thought that bird is resting, yet working. What a picture is presented of what every child of God should be—resting on Him, yet working for Him, and keeping themselves above and unspotted from the world!"

A King's Enthusiasm for Africa.—Mr. Grattan Guinness says: "A wealthy European monarch has been fired with enthusiasm for Africa. When I visited King Leopold I asked him, 'What makes you so earnest about Africa?' I was touched with his reply. He said, 'You know God took away from me my son, my only son, and then He laid Africa upon my heart. I am not spending the revenue of Belgium on it, but my own private resources, and I have made arrangements that when I die this civilizing and evangelizing work in Africa shall still go on.' At the present time the king is expending $400,000 a year in Africa out of his private purse. Having lost his natural heir he has made Africa his heir."

Converted during a Holiday.—A Devoted worker in the Lord's service remarked: "A young Christian friend of mine and an unconverted companion went for a holiday to Campbelltown, in Scotland. As they were walking one Sunday they came to a turn in the road where there were many large projecting rocks. My friend's companion made the remark, 'Don't these rocks look awfully solemn?' By way of answer my friend began to sing, 'Rock of ages, cleft for me, let me hide myself in Thee,' etc. These few lines made mighty by the Holy Spirit were the means of that young man's conversion to Christ. My young friend had been praying for him for a long time, but he told me he little thought that God would answer his prayer in so marvellous and unexpected a way. 'Sow beside all waters.' No effort for God can be lost."

Quite Free from Trouble.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related: "A young girl was lately lying on her death-bed. She had been there for months, suffering great pain in every part of her body. Her minister came one day to see her, and said, 'Mary, I am very sorry to hear that you are suffering so much; what can I do to help you in your great trouble?' She looked smilingly up into his face and sweetly replied, 'I have no trouble, sir.' 'You have no trouble!' rejoined the minister. 'How is that? Your mother told me you were suffering in every part of your body—in your feet and hands, and that sometimes you had dreadful headaches.' 'So I have,' was the quiet reply, 'but I gave all my trouble to Jesus; He has it all, and I have none. Jesus says, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." So I came to Him, and He has taken all my trouble and has given me perfect rest.' That dear young Christian girl has now entered upon the endless rest of heaven."

Brighter for the Furnace Heat.—"Some years ago Dr. Somerville asked me to accompany him on a visit to some poor families. About five o'clock in the evening we were very weary with our day's work, and I said: 'I think we will go home now.' 'No,' he replied, 'we will visit another family, where the peace of God reigns, before going home.' As we entered that quiet, peaceful-looking house I noticed a very delicate-looking young man of about seventeen years of age sitting at the side of the fireplace. His mother and he were the only inmates of that dwelling. The woman told us that in the space of fourteen months her husband and nine of her family had all been taken from her. She said: 'The dead body of my husband was brought home; then one after another of the dear children died, and I am just left with one;' and then she added, 'There is Johnny; he is the last of them, and he will very soon be taken from me, too.' Then looking up toward heaven, with an indescribably peaceful look on her face, she said, 'Not my will, but thine be done, O Lord.' God had truly put that woman through His own refining fire, and had brought her out bright and shining."

Destination of a Tin of Coffee.—Mr. Clyde recently related the following incident of the late Rev. James Scott, of Glasgow: "One night one of the members of the Christian Association called to see Mr. Scott. On entering the apartment where he was, he found him sitting in front of the fire with a very large tin of coffee before him. After talking on different subjects for awhile, the gentleman asked, 'What are you going to do with all that coffee?' 'If you will come with me, I will let you see,' was the reply. The gentleman, with some curiosity, followed Mr. Scott out of the house. He led the way to a brick-kiln, where a group of wretched men and boys were gathered, who seemed to know Mr. Scott very well, and were evidently expecting him. It came out that it had been habitual with Mr. Scott for a long time to make coffee, and with his own hands carry it to these destitute men; and while they were drinking it he had an opportunity of speaking to them of their souls' welfare, and in this way that faithful servant of God led many of the men to Christ."

Mr. George Muller, of Bristol, Relates the following: "A boy, when he entered his first place of employment, made an engagement with his employer that he was to be in his place at nine o'clock in the morning. For a while the boy was always to be found at his post at the appointed hour, but he began to notice that his employer did not come in until a quarter to ten, and he thought it would not matter if he did not come in until ten minutes past nine, for his employer would never know. He got on very well for a time, but at length he began to grow very miserable. He had a feeling that he was cheating his employer, consequently he was unhappy; he felt he had lost his faithfulness, and made up his mind to go in at the hour appointed, and when he did so his peace and joy returned, because he was conscious that he was doing right. It is the same with Christians in their daily life. As long as they are obeying God's commandments they are happy, but whenever they break one of them they become miserable. Want of faithfulness in the most trivial things often breaks our peace, and stops communion with God."

All Alone with a Lot of Serpents.—Mr. Walter Severn, while on a visit to a friend, received a fright. "While looking at some small pictures hanging on the wall I noticed a red blanket protruding from a hole in the wainscoting near the mantel-piece. In reply to my inquiry as to what this meant, my host said, 'Oh, that is where we keep our snakes; are you afraid of snakes?' Before I could stammer out a reply, and while I was trying to steady my nerves, he thrust in his arm, and pulled out with the blanket a lot of serpents, which tumbled on to the ground and the table. Another dive brought out the rest of the blanket, and with it two large snakes, which he informed me were special favorites—a python and a boa constrictor. These at once coiled themselves all round my host's body, in and out of his arms, and about his neck. I tried to retreat, but he assured me, in winning accents and soft words, that the 'dear things' were quite tame. Suddenly my eccentric host called out that we must really fetch down his wife, and shovelling off the two monsters on to the floor he darted from the room, closing the door behind him. I leave you to imagine my feelings! I experienced a creepy sensation in my hair, and strange feelings of fascination, faintness, and fear stole over me as I stood rooted to the floor, afraid even to look round at my possible window escape. The two huge monsters crawled stealthily up the sofa, and kept stretching out their necks to gaze at me, their forked tongues jerking in and out, and their eyes staring with what seemed to me a devilish inquisitiveness. It natural that a man alone and unarmed with s pents should experience fear; but how ma there are who revel fearlessly in the midst sins, the dire brood and offspring of 'that gr serpent, the devil.'"

PROPHETIC SIGNS OF THE LAST DAYS.

Notes of a Conference on Unfulfilled Prophe Last Month at Clifton, England.

THE Rev. Talbot Greaves, in introducing t topic for the day—The Prophetic Signs of Last Days—said: "One great difficulty me us on the very threshold of this most interesti subject—the actual period of time intended the terms, 'the last days,' 'the latter day,' end of the days,' or the more simple and sole 'the end.' The Scriptures abound in pred tions of the signs of this period, and it is o by a careful examination of the context that can fix the exact period intended." The speal then proceeded to examine certain passag with the object of seeing whether they had b fulfilled or are still to be fulfilled. Among th passages were Genesis 49; Job 19 : 25; Isa 2 : 2–4; Daniel 8 : 17–26; 11 : 6–35; Ho 3 : 3–15. Turning to the New Testament, referred to Matt. 24 : 3, 6, 13, 14; 28 : " I am with you even to the end of the world Acts 2 : 17; Heb. 1 : 2; 1 John 2 : 18; 1 Pe 1 : 5.

In proceeding, he said: "We are prepared expect that the predictions should be more less descriptive of the whole period, so t there has never been a century since Christ ca when students of prophecy have not seen predicted signs of the close of the dispensat gathering round. For centuries there h been early developments of most of those f ures which we now regard as signs of the proaching end of the age, such as Romani Infidelity, and Lawlessness." The number PREDICTIONS UNFULFILLED is becoming very small indeed, and to speaker this seeming exhaustion alike of pro ecy and the resources of the future procla most conclusively the nearness of the end. world of science seems almost to have reac its limit of discovery. How much further ca penetrate beyond electricity, beyond magn ism, and beyond chemical affinity, the telepho the telegraph, photography, and the wonder light? Does it not seem that the human m must soon reach its boundary line, "and t shall the end come?"

There are predictions which are now be fulfilled for the first time; such, for instance those which foretell the decay of the temp power of the Papacy and of Mohammedani the rapid diffusion of knowledge, the methods of which seem given in Daniel 12 the extension of missions, the startling vividn with which Peter's prophecy classifies the pe iar FEATURES OF MODERN SCEPTICISM, giving as its very argument the words, "W is the sign?" drawn from the stability of nat the widespread defection from the truth am religious professors, and teaching so subtle the Lord declares that if it were possibl should deceive the very elect. Such teachin going on all around us, not in this commun and in that, but in every section of the vis Church. While there is much ground for gratulation in the character of the times in wh we live, with many changes which are for better and not for the worse—while there i unwise propensity to magnify the evils of present and the benefits of the past, a deepe sight beneath the gilded surface discloses ments of action and mischief which may create grave misgivings. The SHADOWS OF COMING PERIL are portentous and imminent. Eighteen ce ries have passed since, looking forward from days to the last days of the Church, Paul the expressive warning that the times thro which they had to pass would be stormy full of danger to their faith, stability, and comfort. "Know this," said the apostle, and we must know. It is not enough to be assured of safety in Christ. We must know our position, duty, difficulties and prospects as to the Church and the world, the dangers against which we are called to watch, the conflicts which lie before us, and, like the tribe of Issachar, we must understand the times and know what Israel ought to do.

JEWS IN JERUSALEM.

The Rev. A. Hastings Kelk, Incumbent of Christ Church, Jerusalem, said he had often heard of these Prophetic Conferences, but had never been able to attend one until that day. In the course of his address he referred to the number of Jews who are in Jerusalem at the present time, as being far greater than formerly. He said Bible-readers could not doubt that it was the intention of God to bring back His people to dwell in their own land, to erect their temple, and to carry on their temple services. That restoration, the speaker continued, will for a time be anything but a blessing to the world; but it is one of those things which God has said He will certainly perform. But in asking the question, "Watchman, what of the night?" this certainly should not be left out. It was only about three years ago that accounts reached England of

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE JEWS

in Russia, and from that time till now God has been making the way for the fulfilment of His Word, and has sent back into Palestine very large numbers of His ancient people. There was in Palestine now almost exactly the same number as under the restoration of Ezra and Nehemiah. Some few years ago there were not half so many. This was just an indication of the way in which God is working. At the same time he wished it to be clearly understood that he was not himself laying down a rule by which God will work, but simply stating what He is doing. It appeared to him, however, that there was in this an indication that we are LIVING IN THE LAST DAYS.

There are now in Jerusalem a number of people who have introduced strange doctrines which are permeating the ranks of Jews and Christians. These people have taken up with some very strange notions, reminding one of the words "seducing spirits." They say that all will be saved—even the great Adversary himself; they say that Christ has come already and is with them. They have lately gone so far as to cast away the marriage tie; they say there is no reason to receive the Spirit, and some of them seemed to desire to live much as did the Oneida Community in America. He referred to these things because they seemed so aptly to belong to those "last days," of which the inspired apostle had testified. It would be remembered that in the description of this period it was stated that there would be such plausible signs that, it if were possible, even the very elect would be deceived. Meanwhile they were earnestly looking forward to that great Pole Star of the Church, the Coming of the Lord, for He would be the great joy of the believing heart.

The Rev. James Ormiston read Matt. 24; II Pet. 3. He remarked that the "scoffer" of these last days well represented the scoffer of the apostle's time, who said, "All things continue as they were." This is precisely what the Lord says. The world will go on ripening for the judgment, and as a thief breaking into a house, so the Lord will come.

OUR ATTITUDE,

therefore, should be precisely that of Noah in the presence of the forthcoming judgment on the world when it was doomed to destruction by water. As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man; and the world will be found ignorantly walking on to face the coming judgment. The line which Noah pursued is plainly set forth (Heb. 11 : 7). And this is exactly our attitude.

God's Church is called to the very definite and the very thorough walk of faith. Two words are frequently used to-day—grace and judgment; and these two words represent the testimony which God requires of His Church in this awful crisis. I would express my fear that we have not preached the second of these two facts with sufficient force. It is a blessed thing to preach grace; there is a holy luxury in it, but there is that other aspect set before us in divine revelation to which we should not dare to be blind.

THE PERILS OF THE TIMES.

Rev. W. Frith said: "There are three things on which we are all agreed; that we are firm believers in the personal pre-millennial coming of our blessed Redeemer; that that Redeemer is the Bridegroom of the Church, and that the Church is the Bride of the Bridegroom. These three truths, if we will consider them, form a foundation for practical thinking on our attitude. There is a general belief that these are the last days, but what influence is this belief exercising upon Christian professors generally? To-day we are not in danger of the perils to which our forefathers were exposed, and to all the perils which they had to face in earlier times, and in meeting which they were faithful even unto death. But to-day we have

VERY REAL PERIL.

We are in danger of being drawn aside from the direct line of Christian duty, and there is a call upon us to make our charity very elastic. Now you may make that charity as elastic as you please, but remember there is but one line, and there is but one Book. We must have fidelity to God. If we are faithful to Him we shall not be found in many of the societies in which Christian professors are sometimes found—in parties, for example, where it would be sheer mockery to close with prayer after the manner in which the evening has been spent."

A MOTHER'S JOURNEY OVER A MOUNTAIN.

By Mr. W. Y. Fullerton, Mr. Spurgeon's Evangelist.

An elderly woman stood on the threshold of a happy-looking home, bidding good-by to her daughter, who every moment expected her husband to return from his toil. The day had been bleak and cold, and as she had some miles to go to the little cottage where she lived a quiet life at the hillside, she left before the darkness of night grew down. And the darkness came very soon that evening; the clouds shrouded the sky, and everything betokened the fall of a heavy snowstorm.

"I must hasten home for fear of the snow," might well be imagined to have been the words of that mother, as, after a prolonged stay with her married daughter, she bade her "Farewell," and with quick step turned homeward. The snowstorm began, and heaven's downy feathers kissed her cheek as they fell to earth. Thicker and faster the cloud descended, and the breeze became fresher, until, with eyes blinded by the whirl, she was barely able to guess her way along the path, which was now entirely covered with the white mantle. But it was no new thing for her to travel along that mountain-side; home was near, and the spot was well known. Even if she missed the path she would be sure to arrive in safety.

In the morning, after a somewhat restless night, the daughter looked out of the window, and through the still-descending snow saw that during the hours of darkness. The snow was many inches thick, and the drift deeper on exposed places. Surprise at the sudden downfall soon yielded to fear, as she remembered that the storm began before her mother could possibly have been half way home. Not that she doubted for her mother's safety, but a strange misgiving took hold of her, and she would not be satisfied unless her husband promised to go with some others and see whether all was well.

It was not an easy task to go over the hill on such a day; but as the sun rose higher the storm lulled a little, and they started on their journey. Arriving safely at the cottage where the mother lived, they entered, as was their custom, by the back door, which generally remained unfastened. No warm welcome awaited them, nor signs of life to cheer. The fire in the grate was set ready for lighting, and if the mother was at home, surely she would have lighted it on such a day! Perhaps she is up-stairs, hope suggested; but after a strict search, both up and down, their worst fears were proved to be well founded, and they came to the melancholy conclusion that

SHE HAD NEVER REACHED HOME.

What was to be done? A last lingering ray of light lay in the suggestion that perhaps she had taken refuge in a house by the wayside, and was remaining there until the storm should be past. At any rate, a search must be started, and accordingly a party of volunteers was found who sallied forth on their mission of mercy. A call at the farm-house by the way dispelled their last shred of hope. The task of searching became difficult, for the storm now raged with increased violence, but the brave men toiled on. Over the main road they trudged, and then through every lane and by-path into which the poor lost one might have wandered; until, as the early darkness of another evening was drawing thickly down, they once more found themselves at the cottage, dispirited at their want of success, and because of the conviction, which was now a certainty, that

THE WOMAN WAS LOST.

Still they were bewildered, and wondered that after such a careful search they had not found the body.

The snow still whirled and danced in the air, and as they, with cheerless hearts, looked out of the windows, the glee of the laughing, fleecy flakes contrasted strangely with their own sad hearts. They talked of giving up the search in despair, and returning home before nightfall. As there was no further hope of success until the storm abated, this plan was immediately agreed upon, and they separated with sorrowful hearts and silent voices.

But going home they found her! Found her stiff and cold and frozen! Found her in a place where they had not dreamed of looking before! And the whole story was clear now!

She had wandered on, blinded by the snow; she had missed her way, had been bewildered as to her whereabouts, and, wearied by frequent unsuccessful attempts to find her dwelling, she had sunk down to sleep; and that long snow-sleep was her last on earth; it ended, as snow-sleeps always do—in death.

Had she but known; oh, that was the sad part of it! Had she but known how near she was to home! So near that a few steps more would have brought her to it. But she did not know of the shelter so close at hand; she had laid herself down, or fallen exhausted, where she was found, her head resting

ON HER OWN DOORSTEP.

The searchers had hitherto entered by the rear of the house; but now, as they passed out of the front, the awful truth was told, that the threshold of her own cottage was to her the threshold of eternity.

It was doubly sad! To be lost anywhere was sorrow enough; but the grief would not have been half so great if the mountain-side had been the cold couch whereon she had breathed her last. To be so near home, and yet homeless! So near safety, and yet unsaved! So near the door of hope, and yet to perish outside! This added new pangs of regret, touched the stoutest heart, and made eyes most unused to tears moist with weeping.

A storm is gathering—already the sky is overcast, and threatenings of judgment fill the air. Oh, be wise! Do not dally or delay. Enter through this open door which God sets before you in the Gospel, and which is Christ Himself; lest, haply, when the storm shall come suddenly, you may be found, discomfited and dismayed, dead on the doorstep of glory.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Official Count in New York State of the Presidential vote was not concluded until last Saturday. Both parties had experienced lawyers watching the count, but the figures previously given were not materially changed. Governor Cleveland's plurality in the State is now stated at 1105. That plurality gives him New York's thirty-six votes in the Electoral College, and decides the election. The total vote cast for him in the State was 563,103, an increase over the votes cast for the Democratic candidate in 1880 of 28,592. The total vote in the State for Mr. Blaine was 561,998, an increase over the vote of 1880 for Garfield of 6454. The Prohibition vote of the State for Neal Dow in that year stood at the ridiculous figure of 1517 ; this year 25,178 votes were cast for St. John. A comparison of these figures should convince Prohibitionists of the advantage of selecting a Candidate of sense and good character who has something to recommend him beside zeal for Prohibition. Butler's vote in the State was 16,988. Cleveland will have a majority of thirty-seven in the Electoral College, and it seems probable that he will have a plurality on popular vote in the whole country of 93,938.

Mr. St. John Indignantly and Emphatically denies the charges made against him in the New York Tribune. It would be unnecessary to contradict statements made in that journal alone, but the charges were in this case copied by reputable newspapers in other parts of the country. It is well, therefore, that St. John's denial should be widely published. He states that his divorced wife married shortly after the divorce, and lived with her second husband twelve or fifteen years—in fact, until she died. St. John says of his son : "The boy was educated by me, studied law with me, and has always been helped by me when he needed it, and holds a position in Washington at a salary of $3000 per year, which I procured for him. He is very indignant over the infamous lies. He will be at home (my house) this week."

A Monument in Memory of the Battle of Monmouth was unveiled at Freehold, N. J., on November 13th, with imposing ceremonies. The monument is a slender granite shaft 100 feet high. It can be seen for a great distance on every side. It cost $40,000, of which $20,000 was an appropriation by the United States. The first move toward its erection was under the administration of Governor Joel Parker, in 1877. The corner-stone was laid in 1878. The shaft stands on a mound in the public park which was the site of the battle. The base is in the form of an equilateral triangle, with a cannon at each corner. Three spurs of granite form the base of the shaft, on which are five bas-reliefs illustrating important features of the battle fought June 28th, 1778, between the American army under Washington, and the British forces commanded by Clinton. Above them are the coats-of-arms of the original thirteen States. Rising above these is the staff proper, surmounted by the statue of Columbia triumphant. The first bas-relief represents Lieutenant Colonel Nathaniel Ramsey, of Maryland, in his heroic effort to rally his troops, until the main army could come to his support. The second shows Washington in the act of bringing the troops again to the front after General Lee's unaccountable order to retreat. Molly Pitcher is shown in the third, with her husband lying dead at her feet, and General Knox at her side is ramming home a charge in the gun her husband died in defending. The fourth relief represents the Council of War at Hopewell, which as yet is unfinished, as is also the fifth, which will represent "Mad Anthony" Wayne's charge at the close of the battle. The monument is constructed of New England granite. Governor Abbett, on behalf of the State, accepted the monument in a graceful speech.

A Further Decrease in Immigration is Shown by the Government returns issued last week. During the month of October the arrivals numbered 36,441, which is less than the number landed in the same month of last year by 12,424. The arrivals during the ten months ended October 31st was 414,324, as against 501,037 during the same period of the preceding year. Of the immigrants arrived during the first ten months of the present year 47,751 were from England and Wales, 54,897 from Ireland, 7884 from Scotland, 11,605 from Austria, 141,684 from Germany, 12,252 from Italy, 13,125 from Norway, 22,455 from Sweden, 40,681 from Canada, and 61,989 from all other countries. The decrease in immigration was from England and Wales, Ireland, Scotland, Germany, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Canada, and the increase from other countries.

Two Mormons have now been Convicted of polygamy, and one has been sentenced to fine and imprisonment under the Edmunds law. His name is Rudger Clawson, and he is a son of "Bishop" H. G. Clawson, of the Mormon Church. This is his second trial. At the first trial the jury disagreed. No polygamists were allowed on the jury the second time. All the witnesses were Mormons. The officers of the Mormon Church when on the witness-stand skilfully parried the cross-examination, and professed to have bad memories. A young man, the son of the Utah Congressional delegate, swore that he had heard the defendant admit that he had married a second wife. The second wife was also a witness, but refused to testify at first. After being imprisoned for contumacy she acknowledged the marriage. Clawson declared that he regarded the laws of his church as above the law of the country, and when the two came in conflict he believed it his duty to obey the former. Evidently the end of the Mormon problem is not yet.

Precautions against Cholera are Recommended in a circular issued by the National Board of Health to the governors of all the States. Secretary McCulloch also has continued the embargo on rags, which was to expire on December 1st. The National Board of Health calls attention to the fact that the disease has been steadily working westward for two years, and our extensive intercourse with other countries precludes the hope of our escaping the epidemic. It urges the governors, "in view of the imminent danger which threatens our people, and the responsibilities resting upon the rulers and all in high official station, to call the attention of the Legislature to the subject, and to urge the necessity of appropriate legislation for providing the means whereby the most thorough sanitary service, State and local, may be immediately organized." If this is done, the Board hopes that if we do not wholly escape the dread disease its ravages may be limited to the places where it first makes its appearance.

The Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, President Arthur's Secretary of State, has been elected President of the American Bible Society in place of the late Dr. S. Wells Williams. The election was unanimous. It is an interesting circumstance that Mr. Frelinghuysen's uncle, the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, who adopted the present Secretary of State as his son, also held the office of President of the Bible Society, and a full-length portrait of him hangs in the managers' room. There is nothing incongruous in this selection. Mr. Frelinghuysen has for many years taken a deep interest in Christian work, especially that of the Bible Society, and he has frequently spoken at its public meetings. He is a member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church.

The Centennial Anniversary of the Consecration of Bishop Seabury, the first bishop of the American Protestant Episcopal Church, was celebrated at Trinity Church, New York, on November 14th. Dr. Samuel Seabury was consecrated in Aberdeen, Scotland, on November 14th, 1774, by Scottish bishops, after vainly endeavoring to secure bishop's orders from the Primate of the English Church. Trinity Church was decorated on Friday for the centennial service. Assistant Bishop Potter took part in the service, and Dr. Morgan Dix preached a sermon, in the course of which he dwelt on the goodness of the Scotch bishops and their courage in braving ecclesiastical penalties which might have been enforced for their act of consecration. He then briefly sketched the history and progress of the American Church.

Five Missionaries for the Congo Sailed from New York on Saturday last in the Britannic. Ordination and farewell services were held in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, on November 11th, when each of the missionaries delivered an address. Mr. John A. Condit, one of them, is a young American who was converted at McAuley's Thirty-second Street Mission. He gave an interesting account of the manner in which his attention had been directed to the work by Stanley's description of Central Africa and the need of missionaries there. Mr. Condit spoke hopefully of his own and his companions' plans for self-support while carrying the Gospel to the heart of this almost unknown land. His companions are Messrs. William Pierson, a negro ; William Quayle, who was converted in the Thirtieth Street Gospel tent, and who is an Englishman and has been a sailor in the British Navy ; J. W. Jansen, a Norwegian, who was converted in Bethel Mariners' Mission, and who has already been on the coast of Africa, and F. M. Garrish. The Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Tabernacle, gave an interesting account of the financial affairs of the enterprise. Among other details he mentioned that part of the expenses of sending out these missionaries had been realized through the kindness of a Christian lady, who had given her diamonds to be sold. The missionaries intend going to Cabendia, about one hundred miles north of the route of Bishop Taylor's party, and remaining there a year and building a station, after which they hope to be re-enforced by new workers, and will proceed farther into the interior.

"Thy Healer, God's Dealings with Soul and Body," edited by Mrs. M. Baxter. A magazine devoted to the subject of faith-healing. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month. Mrs. Baxter desires us to make the following announcement in reference to the magazine :

"Arrangements are made by which copies may be sent to subscribers direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Single copies, 2 cents ; with postage, 3 cents. Yearly subscription (24 numbers), 75 cents. Subscribers are requested to send subscriptions for 1885 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, 63 Bible House, New York by December 1st, with name and address clearly written."

Any orders and subscriptions so received will be duly forwarded, but time would be saved by sending them direct to Mrs. M. Baxter 10 Drayton Park, Highbury, London, England.

The Deaths from Cholera in Paris Last Week showed a slight decrease, which was attributed to the colder weather. The daily record sank to seventy-five toward the end of the week. Three days before it stood at ninety-eight. Considerable alarm prevails, especially among visitors. Many people have already left the city in the hope of getting beyond the fatal influence of the disease. Latterly the exodus has been increasing, and a continuous string of vehicles can now be seen in the streets leading to the various railway stations, filled with people eager to get at a safe distance from the city. The government is actively endeavoring to check the progress of the epidemic. Efforts are being made to put the slums in a better sanitary condition by flushing them with water and carbolic acid. Three cases of cholera have occurred at the police depot in the prefecture. The conditions are such there that it is feared the disease will make rapid headway. The depot contains prisoners who are awaiting trial or who have already been sentenced and have not yet been sent away to their place of punishment. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald describes the rooms in which the prisoners are huddled together pell-mell as nauseous holes, into which scarcely a ray of daylight can penetrate. "They are extremely filthy, and reek with the foulest and most noisome odors. The bed linen, such as it is, is seldom cleaned. These disgraceful quarters are now being surprised with a thorough cleansing and disinfection."

The Prospects of a Compromise between the two Houses of the British Parliament have received a check. An election held last week of a successor to the Hon. Gilbert C. Leigh, M. P., who was killed while hunting in America, has resulted in the election of a Conservative by a large majority. This result has been regarded by the House of Lords as an expression of public opinion, and has made them less inclined to comply with the demand of the Commons. There is really very little in the election to encourage them. The constituency Mr. Leigh represented has nearly always been represented by Conservatives. Mr. Leigh carried it in the Liberal interest, not because he was a Liberal, but because he was the eldest son of a popular landowner. The new member is a popular banker. He was elected chiefly because he promised the voters to support a proposal for imposing a duty on imports of corn and wheat from America. He is not likely to redeem his promise, as the leader of his party in the House of Commons is Sir Stafford Northcote, as firm a believer in free trade as is Mr. Gladstone. The election, however, has caused the Lords to believe that the people are with them in the struggle, and has encouraged them to persist. It is expected now that the Parliament will be dissolved and a general election held at an early date.

A Letter from Gen. Gordon, Dated Khartoum, November 4th, has been received by General Wolseley. There appears, however, to be some doubt about its being genuine. It is supposed that, if genuine, the date should be October 4th. The letter represents General Gordon as still able to hold out against the Mahdi. It also stated that the steamer which bore Colonels Stewart and Power and M. Herbin and some Greeks left Khartoum September 10th. Messrs. Hansel and Leonides are safe at Khartoum. General Gordon had received letters through Major Kitchener from his sister, from Sir Samuel Baker, and from Mr. Henry M. Stanley. General Gordon expresses regret at the wreck of the steamer which he had sent down the river to Dongola, and speaks with sorrow of the massacre. He is delighted, however, to hear of the British advance up the Nile, and hopes to be able to maintain his hold at Khartoum until the arrival of the relief expedition. He says he continues to harass the Mahdi with steamers whenever he attempts to approach Khartoum. The Mahdi is himself encamped only one day's march from Khartoum. The expedition is still trying to force its way up the Nile, though difficulties increase. It is stated now that the expedition will cost sixty-five million dollars.

Riots and Religious Outrages in China are reported by the steamer City of Rio Janeiro, which arrived at San Francisco from Hong Kong on November 10th. It brings news that Chinese mobs have attacked persons and places of Christian worship at Canton and interior points. In the province of Kwang-Tung alone four Roman Catholic and five Protestant churches have been destroyed, one hundred and twenty houses of resident Christians looted and their occupants driven away. At Nam-hoi three Catholic chapels were pillaged, as were also the houses of converts. The priests and the converts were beaten and the females outraged. At Shi-hung the Protestant Episcopal Church chapel was destroyed. The Chinese tore the clothing from the preacher's wife, and treated her shamefully. At Chant-sung the Wesleyan chapel was destroyed. Christians are fleeing from the Province of Hong Kong. The Chinese gave them the alternative of sacrificing to the idols or leaving their homes. They preferred the latter, but while leaving many of the women were caught and outraged. The authorities of twelve Cantonese villages have issued notices that all Christians must leave. Fifteen churches in those villages have already been destroyed and several stores looted. Many persons are homeless. Although the attention of the Chinese Government has been called to these barbarous acts, no action has been taken to prevent them or to punish the perpetrators. The Chinese do not discriminate among foreigners; they regard the French and English and Americans alike as their enemies.

France and China Continue in the Same Unsatisfactory relations as last week. With respect to the rumored mediation of England there is no hopeful progress. At a dinner given by the Lord Mayor of London to the Cabinet, Earl Granville, the Secretary of State, said that although both France and China at different times were willing to accept the mediations of England, they had not been simultaneous in their propositions. He expressed the hope that in the event of failure to secure the mediation of England, those countries would find some neutral Power to intervene. In referring to the conference at Berlin upon matters pertaining to the Congo country, Earl Granville said that the Government of England entertained no jealousy of Germany's scheme of colonizing in that country, especially if it is accompanied by freedom of navigation and commerce.

The Congo Conference in Berlin was Opened on November 15th. The first session was only formal. Only the plenipotentiaries representing their various nations were present. Their assistants were required to consider and deliver their opinions upon special cases. Only two of the delegates have ever been in Africa. There was a conference between Baron de Courcel, the French Ambassador, and Prince Bismarck the day before. It is believed that the principal topic discussed was the programme to be followed in the Congo Conference. Prince Bismarck sent a brief circular letter of invitation to the different members of the Conference. It is reported that Portugal has instructed her delegate to withdraw from the Conference if Portugal's rights in the Congo country are not recognized.

A Stately Service, in which Twenty Bishops participated, was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on November 14th, to commemorate the consecration of Bishop Seabury one hundred years ago. Although the prelates of the English Church refused to consecrate an American bishop a century ago, and Dr. Seabury had to go to Scotland for consecration, there was no lack of cordiality in the celebration. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of all England, preached the sermon, and six bishops administered the communion. The Archbishop expressed the deep interest of the English Church in "the American brethren."

A SUMMARY OF EXPERIENCE AND A BODY OF DIVINITY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and to wait for His Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come."—I THESSALONIANS I: 9, 10.

A Body of Divinity—The Doctrines in the Text—Christ's Nearing Advent—The Assurance.

IN Thessalonica the conversions to the faith were remarkable. Paul came there without prestige, without friends, when he was in the very lowest condition; for he had just been beaten and imprisoned at Philippi, and had fled from that city. Yet it mattered not in what condition the ambassador might be; God, who worketh mighty things by weak instruments, blessed the word of His servant Paul. No doubt when the apostle went into the synagogue to address his own countrymen he had great hopes that, by reasoning with them out of their own Scriptures, he might convince them that Jesus was the Christ. Paul must have felt disappointed with his own countrymen; indeed, he had often cause to do so. His heart was affectionately warm toward them, but their hearts were very bitter toward him, reckoning him to be a pervert and an apostate. But if he seemed to fail with the Jews, it is evident that he was abundantly successful with the Gentiles. These turned from their idols to serve the living God, and their turning was so remarkable that the Jews charged Paul and Silas with turning the world upside down.

In those days there was a good deal of abroad, and therefore the wonder was not so much that men left their idols, as that they turned unto the living God. It became a matter of talk all over the city, and the Jews in their violence helped to make the matter more notorious; for the mobs in the street and the attack upon the house of Jason all stirred the thousand tongues of rumor. Everybody spoke of the sudden appearance of three poor Jews, of their remarkable teaching in the synagogue, and of the conversion of a great multitude of devout Greeks, and of the chief women not a few. It was no small thing that so many had come straight away from the worship of Jupiter and Mercury to worship the unknown God, who could not be seen, nor imaged; and to enter the kingdom of one Jesus who had been crucified. It set all Macedonia and Achaia wondering; and as with a trumpet-blast it aroused all the dwellers in those regions. Every ship that sailed from Thessalonica carried the news of the strange ferment which was men were caring for religion, and were quitting old beliefs for a new and better faith. Thessalonica, situated on one of the great Roman roads, the centre of a large trade, thus became a centre for the Gospel.

Wherever there are true conversions there will be more or less of this kind of sounding forth of the Gospel. It was especially so at Thessalonica; but it is truly so in every church where the Spirit of God is uplifting men from the dregs of evil, delivering them from drunkenness, and dishonesty, and uncleanness, and worldliness, and making them to become holy and earnest in the cause of the great Lord. There is sure to be a talk when grace triumphs. This talk is a great aid to the Gospel; it is no small thing that men should have their attention attracted to it by its effects; for it is both natural and just that thoughtful men should judge of doctrines by their results; and if the most beneficial results follow from the preaching of the Word, prejudice is disarmed, and the most violent objectors are silenced.

You will notice that in this general talk

THE CONVERTS AND THE PREACHERS

were greatly mixed up: "For they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you." I do not know that it is possible for the preacher to keep himself distinct from those who profess to be converted by him. He is gladly one with them in love to their souls, but he would have it remembered that he cannot be responsible for all their actions. Those who profess to have been converted under any ministry have it in their power to damage that ministry far more than any adversaries can do. Members of churches, will you kindly think of this? Your ministers share the blame of your ill conduct if ever you disgrace yourselves. I feel sure that none of you wish to bring shame and trouble upon your pastors, however careless you may be about your own reputations.

Quitting this line of thought, I would observe that these two verses struck me as being singularly full.

OCEANS OF TEACHING

are to be found in them. A father of the church in the first ages was wont to cry, "I adore the infinity of Holy Scripture." That remark constantly rises from my lips when I am studying the sacred Word. This book is more than a book—it is the mother of books, a mine of truth, a mountain of meaning. It was an ill-advised opinion which is imputed to the Mohammedans at the destruction of the Alexandrian Library, when they argued that everything that was good in it was already in the Koran, and therefore it might well be destroyed. Yet it is true with regard to the inspired Word of God, that it contains everything which appertains to eternal life. It is a revelation of which no man can take the measure, it compasses heaven and earth, time and eternity. The best evidence of its being written by an Infinite mind is its own infinity. Within a few of its words there lie hidden immeasurable meanings, even as perfume enough to sweeten leagues of space may be condensed into a few drops of otto of roses.

I. The first part of the text contains

A SUMMARY OF EXPERIENCE:

"What manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven." Here we have in miniature the biography of a Christian man.

It begins, first, with the entering in of the word—"What manner of entering in we had unto you." When we preach the word you listen, and, so far, the word is received. This is a very hopeful circumstance. Still, the hearing with the outward ear is comparatively a small matter; or, at least, only great because of what may follow from it. The preacher feels even with some who listen with attention that he is outside the door; he is knocking, and he hopes that he is heard within; but the truth is not yet received, the door remains shut, an entrance is not granted, and in no case can he be content to speak with the person outside the door; he desires an entrance for the Word. All is fruitless until Christ entereth into the heart.

I have seen the following: the door has been a little opened, and the man inside has come to look at the messenger, and more distinctly to hear what he may have to say; but he has taken care to put the door on the chain, or hold it with his hand, for he is not yet ready to admit the guest who is so desirous of entertainment. The King's messenger has sometimes tried to put his foot within when the door has stood a little open, but he has not always been successful, and has not even escaped from a painful hurt when the door has been forced back with angry violence. We have called again and again with our message, but we have been as men who besieged a walled city, and were driven from the gates; yet we had our reward, for when the Holy Spirit moved the hard heart the city gates have opened of their own accord, and we have been received joyfully.

The truth has its own

WAYS OF ENTRANCE;

but in general it first affects the understanding. The man says, "I see it; I see how God is just, and yet the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. I see sin laid on Christ that it may not be laid on me, and I perceive that if I believe in Jesus Christ my sins are put away by His atonement." To many all that is wanted is that they should understand this fundamental truth; for their minds are prepared of God to receive it.

Then it usually commences to work upon the conscience, conscience being the understanding exercised upon moral truth. The man sees himself a sinner, discovering guilt that he was not aware of; and he is thus made ready to receive Christ's pardoning grace. He sees that to have lived without thinking of God, without loving God, without serving God was a great and grievous crime; he feels the offensiveness of this neglect. He trembles; he consents unto the law that it is good, and he allows that, if the law condemns him, he is worthy to be condemned.

When it has thus entered into the understanding and affected the conscience, the Word of God usually

AROUSES THE EMOTIONS.

Fear is awakened, and hope is excited. The man begins to feel as he never felt before. He finds himself suddenly dissolved, where aforetime he was hard as adamant; for the word is entering into him, and exercising its softening power.

By and by the entrance is complete; for the truth carries the central castle of Mansoul, and captures his heart. He who once hated the Gospel now loves it. At first he loves it, hoping that it may be his, though fearing the reverse; yet owning that if it brought no blessing to himself, yet it was a lovable and desirable thing. By and by the man ventures to grasp it, encouraged by the word that bids him lay hold on eternal life.

What comes next? Well,

THE SECOND STAGE

is conversion. "They themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned from idols to serve the living and true God." There came a turning, a decided turning. The man has come so far in carelessness, so far in sin and unbelief; but now he pauses, and he deliberately turns round, and faces in that direction to which hitherto he had turned his back. Conversion is the turning of a man completely round, to hate what he loved and to love what he hated. Conversion is to turn to God decidedly and distinctly by an act and deed of the mind and will. In some senses we are turned; but in others, like these Thessalonians, we turn.

These Thessalonians turned from their idols. Do you tell me that

YOU HAVE NO IDOLS?

Think again, and you will not be quite so sure. The streets of London are full of fetich worship, and almost every dwelling is a joss-house crammed with idols. Why, multitudes of men are worshipping not calves of gold, but gold in a more portable shape. Small circular idols of gold and silver are much sought after. They are very devoutly worshipped by some, and great things are said concerning their power. I have heard the epithet of "almighty" ascribed to an American form of these idols. Those who do not worship gold may yet worship rank, name, pleasure, or honor.

Most worship self, and I do not know that there is a more degrading form of worship than for a man to put himself upon a pedestal and bow down thereto and worship it. You might just as well adore cats and crocodiles with the ancient Egyptians as pay your life's homage to yourselves. No wooden image set up by the most savage tribe can be more ugly or degrading than our idol when we adore ourselves. Men worship Bacchus still. Do not tell me they do not; why, there is a temple to him at every street corner. While every other trade is content with a shop or a warehouse, this fiend has his palaces, in which plentiful libations are poured forth in his honor. The gods of unchastity and vice are yet among us. It would be a shame even to speak of the things which are done of them in secret. The lusts of the flesh are served even by many who would not like to have it known.

We have gods many and lords many in this land. God grant that we may see, through the preaching of the Gospel, many turning from such idols. If you love anything better than God you are idolaters; if there is anything you would not give up for God it is your idol; if there is anything that you seek with greater fervor than you seek the glory of God, that is your idol, and conversion means a turning from every idol.

But then that is not enough, for some men turn from one idol to another. If they do not worship Bacchus they become teetotalers, and possibly they worship the golden calf, and become covetous. When men quit covetousness they sometimes turn to profligacy. A change of false gods is not the change that will save; we must turn unto God, to trust, love, and honor Him, and Him alone.

THE THIRD STAGE.

After conversion comes service. True conversion causes us "to serve the living and true God." To serve Him means to worship Him, to obey Him, to consecrate one's entire being to His honor and glory, and to be His devoted servant. We are, dear friends, to serve the "living" God. Many men have a dead God still. They do not feel that He hears their prayers, they do not feel the power of His Spirit moving upon their hearts and lives. They never take the Lord into their calculations; He never fills them with joy, nor even depresses them with fear; God is unreal and inactive to them.

But the true convert turns to the living God, who is everywhere, and whose presence affects him at every point of his being. This God he is to worship, obey, and serve. Then it is added, to serve the true God; and there is no serving a true God with falsehood. Many evidently serve a false god, for they utter words of prayer without their hearts, and that is false prayer, unfit for the true God, who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

A fourth matter follows to complete this Christian biography, namely, waiting— from heaven." That conversion which is not followed up by waiting is a false conversion, and will come to nothing. We wait, dear brethren, in the holy perseverance of faith; having begun with Christ Jesus our Lord we abide in Him; we trust, and then we wait. We do not look upon salvation as a thing which requires a few minutes of faith, and then all is over; salvation is the business of our lives. We receive salvation in an instant, but we work it out with fear and trembling all our days. He that is saved continues to be saved, and goes on to be saved from day to day, from every sin and from every form of evil. We must wait upon the Lord, and renew the strength of the life which He has imparted. As a servant waiteth on her mistress, or a courtier upon his king, so must we wait upon the Lord.

"TO WAIT FOR HIS SON

This waiting also takes the shape of living in the future. A man who waits is not living on the wages of to-day, but on the recompenses of a time which is yet to come; and this is the mark of the Christian, that his life is spent in eternity rather than in time, and his citizenship is not of earth but of heaven. He has received a believing expectancy which makes him both watch and wait. He expects that the Lord Jesus will come a second time, and that speedily. He has read of His going up into heaven, and he believes it; and he knows that He will so come in like manner as He went up into heaven. For he looks with calm hope; he does not know when it may be, but he keeps himself on the watch as a servant who waits his lord's return. He hopes it may be to-day, he would not wonder if it were to-morrow, for he is always looking for and hasting unto the coming of the Son of God. The coming of the Lord is his expected reward. He does not expect to be rewarded by men, or even to be rewarded of God with temporal things in this life, for he has set his affection upon things yet to be revealed, things eternal and infinite. In the day when the Christ shall come, and the heavens which have received Him shall restore Him to our earth, He shall judge the world in righteousness, and His people with His truth, and then shall our day break and our shadows flee away. The true believer lives in this near future; his hopes are with Jesus on His throne, with Jesus crowned before an assembled universe.

II. I shall want you to be patient with me while I very briefly unfold the second half of this great roll. Here even to a greater degree we have multum in parvo, much in little; packed away in a nutshell. "To wait for His Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come."

A BODY OF DIVINITY

To begin my body of divinity, I see here, first, the Deity of Christ. "To wait for His Son." "His Son." God has but one Son in the highest sense. The Lord Jesus Christ has given to all believers power to become the sons of God, but not in the sense in which He, and He alone, is the Son of God. The Eternal Filiation is a mystery into which it is better for us never to pry. Believe it; but how it is, or how it could be, certainly it is not for you or for me to attempt to explain. Side by side with this in this text of mine is His humanity. "His Son, whom He raised from the dead." It is for man to die. God absolutely considered dieth not; He therefore took upon Himself our mortal frame, and was made in fashion as a man; then willingly for our sakes He underwent the pangs of death, and being crucified, was dead, and so was buried, even as the rest of the dead. He was truly man, "of a reasonable soul, and human flesh subsisting;" of that we are confident.

Furthermore, in our text we perceive a doctrine about ourselves very plainly implied, namely, that men by nature are guilty, for otherwise they would not have needed Jesus, a Saviour. They were lost, and so He who came from heaven to earth bore the name of Jesus, "for He shall save His people from their sins." It is clear, my brethren, that we were under the divine wrath, otherwise it could not be said, "He hath delivered us from the wrath to come." That truth is in the text, and a great deal more than I can mention just now.

But the next doctrine, which is one of the fundamentals of the Gospel, is that the Lord Jesus Christ died for these fallen men. He could not have been raised from the dead if He had not died. That death was painful and ignominious; and it was also substitutionary; "for the transgression of my people was He stricken." In the death of Christ lay the essence of our redemption. Let us always dwell upon that central truth, and when we are preaching Christ risen, Christ reigning, or Christ coming, let us never so preach any of them as to overshadow Christ crucified. "We preach Christ crucified."

Further on, we have another doctrine, among many more. We have here the doctrine of our Lord's resurrection. Christ is risen from the dead. I pray you, do not think of the Lord Jesus Christ as though He were now dead. It is well to dwell upon Gethsemane, Golgotha and Gabbatha; but pray remember the empty tomb, Emmaus, Galilee and Olivet. It is not well to think of Jesus as forever on the cross or in the tomb. "He is not here, but He is risen." Ye may "come and see the place where the Lord lay," but He lies there no longer; He hath burst the bands of death by which He could not be holden; for it was not possible that God's holy One could see corruption. The rising of Jesus from the dead is that fact of facts which establishes Christianity upon an historical basis, and at the same time guarantees to all believers their own resurrection from the dead. He is the firstfruits and we are the harvest.

Further, there is here the doctrine of His ascension: "to wait for His Son from heaven." It is clear that Jesus is in heaven, or He could not come from it. He has gone before us as our Forerunner. He has gone to His rest and reward; a cloud received Him out of sight; He has entered into His glory.

But the text tells us more; not only that He has gone into heaven, but that He remains there; for these Thessalonians were

EXPECTING HIM TO COME

"from heaven," and therefore He was there. What is He doing? "I go to prepare a place for you." What is He doing? He is interceding with authority before the throne. What is He doing? He is from yonder hill-top looking upon His Church, which is as a ship upon the sea buffeted by many a storm. In the middle watch ye shall see Him walking on the waters; for He perceives the straining of the oars, the leakage of the timbers, the rending of the sails, the dismay of the pilot, the trembling of the crew; and He will come unto us, and save us. He is sending heavenly succors to His weary ones; He is ruling all things for the salvation of His elect, and the accomplishment of His purposes. Glory be to His blessed name!

Here is conspicuously set forth

THE SECOND COMING,

a subject which might well have occupied all our time—"To wait for His Son from heaven." Every chapter of this epistle closes with the Second Advent. Do not deceive yourselves, oh ye ungodly men who think little of Jesus of Nazareth! The day will come when you will change your minds about Him. As surely as He died, He lives, and as surely as He lives He will come to this earth again! With an innumerable company of angels, with blast of trumpet that shall strike dismay into the heart of all His enemies, Jesus comes! And when He cometh there shall be a time of judgment, and the rising again of the dead, and "Every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him; and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him."

HE MAY COME TO-MORROW!

We know not the times and the seasons; these things are in the Father's keeping; but that He comes is certain, and that He will come as a thief in the night to the ungodly is certain too. Lay no flattering unction to your souls as though when He was crucified there was an end of Him; it is but the beginning of His dealings with you, though you reject Him. "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him."

But there was something to be delivered from, and that is, the coming wrath, which is mentioned here. "Oh," saith one, "that is a long way off, that wrath to come!" If it were a long way off it were wise for you to prepare for it. He is unsafe who will be destroyed most certainly, however distant that destruction may be. A wise man should not be content with looking as an ox doth, as far as his eye can carry him, for there is so much beyond, as sure as that which is seen. But it is not far-off wrath which is here mentioned; the text saith, "who delivereth us from the wrath coming"—that is, the wrath which is now coming; for wrath is even now upon the unbelieving. It is said of every one that believeth not in Christ Jesus, that "the wrath of God abideth on Him." "God is angry with the wicked every day." This wrath abideth upon some of you. It is the joy of believers that they are delivered from this wrath which is daily coming upon unbelievers, and would come upon themselves if they had not been delivered from it by the atoning sacrifice.

Lastly, there is here the doctrine of assurance. Some say, that you are saved?" It can be known; it ought to be known. "That would make me inexpressibly happy," cries one. Just so, and that is one of the reasons why we would have you know it this day. God saith, "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life," and therefore the believer may be sure that He has it. Our message is, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." God make you to escape that dreadful doom! May you be delivered from the wrath which is coming for Jesus' sake. Amen.

"HOW ARE YOU TO KNOW

MR. J. H. RAPER,

The English Prohibitionist.

MR. RAPER, whose portrait appears on the next page, and who is one of the leaders in the Prohibition party of Great Britain, was born in 1820 at Carlisle, and is now sixty-four years old. Several years of his early manhood were spent as a schoolmaster, in which vocation he was pre-eminently successful. Shortly after its formation, in 1853, he joined the United Kingdom Alliance, under which name the English Prohibitionists have banded together. His organizing abilities soon made him prominent in the Alliance, and he was appointed its Parliamentary agent. His duties in connection with that institution compelled him to travel from one end of the land to the other, and brought him into close contact with all the leaders of the Alliance movement. In the course of his tours he made frequent addresses, stimulating, encouraging and energizing the local societies which heard him.

In the interests of Temperance he visited Sweden, in 1873, in order to see for himself the operation of her licensing laws, more especially in Gothenburg. "In carrying out my resolution," wrote Bailie Lewis, of Edinburgh, in a lecture on "The Gothenburg Licensing System," "I was successful in securing the company of two gentlemen animated by the same spirit of inquiry, and whose names are recognized throughout the United Kingdom as distinguished Temperance Reformers. I refer to the Rev. Mr. Jones, of Liverpool, and Mr. J. H. Raper, of Manchester."

HE VISITED AMERICA

in 1875, where he received a most hearty reception. "He was one of the chief speakers at the great Temperance conventions of the year," writes Miss Frances E. Willard, "and his mingled wit and wisdom were the theme of general commendation. He has all the best traits of an English platform orator, being perfectly at home with his audience. He was no holiday tourist, but a vigorous student, intent upon the novel lesson under his eyes." In the "Centennial Temperance Volume," a memorial of the International Temperance

CONFERENCE HELD IN PHILADELPHIA, in 1876, there is a report of Mr. Raper's speech, with the following paragraph appended: "Reporter's Note.—Those who listened to Mr. Raper's address may be disappointed in the report. The above is substantially what Mr. Raper said, but he is one of those rare speakers whose manner and action and voice give a charm to their words that cannot be put upon paper; and, further, he is so very rapid in the utterance of some of his sentences that the reporter may congratulate himself if he can preserve the sense, though the words may, some of them, elude the skill of his pen."

An Appeal to a Sailor.

On the occasion of his second marriage, in 1880, Mr. Raper's friends thought it a favorable opportunity for presenting him with "a well-earned recognition of his past services," in the shape of a money gift worth $8000, in addition to a handsome silver tea and coffee service, which bore the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. and Mrs. J. H Raper, with £1600, on their marriage, by friends and co-workers in the Temperance Movement."

Though some years ago Mr. Raper's circumstances permitted him to resign his salary as Parliamentary agent of the Alliance, there has been no diminution in his able efforts on behalf of that beneficent organization.

A SAILOR'S TESTIMONY.

(See Illustration on this page.)

A GODLY man, whose unremitting exertions among seamen ashore had at length rendered rest and change necessary, went on a sea voyage. Aboard ship he could not rest, but was about his Master's business. The sailors, some of whom knew him, listened to him attentively, and he had hopes that the Lord's work was begun in some souls. One, however, carefully avoided him, and always pretended, when found alone, to have some pressing reason for doing work in another part of the ship. At last, however, the missionary found him sitting smoking his pipe in the poop. Then, seating himself beside him, he made a solemn appeal. The man admitted that he was "a hard case," that his wife was 'verted, and that he had ill-used her for going to meeting. Other opportunities came, and the man no longer avoided them.

Some weeks afterward, at a sailor's Bethel, the same sailor rose in the meeting and declared what God had done for his soul. After telling of his avoidance of the missionary on the voyage and of his subsequent listening to his appeal, he said:

"Our time out was nearly up, and I said I'd wait till we got home. I tried to laugh and swear it off, but 'twas no good. On the run home I got worse and worse, and was so frightened I got into the fore poop out of the way of the lads, and had a good cry. When I got to Gorleston and found my wife waiting for me, I scarce knew what to say. However, we got home, and I knew it was Bethel service night, though I didn't like to let on, though I couldn't rest; I said, 'Will you get my tea ready?' 'Yes, but what's the hurry?' 'Make haste, I'm hungry.' 'All right,' she says, 'I will.' 'Ain't this service night?' I knew it well enough, but didn't like to let her know. 'Yes, of course; if you hadn't come, I'd agone; but now you're home I can stay.' 'I ain't goin' to keep you at home,' I said, and what's more, I don't know but I'll come with you.' She couldn't think whatever had come over me, for she saw I'd changed my tune, but she was afraid to ask, I'd been so mad before. So she bustled about and had tea ready in a twinkling, and off we went. I went again next Sunday, and an old chap was a-speaking. I thought, 'He's a-speaking to nobody, on'y me.' After service I sat still, I couldn't move; some of them talked to me, and God saved me that night. You should have seen my wife; she didn't know what to do, she was so glad."

A DISCOVERY IN A RIVER.

IT would be difficult to find a prettier river than the Leam. True, strangers accustomed to row on larger rivers contemptuously called it "a ditch." It was narrow; its admirers could not deny that; and it wound in and out without a single long stretch of straight channel. There could be no boat-racing on that river, but a man fond of nature and solitude could spend a summer afternoon very happily on its surface. There are little nooks into which the boat drifts, and one is surrounded by grand beeches and oaks, while on the smooth grassy banks, close to the water, willows grow and spread their boughs, so as to make a natural awning. Violets peep out from among the grass and forget-me-nots grow in the moist soil which the river laps lazily in its sluggish motion. Seven or eight miles a light skiff can be propelled toward its source among the hills from the point where it joins the larger river, and all the way no view of the country is obtainable, only banks gently sloping from the edge of the water, varied here and there by massive boulders. The rower is irritated at first by the need of constantly looking behind him to trim his boat to keep its bow out of the rushes or off the bank; but soon the irritation subsides in delight at the natural beauties surrounding him

The Leam and its banks were looking their loveliest one afternoon, in the delightful Indian summer, when George Dawson and his friend Seymour set out for a row. They knew it would be dark early, so they made all the speed they could at first, Dawson, who knew the river best, leading, and Seymour following in a boat a little heavier than that of his friend. They had been pulling for about half an hour when Dawson suddenly dropped his sculls and, gazing earnestly among the rushes at the foot of an ancient oak, raised his hand in horror, and called his friend to look. Seymour rose and, keeping his boat steady by thrusting the blade of his scull into the mud of the bank, peered over to see the sight that terrified his companion. It was the figure of a man evidently dead. The river had carried it among the rushes, and there it lay, the head resting on the trunk of the oak.

"Why, it's Curtis," said Seymour, "and he's certainly dead. What can have happened?"

"Do you really think he's dead?" Dawson asked, his face blanched with horror.

"Yes, I am afraid there's no doubt of it; but we must do what we can, for sometimes a doctor can bring a man to after he seems to be quite drowned. We must get him into one of the boats and tow it back to the city as fast as possible."

After much exertion, for the strong, tough weeds had wound themselves around the limbs, they succeeded in lifting the body into the boat, and then both men entered the other boat, and, tying its stern fast to the bow of the one containing the body, they pulled vigorously back to the city. Their exertions were fruitless; the ambulance doctor declared that the man had been dead several hours.

"It is a horrible thing," said Dawson, the next day, as the two friends walked away together from the inquest after giving their evidence. "How that woman suffers! I thought she would have fainted before the inquest was over. No wonder, poor thing! it is bad enough to be a widow, but to be widowed in this way adds to the misery."

"Yes; and she has other causes for grief besides, or I am mistaken. It was no part of my duty to give explanations, and as the coroner and the jury were disposed to make the verdict accidental death, I did not interfere; but I don't believe it was an accident. I feel pretty sure Curtis drowned himself deliberately."

"You amaze me, Seymour," Dawson said. "What makes you think that?"

"Well, perhaps I ought to say nothing about it, as it is only conjecture," said Seymour; "but I feel very sorry for the poor fellow. I used to like him, and I think I was about the most intimate friend he had. He was very reserved, even with me; but he has told me more than once in his quiet, patient way, that he 'had a hard row to hoe.'"

"I did not know him, except by reputation," said Dawson; "but I never heard that he had any serious trouble. What was the matter?"

"I think it is very likely no one ever suspected that he had any trouble but myself, and perhaps the hired girl, and maybe one or two of his business friends. It was only in his home that one found it out. His marriage was a huge mistake, and both husband and wife knew it."

"Ah! that is a terrible discovery for a couple to make," Dawson said. "I wonder how many make it?"

"Perhaps not so many as you bachelors suppose; but certainly a very large number. Sometimes the wife is too good for the husband, and sometimes the husband is too good for the wife; but in this case it was neither of those situations. Mrs. Curtis is a very nice lady, well educated, well bred, and a very lovable woman. Her poor dead husband, as you know, I respected. They were simply unsuited to each other. If they had had plenty of money they might have got on by Curtis adapting himself to his wife's ways and becoming her idea of a husband. But as it was, he had to earn his living, and the adaptation was an impossibility. Life was a serious business for him. His resources were sorely taxed to realize an income sufficient for their needs, and that, I suspect, was the cause of the trouble. Mrs. Curtis appeared to me discontented. Some wives are proud to help their husbands, and are never so happy as when, by some household effort, they can save expense. Mrs. Curtis did plenty of work. I have seen her busy about the house, but she always seemed to me to do it under protest. Her manner, and occasionally a chance word, implied that it was not what she had expected. I think she rather despised her husband that he could not provide better for her. He, poor fellow! would gladly have given her all luxuries if he could. He loved her so well that he would have given her the best dresses and jewelry, and would have been glad to surround her with help so that she should never soil her hands with work. But that was out of the question. He had not the money and could not get it!"

"Why did she marry him, then?" Dawson asked.

"Oh, who can tell! I know she had opportunities of what is called doing better—that is, marrying wealthy men. Curtis knew it, too, and he was rather flattered at first, that she had rejected other suitors on his account. Why she did so I cannot say. Perhaps she was romantic; perhaps she had a liking for the fine, handsome young man; perhaps she thought he would get rich in time. Who can tell what reasons influence a girl in her teens who will not hear advice! Whatever reasons she had, she did marry him, and I think she repented it every day."

"I suppose Curtis was kind to her?"

"Oh, yes, in his way! He was one of those men who bear misfortunes silently and gloomily. When he had done a hard day's work, and had not been particularly successful, he would go home weary and depressed. Mrs. Curtis expected, I think, that he would show her lover-like attentions and listen to her troubles and advise her. Poor fellow! he was bearing a load that required all his strength. He was preoccupied and inattentive. Perhaps her troubles seemed small to him when compared with his own. I don't know; but I have heard her complain that he was a dull companion, and that her life was very joyless. His life, too, was that; but she reproached him in her heart if she did not in words with her miseries."

"That is an unhappy picture of a home, but it does not account for the suicide. As Curtis had borne the trouble so long, I do not see why he did not go on bearing it."

"It may seem strange to you that he did not. There are some trials that make a man callous, but this is not one of them. It culminates, and penetrates deeper and deeper. Besides, there is the drift apart to be reckoned upon. I can imagine a man worried from morning to night, only just keeping himself afloat, making no progress, saying to himself, 'What am I living for?' As he finishes his day's toil and turns his face homeward, knowing that gloom, and discontent, and reproaches, and harsh criticism, and thinly-veiled contempt await him there, the time may come when he would think in his misery that the quiet of the grave would be preferable."

"Not if his faith in God is strong."

"There you touch the key-stone of the arch. Curtis had no faith. If he had been a Christian man—if either of them had been converted—it would have been different. Then there would have been no reproaches, or there would have been strength to bear them meekly. God, as we know, keeps 'those in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on' Him. The troubles of life don't harrow up the Christian's heart as they do the hearts of the worldly. Strength is imparted by faith which nothing impairs. That is why, I think, we have had this sad business, and why we have so many suicides."

"It is a fool's refuge."

"That is so; but the man who rejects Christ is a fool."

A Discovery in a River.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

In Burgundy.

HESTER knew that her father had been dwelling on the border-land between sanity and insanity. But, then, was it indeed true that his hand had not been suddenly hurried into a deed of violence such as he had committed against Robert Waldron? How was she to be sure of that? Rose was dead—murdered. Who could be guilty, if it were not her father?

"Where are we going to?" she asked, and the simplicity of her question struck her forcibly amid the perplexity of their circumstances.

"We are going to Paris," he answered; "after that, anywhere that I can be safe."

It was evident that John Morley was looking to his daughter for direction.

The morning dawned before Hester could form any plan for the future. She saw the pale streaks of light coming across the smooth level of the sea, and playing upon the edge of its soft ripple. The captain came and looked compassionately upon her father's pallid face, and she called a shadowy smile to her lips and eyes as she met his gaze.

"Good-morning," he said, in a low tone; "we have had a very fine passage across."

"Yes," she answered.

"You have crossed before?" he continued.

"No," said Hester.

"Well, there is no trouble; the omnibus will be at the gate of the custom-house to take you straight on to the station. I will get your luggage passed quickly."

"We have scarcely any luggage," she answered, with an inward tremor; "only my father's valise. I shall buy all I want in Paris."

"To be sure," said the captain; "you will get everything in the first fashion there."

A spasm of hysterical laughter contracted Hester's throat, and played oddly upon her face. A flash of the grotesque darted across the profound darkness of her circumstances; but it brought with it a vivid quickening of her oppressed brain. She saw what she could do. She would pass quickly through Paris with her father, not tarrying there at all, and go on to Burgundy. She knew well by the minute description of Lawson's mother the little town from which she had come. It was a very quiet, very remote place, several leagues from the nearest line of rail, and where the visit of any English was an almost unheard-of thing. In this hour of keen mental activity she could recollect the names of the curé, the doctor, the baker even, all whose histories the garrulous old Frenchwoman had loved to narrate. The little town did not seem strange to Hester. It offered her an asylum from afar off within its old gray walls. She knew the patois of the province well; she could speak it as freely as the purer French Robert Waldron had perfected her in. This should be their city of refuge.

Hester experienced no difficulty in making her way through Paris. Her habit of conversing in French with Lawson and his mother had given her a fluent use of the language; and though her manner and appearance, as well as her father's, were unmistakably English, she had no need to attract unusual attention to them by any ignorance or difficulty on her part. She made inquiries as to the route for Burgundy, and went at once from one station to the other, staying no more than a few hours in Paris.

They arrived in safety and without observation at the small country station to which they were bound. There were yet six leagues to accomplish before reaching Ecquemonville; but an omnibus from that town was waiting for the train. It was a four hours' journey, for the diligence was heavy and cumbrous, and the cart-horses attached to it by rope harness were slow-footed; four miles and a half an hour was the utmost speed they could attain. After the rapid whirl and the overwhelming excitement of the last thirty-six hours Hester found a relief in the slow progress of their conveyance. She was worn out, and her heavy eyes scarcely saw the strange country they were traversing; but John Morley was all eager and surprised attention. They were crossing a level plain of several miles, with neither hedgerows nor clumps of trees to vary its uniform aspect, except that here and there, at the interval of two or three miles, they passed a coppice of stone-pines; and that very far away in the marvellous clear light of the distance there stretched a black, irregular line against the horizon, which spoke plainly of a forest.

Since the moment the steamer had left the pier at Folkstone, John Morley had abandoned himself implicitly to Hester's guidance. He did not ask where she was taking him, though his mind was all alert to the impressions the novel scenery was producing upon it. He had never been out of England; and, as we know, for the last eleven years he had travelled no farther from his house than to the chapel where he had always been wont to worship. He had passed through sharp dolor and sore travail, and come out after the sharpest and sorest pang of all into this new life, where every object was fresh and strange to him. His brain, with a healing forgetfulness, refused to recall the later scenes through which he had come.

Everything about his route diverted his thoughts. The blue blouses of the peasantry, the coquettish snow-white caps of the country-women, the jingle of the bells about the horse-gear, the wonderful blue of the sky, the clear dark shadows, the golden harvest of the vast plain ripening in the full light of the June sun, withdrew him from his morbid musings. By fine gradations, as fine as the footsteps with which the morning steals toward the sleeping earth, his bent and heavy eyebrows relaxed a little, and the rigidity of his lips softened. One might have said toward the close of their journey, when they came in sight of the little town, lying in a valley, and girded about with vineyards with gray old walls and narrow gateways, giving it the aspect of a true city of refuge—one might have said that his face kindled with a smile struggling from his soul, but scarcely strong enough to reach the surface.

The only thoughts Hester's weary mind could retain had been anxious ones. Her father had given up his pocket-book to her; and she had found in it notes worth $500, the residue of the money lent by Mr. Waldron. She knew pretty well the cost of living in this remote part of Burgundy, and that this sum, with her thrifty economy, would keep them well for eighteen months or more. But what was to become of them? Were they really exiled forever from England and Little Aston? Safe they would be, but what a safety! The diligence entered Ecquemonville under a gateway in the thick walls, with the old gates still hanging upon their hinges, and grown over with lichens and mosses. It stopped before an inn on one side of the square which formed the market-place, with an obelisk in its centre. A group of curious loungers awaited its arrival, and a bevy of laundresses, who were washing at a fountain close by, paused in their work as it drove up. Hester and her father descended from it, and caused as great a sensation as if they had fallen in their midst from the clouds. But, with these exceptions, the place was all silent and deserted, not a creature was to be seen; for the sultry heat of the afternoon had driven the townspeople to their coolest retreats.

"Can you tell me if the widow Limet has apartments to let now?" asked Hester of the conductor of the diligence, who had been staring at her and her father ever since descending from his high seat, without blinking his eyelids once, and whose eyes opened still wider at this question.

"The widow Limet!" he stammered; "is it that madame knows widow Limet?"

"No," she answered, with a wan smile; "but I have heard she sometimes has rooms to let; and as we may stay here some time, I prefer going there to living at an hotel."

He would conduct them to the widow Limet's, he said; and they followed him, Hester recognizing the place from the minute and frequent descriptions of Lawson's mother. Here were the shops, with their odd miscellany of wares, the cafés painted in gay colors, the butchers' open stalls, with their dwarf orange trees and flowers—all of which Madame had loved to contrast with the dingy streets of Little Aston. Toward one corner of the square, five or six of the shops, having their upper floor projecting above them for eight feet or more, were as cool and almost as dark as cellars. At one of these their conductor stopped, and called aloud for the widow Limet, who appeared from some inner recess, and engaged at once in a combat of words with the guide, so garrulous and voluble, that Hester could not put in a syllable for some time.

"We have been recommended to you," she said, recollecting how often Lawson's mother had urged her to go to Burgundy. "My father and I want some rooms for several months. He cannot speak French. Will you let us look at your apartments?"

The widow Limet led the way up-stairs to the room projecting over the shop—an odd place to English eyes. The walls had been stencilled in gaudy colors and grotesque designs. The uncarpeted floor had been waxed and brushed to a dangerous polish. A bed, with red cotton hangings, stood in a recess, but the rest of the furniture was evidently intended to serve for a sitting room. A closet opened out of it containing a smaller bed, which Hester decided would do very well for herself. The accommodation was simple but inexpensive; eight francs ($1.60) a week, with attendance, being the rent the widow Limet asked for it.

In a short time John Morley and Hester were seated at the centre-table, with an impromptu meal before them of omelettes and dried fruits, and cherries such as they never tasted in England. John Morley ate heartily, but in vague amazement. The elderly voluble Frenchwoman trotting in and out with some utterly foreign dish in her hand, and an unintelligible jargon upon her tongue; the bottles of wine she brought in, which she held up between his eyes and the light that he might see the golden bubbles imprisoned in them; the ease with which Hester understood and answered—all was odd and inexplicable, but he would give himself up to it. There was something terrible in the past, over which a thick curtain had fallen, and he would not lift it so long as it would hang there undisturbed.

That night Hester slept a heavy, dreamless sleep—the sleep of utter exhaustion, when the brain slumbers as profoundly as the body. Nature exacted this repose rigorously; and now that the immediate strain was over, now that the walls of the city encompassed them about, Hester could yield herself to it. She slept far into the next day, and found, when she awoke, her father sitting at her side, watching her with the care and tenderness of a mother.

Hester had been too much occupied in watching and caring for her father and in considering what course they should take to think of affairs at home. With daylight, however, and the relief from anxiety came the return of perplexity, and she began to wonder what was taking place in the little village so many miles away. If she had possessed the gift clairvoyants profess to have, this is what she would have seen:

On the Saturday evening when John Morley fled in a panic of fear from his own home and town, he had scarcely passed the chapel before Madame Lawson emerged from the narrow alley opposite to it. She was going, as she had promised Hester, to wait on John Morley. It was quite dusk, a season which the old foreigner preferred for her walks, in consequence, as she said, of the impoliteness of the English boys, who generally hailed her appearance with numerous rough greetings. She had left her son comfortably settled for the night, with permission to sleep in her own bed, which preserved its air of state in the English garret.

She knocked in vain for some time at John Morley's house-door, but at last she tried the handle, which turned readily in her grasp. It was very quiet within, but a light was shining in the inner room, and she proceeded there boldly. It was John Morley's lamp burning as he had left it, and shedding its accustomed gleam upon the books scattered around it. Madame puckered her eyebrows, and hummed a little song, but no voice or sound answered her. She took up the lamp and went into the kitchen; all was quiet and orderly there as the servant had left it, with the fire almost dead in the bottom of the grate. Up-stairs, with the lamp still in her hands, for it was quite dark now inside the house, proceeded madame, peering through each open door as she passed it. No one was to be seen. Where, then, was monsieur? and where was the servant? She could not have held any conversation with either of them, but she wished to see their faces and make her salutation to them.

The still solitude daunted her; and she crossed herself several times, muttering a little prayer, as she had hummed a tune down-stairs. There was another door open at the end of the passage, and she went on toward it. A faint scent of mould and mildew met her, like the air from a vault. Upon the bare planks she was treading there were spots of blood, but her eyes did not detect them. She entered the room and looked around her. There, upon the sofa, lay a woman, perfectly motionless, with a shawl laid over her. Madame, frightened now, but brave with the courage of old age, approached her, and raised the covering from her face.

A marble face, icy cold, with rigid lips and frozen eyelids; the hands also chilly and numb. Yet to her experienced touch—for in her station an aged woman has felt the clay-cold frigidity of death too often to be easily deceived—there was still a degree of warmth which spoke of life lingering about the heart. She saw quickly that there was little which she could do, and that immediate help was necessary; but how could she make any one understand that she wanted Mr. Grant called in? Her shrewdness, a French subtlety which made her keen at scenting any intrigue, recoiled from the idea of bringing this incident before the public if it could be avoided. She raised Rose's head a little, put a drop or two of eau de vie, which she carried about her, into her mouth ; and, then locking the front door carefully, to provide against any other intrusion like her own, she hastened as quickly as she could to Grant's house.

Fortunately for the explanation of her errand, she saw, upon approaching the house, Robert Waldron standing at the gate in conversation with Grant.

The twilight had not quite faded here outside of the town, and a soft, exquisite tranquillity, the indescribable sense of repose which can only exist at the end of the week, before the dawn of a day of rest and truce with labor, pervaded the whole evening scene. Within the house Annie was just kindling a light, and she could be seen, with her bright face, leaning over the new flame in the lamp. Robert had just looked in and sighed to himself as he talked with Grant, whose lot seemed so much more enviable than his own, when madame threw herself upon his arm, and poured forth her hurried story, which came like a crash of thunder upon him.

"Good heavens! what is the matter?" cried Grant, as Robert reeled and caught at the gate to keep himself from falling.

"He has discovered her and murdered her!" gasped Robert. "Come ; there is life yet, she says. Be quick, Grant. Come with me instantly,"

THE VOICE OF WISDOM.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 30, Prov. 8. Golden Text, ver. 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Wisdom Incarnate—Christ in Eternity Past—Delighting in Men—Wisdom not Forced upon us—Her Munificent Offer—Must be Sought—Treasured—The Keeping Power—Joy and Health in her Hand—Her Paths Peace—Her Words Plain to the Understanding Man—Her House and her Bountiful Feast.

OUR blessed Lord Jesus is of God "made unto us Wisdom" (1 Cor. 1 : 30). He it is who speaks under the name of Wisdom in the Old Testament Scriptures. "The Lord by Wisdom hath founded the earth" (ch. 3 : 19). "All things were made by Him ; and without Him was not anything made that was made" (John 1 : 3). "He hath made the earth by His power, He hath established the world by His wisdom" (Jer. 10 : 12). What power? What wisdom? "Christ the Power of God, and the Wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1 : 24). Christ is just as He is Truth embodied (John 14 : 6), Love embodied (1 John 4 : 16), and the Word embodied (John 1 : 1, 14). "In the beginning was the Word" (John 1 : 1). "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." Jesus, God's Wisdom and our Wisdom, was not only before all created things, but He was the Agent in the creation, and the Witness of all the creative work of God ; "when He prepared the heavens, I was there ; when He set a compass upon the face of the depth ; when He established the clouds above ; when He strengthened the fountains of the deep. . . . Then I was by Him, as one brought up with Him."

One glimpse is given us of our beloved Lord in these early prehistoric times : "I was daily His delight . . . My delights were with the sons of men." "Rejoicing always before Him ; rejoicing in the habitable part of His earth." Our blessed Lord was always the joy of His Father, and the Father was always His joy. But how unspeakably marvellous it is that He should rejoice in "the sons of men!" Before our creation there was joy in the heart of God in the glorious purpose which He had to make man in His own image, conform him to the likeness of His Son, and then dwell in him as the one only part of His earth

HABITABLE FOR GOD.

Oh, how glorious it is that before man fell, and before Satan knew anything of God's purpose in creating him, God had conceived the idea of making man a "temple of the Holy Ghost," "an habitation of God through the Spirit!" With God a thousand years is as one day, and one day as a thousand years ; with Him to think is to do, and to speak is to do ; and thus we find Him rejoicing in man before his very existence.

But Wisdom does not force herself upon us ; she "crieth without ; she uttereth her voice in the streets ; she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates ; in the city she uttereth her words" (ch. 1 : 20, 21). What, then, is

HER COMMUNICATION?

It is not the "thou shalt" of the law ; she comes to the simple ones, the scorners, and the fools who are willing to turn at her reproof, with the message of love, "I will pour out my Spirit unto you." There is no binding of burdens too heavy to be borne, like the hard teaching of the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 23 : 4). Wisdom, i.e. Jesus, calls only for one thing, "Turn, and I will do the rest," "I will pour out my Spirit unto you." With the Spirit of Wisdom how can we not be wise? "I will make known my words unto you" (ch. 1 : 23). But we may miss the teaching of wisdom—yes, we often do—through inattention. Wise in our own conceits, we are very slow to learn how dependent we are every moment and in every circumstance on our divine Wisdom, Jesus Chirst. "My son, attend unto my wisdom, and bow thine ear to my understanding" (ch. 5 : 1).

Wisdom is to be sought after ; "My son, if thou wilt receive my words, and hide my commandments with thee ; so that thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thine heart to understanding ; yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding ; if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures, then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God" (ch. 2 : 1–5). God may speak, but if we do not receive personally into our own hearts the words He speaks, we are none the better for them. And when received, unless we hide them with us as treasures which we open and look at again and again as being priceless, we do not find all that God has to give. A word of power perhaps has struck us, when some deeply taught child of God has been preaching or speaking ; we have failed to ask, "Lord, art thou speaking to me?" and for want of appropriating it by faith, the precious treasure has been lost to us ; it has not become the living Word within us. The Word received becomes power.

"WHEN WISDOM ENTERETH INTO

thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul ; discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee" (ch. 2 : 10, 11). Christ in us is the keeping power ; He alone can deliver us from all evil. Men seek in vain to deliver themselves by reasoning themselves into freedom from lust or passion, worldliness or pride. The foe they deal with is stronger than they, and the great adversary is thoroughly up to the game he plays. But when a stronger than he is let into the heart, and the whole struggle is given over to Him with a master hand, He conquers and delivers.

Wisdom brings both

with her. "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold" (ch. 3 : 13, 14). What is this merchandise? Surely it is the giving of what we are, and what we have in exchange for what Jesus is, and what He has for us. "She is more precious than rubies : and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her" (ch. 3 : 15). Why is this? Because Jesus alone can fill a human heart. He created us with capacities to receive Himself, and nothing else can compare to Him or take the same place We may have the strongest desires for deep spiritual blessing, and think we have obtained what we desire ; but disappointment follows unless it is Jesus Himself that we obtain. Not forgiveness only, but Jesus Himself who pardons ; not holiness only, but Jesus the Holy One ; not healing only, but the healing One—the Lord that healeth thee, the Lord that sanctifieth thee, He that blotteth out thy transgressions. If we have Him, we have all in Him.

"Length of days is in her right hand." This is again and again repeated in substance. "She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her," and this surely for spirit, soul and body (ch. 3 : 16, 18). "Receive my sayings ; and the years of thy life shall be many. . . . Incline thine ear unto my sayings . . . for they are life unto those that find them and health to all their flesh" (ch. 4 : 10, 20, 22). Christ is the Word of God ; by Him all things were made, by Him all things consist. Having Christ, the living Word, in all His creative and upholding power dwelling within us, how can we be other than recreated and upheld in all our being? "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all

HER PATHS ARE PEACE"

(ch. 3 : 17). Thank God, no sooner has He succeeded in leading us to present our bodies a living sacrifice to Him, and so to renounce our own will, than He gives us to prove what a good and perfect and acceptable will His is (Rom. 12 : 1, 2), so that things which we could not endure to think of become absolutely pleasant to us. "I could not work among drunkards," said a Christian lady ; "the very sight of them revolts me." But that very lady, when she gave herself, with all her will and desires, to be the Lord's, underwent such a transformation that it became her joy to do what before was so repugnant. The way of the cross became to her "pleasantness ;" even more, intense joy.

The words of Wisdom are "excellent things," "right things," "truth." "All the words of my mouth are in righteousness ; there is nothing froward or perverse in them. They are all plain to and right to them that find knowledge." Who is he that understandeth? Not the natural man ; for he "receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God ; for they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things." Again, "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him" (1 Cor. 2 : 11, 14, 15)? A dog cannot understand what concerns a man, an inferior creature cannot understand a superior, by any intrinsic power in him ; how much less can a creature understand his Creator? God can understand God ; God the Holy Ghost in us can understand God the Father and the Son ; He guides into all truth those who will let themselves be guided. "Counsel is mine and sound wisdom ; I am understanding ; I have strength." Here is the whole thing : Christ, i.e. Wisdom, is understanding ; yes, Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith.

"I love them that love me ; and those that seek me early shall find me." Is it not marvellous that such as Jesus should prize our love at all? that He should be willing to reciprocate anything which comes from us? Wisdom does yet more : she builds her house, furnishes her table, and then calls us to be her guests. "Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled." "Come and partake of the divine nature, come and eat the bread of God ; come and drink the new wine of the kingdom!" Well may wisdom say, "Riches and honor are with me ; yea, durable riches and righteousness." Well may she say, "I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment : that I may cause those that love me to inherit substance ; and I will fill their treasures." Even when judgment is a necessary thing for Christ's true disciples, He uses it only to lead from the shadow to the substance, from all else to Himself.

WHY DOST THOU WAIT?

Poor, trembling lamb! Ah! who, outside the fold
Has bid thee stand, all weary as thou art,
Dangers around thee, and the bitter cold
Creeping and growing to thy inmost heart?
Who bids thee wait till some mysterious feeling,
Thou know'st not what—perchance may'st never know—
Shall find thee, when in darkness thou art kneeling,
And fill thee with a rich and wondrous glow
Of love and faith; and change to warmth and light
The chill and darkness of thy spirit's night?

For miracles like this who bids thee wait?
Behold "the Spirit and the Bride say, 'Come,'"
The tender Shepherd opens wide the gate,
And in His love would gently lead thee home.
Why should'st thou wait? Long centuries ago,
Thou timid lamb, the Shepherd paid for thee!
Thou art his own. Would'st thou His beauty know,
Nor trust the love which yet thou can'st not see?
Thou hast not learned this lesson to receive:
More blest are they who see not, yet believe.

Still dost thou wait for feeling? Dost thou say,
"Fain would I love and trust, but hope is dead,
I have no faith, and without faith, who may Rest in the blessing which is only shed
Upon the faithful? I must stand and wait."
Not so. The Shepherd does not ask of thee
Faith in thy faith, but only faith in Him.
And this He meant in saying, "Come to Me."
In light or darkness, seek to do His will,
And leave the work of faith to Jesus still.

A FAMOUS PICTURE.—The Last Supper of the Saviour and the Apostles at Jerusalem. This most remarkable gem of art is pronounced by the highest authority, one of the finest pure line steel-plate engravings of this century. It is just what it is represented to be. We have examined it and are quite sure that no one who orders it will be in the least disappointed.

LOW COST HOUSES.—The Atlas of Low Cost House Plans, advertised in another column, is well worth its cost to any one interested in the subject. Moreover, the subject is one which should interest almost every man. If the leading men of a community, by example or advice, see that the houses built are beautiful, convenient, healthy and economical, they would confer a lasting benefit which would be felt for generations.

THE announcement we made two weeks ago of the death of the Right Honorable Henry Fawcett may not have had to our readers, just then engrossed with the Presidential election, a subject of closer interest, the significance properly belonging to it. We now give his portrait, with that of his wife, in order that the lessons of a life so full of grand teaching may be duly appreciated. It may be that some poor sufferer, groaning under a burden that seems to crush him to the dust, closing to him the avenues to greatness, and shutting him out from the paths of honorable ambition, may be encouraged by this dead statesman's example to put aside from him the cup of despair and once more take heart to struggle and strive to make his life a blessing to the world.

A CRUSHING CALAMITY

fell upon this man when he was twenty-five years of age. Life was opening before him with unusual promise. He had won by hard labor honors coveted by all ambitious young men of his day. It seemed to others, as doubtless it did to him, that the mental powers which had achieved distinctions so brilliant might enable him to win his way to the highest offices in the gift of his country. He was just entering on this career when suddenly—in a moment, he was stricken with total blindness. In one instant

"Shut from the living while amongst the living;
Dark as the grave amidst the bustling world;
At once from business and from pleasure barr'd;
No more to view the beauty of the spring,
Nor see the face of kindred, or of friend."

HEROISM

of the highest kind sprang up under the ordeal. It was a stupendous catastrophe for a young man of twenty-five, under which one would not have been surprised if he had sat down in melancholy resignation, despairing of ever doing any useful work more. But that was not young Fawcett's rôle. He knew that henceforth he was

"From the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
Presented with a universal blank
Of nature's works, expunged and razed,
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out."

But he was not crushed. His power of will and his determination to make his way appeared to have been invigorated by the calamity, and he set himself to work with renewed vigor and with a marvellous capacity for adapting himself to the strange circumstances of a life of total darkness in which "feeling was to be his only sight." On November 6th, 1884, twenty-six years later, he died, having done a work in his darkne s which astonished his countrymen and which won tributes of affection and esteem from millions of Asiatics who had never looked on his poor blind face. He died universally regretted, leaving his country to wonder doubtingly whether any seeing man could be found to do so well the work that this sightless man had begun, but had left unfinished.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Henry Fawcett was born near Salisbury, England, in 1833. His father was a gentleman farmer and a Radical who took part in the Anti-corn Law agitation. The boy was educated at the Agricultural College at Queenwood, Hampshire; at King's College, London, and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he took his degree and won the honors of seventh wrangler in 1856 and was elected to a fellowship. He then studied for the bar at Lincoln's Inn. At this time he is described as being a young man of fine physique and excellent promise. No one could look upon the late professor but he could see on his face the evident indications of courage, frankness, and inteligence. He was six feet two inches in height, very blonde, his light hair and complexion, and his smooth, beardless face giving him something of the air of a boy. His features were at once strongly marked and regular.

It was during his training for the profession of the law that the calamity occurred which changed the whole current of his life. In September, 1858, Mr. Fawcett took a brief respite from his studies and went home. It was the season of partridge shooting, and on the seventeenth of the month the young man, who was always an ardent lover of outdoor sports, made one of a party for the moors. During the day's sport a covey rose and flew over a little hillock, on the opposite side of which Mr. Fawcett had disappeared. A companion—one account says his own father—fired just as his head topped the rising ground and two pellets perforated the spectacles he was wearing and lodged themselves, by a singular fatality, exactly in the centre of each eye, causing instant blindness. The accident occurred on a spot overlooking Salisbury Cathedral, and the last view Mr. Fawcett was able to perceive was thus associated with his native place.

THE FIRST YEAR OF DARKNESS

was devoted to hard study. No sooner did young Fawcett learn that his blindness was incurable than by an effort, the cost of which none but he knew, he put aside all vain regrets and matured his plans for his strangely altered future. Lincoln's Inn gracefully offered to give him the standing of a barrister without further study, but he realized that his blindness would incapacitate him for the legal profession, and so, though much touched by this unprecedented act of kindness, he declined it with sincere expressions of appreciation.

He returned to the college at Cambridge, of which he was "a fellow," and devoted himself to the study of political economy. John Stuart Mill was his great friend and he became Mill's pupil, taking long and pleasant walks with him and listening not only to his learned disquisitions on political economy, but drinking in the graphic descriptions of picturesque wayside scenery eloquently given by his erudite and grave companion. With the aid of a reader, who now became his constant companion, he made rapid progress in his studies. It seemed as if the process of mental digestion was quickened by his darkness, and his memory certainly became more retentive. In just a year after the calamity, he attended the meetings of the British Association at Aberdeen, and delivered an address upon "The Economic Effects of the Recent Gold Discoveries." As this paper was full of elaborate statistics, the extraordinary strength of the speaker's memory was tested in a remarkable degree; but he mastered all his difficulties, and surprised his hearers by the readiness with which he answered the objections advanced against his theories.

Gradually, too, his love of

prompted him to try how small were the deprivations entailed upon him by his loss of sight. He had been an expert angler, and although this pursuit might be supposed to require sight as much as sensitiveness of touch, he was able to follow it after he lost his sight, on the banks of his favorite river, the Itchen. This was doubtless owing to the fact that he was very familiar with its waters, and when taken to various points of the river, he could throw the line with great advantage.

His success encouraged him to make further efforts, until after a few years all his outdoor pleasures were resumed. Walking, rowing, and skating he delighted in, and frequently went for a spin of thirty or forty miles on the ice in the Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire fens. One who saw him skating twelve years after he lost his sight describes the beautiful significance of what he saw. The blind man was enjoying the exhilarating exercise guided by his little daughter, a child of eleven years, who went a few paces ahead. She was whistling sweetly, and her father's quick ear detected by her intonations the course to take and avoided with exact precision any obstacle in the way, turning to the right or the left with perfect confidence as she indicated.

His last achievement in this line was to resume hunting, of which also he was very fond. As a hard rider after hounds, over hedges and ditches, though he was sightless, he had few rivals; and there was a joke against him at Cambridge that the livery stable keepers have two tariffs—one ordinary for those who have not been seen in the society of Professor Fawcett, and one extraordinary—fifty per cent higher—for those who have.

His pedestrian powers were remarkable, and few companions would venture on an excursion with him without first stipulating on a limit of distance. His topographical knowledge was so minute that when his guides were at fault he not unfrequently directed them—from early recollections of natural objects, of course. He regularly frequented the Univeristy boat race on the Thames, and was as heartily interested in the proceedings of the day as the keenest-eyed observer. At Cambridge he was stroke oar of the "Ancient Mariners" boat, and a better stroke no crew of "mariners," ancient or modern, need desire. He was also a good swimmer.

A CAMBRIDGE PROFESSOR.

Mr. Fawcett's studies led to the production of a volume on the subject with which his name is most closely identified. His "Manual of Political Economy" was one of the most lucid and convincing works ever produced on the subject, and edition after edition was called for by the public. Beside this standard work he wrote short essays on branches of the same subject, remarkable for cogent thought and accuracy and force of expression, and these appeared in the leading reviews. Mr. Fawcett soon became known as an authority in this field second only to John Stuart Mill. So high did his reputation rise that Cambridge, in 1863, honored itself by making him Professor of Political Economy.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

His position was now assured, but his ambition was not satisfied. He aspired to a seat in the great council of the nation. In England the great political parties do not hold conventions and nominate candidates as we do; any man who can find the money to discharge the legal expenses incident to the election, and who can find a few responsible men to nominate him can run as a candidate for Parliament. It is not even necessary that he should live in the city or county he desires to represent. Mr. Fawcett first offered himself to Southwark, one of the London constituencies. But finding that his canvass would divide the Radical party and probably lead to the election of a Conservative, he retired before polling-day. In 1863 he offered himself to Cambridge, but was defeated. The next year he ran as Liberal candidate in an election at Brighton and was again unsuccessful; but in 1865 there was another vacancy at Brighton, and the city reversed its decision of the year before and elected Mr. Fawcett. He continued to represent it until 1874, when he became member for Hackney, which he continued to represent until his death.

Two years later Mr. Fawcett married, and from that time until the day of his death he was indebted to his wife for help such as only an intelligent and loving woman can give to her husband.

In Parliament Mr. Fawcett did not fritter away his energies in the wide field of general legislation, but devoted himself to the special field he had made his own. He set himself resolutely to oppose waste of public money, and to check the tendency to lavish extravagance in the Government. As he became best known. Every scheme introduced to appropriate public money to the support of aristocratic idlers found in him a determined foe. He knew well the struggle the people had to make to pay their taxes. He knew that the effort to live honestly was hard enough for the great majority of the people, and that he could best aid them by guarding the national treasury against the horde of titled paupers who want to live at the public expense. He opposed the annual grant made to keep up the royal palaces, which the Queen has so seldom occupied since Prince Albert's death. He grudged her Majesty nothing necessary to her dignity, and was careful to say that if she wished to use these buildings as residences it was right that the large army of servants should be retained ; but he objected to appropriating the money of the people to pay a lot of servants, and the cost of maintaining palaces for the use of the Queen's numerous impecunious German friends.

Mr. Fawcett was equally earnest in defending the treasury against the people themselves. He resisted with all his might the poor-law system which, he believed, enabled idle loafers to live at the expense of the industrious classes. His war was with injustice in any form and his indignation was always aroused against any scheme which involved money being taken from the national treasury to support men who he thought ought to be working for their own living. Whether those men were aristocrats or paupers did not concern him, he was concerned only in limiting the expenses of the Government to the legitimate expenses of the Government, and in reducing those to the smallest sum compatible with efficiency.

THE FRIEND OF INDIA

was the title which he loved most, and which was given him in loving gratitude by the people of that land. India had few friends when Mr. Fawcett entered Parliament. The country had been regarded as the prey of aristocratic Englishmen, who too often went there to recruit their fortunes, wring out of it the utmost they could during their term of office, and return home to live in luxury for the remainder of their lives. Mr. Fawcett began by showing the people of England how poor India was, and after persistent efforts at last succeeded in having the Speaker appoint a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the condition of the Indian finances. He made on this occasion a strong attack upon the supposed Indian surpluses, which were always said to exist, but which were very difficult to realize. Again and again he was heard in the House of Commons upon Indian questions, which he understood better than any man in Parliament. He initiated an important discussion on an unjust proposal of financial management, condemning the increase in the duties on salt in Bombay and Madras, which was suggested in order to equalize them over India, when they might have been equalized by lowering them. He also denounced the imposition of the licence tax on trades and professions, as falling with most weight upon the poor.

HIS GREATEST EFFORT,

however, was made in 1867. A famine was desolating India, and the poor were dying by thousands for want of food. Just at that time the Sultan of Turkey visited England and was entertained at the public expense. The Government thought that as the friendship of the Sultan, which this entertainment was intended to foster, was chiefly valuable in connection with India, India ought to foot the bill. Mr. Fawcett's indignation knew no bounds as he heard this proposal, and in scathing terms he denounced the Government for attempting to tax the famine-stricken people to pay for the feasting of this Turkish despot. The eloquence of his address on the occasion has rarely been surpassed in Parliament.

A TESTIMONIAL FROM INDIA

came to him thirteen years afterward in recognition of his long and indefatigable services in behalf of that country. It consisted of a silver tea service and salver of Cutch work, enclosed in a carved wood case, also of native manufacture. The case was inscribed, " Presented to the Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, M.P., by his native friends and admirers in Bombay, India, June, 1880."

APPOINTED POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

When Mr. Gladstone came into power after the general election of 1880, he proffered Mr. Fawcett the office of Postmaster-General, which was accepted. Before the close of the first session of his official career, the new Postmaster-General had introduced several legislative reforms affecting the business of the Post-Office. The most important of these was the Money Orders Act, the object of which was to reduce the charge for orders, and to facilitate their currency. The cost of orders was reduced, and the transmission of the notes made less cumbrous.

Another reform was also introduced in connection with the Savings Bank, which is run in England in connection with the Post Office. It was provided that forms containing twelve spaces each could be obtained at the Post-Office, and when a penny stamp had been affixed in each space, the form might be put in the Savings Bank, and an account opened in the name of the depositor. These reforms the public speedily availed themselves of to a large extent. Mr. Fawcett also established a new Parcel Post, which has proved a great boon to the mercantile community, though as yet it has not been very successful financially. He further instituted many useful reforms in connection with the postal department, and brought the telegraphic service into a much greater state of efficiency than when he found it.

POST-OFFICE LIFE INSURANCE.

But of all the reforms by which Mr. Fawcett signalized his control of the Post-Office, perhaps there was none which promises to be more beneficial, especially to the working classes, than his elaborate scheme of Post-Office annuities and insurance, which came into operation in June of the present year. The chief reason which had heretofore prevented annuities and policies of life assurance from being obtained in any considerable number through the Post-Office was that so many cumbrous and troublesome formalities had to be gone through. Under the new scheme annuities and insurance are made through the deposits in the Post-Office Savings Banks.

There are more than seventy-four hundred Post-Office Savings Banks in England, Scotland and Ireland. The number of depositors is upward of three million, and the aggregate amount of deposits nearly $225,000,000. With a few exceptions, these depositors may devote any part of their deposits, or of the interest thereon, to the purchase of an annuity for old age, or to securing an insurance policy. A person may also become a depositor with the sole object of having his money applied to the purchase of an annuity or insurance policy. Annuities of any amount between $5 and $500 a year can be purchased on the life of any person not under five years of age. There is thus brought within the reach of every family a ready and feasible plan of insurance and annuity. Mr. Fawcett determined to make his scheme self-supporting, so that it should not become a charge in any way upon the taxpayers of the country. At the time of his death it is understood that he was engaged in perfecting other useful reforms in connection with the postal and telegraph services.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

In November, 1882, he was laid aside by severe illness. It was an instance of the rare coexistence of diphtheria and typhoid fever, which Dr. Murchison, in his large experience, appears to have met with only once, and which is only occasionally mentioned by other authors, chiefly foreign, who lay much stress on the gravity of the complication. His friends watched by his bed anxiously, and when at last he began slowly to recover they rejoiced with trembling, for his chief medical attendant wrote warning them of dangers that were imminent. He said : " New complications have arisen. The fever was making favorable progress when, on Saturday, December 9th, Mr. Fawcett had three distinct attacks of spasmodic cough, accompanied by hemorrhage from the upper part of the air passages. There is some ground for uneasiness lest lung mischief should be caused by the clots effused." These predictions have now been fulfilled.

On October 22d last he caught a severe cold, and had not recovered from it when important business required his presence in the House of Commons on October 30th. The night was chilly ; a cold north-west wind was blowing, and a heavy fog overhung the river Thames, by the side of which he walked to his residence near Vauxhall Station, his only companions being his secretary and the large briar-wood pipe which, in accordance with a long-standing habit, he lighted in the private room at the foot of the staircase leading to the reporters' gallery. It is feared that it was upon this occasion that he contracted the chill which led to grave and subsequently to fatal evils. Indeed, all through the treacherous weather which has recently prevailed in London he was never seen to wear an overcoat, and has more than once been gently remonstrated with by his friends for his imprudence.

Mr. Fawcett was, however, well enough to go to Cambridge a few days later to attend to his duties as professor. But there he was seized with pneumonia, aggravated by heart trouble. The best aid was of course rendered, but the case had evidently become a hopeless one—the patient grew weaker and weaker, and on November 6th Mr. Fawcett expired in the presence of his wife, and of her sister, Mrs. Garrett-Anderson, M.D., who had been assisting in nursing her distinguished relative, three other physicians being also present.

MRS. FAWCETT.

In his literary and other labors Mr. Fawcett found a helpmeet worthy of him in his wife, and of her invaluable assistance and tender care he was never tired of making grateful acknowledgment. This lady is a daughter of Mr. Newsome Garrett, of Aldeburgh, Suffolk, and they were married in 1867.

No public man ever had a wife better able to lighten his labors, or more ready to sympathize with his aims. Much trying and tedious assistance did Mrs. Fawcett render in her capacity as secretary and amanuensis. Mr. Fawcett in his blindness studied and followed current events by having books and newspapers read to him, and his books and essays were of course dictated by him. Much, if not most, of this oral and manual co-operation was contributed by Mrs. Fawcett. But she did a good deal more than this. She identified herself with the pursuits of her husband, and made herself familiar with the studies in which he was engaged. No small amount of Mr. Fawcett's literary work is due to their joint endeavors. Before his marriage he had published the first edition of his " Manual of Political Economy' and the " Economic Condition of the British Laborer," together with numerous periodical essays on kindred subjects. The first result of their collaboration was a volume of essays published in 1872 ; but Mrs. Fawcett had in 1869 furnished evidence of her own capacity by her " Political Economy for Beginners," which was followed, six years afterward, by " Tales in Political Economy." On the platform Mrs. Fawcett was a prominent supporter of the woman's rights programme, as was also her sister, Dr. Garret-Anderson. Mr. Fawcett also was an earnest advocate for the admission of women to the franchise.

In our frontispiece picture we give, with the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett, a view of the General Post-Office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, London. Below these are scenes illustrative of some of the departments engaged in the despatch of letters, etc., to their various destinations.

INTOLERANCE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 23, 1884.

"Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth: and he said Sibboleth: for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan."—JUDGES 12 : 6.

The Test Applied—A Small Difference—But Weighted with Death—The Denominations—Futility of Gag Laws—The Nothingarians—The Evil of Sectarianism—I. DO you notice the difference of pronunciation between shibboleth and sibboleth? A very small and unimportant difference, you say. And yet, that difference was the difference between life and death for a great many people. The Lord's people, Gilead and Ephraim, got into a great fight, and Ephraim was worsted, and on the retreat came to the fords of the river Jordan to cross. Order was given that all Ephraimites coming there be slain. But how could it be found out who were Ephraimites? They were detected by their pronunciation. Shibboleth was a word that stood for river. The Ephraimites had a brogue of their own, and when they tried to say shibboleth always left out the sound of the "h." When it was asked that they say shibboleth they said sibboleth, and were slain. "Then said they unto him, say now shibboleth; and he said sibboleth, for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him and slew him at the passages of Jordan." A very you say, between Gilead and Ephraim, and yet how much intolerance about that small difference! The Lord's tribes in our time—by which I mean the different denominations of Christians—sometimes magnify a very small difference, and the only difference between scores of denominations to-day is the difference between shibboleth and sibboleth.

THE CHURCH OF GOD IS DIVIDED into a great number of denominations. Time would fail me to tell of the Calvinists, and the Arminians, and the Sabbatarians, and the Baxterians, and the Dunkers, and the Shakers, and the Quakers, and the Methodists, and the Baptists, and the Episcopalians, and the Lutherans, and the Congregationalists, and the Presbyterians, and the Spiritualists, and a score of other denominations of religionists, some of them founded by very good men, some of them founded by very egotistic men, some of them founded by very bad men. But as I demand for myself liberty of conscience, I must give that same liberty to every other man, remembering that he no more differs from me than I differ from him. I advocate the largest liberty in all religious belief and form of worship. In art, in politics, in morals, and in religion, let there be no moving of the previous question, no persecution, no intolerance.

You know that the air and the water keep pure by constant circulation, and I think there is a tendency in religious discussion to purification and moral health. Between the fourth and the sixteenth centuries the Church proposed to make people think aright by prohibiting discussion, and by strong censorship of the press, and rack, and gibbet, and hot lead down the throat, tried to make people orthodox; but it was discovered that you cannot change a man's belief by twisting off his head, or that you can make a man see things differently by putting an awl through his eyes. There is something in a man's conscience which will hurl off the mountain that you threw upon it, and, unsinged of the fire, out of the flame will make red wings on which the martyr will mount to glory.

In that time of which I speak, between the fourth and sixteenth centuries, people went from the house of God into the most appalling iniquity, and right along by consecrated altars there were tides of drunkenness and licentiousness such as the world never heard of, and the very sewers of perdition broke loose and flooded the church. After a while the printing-press was freed, and it broke the shackles of the human mind. Then there came a large number of bad books, and where there was one man hostile to the Christian religion there were twenty men ready to advocate it; so I have not any nervousness in regard to this battle going on between Truth and Error.

THE TRUTH WILL CONQUER

just as certainly as that God is stronger than the devil. Let Error run if you only let Truth run along with it. Urged on by sceptic's shout and transcendentalist's spur, let it run. God's angels of wrath are in hot pursuit, and quicker than eagle's beak clutches out a hawk's heart God's vengeance will tear it to pieces.

I propose this morning to speak to you of its origin, its evils, and its cures. There are those who would make us think that this monster, with horns and hoofs, is religion. I shall chase it to its hiding-place, and drag it out of the caverns of darkness, and rip off its hide. But I want to make a distinction between bigotry and the lawful fondness for peculiar religious beliefs and forms of worship. I have no admiration for a nothingarian.

In a world of such tremendous vicissitude and temptation, and with a soul that must after awhile stand before a throne of insufferable brightness, in a day when the rocking of the mountains and the flaming of the heavens and the upheaval of the sea shall be among the least of the excitements, to give account for every thought, word, action, preference, and dislike—that man is mad who has no religious preference. But our early education, our physical temperament, our mental constitution, will very much decide

OUR FORM OF WORSHIP.

A style of psalmody that may please me may displease you. Some would like to have a minister in gown and bands and surplice, and others prefer to have a minister in plain citizens' apparel. Some are most impressed when a little child is presented at the altar and sprinkled of the waters of a holy benediction "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," and others are more impressed when the penitent comes up out of the river, his garments dripping with the waters of a baptism which signifies the washing away of sin. Either is right. Let either have his own way. One man likes no noise in prayer, not a word, not a whisper. Another man, just as good, prefers by gesticulation and exclamation to express his devotional aspirations. One is just as good as the other. "Every man fully persuaded in his own mind."

George Whitefield was going over a Quaker rather roughly for some of his religious sentiments, and the Quaker said: "George, I am as thou art; I am for bringing all men to the hope of the Gospel; therefore, if thou will not quarrel with me about my broad brim, I will not quarrel with thee about thy black gown. George, give me thy hand."

I. In tracing out the religion of sectarianism, or bigotry, I find that a great deal of

in the home circle. There are parents who do not think it wrong to caricature and jeer the peculiar forms of religion in the world, and denounce other sects and other denominations. It is very often the case that that kind of education acts just opposite to what was expected, and the children grow up, and, after a while, go and see for themselves; and looking in those churches, and finding that the people are good there, and they love God and keep His commandments, by natural reaction they go and join those very churches. I could mention the names of prominent ministers of the Gospel who spent their whole life bombarding other denominations and who lived to see their children preach the Gospel in those very denominations. But it is often the case that bigotry starts in a household, and that the subject of it never recovers. There are tens of thousands of

BIGOTS TEN YEARS OLD.

I think sectarianism and bigotry also rise from too great prominence of any one denomination in a community. All the other denominations are wrong, and his denomination is right because his denomination is the most wealthy, or the most popular, or the most influential, and it is "our" church, and "our" religious organization, and "our" choir, and "our" minister, and the man tosses his head, and wants other denominations to know their places. It is a great deal better in any community when the great denominations of Christians are about equal in power, marching side by side for the world's conquest. Mere outside prosperity, mere worldly power, is no evidence that the church is acceptable to God. Better a barn with Christ in the manger than a cathedral with magnificent harmonies rolling through the long-drawn aisle, and an angel from heaven in the pulpit, if there be no Christ in the chancel, and no Christ in the robes. Bigotry is often

THE CHILD OF IGNORANCE.

You seldom find a man with large intellect who is a bigot. It is the man who thinks he knows a great deal, but does not. That man is almost always a bigot. The whole tendency of education and civilization is to bring a man out of that kind of state of mind and heart. There was in the far East and one side of the obelisk was white, another side of the obelisk was green, another side of the obelisk was blue, and travellers went and looked at that obelisk, but they did not walk around it. One man looked at one side, another at another side, and they came home each one looking at only one side; and they happened to meet, the story says; and they got into a rank quarrel about the color of that obelisk. One man said it was white, another man said it was green, another man said it was blue, and when they were in the very heat of the controversy a more intelligent traveller came, and said: "Gentlemen, I have seen that obelisk, and you are all right, and you are all wrong. Why didn't you walk all around the obelisk?"

Look out for the man who sees only one side of a religious truth. Look out for the man who never walks around about these great theories of God and eternity and the dead. He will be a bigot inevitably—the man who only sees one side. There is no man more to be pitied than he who has in his head just one idea—no more, no less. More light, less sectarianism. There is nothing that will so soon kill bigotry as sunshine—God's sunshine.

II. So I have set before you what I consider to be the causes of bigotry. I have set before you the origin of this great evil. What are some of

THE BALEFUL EFFECTS?

First of all, it cripples investigation. You are wrong, and I am right, and that ends it. No taste for exploration, no spirit of investigation. From the glorious realm of God's truth, over which an archangel might fly from eternity to eternity and not reach the limit, the man shuts himself out and dies, a blind mole under a corn-shock. It stops all investigation.

While each denomination of Christians is to present all the truths of the Bible, it seems to me that God has given to each denomination an especial mission to give particular emphasis to some one doctrine; and so the Calvinistic churches must present the sovereignty of God, and the Arminian churches must present man's free agency, and the Episcopal churches must present the importance of order and solemn ceremony, and the Baptist churches must present the necessity of ordinances, and the Congregational Church must present the responsibility of the individual member, and the Methodist Church must show what holy enthusiasm, hearty congregational singing can accomplish. While each denomination of Christians must set forth all the doctrines of the Bible. I feel it is especially incumbent upon each denomination to put particular emphasis on some one doctrine.

Another great damage done by the sectarianism and bigotry of the church is that with the Christian religion. Now, my friends, the Church of God was never intended for a war barrack. People are afraid of a riot. You go down the street and you see an excitement, and missiles flying through the air, and you hear the shock of fire-arms. Do you, the peaceful and industrious citizen, go through that street? Oh, no! you will say, "I'll go around the block." Now, men come and look upon this narrow path to heaven, and sometimes see the ecclesiastical brickbats flying every whither, and they say, "Well, I guess I'll take the broad road; if it is so rough, and there is so much sharp shooting on the narrow road, I guess I'll try the broad road."

Francis I. so hated the Lutherans that he said if he thought there was one drop of Lutheran blood in his veins he would puncture them and let that drop out. Just as long as there is so much hostility between denomination and denomination, or between one professed Christian and another, or between one church and another, just so long men will be disgusted with the Christian religion, and say, "If that is religion, I want none of it."

Again, bigotry and sectarianism do great damage in the fact that they hinder the triumph of the Gospel. Oh, how much

how many men of splendid intellect have given their whole life to controversial disputes, when, if they had given their life to something practical, they might have been vastly useful! Suppose this morning, while I speak, there were coming up the bay through the Narrows, and all the forts around New York began to fire into each other—you would cry out, "National suicide! why don't those forts blaze away in one direction, and that against the common enemy?" And yet I sometimes see in the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ a strange thing going on: church against church, minister against minister, denomination against denomination, firing away into their own fort, or the fort which ought to be on the same side, instead of concentring their energy and giving one mighty and everlasting volley against the navies of darkness riding up through the bay!

I go out sometimes in the summer, and I find two beehives, and these two hives are in a quarrel. I come near enough, not to be stung, but I come just near enough to hear the controversy, and one beehive says, "That field of clover is the sweetest," and another beehive says, "That field of clover is the sweetest." I come in between them, and I say, "Stop this quarrel; if you like that field of clover best, go there; if you like that field of clover best, go there; but let me tell you that that hive which gets the most honey is the best hive!" So I come out between the churches of the Lord Jesus Christ. One denomination of Christians says, "That field of Christian doctrine is best," and another says, "This field of Christian doctrine is best." Well, I say, "go where you get the most honey." That is the best church which gets the most honey of Christian grace for the heart, and the most honey of Christian usefulness for the life.

Beside that, if you want to build up any denomination, you will never build it up by trying to pull some other down. Intolerance never put anything down. How much has Intolerance accomplished, for instance, against the Methodist Church? For long years her ministry were forbidden the pulpits of Great Britain. Why was it that so many of them preached in the fields? Simply because they could not get in the churches. And the name of the Church was given in derision and as a sarcasm. The critics of the church said, "They have no order, they have no method in their worship;" and the critics, therefore, in irony called them "Methodists."

I am told that in Astor Library, New York, kept as curiosities there are seven hundred and seven books and pamphlets against Methodism. Did Intolerance stop that church? No; it is either first or second amid the denominations of Christendom, her missionary stations in all parts of the world, her men not only important in religious trusts, but important also in secular trusts. Church marching on, and the more intolerance against it, the faster it marched.

What did Intolerance accomplish against the Baptist Church? If laughing scorn and tirade could have destroyed the church it would not have to-day a disciple left.

The Baptists were hurled out of Boston in olden times. Those who sympathized with them were confined, and when a petition was offered asking leniency in their behalf, all the men who signed it were indicted. Has Intolerance stopped the Baptist Church? The last statistics in regard to it showed twenty thousand churches and two million communicants. Intolerance never put down anything.

In England a law was made against the Jew. England thrust back the Jew and thrust down the Jew, and declared that no Jew should hold official position. What came of it? Were the Jews destroyed? Was their religion overthrown? No. Who became Prime Minister of England only a little while ago? Who was next to the throne? who was higher than the throne because he was counsellor and adviser? Disraeli, a Jew. What were we celebrating in all our churches as well as synagogues only a few weeks ago? The one hundredth birthday anniversary of Montefiore, the great Jewish philanthropist. Intolerance never yet put down anything.

THE REMEDY FOR SECTARIANISM.

III. But now, my friends, having shown you the origin of bigotry or sectarianism, and having shown you the damage it does, I want briefly to show you how we are to war against this terrible evil, and I think we ought to begin our war by realizing our own weakness and our imperfections. If we make so many mistakes in the common affairs of life, is it not possible that we may make mistakes in regard to our religious affairs? Shall we take a man by the throat, or by the collar, because he cannot see religious truths just as we do? In the light of eternity it will be found out, I think, there was something wrong in all our creeds, and something right in all our creeds. But since we may make mistakes in regard to things of the world, do not let us be so egotistic and so puffed up as to have an idea that we cannot make any mistake in regard to religious theories. And then I think we will do a great deal to overthrow the sectarianism from our heart, and the sectarianism from the world, by chiefly enlarging in those things in which we agree rather than those on which we differ.

Now, here is

A GREAT GOSPEL PLATFORM.

A man comes up on this side the platform and says, "I don't believe in baby sprinkling." Shall I shove him off? Here is a man coming up on this side the platform, and he says, "I don't believe in the perseverance of the saints." Shall I shove him off? No. I will say, "Do you believe in the Lord Jesus as your Saviour? do you trust Him for time and for eternity?" He says, "Yes." "Do you take Christ for time and for eternity?" "Yes." I say, "Come on, brother; one in time and one in eternity; brother now, brother forever." Blessed be God for a Gospel platform so large that all who receive Christ may stand on it!

I think we may overthrow the severe sectarianism and bigotry in our hearts, and in the church also, by realizing that all the denomination of Christians have yielded and noble men. There is nothing that so stirs my soul as this thought. One denomination yielded a Robert Hall and an Adoniram Judson; another yielded a Latimer and a Melville; another yielded John Wesley and the blessed Summerfield, while our own denomination yielded John Knox and the Alexanders—men of whom the world was not worthy. Now, I say, if we are honest and fair-minded men, when we come up in the presence of such churches and such denominations, although they may be different from our own, we ought to admire them, and we ought to love and honor them. Churches which can produce such men, and such large-hearted charity, and such magnificent martyrdom, ought to win our affection—at any rate, our respect. So come on, ye ninety-five thousand Episcopalians in this country, and ye four hundred thousand Presbyterians, and ye nine hundred thousand Baptists, and ye two million Methodists—come on; shoulder to shoulder we will march for the world's conquest; for all nations are to be saved, and God demands that you and I help do it. Forward, the whole line!

Moreover, we may also overthrow the feeling of severe sectarianism by joining other denominations in Christian work. I like when the spring-time comes and the anniversary occasions begin and all denominations come upon the same platform. That overthrows sectarianism. In the Young Men's Christian Associations, in the Bible Society, in the Tract Society, in the Foreign Missionary Society, shoulder to shoulder all denominations.

Perhaps I might more forcefully illustrate this truth by calling your attention to an incident which took place four, or five or six years ago. One Monday morning at about two o'clock, while her nine hundred passengers were sound asleep in her berths dreaming of home, crashed into Mars Head. Five hundred souls in ten minutes landed in eternity! Oh, what a scene! Agonized men and women running up and down the gangways, and clutching for the rigging, and the plunge of the helpless steamer, and the clapping of the hands of the merciless sea over the drowning and the dead, threw two continents into terror. But see this brave quartermaster pushing out with the life-line until he gets to the rock; and see these fishermen gathering up the shipwrecked, and taking them into the cabins, and wrapping them in the flannels snug and warm; and see that minister of the Gospel, with three other men, getting into a life-boat, and pushing out for the wreck, pulling away across the surf, and pulling away until they saved one more man, and then getting back with him to the shore. Can those men ever forget that night? And can they ever forget their companionship in peril, companionship in struggle, companionship in awful catastrophe and rescue? Never! Never! In whatever part of the earth they meet, they will be friends when they mention the story of that awful night when the Atlantic struck Mars Head.

THE STEAMER ATLANTIC

Well, my friends, our world has gone into a worse shipwreck. Sin drove it on the rocks. The old ship has lurched and tossed in the tempests of six thousand years. Out with the life-line! I do not care what denomination carries it. Out with the life-boat! I do not care what denomination rows it. Side by side, in the memory of common hardships, and common trials, and common prayers, and common tears, let us be brothers forever. We must be. We must be.

"Our army of the living God,
To whose command we bow;
Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now."

And I expect to see the day when all denominations of Christians shall join hands around the cross of Christ and recite the creed: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, and in the Communion of Saints, and in the life everlasting." May God inspire us all with the largest-hearted Christian charity!

SCEPTICAL NEIGHBORS.

By the Rev. Charles Courtenay.

PART II.

THE crowd gazed intently at Tom Shooter's window-shade.

At last a policeman came bustling up, with all the importance in the world and his "Make way, make way."

His loud authoritative rap at the door was immediately responded to, the bolt being withdrawn by Tom Shooter himself. He entered, and with him not a few of the spectators.

There was blood on the floor and on the stick. They took that in at a glance. The room was in great disorder, chairs being upon the table, and other articles of furniture in every imaginable place but the right one. There had evidently been a dreadful struggle.

The policeman fastened his eyes upon Tom Shooter with the most stern and official look he could summon up, and then asked this one question: "Where's the body?"

Was it an expression of guilt which sprang to Tom Shooter's face? The bystanders felt in their souls it was. It was certainly with amazement that he replied:

"The body! What do you mean?"

"The body of your poor murdered wife," shouted a man from the doorway.

Tom was evidently struggling with some emotion. Was it grief? A burst of uncontrollable laughter was his response. The whole thing had dawned upon him at last.

"The body! Why, there's the body," he said, pointing to the floor.

All eyes looked, and saw—the lifeless form of a monster rat.

The policeman looked at the people, and the people looked at the policeman. Tom Shooter and his wife, who had now entered from the back room, looked laughingly upon them all.

Nothing more was said. Those nearest the door quickly departed; and in a very few seconds the room was cleared of policeman and all.

A SUSPICIOUS VISIT.

Tom Shooter was a carpenter by trade, and by all accounts was as good a one as could be found the whole country through.

One morning there came an order from the host of the Rising Sun himself, to fit up some shelves and to do a few minor jobs in the place. This order was all the more noticeable from the fact that mine host knew very well Tom's principles and how energetically he opposed the drink. And so it was all the greater compliment that the teetotaler should be the workman he placed most faith in.

Tom didn't relish the idea of entering his old place of resort, but thinking it his duty to go, and offering up an earnest prayer for strength against temptation, he went.

Meanwhile, a little pantomime was being enacted outside. It seems one of the prophets had seen him enter the saloon, and had executed a sort of war dance at the sight, slapping his thigh, throwing his hat into the air, and performing other like antics.

"Trapped at last!" he gleefully exclaimed.

Then he said in a vindictive tone, "I'll unmask him, the old hypocrite."

His plan was to stop all the passers-by he knew, retaining them until Tom should emerge again from the door he had entered. In this way he thought Tom's broken pledge would be made most public.

"He's uncommon thirsty," said one, who was getting impatient at the time he was kept waiting.

"Aye, these teetotal fellers always go in for a good long pull when they once begin," suggested another.

"Won't he be fresh when he comes out?" said a third.

After having been kept a longer time than any of them had expected, it was suggested that probably Tom had escaped by the back door, and that it would be advisable for one of them to go boldly in as if to order some beer, and so to discover exactly how matters stood. A volunteer being easily found, they awaited the result.

He had been gone only a minute or so when he appeared before his expectant friends with a most woe-begone look on his face.

"He ain't a-drinking at all. He's a-carpentering."

This was enough. Without any more ado the little knot of malicious ones melted away as snow before the sunshine, thoroughly ashamed, I hope, of their most inhuman wishes.

THE NEW SALOON.

Whether it was that Tom's ill-natured neighbors were tired of looking out for falls, or that suspicious appearances were wanting, it was a fact that Tom had for some long time peace and quietness. He was let alone.

But the prophets were not dead. However little faith they had in Tom, they had plenty in themselves. Though they said but little, they kept their weather eye open, and waited for what they felt in their bones they were sure to see before long.

Tom, after he had paid his many debts, refurnished his empty home, and put his wife and children and himself into decent clothes, began to save money fast. In fact, he was himself surprised at the speed with which he was able to put by his banknotes, and at the way in which they grew. And so it was that before long he found himself master of a nice little sum.

Now it seems he had a great weakness for bricks and mortar, and moreover had great faith in them as an investment. And this being the case, it is not to be wondered at that he should determine to build. By joining with a friend, and combining their savings, he was well able to make a start.

One of our prophetical friends managed one day to get a surreptitious peep at the plans, and forthwith declared it as his firm conviction that Tom was going to erect a grog-shop. This was enough. The old hue and cry was revived. Tongues wagged most industriously. Heads were shaken with the profoundest wisdom.

It was declared that Tom's temperance was only depth and cunning. The landlord of the Rising Sun had cleared Tom's pockets, and now Tom was going to set up an opposition shop out of revenge.

Meanwhile the saloon grew and grew, taking every day more of its legitimate shape. And when the shelves were in position, with their plate-glass background, things began to look somewhat complete. When the sign was hung, the last touch was given.

The opening night, how shall I describe it? There was a crowd in the street. The prophets and their friends made up a goodly number of themselves, to say nothing of the thirsty topers who had turned out of the Rising Sun to test the new brew. According to the programme, the first drop was to be drawn at eight o'clock Moreover, all were to have a drink at the expense of the house.

Punctually to the minute, the doors were thrown open, and the crowd rushed in. There was Tom, all beaming behind the bar with his white apron, as complete a rum-seller as could be, waiting for his customers. And there too were the waiters, ready for action. They took these in very quickly. But those three huge copper urns, steaming hot, and shining like plate glass, what did they mean? And those provisions, and those bottles with strange names, and those texts upon the wall staring down so obtrusively, what did they mean? Before their puzzled wits could be settled, the drink was handed to them. But not in quart pots of pewter, nor in glasses, but in cups.

"Why, if it ain't tea!" said one.

"Why, if it ain't coffee!" said a second.

"Why, if it ain't cocoa!" said a third.

While the prophets, looking demurely upon one another, said, "Blest if we ain't sold again!"

Tom Shooter saw that this was the time to strike if he would win the day, so jumping upon a chair, he said:

"Friends, one and all, you're in the bar of a saloon, but it's a saloon without the drink. You've tasted what I sell, and I want to know whether it's not better stuff than you'll get at the Rising Sun?" ("Yes," said a voice.) "Will it go into your head?" ("No.") "Will it rouse your bad passions?" ("No.") "Will it make you thirstier than before?" ("No.") "Will it make you bad fathers, bad husbands, bad workmen, and bad men?" ("No.") "Will it ruin your health and make the fortunes of the pawnbrokers?" ("No.") "Then, I say, stick to this drink. Come here and quench your thirst. The place is yours to come and go when you like, and whether you want to buy or not, and remember you've always got a friend in Tom Shooter."

After this hearty speech, some cheered. And then others cheered, until at last it ended in all cheering.

Tom Shooter was never again suspected.

THE SEVENTY HEPTADS.

By Rev. G. A. Redles.

(From the Episcopal Recorder.)

WE have now to consider "The abomination of desolation" (Matt. 24 : 15) as a sign of our Lord's Coming, and of the End of the Age. Christ said, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet." There are three references in Daniel to "the abomination." One of these is found in Daniel 11 : 31. Another is found in Daniel 9 : 27. "For the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate." The marginal reading is clearer—"Upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolator." The context and other portions of the Word show that this refers to the close of this age. The Desolator plants the idols upon the battlements in the midst of the last of the seventy prophetical weeks.

Now what happens when the seventy weeks have expired? Daniel says, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression and to make an end of sins, and to bring in everlasting righteousness." Daniel's people are the Jews, and his city is Jerusalem. Concerning them the transgression is not yet finished and everlasting righteousness has not yet been brought in. As a nation they are still rejecting Christ and God's heavy hand is upon them and their holy city which continues to be trodden down of the Gentiles.

But what are we to understand about the seventy weeks? The word translated "weeks" is indefinite. Tregelles, whose scholarship is of the highest order, says it means "a period of seven parts." "The denomination here is to be taken from the subject of Daniel's prayer. He prayed about seven years, he is answered about periods of seven years.

SEVENTY PERIODS

of seven years, or four hundred and ninety years cover the time which Gabriel announced to Daniel. The seventy years began in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Dr. Brooks says, "Archbishop Usher, after careful review, and without any doctrinal or prophetical object whatever to accomplish, announced, as the result of patient and particular attention to the point, that the twentieth year of Artaxerxes corresponds to the year 454 B.C., and not to the year 446.

"As all are aware, our Lord's birth occurred four years earlier than the time assigned in our common chronology, and hence, he was crucified in the Jewish month Nisan, A.D. 29, which added to the year 454 B.C., when in the same month, Nisan, the decree of Artaxerxes was issued, we have precisely four hundred and eighty-three years or sixty-nine (weeks) heptads from the command to restore and build Jerusalem to the very month when Messiah was cut off."

Now if

immediately followed, then according to Daniel 9 : 24, it was predicted that seven years after our Lord's crucifixion the sins of Daniel's people would be forgiven, and everlasting righteousness be theirs, whereas they were then rejecting the testimony of the apostles to the remission of sins through the crucified and risen Lord. About forty years later, their sins were brought into terrible remembrance when Jerusalem was destroyed.

Therefore the seventieth week did not immediately follow the sixty-nine weeks, nor for the same reason has it yet been completed. Consequently there is a gap of more than eighteen centuries between the 26th and 27th verses of Daniel 9. So, there is in Isa. 61 : 2, between "the acceptable year" and "the day of vengeance," and for this reason our Lord omits the latter clause in Luke 4 : 19.

But, again, the seventy heptads relate to periods in which God regards the Jews as nationally gathered in Jerusalem. Consequently the progress of at the crucifixion. Jerusalem was then virtually set aside. Our Lord said, four days before His death, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. 23 : 38).

The course of the heptads will not be resumed until the Jews, gathered to Jerusalem by the hand of God ("I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem," Ezek. 22 : 19), shall under a covenant formed with Antichrist again assume a national existence.

Ignorance of this principle of computing prophetic time has led some sceptics to charge the Scriptures with a false statement in asserting that from the Exodus to the building of Solomon's temple comprised four hundred and eighty years, whereas they tell us that the time was six hundred and one years.

The explanation is that they include one hundred and twenty one years, during which time Israel groaned under the heavy hand of foreign oppressors, in the time of the Judges, which time of subjection the Lord does not count.

Therefore we are now living in between the sixty-ninth and the seventieth week. God is now saying of the house of Judah, "Call his name Lo ami; for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God." But the day is coming, "that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God." When God is preparing them for that day, the seventieth week will be ushered in. That week, the last seven years of this age, will find a portion of the Jews (not of the lost ten tribes) dwelling in their own land, with the temple rebuilt and its worship restored. At the close of that week Daniel 9 : 24 will be fulfilled. Notice that the seventy weeks are determined upon thy people (Daniel's people, the Jews) and upon thy holy city (Jerusalem).

Do any ask how the transgressions shall be finished, etc. Turn for an answer to Zech. 14 : 3, 4, 20, 21; 12 : 10-14; 13 : 1.

In Daniel 9 : 27 we read, "He shall confirm the covenant," etc. Who? The antecedent is found in the previous verse—that shall come." But it is there stated that "The people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary." This refers to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman people. The question arises, How can their prince confirm the covenant at the close of this age? The answer is that "The people (of the prince that shall come) shall destroy the city." That prince is yet to arise out of the Roman world, the fourth kingdom in Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. This kingdom, represented by the two legs of iron, the feet and toes, has never yet been fully developed according to the prophecy.

"THE PRINCE

THE TEN TOES,

five on each foot, represent the ten kingdoms of the Roman world, five in the eastern branch and five in the western.

These kingdoms with their kings must be in existence when "the stone cut out without hands shall smite the image upon his feet and break them in pieces." Smiting and breaking in pieces describe not the peaceful conquests of the Gospel in this age, but destroying judgments when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Thess. 2 : 1, 7, 8), and when "He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked" (Isa. 11 : 4). These same kingdoms are predicted in Daniel 7. The fourth beast represents the fourth kingdom. The ten horns upon its head are ten kings that shall arise. "Another king shall arise after them. And he shall speak great words against the Most High."

This last king (Antichrist) is "The prince that shall come, who shall confirm the covenant with many for one week."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"A Lady Preacher Went to Visit a Woman who was dying," said Mr. Drysdale, at a recent meeting. "After a little conversation the lady opened her Bible at Isaiah 55 : 1, and read, 'Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.' You see, this is a free gift, you can have it without money and without price.' 'Is it?' said the woman; 'I never thought of it in that way before; I will take the free gift.' And that woman accepted Jesus there and then as her Saviour, and found unspeakable peace."

Shooting a Faithful Dog.—"I Heard of a man who had a favorite dog. One night he was awakened out of his sleep by the dog pulling at him. He ordered it again and again to desist, but it would not. At last getting irritated he drew from under his pillow a pistol, and shot the faithful animal. In the morning, when he arose, he found that robbers had been into the house, and had carried off a large quantity of valuable goods. Is not this like a man's conscience. It disturbs him at first, and will not let him rest, but he plunges further and further into sin to try and stop the still small voice, and at length he succeeds, for God hath said: 'My Spirit will not always strive with man.'"

A Dying Consumptive Saved.—A Member of a Christian Association says: "I remember some years ago two little girls who came down to our home at Saltcoats, seeking help. One of the workers of this Association visited their mother, and found her in a pitiable condition. She was lying on her death-bed, dying of consumption, and in a very destitute condition. That worker visited her very often, and spoke to her of Jesus, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world; and that woman, although she had led a very wicked life, at once laid her burden down at Jesus' feet, and died fully trusting in Him, furnishing another conclusive proof of the declaration of the Bible, that Christ is 'able to save men even unto the uttermost.'"

A Runaway's Rescue.—A Member of one of the Mizpah Bands testifies: "Twelve months ago I was first convicted of sin. I ran away from home before I was sixteen years of age, and went under any name but my own. In my wanderings one Sunday, I walked into a church, and in the middle of his sermon the minister looking at me said: 'Sinner, what wilt thou do in the swellings of Jordan?' I took these words right home to myself. I knew I was leading a wrong life, and I grew very unhappy; I had such a longing for something which I could not find. I thought at any rate I would leave the place where I was then living, and went to Glasgow. One night I was attracted by an open-air meeting in Cowcaddens. I stood and listened to the singing, and afterward went into the church. I waited until the after meeting, when one of the gentlemen spoke to me. He opened his Bible at John 3 : 16, and read: 'For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' I said: 'I cannot see how I can believe that,' and he told me if I did not believe that I was just making God a liar. The very thought of that frightened me, and then I felt all at once I could believe it, and I went out of the church that night with God for my friend and Jesus as my Saviour, and he has been my close companion ever since."

Infidel Tinsel and Christian Gold.—A Christian gentleman observes: "I knew a man who was connected with an infidel club for sixteen years. Two or three years ago he came himself to Christ. A short time ago he met one of his old companions, a member of the club. After a little conversation, he asked, 'What has Christianity done for you?' 'I'll tell you what it has done,' was the reply. 'For sixteen years I was a member of your infidel club, and I was unlettered and ignorant, and you never taught me to read or write. For three years I have been a Christian, and in that time God's people have taught me to read and write also, and now I am able to read God's holy Word, and find the truth for myself. Oh, how long you blinded my eyes; may God forgive you.'"

Pardoned in a Hospital.—A Gentleman Re- marks: "I went to an hopsital a week or two ago, and as I was walking through one of the wards, I noticed a man lying on a bed very weary looking, and going over to him, I said: 'Would you like me to read to you?' The man nodded an assent and I opened my Bible, and read in Isaiah 43 : 25, "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins.' At the man's request I read the verse again, and he then said: 'For your sake?' 'No,' I said, 'for His own sake.' Calling one of the nurses by name, he said: 'Will you get me a card?' And when he got it, he handed it to me, saying: 'Will you write the verse on that, sir?' And I did so. I left him reading it over and over again, and through its means he has since found for himself the pardon of which it speaks."

An Agonized Husband's Query.—Dr. Kennedy, an evangelist, relates: "A gentleman drove his wife to a meeting every night to hear Dr. M'Kay preach the Gospel. He left her at the meeting, and himself went to the hotel to spend the time while she was there. He used to say he could not see what she could find to interest her in such meetings. One night he went into the meeting, out of curiosity, unknown to his wife. That night she heard him murmuring, 'Oh! where am I going to spend eternity?' Next morning she wrote a letter to the doctor begging him to come and speak to her husband. 'For,' she said, 'I am sure he is awakened to a sense of his sin.' The doctor came at her request, and the gentleman told him that he was in the meeting unknown to his wife, and that God's Holy Spirit was really striving with him. After a little conversation he confessed Christas his Saviour."

A Quarter of an Hour's Horn-blowing.—"I was on a visit lately at a country village. The first morning I was there, I was awakened very early by the sound of a horn blowing, which continued for about a quarter of an hour. It disturbed me every morning, at the same hour, and on speaking of it to my friends they assured me that I would soon get accustomed to it, and it would then cease to disturb me. And so it proved, I could soon sleep on undisturbed, though the horn blew as usual. In a spiritual sense I think this is the most dangerous state into which a man can fall. When they hear the Gospel preached to them at first, they seem to waken out of a sleep, and get disturbed and uncomfortable; but if they do not take advantage of what they hear, they get accustomed to it, and by and by can listen to any Gospel sermon without being moved by it. Such a man's state is worse than at the first, for God's Spirit has ceased to strive with him."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Thanksgiving Day will be Observed to-day throughout the land. It is well that this pious custom of our forefathers has not fallen into desuetude in this utilitarian age. As a nation God has blessed us beyond all other nations of the earth, and as a nation we make to-day humble recognition of the Source of all our mercies. It is not "a day for a man to afflict his soul," but neither is it right for individual Christians to overlook the object for which it is set apart. There is a tendency to spend the day in feasting and frivolity, but that tendency the heads of families should not encourage. While we rejoice over the blessings with which God has crowned the year for us, as individuals, as families, and as a nation, it should be with a sense of our responsibility and with an earnest desire to live as becomes those whom God blesses. If any to whom the past year has been one of loss and disappointment think that his circumstances are such as do not justify him in being in a thankful spirit, a visit to the poor in his neighborhood may be recommended as a stimulating influence. Possibly, if he relieves their need when visiting them, he may find that in watering others his soul too may be watered.

Many Interesting Facts are Contained in the annual reports of the Assistant Postmasters-General, published last week. From these reports it appears that the whole number of post-offices in the United States is 50,017. The cost of inland transportation on June 30th was $20,699,117, divided as follows: For 11,729 star routes, aggregating 226,779 miles, $5,089,941; for 117 steamboat routes, aggregating 15,591 miles, $596,573; for 1573 railroad routes, aggregating 117,160 miles, $15,012,603. First Assistant Postmaster General Marr, in his report, recommends very strongly the extension of the free-delivery system to places having 10,000 inhabitants and yielding $10,000 annual postal revenue. He also urges the consolidation of small offices close to each other, so as to give the community served by all together the advantage of the free delivery.

A Wholesale Ejectment of Office-holders was one of the evils dreaded by the country as a result of the Democratic triumph. It was feared that new men, unaccustomed to national business, might cause confusion and a disturbance of commercial affairs. The remarks made last week by the Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, President of the Civil Service Commission, may therefore have a tranquillizing influence. He said to a reporter: "Having acted with the Republican party since its origin, I can hardly speak without some party bias. Nevertheless, I will frankly tell you what I think. We shall have an Administration absolutely Democratic in policy, but the civil service act will not be repealed, either at the coming session or during this generation. Gov. Cleveland and the statesmen of his party would oppose any attempt to repeal it. The rules will not be abolished; they will be enforced under the new President. . . . There is no public man in this country who has a higher sense of the moral obligations of official life, or who is more certain to withstand mere partisan and selfish appeals, than Gov. Cleveland. This is a great element of power, and of popularity, too, as the people now feel. And, lest my motives be misunderstood, let me add that he has never done me a favor, and that I could neither ask nor accept one at his hands. Many officers outside the rules, and some within, will doubtless be removed for no very good reasons. But so far as possible Gov. Cleveland will prevent mere political proscription."

The Total Vote for St. John and Daniel has not yet been definitely reported. It is, however, computed that at least 150,000 votes were cast for the Prohibition candidates. The Voice, which is the organ of the Prohibition party, has received reports from twenty-six States, and those States gave an aggregate vote of 140,000 for the Prohibition national ticket. No return has been made yet from the other twelve States, which are Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Nevada, Oregon, South Carolina, and Virginia; but from data carefully collected it is believed that the vote in those States cannot fall below an aggregate of 10,000. Of the twenty-six States from which returns have been received, six gave a Prohibition vote of more than 10,000. These were: Illinois, 11,731; Massachusetts, 10,200; Michigan, 17,000; New York, 25,006; Ohio, 12,000; Pennsylvania, 14,624. In 1880 Neal Dow, who was the Prohibition candidate for the Presidency, received only 10,305 votes in the whole country. The enormous increase this year is in part due to the progress of the Prohibition principles, but chiefly because the candidate this year was a man of ability and character, for whom sensible men were not ashamed to vote. An effort is being made to continue the publication of The Voice, which was commenced for the campaign only. Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, the publishers, announce that they will issue it every week if they receive twenty thousand subscriptions before the end of the year.

The Quarrel between the Republicans and the Prohibitionists is causing New York rum-sellers to rejoice. In the country counties the Republicans announce their intention of voting in March next for unrestricted license in retaliation on the Prohibitionists for refusing to support Mr. Blaine. In Duchess and Ulster counties alone the votes given to St. John would have elected Mr. Blaine if they had been given to him. At the present time the Republicans who supported Mr. Blaine are intensely bitter against the Prohibitionists, and they are resolved to punish them at the election of the excise in the spring. There is but little doubt at the present time that all of the ten temperance towns in Ulster County will vote for unrestricted license at the ensuing local elections, and a similar sentiment exists to a greater or less extent in other counties along the Hudson River where temperance Excise Commissioners hold office. It may be hoped that there will be a better feeling in existence before the election, as Republicans and Democrats alike are just as much interested in good local government and the restriction of intoxicants as are the Prohibitionists.

The Discovery of a Great Inland Sea was reported last week. The announcement that such a sea exists within a thousand miles of New York is regarded with doubt by geographers, but the discoverers insist upon the truth of their statement. It appears the Geographical Society of Quebec sent out, last June, an expedition with supplies for the use of an exploring party engaged in the North. The supply party has now returned, not having found the expedition they went to relieve, but bringing back news of the discovery of the inland sea. The party, starting from a village on the Saguenay River, about thirty miles from Lake St. John, journeyed northward, and at a distance of about three hundred and fifty miles from Lake St. John and four hundred and fifty miles from Quebec the southern extremity of the great lake was reached. Those in command appear to have carefully distinguished the great lake from the small one, known as Lake Mistassini, and to have discovered that they are connected by Rupert's River. For seven days they voyaged on the great lake, and after one hundred and twenty miles of navigation the main body of it was not reached. The waters swarmed with fish, the banks were well wooded, and tracts of the adjoining land were arable. The newly found lake lies in latitude nearly corresponding to the latitude of London and Berlin, but the climate is severe.

The German Reichstag was Formally Opened by the Emperor on November 20th. It is expected to be a momentous session. Emperor William, in the course of his speech, spoke of the continued accord between Germany and France. He said: "Germany has summoned a conference of the Powers to secure Africa from disturbance arising from international friction. The universal acceptance of the Conference proves that the friendliness of the various Powers toward Germany is based on the fact that the successes in war which God vouchsafed do not tempt us to seek the people's happiness by other means than cultivating peace. I rejoice at this recognition, and particularly that it was possible at Skierniwice to cement my friendship with the Russian and Austrian monarchs, who are so connected with me by ancestral tradition, relationship and neighborhood that I may regard as certain the undisturbed duration of peace for a long time to come. I thank the Almighty for the certainty of the strong guarantee of peace thus afforded." Nevertheless, the Emperor and his ministers are seriously concerned at the socialistic successes and at the ominous attitude they have assumed.

A Compromise on the Constitutional Question in England appears to have been effected. On November 17th the Premier rose in the House of Commons and made a speech, in which he said: "The government desire to pass the franchise bill without delay. They cannot enter into any understanding with the opposition unless they receive an adequate assurance that the bill will be passed this autumn. In that case the government are ready to make the main provisions or draft of their redistribution bill the subject of friendly communication, or they stand ready to introduce the bill into the House of Commons forthwith and prosecute it with all possible speed." The Marquis of Salisbury, on behalf of the Lords, has accepted Mr. Gladstone's offer. If, therefore, the two leaders can agree on a plan for redistribution, the constitutional crisis will vanish. The Radical leaders are disappointed, as they hoped that the struggle would end in crippling the power of the Lords.

The English Radicals Tested their Strength by a division in the House of Commons on Friday night. Mr. Labouchère introduced a resolution declaring the influence of the House of Lords mischievous, and pressed it to a division. The Conservatives and the Liberals voted against it, but seventy-four members voted in its favor. Many prominent men left the House to avoid voting against Mr. Gladstone, who voted with the conservatives. Among those who went away was Mr. Chamberlain, who is the representative in Mr. Gladstone's cabinet of the Radical wing of the party. The public is surprised that the Radicals number so many in the House, as this division shows. Another trial of strength is expected soon on a question affecting the Royal family. Parliament is to be asked to vote an appropriation for the support of the eldest son of the Prince of Wales. Many members of the House have been required by their constituents to give a pledge that they will oppose this and all future appropriations for the benefit of the Royal family.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the Explorer, has been accepted as the chief adviser of the conference now in session in Berlin to settle the affairs of the Congo. He is a member of the managing committee, and has had frequent interviews with Prince Bismarck, and has dined with the Emperor of Germany. Mr. Kasson, our minister, has also taken a prominent part in the Conference. The proposals formulated by Germany, and which are likely to be adopted by the Conference, are that there shall be perfectly free trade for all nations. Commodities shall be imported and exported free of duty, except such as shall be necessary in the interest of general trade. The Powers exercising sovereign rights in the Congo regions are forbidden to exercise monopolies or favors of any kind in regard to trade. All the Powers exercising sovereign rights shall bind themselves to cooperate in the endeavor to suppress slavery and to promote the work of missions and all institutions which tend to the civilization of the natives. The Portuguese claims for sovereignty were strongly resisted by Mr. Kasson, who said that Mr. Henry M. Stanley, in all his long journeys on the lower Congo, had been unable to discover any signs of such Portuguese dominion or civilizing influences as were now claimed. He had, in fact, said Mr. Kasson, found everything and everybody but Portuguese.

A Treaty with Spain for Cuba and Porto Rico, for commercial reciprocity, has been negotiated and will be submitted to the Spanish Cortes when it meets next month. The Madrid correspondent of the New York Herald describes the treaty as the most complete reciprocity treaty ever negotiated by our government, embracing not only the exchange of products, but also special shipping privileges for the vessels of the two nations, abolishing all tonnage and consular fees on vessels and cargoes, and making all other fees the same as for the national vessels engaged in the coasting trade. It also contains special privileges for commercial travellers, reforms in the Cuban customs regulations concerning fines and the responsibility of vessels for errors when fraud has not been proved; and it contains besides a stipulation against the imposition of new export taxes. In some cases the tariff on the imports from Cuba is to be reduced fifty per cent, and Spain admits a large number of our manufactures free of duty. It is expected that a considerable impetus to trade will be given by this treaty.

More Favorable Reports of the Cholera are cabled from France. Sharp frosts have set in, and with the fall of the thermometer the progress of the epidemic has decreased. The number of seizures is smaller, and there has been an increase in the proportion of persons who recover from attacks of the disease. Cleanlier habits have been induced in all classes, owing to a fear of contracting the malady. Dr. Vulpian, a prominent physician, recently gave the Academy of Sciences some interesting details of experiments practised upon himself, including the swallowing of fœcal matter. He concludes that the cause of death from cholera is blood poisoning, caused by paralysis of the normal functions of the liver.

The Horrors of the African Slave Traffic were graphically depicted by Mr. H. M. Stanley, the American explorer, in the course of a recent speech. He said: "The slave trade is a great blight which clings to Africa like an aggravated pest, destroying men faster than children could be born. I overtook a party of Arab marauders on the Congo in November of last year, over 1200 miles from the sea. They had utterly desolated a number of villages, massacred the adult males who had not at once fled, and carried off the women and children. I never saw such a sight before. In a small camp 300 fighting men kept in manacles and fetters, 2300 naked women and children, their poor bodies incrusted with dirt, all emaciated and weary through much misery. It was a sight to make angels weep, cruel enough to make strong men cry 'vengeance on the murderers.' Here was the net result of the burning of 118 villages, and the devastation of forty-three districts to glut the avaricious soul of a man who had constituted himself chief of a district some 200 miles higher up. Though over seventy-five years old, here he was prosecuting his murderous business, having shed so much human blood in three months that, if collected into a tank, it might have sufficed to drown him and all his thirty wives and concubines. Those 2300 slaves would have to be transported over 200 miles in canoes, and such as could not be fed would die, and perhaps 800—perhaps 900—of all the number would ever reach their destination. This is the latest story of the slave trade in Africa."

The Presbyterian Church of Carthage, Jefferson County, N. Y., which, as was mentioned in these columns recently, was destroyed in the great fire of Oct. 20th, was but lightly insured. The congregation has no place to worship in, and its members have themselves suffered heavily by the fire. They are unable to rebuild, owing to their own private resources being straitened. They therefore appeal to their Christian brethren for assistance in the emergency. "We are," they say, "ready to help ourselves to the extent of our ability, but our people are comparatively poor, and winter is close at hand. The benevolent have responded nobly to the call for relief in the way of clothing and money for the needy and suffering, and still continue to do so." But help for this special purpose is still sorely needed. Donations may be sent to Mr. M. P. Mason, the president of trustees, or to the pastor, the Rev. J. V. Shurts, both of Carthage.

A Physician's Victory over Temptation was recently described by his friend. Speaking of suicides, Dr. John Lambert, of Salem, N. Y., said that a prominent physician now doing a successful work, in early professional life was daily beset with a strong suicidal impulse. He fully realized the situation, and contemplated voluntarily going to the asylum for self-protection; but he resolutely concluded to put the instrument, a delicate knife, with which he was tempted to open the femoral artery, in full daily view, and by strength of mental and Christian force of character he fought the enemy out on this line until the glittering blade had rusted and he had conquered. Sometimes it is the safest course to fly from temptation, but there are other cases, like this, when flight is impossible. Then we may be assured that God's promise will be fulfilled (James 4 : 7).

A Canine Police Officer is Gaining an Excellent reputation in New York. A large black mastiff made the acquaintance of a policeman in Avenue A on a stormy night about three years ago. The dog was hungry, and the policeman fed him. After that night the dog visited the officer on his post regularly, and gradually extended his acquaintance with members of the force. In time the Fifth Street police station became his home, and he was named "Policeman Jack." Jack spends most of his time in the station, except at night, when he patrols the precinct, rain or shine. Many of the patrolmen have found him a ready helper in running down escaping thieves or ruffians, and for such services the dog is credited on the books of the precinct with having made twenty-five arrests. Not long ago a policeman saw thieves attempting to rob a drunken man, and started to arrest them. They fled, and he pursued. Suddenly Jack rushed past him, sprang upon the back of one of the thieves, and fastening his teeth in the man's collar forced him to the ground. The other thief surrendered, and both prisoners were marched to the police station. Many other remarkable anecdotes are related of his intelligence and prowess. His example may be commended to many who are lacking in gratitude for benefits received. We have seen men profess faith in Christ and receive a welcome into His Church who never make any effort to serve Him by bringing in sinners from the world (Matt. 4 : 19).

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Sermon, which usually commences here, will be found on the next two pages.

"A Cap that will Shine Forever" is the Description given of the covering for the Washington monument now near completion. The cap is being exhibited in this city this week before being sent to Washington to be put on the monument. It has been manufactured at Philadelphia by order of the Government, and is made of aluminium, and weighs only one hundred and seventeen and one half ounces. It will be burnished, and as the metal does not corrode by exposure to the elements, the makers promise that it will, when in position, shine like polished silver forever. As the monument to "the father of his country" will be the highest monument in the world, this glistening cap will be a conspicuous object from all standpoints. It is doubtful, however, whether it will shine so brightly when rain and snow and dust have fallen upon it for a few seasons. Its lustre is likely to be dimmed by exposure. We know too well that it is so in spiritual matters. Contact with the world often prevents young Christians fulfilling the Saviour's solemn injunction, "Let your light so shine before men" (Matt. 5 : 16).

An Anæsthetic More Costly than Gold is coming into frequent use in delicate surgical operations. It is called cocaine, and costs $224 an ounce. Eighteen carat gold is worth $16 an ounce. Cocaine is obtained from the coca-leaf, to which the nations of South America ascribe wonderful powers. It is manufactured from this leaf, and is a coarse crystalline powder, although the crystals have no definite and distinctive shape. In color it is a pale yellow, and much resembles a high quality of brown sugar. It is used principally in operation upon the eye. It deadens the nerves temporarily, and thus supersedes the use of chloroform. Cocaine has, however, the same effect upon all parts of the mucous membrane. If, for instance, a small grain be placed upon the tongue it will soon produce a peculiar numbness, and deaden any sensation of pain. People who dread pain—and all do that more or less—will be thankful for this new addition to the number of anæsthetics, costly as it is. As we see impenitent sinners sit unmoved under powerful Gospel appeals, we are apt to wonder whether some such "numbing, deadening" influence can have been applied to their consciences. Certain it is that Satan does harden them by some means, so that they resist the Spirit. The cost that anæsthetic will entail only eternity can reveal (Isa. 6 : 10).

A Marriage Solemnized by Telegraph has had an unhappy sequel in Indianapolis. A year ago a widow lady, with a moderate fortune, in Pennsylvania, inserted an advertisement in the papers, inviting a correspondence with a view to matrimony. She received a letter from a man in Indianapolis, who represented himself as a physician, and a correspondence followed which led to an engagement. They did not meet, but photographs were exchanged. Finally, both parties were anxious for marriage, and as neither could leave home, a marriage by telegraph was arranged. The lady, with a minister, stood at the instrument in her city, while the man was in the operating room at Indianapolis with a friend, who said he was a minister. The ceremony was thus performed, and in a few weeks the lady went to reside with the husband she had never seen. To her astonishment she found that he was not a physician, but a colored barber, who expected her to support him in idleness. She bemoaned her precipitate act, and succeeded in getting the marriage annulled. It may be hoped that her misfortune may act as a warning against the silly custom of telegraphic marriages. Ordinary knowledge of human nature should teach us that it is not safe to act toward men on the principle on which it is our highest wisdom to act in entering into spiritual union with Christ. Of His infinite love and perfection we know so much that we can say, "Whom having not seen we love" (1 Peter 1 : 8).

A CALL TO THE LORD'S OWN FLOCK.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thus shall they know that I the Lord their God am with them, and that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God. And ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord God."—EZEKIEL 34 : 30, 31.

The Lesson of Death in the Church—Should Stimulate Survivors—Need to Hold Fast—I. Profession Toward God—Jehovah Avowed—Profess to be His People—Confidence in Immanuel—II. Proof from God — Marks of His Presence—Gathering the Scattered — Feeding the Flock—Healing the Sick—Careful Walk—Increasing Activity—III. God's Description—His Flock—His Pasture—A Palestine Shepherd's Changed Clothes—Men not Angels—A Letter of Denunciation—An Experience with Perfect Brethren—Their Perfection Poor Stuff.

THE sermon of this morning is intended for the flock of God, and it will be directed very pointedly to that particular part of it here gathered in fellowship. God has been coming very near to us of late; for a considerable number of brethren and sisters have fallen asleep during the last few days; nearly all of them persons of ripe age, who have been gathered as sheaves in their season. Others are evidently upon the eve of departure, for their infirmities are multiplied, and their strength is small. When the Good Shepherd is taking one and another into His bosom, and bearing them away from us, the rest of us ought to recognize His presence with holy reverence. If we do not arouse ourselves when the Lord is calling home our brethren, we must be sluggards indeed. Let us spend the time of our sojourning here in fear, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God.

This is the special matter of which I would speak to-day. The voice of the Spirit to the church of Philadelphia was, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." It is a great thing to have done so well as to have a crown; it is a greater thing to hold it fast. Men of the world tell us that it takes much wit and industry to make a fortune; but that it is far more difficult to keep it when it is made; I am sure that in spiritual things it is so. For a church to be thoroughly prosperous in the life and work of God is difficult enough; but to continue so—this is the labor. Hence our cries to God that He will be pleased to keep us as a church faithful to His truth, united with one another, earnest in the glorifying of God, and diligent in the winning of souls.

It would be a calamity of no mean order if this church should decline. For the sake of those unpopular truths which we uphold, it is a matter for daily prayer that this church may be maintained in honorable usefulness evermore. To that end I wish to speak with you this morning, my own dear brethren and sisters. Strangers must pardon me if I make much of you, and even seem to be egotistical in my address. I risk all that for the sake of the necessary truth which I must put before you.

I. Calling your attention to our text, I shall notice, first, what the text rather suggests than declares, namely, our profession toward God. Read on—"Thus shall they know that I Jehovah am their God.' It is implied, then, that to be our God. So many of us as are joined together in church fellowship here have declared that Jehovah is the one only living and true God. The God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob is the God of believers to this day. We do not wish to have any other God, although in these days the carnally wise have set up another. Their god is a god who has no justice or righteousness; he takes small account of sin, and mainly seeks to make things pleasant all round. This effeminate deity now occupies the place once given to Apollo or Venus, and he is as much a false god as they were. Our God does not suffer one attribute to eclipse another; He has all excellencies in perfection. Remember how Moses spake concerning our God, and said, "The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty." "This God is our God forever and ever; He will be our guide even unto death."

A second profession we have made is this, that we are

HIS PEOPLE.

"That they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God." This is involved in the first profession, but it is not always sufficiently thought of. We are, as believers, in common with all the people of God, separated unto His service, consecrated to His glory. We believe that He chose us, or ever the earth was, to be a peculiar people unto Himself. We believe that He hath redeemed us from among men, according to that word, "Christ loved the Church and gave Himself for it." We believe that by the decree of God we are adopted into the divine family and acknowledged to be the children of the living God, even we who were once heirs of wrath even as others. We are His people because the Holy Spirit has wrought upon us, and we have been turned from darkness to light, from the power of sin and Satan unto God. Our song is, "My beloved is mine, and I am His."

WE ACKNOWLEDGE THE CLAIM

founded upon our redemption, "Ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price." To glorify God in our spirits and in our bodies, which are alike redeemed, is our reasonable service.

Further than that, we have also professed and avowed our joyful confidence in our Immanuel God with us. It is an interesting thing to me that this name should be in my text. Look carefully at the English and you will see it in the very first sentence—"that I the Lord their God am with them." Leave out the word "am," which is in italics, and you get it, "God with them." What is this but "God with us"? To-day we believe in the Lord Jesus, who is God with us.

Jehovah is our God, in opposition to Romanism and Ritualism, with their idols of one form and another, to which they bow the knee. The invisible Jehovah is our God, and not the host, the virgin, the crucifix, or any visible thing. Jehovah is our God in opposition to the new gods of "modern thought," which your fathers knew not; our faith finds light as well in the majesty of the Old Testament as in the mercy of the New. Jehovah is our God in opposition to the "no God" of infidelity. We believe in a personal God, and we put our trust in Him as hearing our prayers; we are His people, and on Him we call; He has come very near to us, and with Him we have sweet communion through Jesus Christ His Son. This is our profession; we dare not say less; we could not say more. Now every profession of so solemn a sort should be backed up with proof. Where shall the proof be found?

II. That shall be our second subject of discourse—from God. "Thus shall they know that I Jehovah am with them, and that they are my people, saith the Lord God." How shall they know it? In this one way—by the presence of God among us. If God work among us, then shall even our adversaries say, "Jehovah-Shammah," the Lord is there. A tree is known by its fruit, and the rule applies even to God Himself. God is known among us by the acts that He doeth. He discovers His presence unto His people by His deeds of grace. I want you to look back through the chapter and then to see whether we have or have not as a church the marks of Jehovah's presence, by which we are attested to be His people.

The first mark is the gathering in of the scattered. See verse eleven. "Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep." I am bound to bear witness that in the midst of us many have been sought out and saved who but a little while ago were wandering far away from Christ. Whenever I give notice that I will see friends who wish to join the church, I am cheered by the many who present themselves. They tell me glad news of news which makes my heart to leap for joy. Conversions are among us at this time very many; not only from my own preaching of the Word, else might I speak with less freedom, but from the school, the mission-stations, the street-preaching, the tract-distributing, and from every form of effort. Frequently, when I have spoken with a number of new converts, I have found the larger proportion not brought to Jesus Christ by my word from this platform, but brought to Him by you, dear brothers and sisters, who have laid yourselves out to win souls.

Conversion is the sure sign of the immediate presence of the Lord. The Lord has promised that He will search His sheep and seek them out, and He has fulfilled that word in our midst, therefore is He with us. If I had to stand here and say to you, "Brethren, there are no conversions, none are brought to repentance and faith," then might we hold days for fasting and humiliation, and we might each one weep his eyes out, because the glory has departed. But the Lord has not left us. No ear has heard the awful words within the holy place saying, "Let us go hence." Glory be to His name, His hand is stretched out still for miracles of grace.

A second token of the Lord's presence is

THE FEEDING OF THE FLOCK.

The Holy Spirit seems to lay great stress upon that; for thus saith the Lord in verse fifteen: "I will feed my flock, and I will cause them to lie down. There shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed." Have we not found it so? Have not our Sabbaths been times of holy festival? Value greatly this boon, for it comes not from man, but is a choice gift of God.

Another token of the presence of the Good Shepherd is the

HEALING OF THE SICK;

I mean the spiritually sick, for there is this promise given, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick." It is a rare joy to restore such as have been overtaken in a fault. Lately I have received several brethren and sisters who had aforetime gone from us through laxity of life or through falling into novelties of opinion. I am glad to see among those who come to unite with us familiar faces which for a while had been missed. Those who have lived where Jesus dwells do not feel easy till they return to such society. They are saying, "We will return to our brethren, with whom we assembled beforetime, for it was better with us then than now." The presence of the Lord acts like a charm upon the wanderers, and they hasten to return at His bidding. If backsliders are not brought back in any church, I should conclude that God is not there; but when they do come back, we rejoice in this evidence of His presence. The God of our salvation hath devised means to bring home His banished, and therefore He is still in the midst of us. Glory be to His condescending love!

A further evidence of the Lord's presence with a people is found in their prevailing

PEACE OF MIND.

"I will make with them a covenant of peace, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land; and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods." Do not many of you realize that deep peace, the peace of God which passeth all understanding, so that you are free from all fear, and happy amid grievous poverty and trial? By reason of your great numbers, I cannot converse much with you personally while you are in health, but I do have the sorrowful privilege of speaking with many brethren and sisters in the time of sickness and death; and my uniform experience is most joyful. To this statement I can remember no exception whatever within my memory.

Not long ago, one who preaches far other doctrine than mine complained bitterly that he could make no headway with people of your sort, because those who had once fallen under the influence of our doctrine are settled in it, and cannot be rescued from it. He said that no headway could be made against our views, for men become so desperately enamored of them that they cannot be weaned from them. Blessed be God for that. Let a man once know the living God, and feel His eternal love within his bosom, and all the devils in hell cannot make him leave the doctrine which is life unto his soul.

I desire to speak to you with no flattering words, but wish soberly to testify what I have seen, desiring ever to be taught of the Spirit of God, that I may speak no further than I can justify by fact. I can say, and do say, "The Lord of hosts is with us." What then? Then it seems to me that it becomes every member of this church, as indeed of every other, to be very and walks. If the Lord be with us, remember there is a discipline going on in the church every day; not only that which the church can execute by itself, but that which God in providence executes. "His fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His floor." Good men, if they hinder the work of God, are not dealt with as the ungodly, and suffered to go on their evil way, but frequently they are laid aside, and their influence is taken from them. Even more than this: I doubt not that many are removed by death when they become obstacles to the truth; or fall into sin. "For this cause," said Paul to the Corinthians, "many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." Thus believers are chastened of the Lord that they should not be condemned with the world. God will not have His own child transgress the rules of His house without chastising him. Hence the need of careful behavior on the part of church members.

In addition to this, it seems to me that if God be with us, now is the time for abounding activities. In evil days we tug the laboring oar to small purpose, for the vessel makes no progress against the tide; but now that a favoring wind is with us, let us spread every yard of sail. "Crowd all thy canvas on, cut through the foam." Now is the mariner's happy hour, and he must avail himself of it. If there be anything more that we can do, if there be any forgotten enterprise which we can revive, if there be a possibility of greater ardor, and intenser zeal, in the name of God let us rise to it.

Again, let

be more fervent. Nothing comforts my heart like the prayer-meetings which are so continual among us. Even the little gathering for prayer which meets on Thursday before my sermon, has grown to larger proportions, and we have delightful seasons of communion with God. As for our Monday-evening assemblies, what a benediction from the Lord! Now that our hundreds at prayer are verging into thousands it delights my heart to see them. May your prayerfulness at home, in your families and in your closets, be increased continually.

III. A very interesting part of our discourse this morning lies in by God. How does God describe His own Church? Read the last verse of the text. "Ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord God." First, in this description God calls His Church His flock. A flock is the shepherd's treasure, it is his living wealth; but it is also the shepherd's care, it is his constant anxiety. Ask a shepherd what he prizes most, and he tells you, of course, his flock. Demand what he cares for most, and he replies, "I have no other care but this, my flock; for this I spend my days in the heat and my nights in the damp and the cold." Only think of the Lord's looking down upon His people here and saying, "Ye are my flock." Some Christians try to go to heaven alone, in solitude; but believers are not compared to bears, or lions, or other animals that wander alone; but those who belong to Christ are sheep in this respect, that they love to get together. This flock is so well preserved that at the last the great Shepherd will say, "Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none."

Observe that it is added, "The flock of

MY PASTURE."

There is a different idea here. It shows that God's people are not only peculiar in other things, but they are peculiar in their feeding. You may know a child of God by that which his soul lives upon. Many professors can feed on any mortal thing, so long as it is cleverly put. "Have you heard So-and-so preach?" "No, I have not, but I have heard that he has departed from the truth." "But," says one, "he is a wonderfully clever man;" and if a man is only clever, the generality of people will accept anything he likes to bring, from heaven above, or from the earth beneath, or from the waters under the earth. It does not matter to most people so long as the man can deliver his opinions fluently and poetically. But such are not Christ's sheep, for they have not the discernment of the faithful.

"The sheep follow him, for they know his voice; and a stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers." I remember hearing a brother tell how he disproved the notion that sheep only know the shepherd by his dress. When in Palestine he asked a shepherd to allow him to put on his clothes. Then he began to call the sheep, but never a one would come, not even a lamb. The most sheepish of the flock had sense enough left to know that he was not the shepherd, and even the youngest kept aloof, heedless of the stranger's voice. He might have called till he was hoarse, but they would not come. So God's people know their Lord, and they know the kind of food which He gives them.

It is a very singular thing, but it is added, "Ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men." This was inserted, some commentators think, lest the reader should think that the Lord was really speaking of sheep. This cannot be true; for no rational being could be so foolish as to fall into that mistake. The language is used for a much higher purpose. "Ye are men;" then God knows what kind of persons we are, whom He has loved with an everlasting love. We are

ADAMS, NOT ANGELS.

If you come into the Church of God, and expect to get among angels, you will be mightily mistaken; and if the brethren should receive you, and hope that they are receiving angels unawares, they will be mistaken, too. We make absurd mistakes through foolish expectations. We shall not find that our brethren and sisters are male and female cherubim, for they are men and women, and nothing more.

They are fallen men, too, bearing about them traces of the ruin of their nature; they went astray like lost sheep, even the best of them. They are men, that is to say, they are only men; for the best of men are but men at the best. Somebody once wrote to me a letter of denunciation for using that sentence; and, as far as I could make out from his letter, the friend thought himself to be something more than a man. I did not coincide with his judgment, but fancied that he was rather less than more than a man; from the bitter spirit of his letter I thought him more human than humane.

The best men I have ever seen are but men; and, generally, the better men are the more ready they are to confess their imperfection. Some are tall by the measurement of conceit, but short when brought to the standard of wisdom. God's people are but men; yet they are men and not brutes. There are in human form many who are hardly so good as brutes; but the saints are gentle, compassionate, and gracious. God's people are true men; when the Spirit of God is in them they quit themselves like men; they come to the front and bear the brunt of the battle. "Ye are men"—it is a bad word in one sense, but a good one in another. God make us men in the better sense, and may we rise superior to the infirmities of "men" in the worst sense, by being

HUMBLE, YET BRAVE.

I have two words to say. One is to the poor sinner. He says, "I am afraid to come to God in Christ Jesus." Do not be afraid to come, for He knows what you are. "Oh, but I am so vile." He knows how vile you are. "But I am everything I ought not to be." He knows that. That is why He sent a Saviour. If you had not been lost, there would have been no need for Him to seek you out. Come to Jesus just as you are, poor trembler, and let this word beckon you to Him, "Ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men." You are poor, weak, feeble, erring, undeserving men, but your God is full of mercy, and His thoughts of love are as high above your thoughts as the heavens are above the earth. Come now and reason together with him, and he will put away your sins as a cloud and your transgressions as a thick cloud, and you shall sing, "Who is a God like unto thee?"

The other word is to you that ought to be members of the church, who know the Lord and love Him, but have never confessed Him. You say, "I shall join the church when I feel better." When will that be? Are you any better than you were a year ago? How much better are you going to be before you obey your Lord? I should like to hang up a sort of thermometer so that when you did reach the point you might come out, obey your Lord's command, and join with His Church. Do you want to be perfect, and to join with perfect men? If you do, do not come to this church, because I will warrant you there is not a perfect member in it, though there are many of the excellent of the earth in our midst. We had some once; but they went to their own place after having proved to us that their boasted perfection was very poor stuff. When workers get that proud notion into their heads they become both useless and unloving. We are sorry to say that we are a company of imperfect men and women; but we shall be very glad to receive you if you love the Lord and are prepared to obey His commands. That is all we require. Do you want to join a perfect church? You must die. You will not do it else. And if you were to join a perfect church, I am sure it would not be perfect after you had been admitted into it. You had better give up that idea and just believe what God says about His own Church, "Ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men." Come, then, with us, and we will do thee good.

"I am afraid," says one. Is this like a man? Can we say of such cowards, "Ye are men"? We cannot give you the good side of the word, surely. But come with us. If you believe that Jesus is the Christ, confess Him. The Gospel message is, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Faith and baptism are here placed very closely together; do not divide them. "He that with his heart believeth, and with his mouth maketh confession of Him, shall be saved." Neglect not one command of Christ; confess your faith at once. "There is nothing saving in it," say you. Selfish wretch, so you will do nothing except to save your own skin. If you are a saved man, you will loathe such meanness, and you will say, "Now, for the love I bear my Master's name, whatever command He gives to His believing people, I am ready to obey."

"Through floods or flames, if Jesus leads,
I'll follow where He goes;
'Hinder me not,' shall be my cry,
Though earth and hell oppose."

God grant you His blessing in so doing, for Christ's sake. Amen.

PREACHING TO THE CHINESE.

On this page is a picture of the Rev. Mr. Wolfe preaching to a Chinese crowd. The incident is thus related by himself: "A gorgeous procession in honor of a great idol in the town had just passed, and I endeavored to speak to the multitude around us of the great power of God, the great and infinite Creator. One said, 'Do you mean to say that God had no beginning?' I said, 'Yes.' One then asked what was the name of my God. I said, 'His great and glorious name is Jehovah, which means the eternal self-existent one.' 'But we cannot see; how then can we believe?' I replied, 'You never saw the emperor in the golden city, but you have no doubt that he exists there.' They said, 'Yes; but we have seen the mandarins, and who could appoint mandarins but the emperor?' I said, 'True; but you have never seen the emperor. Now, we can see the works of God, the heavens, the sun, the moon, the stars, the earth. Some one must have made all these, and who could make them but the great Jehovah, even the great God of whom I speak?'"

It is in this way that the doctrines of the Christian religion are propagated in that dark land. Not so much by regular sermons in the mission churches as in short speeches and public conversations in the streets.

A FAMOUS PICTURE.

There are few people who have not heard of the wonderful picture in Milan, Italy, of the Lord's supper. American visitors who have seen it in the Dominican Convent of the famous city have described it again and again in glowing words. The renowned artist Leonardo da Vinci chose as the subject of his work that moment of the feast when our Lord had just uttered the warning words, "Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me" (Matt. 26 : 21). The scene that followed we have often imagined, but never fully realized. How the character of each of those twelve men would show itself individually at that moment! As each would look at his neighbor in amazement and momentary suspicion, and then, as the conscience reminded every one of individual weakness, the question is asked, "Lord, is it I?" It was a scene worthy of the artist's powers. It seems that Leonardo da Vinci made careful study of the characters of the apostles as revealed in the New Testament, and endeavored to make his picture true to the life. His success has astonished all who have seen the picture.

As will be seen by an advertisement on the last page, an engraving on steel has been made of this picture for sale in America. Good judges have pronounced it a perfect little gem of the engraver's art. Though the actual picture is only six inches wide and three long, the faces of the figures, the pattern of the tablecloth, even the wine in the half-filled glasses are clearly shown, and under a magnifying glass the excellence is still more distinct. It is evident that a vast amount of time and skill must have been expended in its production. However, the large demand there is for the picture enables the producers to offer it at a price marvellously low. As will be seen by the advertisement, it will be sent free by mail on the receipt of twenty cents.

AN ADDRESS TO CROOKED PEOPLE.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the converted pugilist, who is now laboring for Christ in Chicago, recently held a meeting in that city expressly for people who in various ways are enemies of law and order. Many notorious pugilists were attracted by their previous acquaintance with Hogan in the ring, and there were others whose pursuits are often checked by the police. Hogan has been there himself and adapted himself to their ways and modes of talk, following the apostolic example of becoming "all things to all men that" he "might save some." The following is a report of Hogan's address:

"In Isaiah 55 : 7, God says, 'Let the wicked' —that is, the crooked—'forsake his way.' I see a great many of the crooks here to-night, some of the gang which I knew personally; men that I used to loaf with, and fight with, and fight for, and scheme with, and oh, what an awful life this crooked life is! Walking down the street by day or by night with a trembling heart, afraid that *a fly cop might meet us, not a home we could call our own, meditating day and night where we can make a haul or crack a safe, or lay our traps to beat a stranger for his sugar† on the rattlers‡ or upon the highways. Then after devouring the poor chump, walking straight to a gambling den with this blood money, playing it against a tiger which will surely devour us, no matter how skilful we may be or how far we are advanced in gaming. But you can bet I have blowed in my last dust. My lush money and my gaming money I can use to better advantage. Instead of dropping it that way, I now drop it in the house of God for the benefit of humanity. And if you could realize how much better I feel since I am leading a straight life you surely would join my new gang. As you all know, I have been one of the leaders among the crooks, and now speak from experience on both sides.

"Some of you may ask me, How can you forsake our crooked paths? Let the crooked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and God says, 'Turn unto me and I will give you rest.' But the devil may say, 'Don't you do it; you are a flat if you do.' But that duffer is a liar. He has lied to me for twenty years, and when I dropped on him I dropped him like a hot iron. There is no rest in him; the truth is not in him.

"Now if you believe that I am on the right road (which in your heart I think you do), why don't you come to-night? Is it not a great deal better to be a gentleman than to be a loafer, or a drunkard, to lead an honest, industrious life? Your own conscience tells you so. Is it not a great deal better to be free than to be in prison? A man that's leading a crooked life is always in prison; but by leading a godly life you are always in heaven. May God bless you."

THE DUDE OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

The curious creatures whose peculiarities of dress have excited the scorn of sensible people, and to whom the name of "dude" has been given, are not the product exclusively of our time. In the earlier half of the eighteenth century there was no place in England more frequented by fashionable society than Bath. There were mineral springs there, the remedial virtues of which were much recommended by physicians. It became the fashion for men and women exhausted by the dissipations of life in London to go to Bath for a few weeks to drink the waters and recuperate. Among these fashionable people was one man who was regarded as a leader of society there and in London by reason of his gorgeous raiment, and his wit and humor. He was called "Beau" Nash. This poor creature set himself to annoy John Wesley, who, in the course of his journeys, was to preach at Bath in the midst of the fashionable season. How he failed, and how his humiliation was completed by a woman present, is recorded in the diary of the great reformer:

"Tuesday, 5th June, 1739. There was great expectation at Bath of what a noted man was to do to me there; and I was much entreated not to preach; because no one knew what might happen. I told them plainly the Scripture had concluded them all under sin—high and low, rich and poor, one with another. Many of them seemed to be a little surprised, and were sinking apace into seriousness, when their champion appeared, and coming close to me, asked by what authority I did these things. I replied, 'By the authority of Jesus Christ, conveyed to me by the (now) Archbishop of Canterbury, when he laid hands upon me and said, "Take thou authority to preach the Gospel." ' He said, 'This is contrary to Act of Parliament: this is a conventicle.' I answered, 'Sir, the conventicles mentioned in that Act (as the preamble shows) are seditious meetings; but this is not such; here is no shadow of sedition; therefore it is not contrary to that Act.'

"He replied, 'I say it is; and, beside, your preaching frightens people out of their wits.' 'Sir, did you ever hear me preach?' 'No.' 'How then can you judge of what you never heard?' 'Sir, by common report.' 'Common report is not enough. Give me leave, sir, to ask, is not your name Nash?' 'My name is Nash.' 'Sir, I dare not judge of you by common report; I think it not enough to judge by.' Here he paused awhile, and, having recovered himself, said, 'I desire to know what this people comes here for?' on which one replied, 'Sir, leave him to me; let an old woman answer him. You, Mr. Nash, take care of your body; we take care of our souls; and for the food of our souls we come here.' He replied not a word, but, crestfallen and vanquished, walked quietly away."

The Old Lady did not know Her Son.

ANNIE'S HOSPITAL PATIENT.

(See Illustration on this page.)

It was a bitterly cold day in the early part of December, in the year 1845, that a middle-aged man might have been seen walking up the long straggling street of the village of R——. The thoughtful way in which he gazed at the houses and inhabitants and the smoking chimneys of the collieries might be said to be indicative o some revived interest in, or acquaintance with, the place. The rugged lines of his face bore evidence that life had not been an amusement, but a hard conflict.

"Does Mrs. Baker live here still?" he inquired of a boy. On being answered by a nod and a stare, he knocked at the door near which he stood.

Receiving no answer, he lifted the latch and walked in. The room into which he thus entered appeared to contain no occupant save the cat, which regarded the visitor with a scared look. It was but scantily furnished. On the table of oak was an open Bible, on the pages of which lay a heavy rimmed pair of spectacles, and on the mantel was a teapot and cup. These, with a few old-fashioned prints hanging on the walls, a chair or two, and a piece of wicker work, from the back part of which it was difficult to conjecture what it really was, formed the furniture of the room.

The visitor rapped on the floor with his stick, and at once the head of a woman of great age peered out of the sentry-box-like piece of wicker work just referred to, and, seeing the gentleman, she made an effort to rise from her seat and get him a chair.

The visitor, after exchanging a few general remarks, said that he had heard of the old lady from one who knew her years ago, and he had promised to call upon her.

"Who could that be," the old lady asked. "Would to God, sir, it were my long-lost son; but I guess I shall never hear anything of him.'

"Tell me about him, madam," said her visitor; "did he use you badly?"

"No, sir; he was always good to his mother. But he went away seventeen years ago, and I have never heard of him since."

"Why did he leave you?"

"Well, sir, it's a long story, and I suppose we did not do the right thing by him. We tried to bring him up in the fear of God; but one little thing we overlooked, and that one little thing proved the first step toward his ruin. We did not warn him against liquor, and as we had been accustomed to have our pint of ale for supper as our boy grew up we thought he needed a little, and so he had his glass at the table with us. In course of time he became attached to a dear Christian girl, Annie Roberts, and he used to delight to help in the singing. People used to say they always knew when Harry Baker was at chapel; his voice was recognized by every one. That voice, with the liking for drink which he acquired with the little he took at our table, led him quickly the downward road."

"Did not his sweetheart try to save him?"

"His dear Annie pleaded with him to abandon his course of life, but without avail, till she told him plainly that she would never be his wife until he became converted to God. This touched his pride, and, burning with rage and shame, he suddenly packed up and left us, and went away, without saying anything to us, we know not whither."

"His father died, I think you said?"

"Yes, sir, he did, though I did not say so. A few months afterward he lost his life in the colliery, and since then, now nearly sixteen years ago, the proprietors have supported me, to show their appreciation for his character and services. Annie's mother also died, and she was left alone to struggle with the world; and oh, how often did she come into this cottage, and pour out her heart to me, and then we would join together in prayer for the prodigal! By the influence of a doctor she obtained a situation as nurse in a hospital. It is now eight years ago since I last heard from her, and she was then taking an appointment in New York."

As the poor woman proceeded with her story the rugged face of the visitor was often visibly affected, and when she had finished, and after a pause, he said:

"I told you when I entered that I had heard about you. It was Annie who told me. Put on your spectacles—now, mother, don't you know me?"

The woman gazed into the visitor's face, and then, with almost a bound, and a cry of joy, she clasped her long-lost son in her arms.

As soon as this affecting scene was over, and she had somewhat recovered from the shock and surprise, Harry gently told his mother the story of his prodigal life. How on leaving home he had gone further and further into sin, until five years ago he was severely injured by an accident on the railroad, and conveyed to a hospital, where he lay helpless for many weeks. During that time a tender hand administered to his comfort, a gentle voice soothed his peevish and irritable tones, and in the gentleness and patient thoughtfulness of that hospital nurse he at last recognized his loving, firm, and constant Annie.

Tears of sorrow fell as, on that stormy night, she had recognized in the injured man brought into her ward her dissipated lover. Tears of joy fell as, with repentant look and humble trust, he left that ward, "A new creature in Christ Jesus, old things passed and all things new."

His career now became upward instead of downward, and with the use instead of the abuse of his talents, and a mind stayed upon God, he soon attained a good position, and had the happiness of making Annie his wife. Many a time she had wanted to write the glad news, but he would not allow her to do so. "I will go and tell her myself some day," he said, "and here I am." Once again he clasped her in his arms, and the mother clung to her boy, who had been lost, but was found.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Bewilderment.

ROBERT recovered himself while he was speaking, and darted off at full speed down the street, followed by Grant, who knew no more of what had taken place than the few incoherent words of Robert conveyed to him. They had to wait a few minutes at the door, and then Robert, still wildly and wanderingly, told him what Madame had said—that a woman lay nearly dead in the house, and that neither John Morley nor Hester were to be found. She was almost murdered, he repeated, in a voice of extreme terror; and what would become of him and Hester?

As soon as the door was opened, Robert strode through the house into the court beyond, and up the staircase to the loft, where he expected to find Rose. The poor place was empty; the window had been left open, and the wind was flapping the curtain to and fro gayly, and fluttering the leaves of an open book upon the window-sill. He turned away from it with the last gleam of self-complacency faded from his face. Grant, who had followed him closely, had already descended into the court, and was obeying the vehement gesticulations of Madame. Robert could not stay behind. An irresistible impulse carried him on to see the thing he dreaded; though, like one running swiftly down hill, he might be about to cast himself into some gulf which would swallow him up in hopeless remorse. He overtook Grant at the door of the drawing-room, and thrust him roughly on one side.

The lamp burned brightly, revealing to him the scene he had so often looked upon. He saw the room as Rose had seen it. His glove lying upon the table; the open piano with the music upon it; Hester's little seat beside his chair. And there lay Rose upon her sofa, with a shawl thrown over her, looking as if she slept. He trod softly nearer to her, and stood beside her, not heeding in his profound abstraction how solemn and silent Grant was. Her attitude was peaceful, full of rest and quiet; the hair half hiding her face from his sight. But he could not stir, and when he tried to speak, his voice was hollow and inarticulate. He would have sacrificed his own life gladly at that instant to recall her to the life and happiness she had forfeited through his villainy.

How long he stood there he did not know; but at length Grant put him aside gently, and lifted up the tangled and matted hair with his hand. There was the wound; a stroke like that which had nearly slain him had fallen upon her as well. "This was his work," said his conscience, so long dethroned, but now asserting itself with mightier tyranny. He looked into Grant's face, and shuddered at the expression upon it.

"She is not quite dead, my poor fellow," said Grant, pityingly; "you recovered from a severer blow; but she is a woman, and delicate. We must not hope too much."

For some time they were busy about the almost lifeless form, Robert obeying mechanically the directions of Grant and translating his orders to the Frenchwoman. They carried Rose to Hester's bedroom, and laid her upon her bed. When all was done which Grant could do, he went down-stairs with Robert into John Morley's parlor.

"You know who she is," said Robert, avoiding Grant's eye.

"I have guessed," answered Grant, briefly.

"He must have found her," continued Robert. "Hester sheltered her here without his knowledge. I only knew of it while he was ill a few weeks ago. But where can they be gone to?"

"They have made their escape," answered Grant; "yet it can only be by an hour or two at the utmost. Must we pursue them?"

"Pursue them!" ejaculated Robert; "what for? What are we to do? If we bring him back, and she dies—"

He did not finish his sentence, but sank down into John Morley's chair, looking up to Grant with a face as haggard as that of the man he had wronged.

"If she dies, he may be punished as a murderer," said Grant; "but living and escaping, he is a madman, and he takes Hester with him! He is mad—I could swear to it; and he has Hester in his power."

A miserable silence fell upon them both as they turned over in their minds the wretched alternative presented to them. The life of Rose hung upon a thread which might snap at any moment; and to bring back John Morley, whether she lived or died, would be to subject him to a criminal prosecution, in which he could not fail to be found guilty. As yet the secret was their own, and could be confined to very few—themselves, Annie, Lawson's mother, and Lawson himself, perhaps, who was devoted to John Morley. The most imminent danger to Rose would be over during the next twenty-four hours; and until then, it being Sunday, John Morley's flight would remain unknown and unsuspected by his townspeople. He would have time to make good his escape. But, on the other hand, if they let him go, they left Hester in his power, under the control of a madman, at the very moment when he was most frenzied by his recent act of vengeance. It seemed impossible to leave her thus. A flood of passionate tenderness swept across the tempest of remorse and anguish on which Robert Waldron was tossed. He would have been willing to give her into the charge and protection of Carl himself, if by that he could only be sure that she was safe and, at last, happy.

"Ought we not to tell your father?" asked Grant. "He is a magistrate, and we should incur great responsibility by keeping this matter secret. Supposed she should die!"

"We must run the risk," answered Robert, after a moment's consideration; "I will shield you if any blame comes to us. No, no; if we tell my father, his duty as a magistrate would be to send in pursuit of John Morley. Grant, we must let him get off; but for Hester's sake, I must follow them myself."

"Where would they be likely to go?" said Grant. "Hester has never been away from Little Aston, and he has not stirred out of it for years. Let us look about and see if we can find any clue."

"And then I will go down to the station," added Robert.

They went up-stairs to John Morley's bedroom. Everything there bore the marks of confusion and haste. The drawers were left partly open, and the clothes in them were tossed about. Those which Rose had laid out for the next day still lay neatly folded upon a chair by the bedside. The basin was half full of crimsoned water, and there were stains of blood upon the dressing-table. No doubt had existed in their minds before as to who had been guilty, and everything there fastened the crime upon John Morley. But they could discover no trace of flight about Hester's room. There all was maidenly order; a delicate, innocent, girlish harmony, which it had seemed almost sacrilege to disturb when they had laid Rose upon her bed.

"I will go down to the station," repeated Robert.

It was growing late by this time, and only two night-porters were about the station. They had seen no one; had not been there during the day. He turned back again, disappointed and cast down. Grant wanted him to go up to his house to tell Annie he should be away all night, and to bring his case of instruments. He was about starting, when Madame, who had been wonderfully silent, ventured to ask a question.

"Where then is monsieur?" she inquired.

"I don't know," answered Robert; "I wish to know; and where Hester is, too."

"Oh, the little one is gone to London," answered Madame; "she set out at mid-day. That is why I find myself here. I came to watch the house while mademoiselle is away."

Here was a new element of mystery and perplexity. Hester had gone many hours before John Morley could have wreaked his long-cherished vengeance upon Rose. Was it possible that he had acted upon a premeditated purpose, instead of having been hurried into the crime by the impulse and frenzy of the moment? And upon what pretext could he have sent Hester on to London? If she were gone there, Robert's jealousy assured him that she would go to Carl.

"Grant," he said, "I will start for London by the first train to-morrow."

He went at once after that to Grant's house, and returned with the articles he needed. All through the long night he watched, with Grant and Madame, by the side of Rose, whose fate swung slowly from life to death, and from death to life again, as hour after hour crept sluggishly by. To Grant there was stimulus in it; the keen interest he felt in the triumph or failure of his skill; and Madame, in almost unbroken ignorance, and only with a few cunning guesses as to the truth, looked on with nearly equal excitement. But to Robert it was a night of slow martyrdom; of a crucifixion of his whole nature. His old love for Rose, his new love for Hester, his easy good-nature, his selfish repugnance to witness any suffering, his memory of the past, his dread of the future—all were compassing him about, and there was no refuge, nor any one to deliver him.

The morning came and found him a changed man. Grant looked into his face, and the tears started to his eyes. He pressed his hand hard in his own, but he could speak no word of consolation. Rose still lingered on the edge of the open grave, and might be swallowed up in it before he could reach London; but it was best that he should go. They parted in silence, and with a heart bowed down, Robert Waldron set out on his journey.

There were two trains starting nearly at the same time, run by different companies. Robert, caring nothing by which he went, started by the first, which was detained upon the road by a trifling accident to the engine. The second took up John Morley on its route at a station farther on; and thus, by what seemed an accident, Robert missed meeting with the man whom he was pursuing.

It was six o'clock when the train reached the London terminus, and Robert knew that Carl would certainly be at his chapel. He was the only person known to Hester, and therefore it was to him that he must go for any chance of information. He called a cab, and bade the driver drive as quickly as he could to the chapel; but the service had already begun when they arrived at it. In no mood to present himself in the midst of a congregation, Robert found his way to the vestry, and waited there in growing impatience for the conclusion of the service. The door was open, and he could hear every word uttered by Carl's clear voice, so modulated and varied that commonplace words took almost a tone of eloquence from it. He was preaching concerning temptation; and Robert's bruised spirit felt more deeply wounded by it. What did this boy, with his pure, unsullied life, his soul which had never betrayed its own ideal, know of temptation, or of sin? At length the torture was ended. Carl pronounced the last soothing benediction; and in a minute or two afterward entered his vestry.

On his part, when Carl's eyes fell upon Robert, he started back with a momentary disquiet and apprehension. He looked worn and ill. The terrible scene of the past night had made him utterly regardless of those small, minute cares as to his appearance, which had invariably occupied him hitherto. He had not slept at all; and he had suffered horribly. The years, which had seemed to pass over him leaving no trace, had been graving secret lines upon his features, which now started out in strong relief, ageing him abruptly. Carl fancied, as he stood by the window, with the light falling upon his head, that he could see a faint tinge of white, a shining line of silver here and there among his disordered hair. They had not parted as friends; and they knew each other to be rivals. Carl closed the door, and locked it against any intruder; and then waited for Robert to speak.

"Do you know anything of Hester?" asked Robert, approaching him, and speaking in a low voice.

"Hester! no!" answered Carl, in amazement and alarm. "What is the matter with her?"

"She came up to London yesterday," said Robert; "and I made sure you would know where she is. She had no one to go to but you. For pity's sake, Carl! do not hide from me anything about her. I only ask to know that she is safe; that you are taking care of her. I will not ask to see her. I give her up to you altogether. Only remove my anxiety. Tell me that you have found some safe home for her."

"I know nothing about her," cried Carl, in anxiety equal to his own. "What do you mean? Is not Hester at home with her father?"

"They are neither of them at home," he answered. "Hester came to London by the twelve o'clock train from Little Aston, yesterday; and her father fled last night."

"Fled!" echoed Carl, his heart sinking within him.

"He has murdered Rose," continued Robert, hurriedly; "and I am in pursuit of him. Not to give him up; no, but to save Hester. He is mad, Carl; and what can she do with a madman? What can we do? Have you no clue at all to the motive that brought her up here? My only hope was in you."

"Stop!" he exclaimed, as a sudden light flashed across him; "she must have come to see little Hester. I wrote on Thursday to tell her about the child; and she must have made up her mind to come and see her. She is very ill."

If it had been possible for Robert's face to grow more pallid, it would have done so at these words—a stray shaft shot at random by Carl, whose thoughts were too full of Hester to remember that he had betrayed a secret which he was pledged to keep. He was in haste to be gone, to hurry to the school where the child lived, in order to make inquiries there. Neither of them knew by how small and trifling a chance Hester had missed breaking in upon their interview.

"Where are you going?" asked Robert, as Carl opened the outer door of the vestry.

"Where?" exclaimed Carl, impetuously, "to find Hester. We must find her to-night. Did you not say her father is a madman, and has murdered Rose? Find her? Can I take any rest or sleep until she is safe? Yet God has her in His safe keeping!"

He said these last words with a half sob, and raised his hand to his eyes for an instant. Then he turned toward Robert with a glance of profound and unutterable trouble.

"You may come with me, if you choose," he continued; "I am going to see Rose Morley's child."

Robert followed him mechanically, his head reeling and his limbs tottering. Carl saw it, and drew his arm through his own, pressing it to his side with an earnest pressure Whatever his own anxiety and terror might be, it could not equal in anguish and intensity that of Robert Waldron.

TEMPERANCE.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 7. Jer. 35. Golden Text, Prov. 20 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Temperance Awakening—Alarm at the Growth of Intemperance—What Saith the Lord—The Wines of Scripture—Scriptural Instances of Intemperance—A Test for Christians—The Rechabites Tried—Their Fidelity to their Father—God's Approbation.

THE question of temperance has become one which can no longer be ignored. Ministers are awakening to the fact that unless they stand on the side of temperance they lose a large share of their influence and power, and they cannot command the respect of their people. Physicians are examining the matter, and many of the most renowned have declared that alcohol has no nutritive qualities, and that its introduction into the system as a food is most deleterious.* The governments of various countries have been forced to consider whether anything can be done to stay among their people The national drunkenness of England is proverbial; and our guilty country, not satisfied with ruining her own children, spreads intemperance, with all its accompanying sin and misery, among her colonies. France, Germany, Russia and Switzerland, in their marked increase of drunkenness, appear to emulate England's disgraceful pre-eminence. Souls are ruined, health is lost, homes are made desolate: prisons, lunatic asylums and poorhouses are filled by this fearful weapon of Satan—drink.

Such is the state of things—what then saith the Lord? Non-abstainers attempt to prove from Scripture that intoxicants are a good gift from God, given us "richly to enjoy." Christ's turning the water into wine, Paul's recommendation to Timothy, and the use of wine in the institution of the Lord's Supper, are the passages usually quoted. Residents in wine-growing countries cannot but know that very much unfermented wine is drunk by the inhabitants, and answers to "the fruit of the vine" and the "new wine" mentioned in Scripture. This unfermented "new wine" "maketh glad the heart of man" (Ps. 104 : 15), "maketh glad the life" (Eccl. 10 : 19, margin), "cheereth God and man" (Jud. 9 : 13). But brought disorder into the families of Noah (Gen. 9 : 20), of Lot (Gen. 19 : 33) of Nabal (1 Sam. 25 : 36), of Elah (1 Kings 16 : 8), of Benhadad (1 Kings 20 : 16), of Belshazzar (Dan. 5 : 4), etc. This it is of which God says, "Wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging" (Prov. 20 : 1); this it is which "biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder" (Prov. 23 : 32).

THE CHRISTIAN'S TEST.

The question which Christians have to settle is a very simple one. Our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost; we belong, not to ourselves, but unto Him who has redeemed us. Is it by the authority of God, our rightful Owner, that we introduce "a mocker," a raging mocker, into His temple? Because of His indwelling it is our glorious privilege, whether we eat, or drink, or whatsoever we do, to do all to the glory of God (Col. 3 : 17). Surely no glory is brought to God by that which "biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder"! The very inspired description savors of that old serpent, the devil, who has made alcohol his too successful instrument. "What wilt thou have me to do?" is the natural question of one whose joy it is to have no will but God's. Paul, the very man who asked the question, answers it in these words: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. 14 : 21). For God's sake, for our own sake, and for the sake of others, let us abstain. Stimulants and narcotics have the power of deadening the spiritual sensibilities, they are bad for the soul; alcohol cannot be digested, and therefore, by bringing the liver into a state of disease, it injures the body. "Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5 : 18). Here is a strong word of God's to show how He would have His temple under the power of no other stimulant than the Holy Ghost. All these things which bring the being of man under their power, and make him what he would not be without them, are distinctly usurpers of the Holy Ghost's dominion. In so far as these things are introduced into the being of man he puts himself under their power, and in so far as he does so, he is who alone has the right to make a man what he is not by nature.

The history of the Rechabites, at the time of Judah's defection, shows how God loved and honored those who stood free from that lust of the flesh which ruins so many in our land. Jeremiah, the prophet, who was the willing, pliable instrument of God, to speak or not as He would, to do things, pleasant or unpleasant; foolish in the eyes of men or wise—was sent by Him to the house of the Rechabites. God commanded him to go and bring them into the house of the Lord and to set wine before them. A strange command! Some people are afraid to yield themselves up wholly to God, lest He should ask of them some strange, unheard-of thing. "A prophet of the Lord sent to tempt abstainers to break their pledge! Never; this is not God's guidance: Jeremiah is an old fanatic." Such were probably the remarks passed. But Jeremiah belonged to the Lord, reputation and all; he knew he was not mistaken in the familiar voice to which he was listening; and he obeyed, leaving all the consequences to the God he served. Had the prophet been sensitive about his reputation this would have been a most unwelcome service; had he thought, "The Rechabites will look upon me henceforth as an unprincipled man," he would have been as slow to carry out the command of God as Jonah was to warn the Ninevites. But the man was "a whole burnt offering," "a living sacrifice," and so went forward unquestioningly. There was a depth of self-renunciation in his simple obedience, which only those can appreciate who have been placed in a similar position. Jeremiah did not half do the thing; "I took Jaayaniah . . . and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites; and I brought them into the house of the Lord. . . . And I set before the sons of the house of the Rechabites pots full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them, Drink ye wine."

How then did the Rechabites act in these unexpected circumstances? It must at first have been a shock; Jeremiah, the most well-known man living for uncompromising piety! Could he tempt them to drink wine, and bring them solemnly into the house of the Lord for the purpose? Could it be possible that he was acting under the direction of God? Above all, could God disapprove of their abstinence and unworldliness of life? Was such a thing conceivable? The Rechabites did not weigh the matter; they acted on to their father, Jonadab, and said, "We will drink no wine; for Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons, forever: neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any; but all your days ye shall dwell in tents: that ye may live many days in the land wherein ye are strangers. Thus we have obeyed the voice of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, in all that he hath charged us to drink no wine all our days, we, our sons, nor our daughters; nor to build houses for us to dwell in; neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed; but we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us."

Three hundred years had elapsed since the command was given, something like twelve generations of men had come and gone, and still the descendants of adhered to his principles, and maintained them even under such a trial of faith as we have seen. God took occasion to make them an example to the reprobate inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem: "Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words, saith the Lord?" And then most touchingly he pleads that the command of Jonadab to his sons that they should drink no wine was performed, for unto this day they drink none, notwithstanding He their God had spoken to them, and had also sent prophets, rising early and sending them, yet they had not hearkened unto Him. But, far from seriously desiring the Rechabites to change their principles, God sent Jeremiah to them with this message, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according to all that he hath commanded you; therefore thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Jonadab the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever." How glad, how overjoyed these men must have been when they saw that, far from spreading a snare for them, God had only tried their faith as a lesson to His people and as an opportunity of perpetuating blessing to them! "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience" (James 1 : 2, 3).

ENTERING IN.

Why don't you enter in?
Into the Heart that calls and calls for you,
Into the promises so grand and true,
Into the rich inheritance that waits,
Why will you stand and weep without the gates,
O sorrowing one?

You say you cannot see
Why, if He loves, He wants to grieve you so,
Why thro' this clouded path he made you go;
O if you would but enter in to-day
And let him show you in His own sweet way,
Dear suffering one.

But you will enter in,
I am so sure you will some blissful day,
And then, and then you'll joy to hear him say
Why you have suffered so and wept so sore,
And you will see your sorrow was your door
To let you in.

To let you in—
O Alchemist divine, O wondrous sight!
Your counted tears all changed to jewels bright,
For you have entered in the secret place,
Where He reveals the wonders of His grace,
Where you can see the ALL THINGS of His Word!
For you have entered the sweet Will of God.

FOOD FOR INVALIDS.

EDITOR HOME DEPARTMENT: I have read with true sympathy the request of "One in Need," and though I have never become one of the Home family by contributing my mite toward sustaining the Home circle, I wait not as a stranger waiteth, but as one who has long shared the good things, and hopes to find a welcome.

To "One in Need" I would say: I am a constant sufferer, and have made the question of food my study for years. A grain of wheat is said to contain all the qualities for nutriment that the body requires: but to select only the starch or fine flour so generally used for food, is to deprive our bodies of all sustenance. It is said two years would be the limit of life under such a regimen. But select other parts of the kernel and you have the real germ of health and strength. Do not use ordinary Graham flour. It has produced more dyspeptics than it has cured. The outer husk or burr of the grain is not removed, and irritates the digestive organs. I live upon the gluten of wheat combined with barley, and find it very nutritious; seldom eat any meat. It is a remedy for sleeplessness, if taken when retiring for the night. If I am permitted to inform you where to obtain the "Health Food," with full instructions how and what to use, I would like to direct you to send a description of your disease, inquiring what you need, to the "Health Food Co.," No. 72 Fourth avenue, New York. You will receive advice and circulars free. Hoping and praying that the blessing of God may attend you, bringing peace to your household, and joy to your home, I write in the cause of HUMANITY.

THE reproach is often brought against the Christian Church that it neglects philanthropic work. Christians, say their accusers, forget that men have bodies as well as souls, and when a hungry, half-naked creature asks for bread he is given a tract. The charge is in the main unjust. There are exceptional cases in which the bodily needs of the poor are neglected by men zealous in the work of soul-saving, but philanthropy would shrink to insignificant proportions if it were to lose the support of those who give their money and time and labor to it on religious principles. Not only do Christian citizens labor unostentatiously for the relief of want and misery, but they form the strength and nucleus of societies which do the same work on a larger scale. Not a few have gone beyond this, and, like Mr. Spurgeon, Mr. Muller, of Orphanage fame, and Dr. T. J. Barnardo, have founded and organized and maintained, as God has helped them, gigantic enterprises for the benefit of the poor. This is always a grand work, and those who engage in it deserve the honor of the Church universal. One such man is Dr. Stephenson, whose portrait THE CHRISTIAN HERALD publishes this week, with pictures of the institutions which, one by one, he has been enabled to establish as God sent him means.

Dr. Stephenson, whose portrait appears on the first page, is an eminent Wesleyan minister, and the founder of the "Children's Home," the various branches of which appear also in our illustrations. He was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, in 1839, and is now forty-five years old. He was educated principally at Wesley College, Sheffield, and took his degree of B.A. at the London University in 1859. He then proceeded to the Richmond Theological Institution in order to prepare for the ministry. Stationed successively at Norwich, Manchester, Bolton, and London, he everywhere gave abundant proof of his deep and earnest sympathies with the dark and ignorant masses of the surrounding population. By evangelistic services, by promoting the cause of Temperance, and endeavoring in every way that he could devise to assist the fallen, he rapidly became a "popular" minister in the best and truest sense of the term.

In 1880 the Wesleyan Conference testified its appreciation of his labors by electing him into the managing council known as the "Legal Hundred," and the following year he received from America the honorary degree of LL.D. He has served for one term as a member of the London School Board, and has taken an active part in many of the philanthropic and social movements of the day. Owing to the speedy and remarkable development of the work in connection with

THE "CHILDREN'S HOME,"

Dr. Stephenson was compelled, some twelve or thirteen years ago, to resign his place in the regular ministry, as the rule of the denomination, that a minister shall not remain over any one charge more than three years, prevented him carrying forward the philanthropic enterprises in which he was engaged.

Before giving some information as to the "Home" and its branches, we may briefly state

HOW THE HOME ORIGINATED.

While stationed in London, and laboring as a Wesleyan minister, especially in that district in which abject poverty of the most depressing kind exists, and which is known as the "New Cut," Dr. Stephenson became painfully impressed with the wretchedness, vice, and crime around him, and longed to do something practical in the way of rescuing the children from the inevitable ruin awaiting them if left to such surroundings. Calling to his help a few friends like-minded with himself, a little house was taken, and transformed into a refuge for a few poor and needy boys and girls. A stable at the rear was transformed into a dining-room, and a hay-loft over it into a dormitory. Such was the small beginning. Presently another house was taken, until at length the home was removed to the more healthy neighborhood of Bonner Road, and from that time it rapidly developed, and today there are about six hundred and fifty children in the various branches of it. Though under the direction of the Wesleyan Conference, no question of sect or creed influences the selection of its inmates, the most pressing and needy cases being invariably given precedence. Since its commencement about fifteen hundred children have enjoyed its advantages.

STRANGE HISTORIES are attached to many of the children thus rescued and nourished; terrible tragedies in some cases, and hardly less tragic comedies in others. With almost every crime in the calendar some of these children are acquainted. Sin and shame, cruelty and violence, have been the familiar objects of their family life, and the most tender and sacred of earthly relationships have become odious to them. Several of the lads were one day learning the Ten Commandments; when they came to the fifth, a bright little fellow looked up to the teacher and asked, "But what if you've got a bad father, sir?" Poor child! the last time he had seen his father was when he left him and his brother locked up alone in a room without food or fire, and departed never to make inquiry about them again. How little could such a child understand the beautiful meaning of the words, "Our Father, which art in heaven!"

And here we touch the foundation fault which has caused the misery of these children's lives. They have had no homes. There has been no family life for them, with all its tender, gracious development and restraining influence. And this is precisely what the Home supplies. It is not a mere institution where the children are gathered together, fed, clothed, taught in a mass; but, like Mr. Spurgeon's orphanages, it is a collection of families, each having its own house, its house-mother, and distinct family life. There can be no doubt that this home-life is the secret of the success which has attended Dr. Stephenson's work. A child is brought from the vilest surroundings, unaccustomed to control, vicious, dishonest, profane, and filthy; but in the course of a few weeks the wild cub is softened by the influence of love around him, is tamed and subdued until he becomes like a lamb, and may be seen playing like a child among children, singing with evident enjoyment the songs of Zion, clothed and in his right mind.

In a recently issued little book, entitled

"THE STORY OF THE HOME,"

Dr. Stephenson points out the distinctive features upon which the work is based. 1. It is a religious work, a mission for Christ Jesus to His neediest little ones. 2. It is industrial, for the children are trained to habits of industry, and put upon the lines of industrial progress. 3. The idea suggested by the title "Home" is carried out by the system adopted of placing the little ones not in barracks, but in homes. They are grouped, not in regiments of two or three hundred, but in "families" of about twenty, each with its separate house and a "Mother"—the best educated and refined woman that can be obtained, and one whose heart has been moved with a Christ-like pity for the outcast and destitute. Each successive development of the work is simply a reproduction again and again of these three ideas. An excellent day school, well-organized workshops, and thorough religious training all combine to prepare the children for a happy and prosperous future.

THE LONDON BRANCH

consists of a square block of buildings, with suitable playgrounds, gymnasium, etc. The part facing Bonner Road is a row of houses (as seen in the frontispiece picture), which have been secured, one by one, for the purposes of the institution, as the funds have permitted. The workshops are placed to the rear, and several useful trades are being taught to the inmates of the "Home." Each house has its distinctive name, indicating its origin. Thus, one is called "Laleham House," being the gift of Miss Pipe, and pupils of Laleham, Clapham, in 1874; another bears the inscription of "Sunday-School House," inasmuch as it was built by the generous contributions of Sunday-school teachers and scholars during the years 1872–74. A third is known as the "Walton Memorial House," the gift of a gentleman in memory of his beloved wife. One corner of these premises is occupied by which is a beautiful, though simple, structure. The hard limit of space compelled its erection over the school-room; though, once inside, the peculiarity of its position is quickly forgotten. The organ, a small but richly-toned instrument, was paid for by concerts given for this purpose by the choir of the Home; while the Bible is the gift of boys and girls once inmates of the home, but who have now settled in Canada. The services at the "Home Chapel" are open to the public, and, though no effort is made to establish a regular congregation of outsiders, great importance is attached to the presence of visitors, which makes the worship "public worship," and thus more than a mere part of institutional routine. Great pains are taken to make the service interesting and effective. The musical part is varied, and is led by a carefully trained choir of the children, some of the best anthems being sung on each occasion. The chapel is used for no other purpose than worship, and all these circumstances combined secure a solemnity and propriety of demeanor in the children which is remarked by all visitors, and might well be imitated by congregations of older persons.

Though the work began in London, it did not stop there, and we pass on next to notice the

which is located at Edgworth, near Bolton. (See the middle picture on the right-hand side of the front page.) This development arose from the generous gift of a philanthropic gentleman—Mr. James Barlow—who gave for the purpose a large building, with one hundred acres of land. It had previously been a notorious rum-shop and hotel, which had obtained an evil notoriety throughout the neighborhood. Many and great alterations have since taken place here, and no former visitor would now recognize it. The central building consists of Wheatsheaf (so called in memory of its former title when it was a hotel), of Bolton House, commemorating the generous gifts of friends in that adjacent town; of Woodville, a gift from South Africa, and of a wing recently added through the liberality of friends in South Australia. Then there are, in connection with it, extensive farm buildings, the governor's house, offices, etc., providing, altogether, a vast amount of work for the young inmates of this branch.

Taking a sudden leap from the north of the country to the south, the visitor is introduced to the situated at Milton, near Gravesend. (This is shown on the left side of the frontispiece picture.) It was found, as the work of the "Home" progressed, that there were many children who seemed to have a special claim upon the attention and sympathy of Dr. Stephenson and his coadjutors, and yet came so fairly within the provisions of the law, as to warrant the aid of the State being most properly sought for their maintenance. The lease was secured of an old country mansion, surrounded by some fifteen acres of park lands, and a certified industrial school was established there. At the present ne the number of lads in residence is one huned and seventy, and the results have been ex-edingly gratifying to all concerned.

THE ISLE OF MAN BRANCH.

About twenty years ago an interesting and éful work was commenced at Ramsey, in the le of Man, by a philanthropic Christian lady—iss Gibson. It began at first as a Ragged
:hool, but in the course of time developed into Home for orphan and destitute children, very milar in its spirit and aim to that at Bonner oad, although it never attained large proporons. Assisted by her aunt, suitable premises ere purchased, consisting of a well-situated ilding, with about five acres of land. Within vo years, however, Miss Gibson's useful life as suddenly cut short, and in accordance with er dying wish the institution she had estab-shed at Ramsey was then connected with the hildren's Home in London. It has a charming ookout over Ramsey Bay, and bears the approriate title of "Ballacloan," which is the Manx or "Children's Refuge." (See picture in the ft-hand corner of the lower portion of frontisiece.)

BOY AND GIRL EMIGRANTS.

The necessity for relieving the overcrowded ities of England by emigration has long been pparent to all who are anxious to improve the ondition of the poor. Soon after the "Home" as founded its promoters had their attention irected toward this subject, inasmuch as many f the boys and girls began to approach the age t which it was right that they should earn their wn living, and two difficulties had to be faced.
he labor market was not in a condition which romised much aid to them in their struggle, nd, on the other hand, many of them were aken from associations which would be certain o cling around them with a most disastrous ffect. Hence it was an absolute necessity that hey should be enabled to commence their ac-ive career in some place to which their relatives ould have no easy access to them, and from hich, during the first years in which their judg-ent was to grow to independence, it would ot be easy for them to return to their old aunts.

At that time the late Dr. Punshon was resident n Canada. He took, from the very first, a deep nterest in the work of the "Home," and sug-ested that that great and enterprising country ould afford peculiar advantages to the children.
t his suggestion Dr. Stephenson paid a visit to anada, in order to make the necessary inuiries, and at length it was determined to end out parties of children to that country.
hrough the liberality and influence of Dr.
unshon, aided by many generous Canadian riends, the committee were able to establish

THE CANADIAN BRANCH,

hich is a commodious house, with eight acres f land attached, and conveniently situated near he city of Hamilton, Ont. (As illustrated in he right-hand section of the upper portion of ur frontispiece.), This admirably serves as the anadian headquarters of the "Home." The dvantages of a well-organized system of emigra-ion in connection with this work is obvious. It nables the managers to place a large number of hildren in situations much earlier than it would e safe to do so in England. A Canadian farmer ill take a boy of ten or twelve into his house, nd treat him as a member of his own family.
hen a party of young emigrants are thus sent ut an officer of the "Home" goes with them, nd on their arrival they proceed direct to the anadian Branch, where they pass into the care
f the resident governor. Before

THEIR ARRIVAL

e has advertised their coming, and received ap-lications for them, taking care that the homes o which the children are sent are Christian omes, in which they will be kindly treated.
ithin a few weeks most, if not all, of the chilren are provided with situations, but they are by o means lost sight of. By correspondence, inuiries, and personal visits the agent makes imself acquainted with their condition and circumstances. Great success has followed this development of the work also.

It is very touching to hear of the anxiety the children manifest on account of their mothers and other relatives. More than one lad, safely and comfortably settled in the New World, has sent home money to bring his mother or sister out too. And in their prayers, with a simplicity as touching as it is amusing, they commend their to God. "O Lord, bless our fathers and mothers!" prayed a boy who had come from Newgate to the Home; "and don't let them throw the poker at each other to-day—but may they be as tame as mice."

A QUAINT PRAYER.

Another of this boy's prayers is worth quoting for its quaint simplicity and for the evidence it gives of his faith in the power of prayer about small matters. At a time when the boys had established a prayer-meeting among themselves, he would go round to bring them to it; and on one occasion, having been somewhat unsuccessful, he prayed, "Lord, bless all the boys, and make them want to come to the prayer-meeting, and don't let them say again, 'No, I can't, I've got to sew a button on my trousers.'"

The latest extension of this institution is the establishment of the

which was formally opened on the 19th of July. This branch owes its origin to the liberal offer made by a philanthropist of Erdington, to give a sum worth $50,000 to meet a like amount provided by the "Wesleyan Methodist Thanksgiving Fund." An estate of eighteen acres was thus purchased, and when the whole of the buildings are erected (as shown in our front picture, at the right-hand corner of the lower portion), accommodation will be provided for about three hundred children. At present only a part of the plan has been executed, consisting of the large hall, governor's residence, and the necessary offices. By permission of the Queen, the title of "The Princess Alice Orphanage" has been bestowed upon it, in remembrance of the self-denying and philanthropic labors of that lamented princess. It is established for the benefit of the orphan children of Christian parents, and in all cases the destitution of the children must be proved to the satisfaction of the committee. At present forty-five children are sheltered there, and the work will be gradually extended as the funds permit.

We have thus given a brief sketch of the Home and its numerous branches. The question will naturally suggest itself to our readers:

HOW IS THE HOME MAINTAINED?

It is in no sense endowed, but dependent entirely upon the free-will offerings of those who give practical proof of their sympathy with the helpless little ones, who sorely need the hand of mercy being stretched forth for their rescue. The report issued year by year shows that pecuniary aid is rendered by people of all classes, irrespective of creed or denomination, and from all parts of the world. Many subscribe regularly to the institution, and collections are also made in Wesleyan places of worship. Valuable help has also been rendered by the Sunday-schools of the Wesleyan Methodists, most of which make an annual collection on its behalf. Children's bazaars, too, are frequently held, many of them being conducted by young people; and in many ways, prompted by true Christian sympathy, the work is sustained and strengthened. Still, it is often a source of great anxiety to Dr. Stephenson and his noble band of helpers how the necessary funds are to be obtained.

At every meeting of the committee an overwhelming number of needy cases are presented for consideration, each telling its own sorrowful tale, and proving the dire necessity for a more vigorous prosecution of the work. Hitherto God's people have generously enabled Dr. Stephenson to continue fulfilling on this large scale the injunction of the risen Lord, "Feed my Lambs."

REV. NEWMAN HALL'S WELCOME HOME.

Rev. Newman Hall has arrived at home after his three months' tour in America. His congregation mustered in force on Thursday night, November 6th, to give him a hearty welcome home. Hawkstone Hall, adjoining Christ Church, in which the gathering took place, presented quite a gala appearance, what with flowers, flags, and appropriate devices. In front of the platform, with a background of choice flowering plants, stood a marble bust of Mr. Hall, for presentation during the evening, to mark his thirty years' connection with the congregation. After tea the company repaired to the hall, where some little time was spent in social intercourse.

Mr. and Mrs. Hall and the church officers having become seated on the platform, the more practical portion of the evening's business was proceeded with. The chair was occupied by the Rev. H. Grainger, Mr. Hall's co-pastor at Christ Church, who opened the meeting with prayer. In his subsequent remarks, Mr. Grainger rendered an account of his stewardship during Mr. Hall's absence. The church secretary, then, in the name of the congregation, welcomed the pastor back to their midst, and asked his acceptance of the bust which had been executed in his absence.

Mr. Hall, on rising to respond, was warmly cheered. It was almost worth while to go away, he said, in order to meet with such a hearty welcome on coming back. He and Mrs. Hall had travelled ten thousand miles—six thousand on sea and four thousand on land. On this, his third visit to America, nothing could have been more cordial than the reception he everywhere received. On the occasion of his last visit his object was to raise funds wherewith to build the tower of his church, and he had long been anxious to undertake another preaching tour in the States, and not say a word about money. During the past three months he had enjoyed that privilege.

He must express his thanks to the American people for their unbounded hospitality and generous sympathy. It was so wherever he went, and even before landing invitations began to pour upon him. Churches were readily thrown open to him, and he preached in them without so much as asking to what denomination they belonged, the distinctions which exist in England being unknown on the other side of the Atlantic. He was the guest of Dr. Cuyler and many others more or less known in England; and while at Washington the President sent him an invitation to become his guest for the day, but the messenger arrived just after Mr. Hall had taken his departure.

He was glad to find that none of the good work carried on in connection with Christ Church had relaxed during his absence. Addresses followed from Mr. Warren Hall, brother of the pastor, and other church officers. Toward the close of the proceedings Dr. Wilson presented an address to Mr. Hall, setting forth his labors in that place and at Surrey Chapel during the space of thirty years.

Wise Advice to Social Reformers is Given in a work published last week in Boston. It is from the pen of Axel Gustafson, who urges all who desire to improve the condition of the masses to commence with the liquor traffic, and expresses his conviction that all efforts that leave that untouched will fail. In the course of his argument he says: "It is of little use to talk of the misery of the poor while they are yearly squandering upon drink sums which if saved would go far to extinguish pauperism. It is of little use to talk of purer modes of life while those whose elevation is sought continue to make themselves incapable of appreciating or desiring such a change by their drinking habits. And it is of little use to devise means of reform while governments endure, sustain and encourage the drink-traffic by making it an indispensable and important source of revenue."

THE NATION'S OPPORTUNITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached on Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 27, 1884.

MORE than an hour before the doors of the Tabernacle were opened, the street was crowded with people anxious to get inside. By the time the service commenced every seat was occupied, the aisles were densely packed, and the corridors, lobbies, and even the gallery stairs were full of people, who waited, hoping that there would be a chance of getting within sound of the preacher's voice. There was a general Thanksgiving service, and the products of the various States were there to suggest the country's prosperity and the reason why all should give thanks to their Maker. The platform was arranged with exquisite taste. A bale of snowy white cotton plucked from North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia was placed in the centre, and served as a reading-desk. On either side were mounds of delicate gray moss from Florida, upon which rested apples, oranges, grapes, pears, and bananas in attractive arrangement. Huge pumpkins from Long Island and New Jersey; big cucumbers from farms in New York State; large, rosy apples from all over the country in pyramidal form, and ferns in pleasing variety, alternated to the ends of the platform, where two banana trees from Florida, standing over twenty-five feet high and bearing fruit, were conspicuous. The edge of the platform was thatched with oats, barley, and rye, relieved with ears of golden corn. The back of the platform and organ-pipes were hung with branches of oranges from Florida, sheafs of wheat from Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Long Island, bunches of grapes and clusters of pears from California, and vegetables from different States. Lying carelessly around the platform were nuggets of gold and silver from New Mexico, Iowa, and California; pieces of copper ore from New Mexico; fragments of iron ore and chunks of coal from Pennsylvania. Brass, lead, and other members of the mineral kingdom were conspicuous here and there. The gallery was ornamented with sheafs of wheat, rye, barley, oats, and clusters of corn, alternating with vegetables and fruit, which depended in rustic baskets. Dr. Talmage spoke from the words:

"Another door toward the south."—EZEKIEL 41 : 11.
"On the south three gates."—REV. 21 : 13.

King George and his Chaplain—Why the Vanquished King was Thankful—This Year's Mercies—Brother Deo Gratias—The National Products—The Markets Over Full—Danger of Suffocation—Need of an Outlet—Useless Remedies Considered—The Retreating West—No Help from the East—The New Southern Door—To be Opened at New Orleans—The Waiting Customers in South America—To Buy from us Instead of from Europe—How it will be Done—The Marriage of the two Continents—An Opening for Tourists—Americans Spoiled in Europe—Returning Brainless—The Hungry Millions—Duty of Congress—The Thanksgiving Reunion in Heaven.

King George of England, at the close of the Revolutionary War, in which he had lost thirteen colonies, proclaimed a day of thanksgiving because of the return of peace. His chaplain said to him: "For what would your majesty have us give thanks? for the fact that you have lost thirteen of the brightest jewels of your crown?" "No, not for that," said the king. "Because we have added millions to our national debt?" "No, not for that," said the king. "Because tens of thousands of people of the same race and religion have been destroyed?" "No, not for that," said the king. "Why, then?" insisted the chaplain, "and

FOR WHAT SHALL WE GIVE THANKS?"

"Thank God," said the king, with great vehemence—"thank God because matters are no worse." And if the year now past has been to any of you misfortune or calamity or bereavement, you have so many mercies left you ought to thank God things are no worse with you than they are.

But to vast throngs of us the year has been one of overarching mercy, and as individuals, and as a church, and as a nation we keep jubilee. And would God that our habit of gratitude might become as fixed as that of St. Felix, the monk of Cantalice, who, on all occasions, whether stopping a fight or soliciting alms for the monastery, cried out, "Deo Gratias"—thanks be to God—until the church called him "Brother Deo Gratias," and the children hailed him on the street as "Father Deo Gratias." After a year in which other nations have felt the scourge of epidemic, but this land has been spared, and after emerging unhurt from a Presidential contest in which the blind Samson of partisanship threatened to pull down the pillars of State and to leave the temple flat in the dust, and after three hundred and sixty-five more days of kindness from our God, we are here.

In the graceful and splendid decorations of this church to-day, with the grains and fruits of all sections, we have an American

CONGRESS OF NATIONAL PRODUCTS.

Delegations from North, South, East, and West. Here are delegations with white hair from the cotton fields of the South. Here are those with auburn beard and locks from the golden wheat fields of the North. Here are fruits that have in their round cheeks the blush of the setting sun of the West. Behold this moss from Southern woods, the bridal veil of the forest. Behold these plumes of pampas from the far West. Behold this rice from the Carolinas and these grapes and pears from California. Behold these apples from Connecticut, the "Land of Steady Habits." Your father, perhaps, planted the tree. Behold these great banana trees standing sentinel at either end the platform, by last steamer from Florida, but the fruit this moment growing, and one of them in blossom of resplendent orb.

HARVESTS OF 1884

looking down upon all their predecessors. The wave of temporal blessing has dashed to the top of the nation's corn-crib. Ay, the prosperity of this country has rolled up until the crest of the wave has broken and recoiled upon itself. More corn, and wheat, and cotton, and rice than we can find profitable market for. More manufactured goods than we can dispose of. The grain markets all glutted, and the factories by scores stopping, or run with only half the spindles harnessed, and wages are cut down in some places because the supply has swamped the demand, and nothing is the matter to-day with this country but over-production and under-consumption. Where there is work for ten there are twenty who offer their services, and the hundred thousand wheels of American industry are slowing up, not because there is too little, but because there is too much. God has snowed upon the track of this nation such vast accumulations of prosperity that the engine that draws the train can hardly plough through. The American nation is being choked to death with surplus of production and manufactures. Too much wheat, too much corn, too much cotton, too much fruit, too much hardware, too many drygoods, too many shoes, too many carpets, too many philosophical instruments, too many printing-presses, too many cattle, too many sheep, too many artisans, too many merchants, too many lawyers, too many doctors, and from the large number of excellent men in my own profession without settlements, some might think, too many ministers.

The deluge of supply has risen fifteen cubits higher than the mountains of demand. The load of national wealth is so great that the team cannot draw it. The man who dies for lack of a crust of bread is no worse off than the man who is smothered to death in a wheat-bin. The nation suffers to-day, not from marasmus, but from plethora; not from consumption, but from threatened apoplexy.

WHAT SHALL WE DO?

"Let us rush right down to Washington and have the tariff changed," say a great multitude. But put up the tariff as high as Tiptop House on Mount Washington, and while you might keep out foreign goods, we have enough mills o our own left to weave ten woollen shirts where there is one back to wear them, and make ten pairs of shoes for every ten feet that need them and twenty curtains for every window that could support them, and twenty pairs of eyeglasses for every vision that might be re-enforced by them. Doctor the tariff with homœopathic or allopathic or eclectic dose from now until the Thanksgiving Day of the year 2000, and you cannot in that way cure this chronic malady.

THE PRESIDENT CANNOT DO IT.

Others hope by change of national administration to correct the trouble; but no President, though he had the combined patriotism of Washington, and the broad views of Jefferson, and the suavity of a Madison, and the courage of an Andrew Jackson, and the old-fashioned honesty of an Abraham Lincoln could regulate the inexorable law of supply and demand.

WORSE IN EUROPE.

Well, some say, "Let us pack up our trunks and move east, or north, or west." Going east toward Europe would be exodus into starvation. The avalanche of emigration shows us that those continents are overcrowded. We all know that this is the best country in all the world to live in. I have eight hundred and fifty thousand fresh reasons for saying so. Eight hundred and fifty thousand people in one year coming from other shores to live in America. If America had not been the best place to live, there would have been eight hundred and fifty thousand Americans going to Europe. Shall we go north? Already the busiest hives of competition are along the St. Lawrence and the Androscoggin and the Penobscot, and the voices of the woods of Maine and the forests of the lake chain answer: "No room here!" Shall we move West?

THERE IS NO WEST.

The emigrants chased it across the Ohio, across the Mississippi, across the La Platte and the Fremont exploring expedition put their spurs into the horses' flanks and chased the West from the Rocky Mountains to the Sierra Nevadas, and the Forty-niners from California, landing from the ships on the Pacific beach, attacked the West in the rear, and the workmen of the Union Pacific and Northern Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads came upon it with their spades, and the giant West has ceased; and though some might say of it, as was said in regard to Moses, "No man knoweth of his sepulchre to this day," I think the Yosemite Valley is its sarcophagus, with El Capitain for the headstone and Cathedral Rock for the footstone.

Millions of foreign population that are yet to cross the sea for America will soon enough fill all the area between Atlantic and Pacific beaches. But in the words of my text, I now declare toward the south—on the south three gates." When I say south I do not mean the Southern States of our own American Union, but I mean the magnificent infinity of opportunity beyond—Portuguese America and fifteen Spanish American republics, and the islands of the South Pacific. Through that door will come the complete and glorious relief for all this over-supply. It will come within ten years, within five, within three.

On the sixteenth of next month, at the New Orleans Exposition, that door will begin to swing open, and if the Government of the United States fully appreciate the opportunity, and the people of this country will help, the highest water mark that the wave of our national prosperity has ever reached will be one hundred feet under what shall speedily be the full tide of commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, literary, and moral success.

Our people for the most part sit in appalling ignorance of such as was never spread out before any nation since the morning stars sang together. "On the south three gates"—ay, three thousand tes, and all of them wide open. I have had cts put before me enough to keep a man awake ghts because of their significance. The simple ct is, that the vast realm of population in the opics are buying from transatlantic nations most everything, and from us almost nothing, id the tide ought to turn, and the tide will rn, and I preach this sermon to help it turn.

Your ears will tingle with the intensity of this cital: In 1880 five billion three hundred and xty-nine million dollars worth of goods manuctured in the United States, and only two per nt taken by foreign markets! Is it not a marel that American manufactures are not as dead the proverbial door nail? My only wonder is, at nine tenths of the manufacturers have not one into bankruptcy, and ninety nine one hundredths of the factory hands have not gone into arvation or the almshouse; and it will be worse the battle is to go on between Lowell spindles ere and Manchester spindles there, between reign merchants who want tariffs down and merican merchants who want tariffs up. There no relief for us in the markets of Europe, and here will be none until "Moons shall wax and wane no more."

"Another door toward the south—on the outh three gates." This nation to-day is like a lly drygoods merchant who stands behind the ounter haggling with a small customer about ree yards of tape, when there are at the counr, impatiently waiting, three princesses wishing purchase their bridal trousseaus. May God rouse this nation from its

COMMERCIAL IDIOCY!

On the south of us are regions nearly three mes as large as the United States without anufactories, without woollen goods, without gricultural implements, without telegraphs, ithout telephones, without shoes, without sewg machines, without ten thousand things that e have and they must have. Not tens of thouands, but millions of consumers. Where shall ey get their supplies? They are getting them om another hemisphere three thousand miles way, and we at their next door are buried unr a surplus of those very things. They are ble to trade with us for their sugars, and coffees, d spices, and fruits, and valuable woods, and thousand other commodities we need as much they need our products. But look, and then ang your heads at the statement that, while r next-door neighbors, the southern republics, d Brazil and neighboring colonies import six undred and seventy-five million dollars worth goods a year, only one hundred and twenty-x million dollars worth are from the United tates—one hundred and twenty-six million ollars out of six hundred and seventy-five illion dollars — only one fifth of the trade urs. European nations taking their four finers and leaving us the poor thumb. The ster republics on the American continent, ith a foreign commerce amounting to four undred and twenty-eight million dollars, trade ith us to the feeble and paltry sum of sixty-ree million dollars. There is nothing but a mparative ferry between this country and the Vest Indies, while there are raging seas and ng voyage between them or other continents, et they import one hundred and sixteen milon dollars worth of goods, and only thirty-one illion dollars worth come from us.

Now, all this is going

SPEEDILY TO BE CHANGED,

nd it is going to be the solution of the labor uestion, of the bread question, of the communistic question, of the over production and under onsumption question, and nearly all the other uestions. It is going to set all the mills on ne Merrimac, and the Connecticut, and the usquehanna, and the Chattahoochee, and the labama running day and night with double set f hands, and calling for ten factories where we ave one, and putting all the men out of employ nto work at good wages, and it is going to hange this story of dull times into a prosperity hich will roll on in full tide until the Mississippi loses its way to the Gulf of Mexico.

No more thankful am I for the past blessings to this nation than I am thankful to God for this opening opportunity, in its height stupendous and in its width hemispheric.

HOW WILL IT BE DONE?

Among other things, by such action as that which led our Congress to appropriate one million three hundred thousand dollars to the New Orleans Exposition, and led Mexico to appropriate two hundred thousand dollars, and New Orleans to appropriate five hundred thousand dollars. That Exposition preceded by the Sydenham Crystal Palace, and the French and the Vienna and the Philadelphia expositions, yet in far-reaching significance more important than all of them put together. It is going to be the hinge of this century. Those other expositions showed chiefly what had already been done. This of next month will build a platform on which the nations of this American continent shall come up for introduction to a new commercial epoch in the history of the ages. On that platform will come up Bolivia, Peru, Paraguay, Uruguay, Venezuela, Salvador, Nicaraugua, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Brazil, and the brunette West Indies to meet the blonde and smiling United States.

HAIL! MARRIAGE DAY

of North and South. While the pessimists have been hunting up the burial service to read at the death of American commerce, and the stops of the organ were being pulled out for the Dead March in Saul, I, an optimist both by nature and by grace, take up in anticipation the bright-covered wedding liturgy, and as the blonde North takes the brunette South by the hand, saying, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," I cry, "Whom God hath joined together let neither foreign despotism nor American demagogism ever put asunder." Then let all the organs and choirs and orchestras make everything, from the Montreal ice palace to the halls of the Montezumas, quake under the rolling thunders of the grand march of North and South American progress.

This southern door will be further fastened open by the tides of from Europe to the land of the Aztecs. Much of the one hundred and six million five hundred thousand dollars yearly expended by Americans in Europe will be expended in southern exploration, in looking at some of the ruins of the forty-seven cities which Stephens, the traveller, found only a little way apart, and walking through the corridors, and under the arches, and in the great doorways and over the miracles of mosaic, and along by the monumental glories of another civilization, and ancient America will, with cold lips of stone, kiss the warm lips of modern America, and to have seen the Andes and Popocatepetl will be deemed as important as to have seen the Alpine and Balkan ranges.

So there will be fewer people spoiled by foreign travel, and in our midst there will be less poor and nauseating imitation of the French shrug and the intentional hesitancy of a brainless foreign swell. The fact is, that there are more people made fools of by European travel than in any other way. And though sensible when they embark, they return with a collar, and a cravat, and a shoe, and a coat, and a pronunciation, and a contempt for American institutions, and a bend of the elbow that makes one believe in evolution backward from man to ape! Of the thirty thousand Americans who now cross the sea annually, thousands will, on pleasure and business, visit the tropics, and so tourists and merchants and scientists and capitalists will all help in this national development.

I wish that somehow our next Congress might take the one hundred million dollars of surplus in the United States Treasury which the Republicans neglected to steal and before the Democrats get a chance to steal it, and in some way expend it in establishing new lines of shipping between the ports of North and South America, and in dredging their harbors, and in building telegraph lines, and in the quickening of that glorious consummation which is sure to come. I want it to come very soon. I want it to come before there is any more suffering. I want it to come before there is any more sorrow.

In anticipation I nail on the front door of the nation

AN ADVERTISEMENT:

Wanted, one hundred thousand men to build South American railroad as long as from here to San Francisco.

Wanted, five thousand telegraph operators.

Wanted, twenty million dollars worth of drygoods and hardware from New York City.

Wanted, all the clocks you can make at New Haven, and all the brains you can spare from Boston, and all the bells you can mould at Troy, and all the McCormick reapers you can fashion at Chicago, and all the hams you can turn out at Cincinnati, and all the railroad iron you can send from Boonton and Pittsburg.

Wanted, wanted right away, wanted by express, wanted C. O. D., wanted by railroad train, wanted by steamer, wanted lawyers to plead our causes, wanted doctors to cure our sick, wanted ministers to evangelize our population, wanted professors to establish our universities.

Without this opening prospect this Thanksgiving Day would be dark for those of us who are interested in the laboring classes. To-day there are one million people out of work in this country—ten per cent of the laboring classes with nothing to do but suffer, and another twenty per cent toiling on reduced wages. Can I, a minister of religion, stand in this place to-day, amid all these signs of prosperity and these great harvests, which have brought blessings to so many of our doors, and forget this fact? I cannot. I shall not take my seat at the Thanksgiving table with wife and children to-day, until I look at the bare plates of these multitudes, and at their empty wardrobes, and invoke upon them the mercy of God and the generous consideration of those in comfortable circumstances, and send from my own pocket my individual quota.

Congress will assemble next week, and let it waste no time in abstractions, but by some swift enactment open this door south, and all the other legitimate doors, for the relief of men who can get no work, and who stand in this cold November weather wringing their numb fingers, with their helpless families at their back.

God help them!

and women never have been quiet, and never will be quiet, and never ought to be quiet. Bread they ought to have, bread they must have, and bread they will have. With this, the fifth plentiful harvest, if there be any man, woman, or child in America without food and without comfortable apparel and without shelter, there must be something awfully wrong.

May the suffering Christ, who once had not where to lay His head, champion the cause of the helpless, and smash the great monopolies that are built out of the bones and cemented with the blood of poor workmen, and send a supply this day from full pantries to every destitute home, and so change the condition of those hardly bestead, that by the time another Thanksgiving Day arrives the poorest man in America may have upon his table a twenty-pound turkey, royally browned and basted and stuffed, put upon plates dashed with cranberry, and emptied only to make way for dessert of pumpkin pie such as New England matrons bake, or a more classic mince pie such as our dear old mothers in New Jersey mixed with their own hands before those hands were folded in the last sleep, just before they entered upon the long Thanksgiving Day of heaven, and where we shall yet throw our arms around them and the other departed ones who used to be with us on Thanksgiving Day, and give them a rapturous hug and kiss all the heartier for the present painful separations. I no more believe in the Fatherhood of God than I do in the brotherhood of man. And for all the world may there be plenty to wear and plenty to eat. Amen and Amen!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Girl at the Door.—The Rev. Mr. Andrew said at a recent meeting: "A few days ago, at the end of one of my meetings, a message came to me that a girl, who was at the door, wished to speak to me, and when I went I found her standing waiting for me. She said: 'Oh, Mr. Andrew, I want to tell you that I gave my heart to the Lord. When I went home last night I went into my room and asked Him to take me, and He has done it.' In this way many of the young are being won for the Lord. Jesus says, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'"

Something God Cannot See.—Mr. M'Laughlan says: "A Sunday-school teacher on one occasion asked her class, 'Is there anything impossible with God?' A tiny hand was raised, and a little girl said, 'Please, teacher, is it possible for God to see the sin that is washed out in the blood of Christ?' 'No, my child,' replied the teacher, 'God says when I see the blood I will pass over.' He blots out the sins of those who trust in the dear Saviour."

Christ Found in a Tent.—"One Time an old woman came into our Gospel tent, and in the after-meeting one of the workers asked, 'Are you born again?' Instead of answering the question, she grew very angry, and said she had not been in the habit of being spoken to in that manner, and went out of the tent saying she would never come back. The next night she came down to the door of the tent, and lingered about for some time outside, but at length she came in, and went out when the service was over. And the third night she came in and asked some one to show her the way of peace, for she said, 'I don't know anything about it.' A friend pointed her to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and there and then she found rest for her weary soul."

When Does a Tree Grow?—Mr. Marsh Says: "A short time ago a gentleman was preaching in the open air; his subject was growth in grace. At the close of the meeting, a man approached him and said, 'Our minister has been preaching some excellent sermons on that subject, and I have been trying to grow in grace this long time, but I find I never can succeed.' The preacher, pointing to a tree, said: 'Do you see that tree?' 'Yes,' was the wondering reply. 'Well, it had to be planted before it could grow. In like manner you must be rooted and grounded in Christ before you can begin to grow.' The man understood his meaning, and went away to find Christ; and soon he was rooted in Christ, and brought forth fruit to His praise."

Jennie and Her Shepherd.—Mr. Jack said: "I remember a young girl, who was converted at one of our meetings about twenty years ago. Not long after she had given her heart to Jesus, she was stricken with illness, and lay on her deathbed. One day her mother said to her, 'Jennie, what are ye thinking about?' And quiet Jennie answered, 'I am just thinking how the Good Shepherd found me, a poor dribbling little lamb, and how He took me right up in His arms and blessed me, and is now going to take me home to be with Himself in heaven forever.' Thus the young girl died, clinging with that simple faith to her loving Saviour, who carried her through the dark valley of the shadow of death, into the light and unending gladness of the Father's house on high."

Couldn't Laugh Him Out of It.—"A Young lad got converted to Christ at the tent on Glasgow Green. His companions, who worked in the same shop, hearing of his conversion, made up their minds to laugh him out of it. The next morning, when he entered the shop, his friends greeted him with, 'Oh, David! You were converted yesterday at the tent, were you? You will be too good to speak to us now!' 'Thank God I was converted last night; God took my sinful soul, and washed it in His Son's blood, and now I am a new creature in Him; old things are passed away, and all things are become new,' was David's quiet answer. He was permitted to testify for his Master, and it pleased Him. Many taunting and insulting words had he to endure for the sake of his Master, but it only made him stronger, and pray more earnestly, and very soon, instead of the scoffing, David won the respect of every one who came in contact with him, and led many of them to Christ."

Why he Shouted "Hallelujah."—A Christian man, only recently converted, lately gave his testimony: "I rise to praise the Lord that He has saved my soul. Only to-day I was thrown into the way of strong temptation. I thought, shall I do this? knowing all the time that it was not right. I struggled with the temptation for a while, and then I began to sing, 'Lord Jesus, receive me, no more would I grieve Thee.' When I came to the words, 'No more would I grieve Thee,' the temptation left me, and I was enabled to shout Hallelujah! Praise to His holy name." If Christians, when they are tempted to do wrong, would think how they grieve the gentle, holy Jesus, the temptation, I believe, would very soon leave them. "The devil trembles when he sees the weakest saint upon his knees."

A Boy Who Wanted Everything.—At a recent meeting Mr. Drysdale said: "A very rich lady was walking along the street one day, with two very handsomely-dressed children by her side, when a little boy presented himself in front of them. He was a poor-looking little thing, with no shoes on his feet, and the scant clothing he had was so ragged that here and there his bare flesh could be seen. As he stood there with such a hungry look on his face, the lady, kindly looking down at him, inquired, 'What do you want, my poor child?' 'Please, ma'am, I want everything,' was the boy's eager reply. Is not that what we want, dear friends? Don't we need to go and tell Jesus that we need everything? All our springs are in Him. All fulness is in Him, and 'whatsoever we ask' of Him He has promised to bestow."

Robert Rescued from Drowning.—'A Merry-hearted boy fell into water not long ago, and when he was lifted out it was thought he was dead. He was carried home to his mother, and the doctor was sent for. When he arrived he told them to briskly rub his body, as life might not be quite extinct. There were nine boys and girls in the family, and they all stood outside their brother's door, very anxious to hear if he was living. By and by their mother came to the door, when the eldest of the children, stepping forward, said, 'Mother! mother! is brother Robert alive?' 'Yes, he is alive,' she quietly answered; and they all ran with joyful steps to carry the glad news to their companions, that their brother was alive. So it is with the newly-converted soul. 'There are angels hovering round, to carry the glad tidings home,' that a soul which was dead is alive, saved from the depths of perdition, and through faith in Christ made an inheritor of present joy and everlasting life."

Interview with a Highland Shepherd.—Mr. Arthur said: "A few days ago I was going to speak for Christ in a Highland village. As I was on my way to the hill-top I passed a shepherd. Something told me to speak to that man, but I passed on without doing so, and when I got to the top of the hill I opened my Bible to find a suitable verse for my text, but I could not find anything that would do, and I said to myself, 'I cannot find my text; if I had obeyed God's voice when He told me to speak to that man I should have my text without any trouble.' So thinking, I returned and spoke to the man, and found him to be a very bright Christian, and I spent a most happy time with him, after which I went back to the hill-top, and opened my Bible, and in less than a minute I got exactly the verse that would suit for my evening's address, and God gave great blessing in the meeting that night. I thoroughly believe, if I had not spoken to that shepherd, God would not have blessed my work. It is first by implicit obedience to the guidance of the Holy Spirit that He will bless our work."

A Minister Seen in a Dream.—The Rev. Mr Craig relates: "I went at one time to visit a woman in Glasgow. When I entered the house I found it spotlessly clean. On the bed lay a woman who was still young. When I approached her bedside I could see that she was dying. 'Do you know that you are dying?' asked. 'Yes,' she said. 'Are you ready to die?' I asked again. 'Yes,' she answered 'I am.' I then asked her to tell me the story of her conversion, and she told me the following: 'I was married at the age of eighteen; my husband, who was a drunkard, died shortly after our marriage. One night I dreamed a strange dream. It was this: I was going up the Gallowgate when I noticed a minister coming along my way. Addressing him, I said: "Could you tell me if there is a place of worship about here?" "Yes," he said, pointing up the street, "there is one just at the top of this street." And when I awakened I found it was only a dream. On Sunday I went in search of a place of worship, and went in the direction of which I had dreamed; and when the minister entered the pulpit it was the same man as I had seen in my dream. By the time he had finished his sermon I was very unhappy. God's Spirit was striving with me, and I said to myself, "I will not enter my house until I decide whom I am going to serve;" and, kneeling down just where I was, I gave myself to Christ. And oh! such holy peace filled my soul; and it has stayed with me ever since,' and then she added, 'I shall very soon see my Saviour's face. I am so very happy.'"

THE RESURRECTION OF THE JUST.

By Frank H. White.

Dean Alford on the Doctrines of the Early Church—A Unanimous Agreement—Both Resurrections Literal—A Notable Expression—The Revelation not a Dream—John Gives the Meaning—The Dragon Cast out—The Church in the Tribulation — Satan's Release — The Two Thrones—The White Throne of Judgment-Christian Duty.

A FEW weeks since I met with Dean Alford's remarks upon the passage (Rev. 20). He says: "I cannot consent to distort its words from their plain sense and chronological place in the prophecy on account of any consideration of difficulty or any risk of abuses which the doctrine of the Millennium may bring with it. Those who lived next to apostles and the whole church for three hundred years understood them in the plain literal sense; and it is a strange sight in these days to see expositors, who are among the first in reverence of antiquity, complacently casting aside the most which primitive antiquity presents. As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the 'spiritual interpretation now in fashion.'"

If in a passage where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain souls lived at the first and the rest of the dead lived only at the end of a specified period after that first—if in such a passage the first resurrection may be understood to mean spiritual rising with Christ, while the second means literal rising from the grave, then there is an end of all significance in language and Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to anything. If the first resurrection is spiritual, then so is the second, which I suppose no one will be hardy enough to maintain; but if the second is literal, then so is the first, which in common with the whole primitive church and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain and receive as an article of faith and hope.

Now, in this chapter you notice an expression you find in almost every chapter in the Revelation—"I saw," and my mind has been revelling to the way the same apostle opened his first letter. There he speaks of things which he saw and heard. He is equally confident about things which he saw in vision. Many people have an idea, when they are directed to that they are asked to consider something visionary, something to be ranked with dreams and fancies. But that is not so; the apostle saw these things represented. As history represents facts accomplished, so prophecy is a prediction of facts yet to become history. So in this chapter we deal with the verities of God, and in humble dependence on Him we seek to know the true meaning. This is a very plain chapter.

Doubtless there are many difficulties in the Revelation; but just as children in putting together a map will easily get hold of the large pieces and fit them, although they will have trouble with the small pieces, so in the study of prophecy we have, as in this chapter, certain great and unmistakable facts. These ascertained and clearly understood, let us hold fast by them, sure that in God's time all else will be made plain.

You notice in this chapter John not only gives us a vision, but he takes pains to give us

THE MEANING OF THE VISION.

For instance, at the close of verses 4 and 5 he explains, "This is the first resurrection;" and again, lower down, after speaking of death and hades cast into the lake of fire, he says, "This is the second death." Notice also how the phrase, "The thousand years," is repeated and emphasized.

Now, I wish to ask you to observe the testimony of the Spirit here to the reality, and personality, and activity, and malignity, and future captivity, and final doom of Satan himself. John "saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand." He laid hold of the—who?

the old serpent, the devil, the great deceiver, Satan; for these four titles are given here that we may make no mistakes as to who is spoken of.

Permit me to say as to the question sometimes raised whether the Church will pass through the tribulation or not, that the very words in which John describes the occupants of the thrones seem clearly to indicate that they, or many of them, have lived on the earth when the Antichrist was in power. As sharers in the first resurrection, they must have been on earth till Christ appears, as in 1 Thess. 4, where we are told the first resurrection takes place when Jesus raptures His Church. And in that case Antichrist must have previously appeared.

Now, a few words on verses 7 and 8: "When the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them to battle." I confess to you I stand in awe of this. I cannot but receive it; it is God's testimony; I feel, however, it sounds a depth of human depravity we might have never suspected. After all these thousand years when Satan was bound, when the Lord's rule and grace and discipline have been at work, yet the unbound deceiver finds plenty ready to listen to his lie again; so at the close of the Millennial age you find

AN OUTBREAK OF SATAN'S POWER.

Just as the present age closes with the great apostasy under Antichrist, so after enjoying the blessed rule of the Son of Man Himself (and today men are saying if we have better and wiser rule and government we shall have a Christianized humanity); yet after a thousand years of His power and grace and mercy and peace there are still thousands of men willing to listen to Satan, and actually to dare to advance against the holy camp and holy city until fire comes down from God out of heaven and devours them all.

Then comes the great white throne. You must distinguish between the mediatorial throne of Christ and this great white throne of solemn judgment. It is it is a great throne, it is a great white throne, indicative of the righteousness which shall characterize its decisions; for it is a throne of decision. Those who are assembled before it, assembled not to be tried, but to hear the decisions already recorded in the books and the Book of Life. All whose names are not written in the Book of Life are cast into the lake of fire, whither Satan and the beast have preceded them.

The revelation is very practical. My solemn conviction is that as the days become darker, and persecutions arise,

THE VEIL WILL BE TAKEN AWAY

and the Apocalypse made more plain. But let me say these things are not written to amuse us, but to stir in us godly fear. Then let us have long patience. One day is with the Lord as a thousand years. He is longsuffering, not willing any should perish. God never hurries. Then let us have a steady hope, not a flickering hope, but a steady hope, so that our gleam may be like the lighthouse burning on whether it blows hard or soft, whether it be cloudy or starlight, always burning on, for the darkness may come at any moment. Then let us have a fervent love. He will reward all that love His appearing. Let us love Him who will appear; let us love all who will appear with Him. Then there will be deep humility; great grace brings deep humility always. Lastly, unwearied activity in doing what our hands find to do, for the night cometh when no man can work.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY IN AFRICA.

A THRILLING narrative of an excursion through an unexplored region and among unknown races was told on November 3d by Mr. Joseph Thompson, a traveller who has just returned from Africa, and who related his adventures to a Geographical Society of which he is a member. Mr. Thompson devoted more than a year to a journey from the eastern coast of "the Dark Continent" three thousand miles into the interior. Twelve hundred miles of the way was through a country in which no other white man has ever set foot.

DANGERS OF THE JOURNEY.

Although he travelled with a smaller escort than Mr. H. M. Stanley thought necessary, and succeeded in bringing his men back "without the loss of a single man by violence, or the necessity of shooting a single native," yet his experiences were by no means devoid of peril. His one hundred and twenty followers were mostly "the offscourings of Zanzibar," who had to be deterred from running off with his goods by armed sentries placed at the gates of his palisade of thorns every night. His one white follower was a Malay sailor, who "could jabber in a dozen languages, though he could neither read nor write."

His native guides nearly betrayed him. A ringleader in treachery he made trustworthy, by appointing him as one of his head overseers. Unsavory negroes promenaded his camp and lolled on his bed. He had to fight both lions and rhinoceroses. He crossed regions desolated by cattle-disease, and had to eat bullocks well-nigh putrid, with bones like mud. What he failed to give away the savages endeavored to steal, and they stabbed at him when he attempted to defend his goods. He was tossed by a buffalo, fell sick of fever, and had an attack of dysentery. Fever, he says, grew on every bush. For fifteen months he was shut off from all communication with the outside world at the coast.

BEAUTIES OF THE SCENERY.

But he had compensation for his troubles. Almost at the outset of his journey he ascended a mountain, to the height of 8777 feet, to collect plants. By a route that had been closed for many years he crossed the great plain of Ngiri, went through the territory of the strange Masai race, and, passing "out of the meridional trough, with its strings of charming lakes," came to the plateau of Lykissia, 8400 feet in height. He was then in a splendid pine-forest, "more suggestive of the heart of Europe than of equatorial Africa." Then he traversed "one of the most interesting tracts of country to be found in the equatorial regions," and crossed a magnificent chain of mountains hitherto unnamed. These mountains rise to a height of 14,000 feet, but he was shortly to see one which utterly eclipsed them. This was Kenia, nearly thirty miles in diameter at its base, and rising from a thorn-clad plain 15,700 feet in altitude. For 15,000 feet the mountain sloped gradually upward from the plain, and then sprang into a sugar-loaf peak 3000 feet high, covered with glittering snow, which had here and there slipped away and left blank patches of the mountain exposed, so as to justify its native name of the "Speckled" or "Gray Mountain." Mountain, plains, lakes, forests, and fertile meadows made up a country which, for splendor of scenery and benignity of climate, was very desirable and well fitted for the home of civilized races.

A GREAT VOLCANIC CONE,

A STRANGE RACE.

In accomplishing this journey he had to pass through the tribes of the Masai, who consider themselves the lords of creation, and have hitherto proved inaccessible to strangers and a terror to all who come nigh their borders. A more remarkable and unique race, he says, does not exist. Physically they are the exact opposite of the stunted negroes, being beautifully proportioned, and showing the "smooth and rounded outline of the Apollo type," but rarely the knotted and brawny muscles of the true athlete. The elder women are decently clad in bullock's hide, and wear for ornament twenty or thirty pounds of thick iron wire coiled round their limbs and neck. The men wear kidskin.

Till twelve or fourteen years of age the boys and girls live with their parents, and are fed on curdled milk, meat, and grain. Then they leave the married men's kraal, and enter one where there are only young unmarried men and women, and where their life is "indescribable." There they stay, clothed mainly in "a smear of wet clay," or a tag of string, till married, the men being warriors and and amusing themselves when at home, but never dreaming of cultivating the ground; while the women attend to the cattle, build huts, and perform household duties. On their expeditions the men preserve order and good discipline, but on their return home fight and slay each other over the division of the spoils. They do not make slaves of their captives, but put them to death; and their thirst for blood is insatiable.

Meat and milk are the only diet for both sexes. "Spirits, beer, tobacco, and vegetable food are alike eschewed." They will not even eat the meat of wild animals, and the they do eat they take alternately for several days together. When they kill a bullock they drink the blood raw. This kind of life suits the Masai warrior so well that he does not marry till he is getting old, and finds his strength decline. Then he settles down into "a staid and respectable member of Masai society," lays aside his weapons, takes a wife, and brings up some young warriors. He may now eat vegetables, drink beer, and chew tobacco. At death his body is thrown out to the hyenas and vultures. Mr. Thompson was not sorry to find that a lot of these warriors had gone on the war-path when he reached their neighborhood.

MORE PROMISING TRIBES.

As he approached the sources of the Nile, the explorer found people more easy to deal with. Those at Taveta were peaceable, hospitable, and honest, and those at Wakavirondo, near the Lake Nyanza, were kind instead of quarrelsome, as he had expected. In these parts food was abundant and prices low, while as they neared the lake which was his goal they passed through regions densely populated. He saw Nyanza, and returned to tell the story of climes where colonies may be planted with great hope of success and mighty nations may yet flourish.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Receipts of the Government for the fiscal year decreased nearly $50,000,000 as compared with those of 1883. The decrease in customs was under twenty millions and in internal revenue about twenty-three millions. The expenditure, however, decreased also to the amount of $21,281,893, so that there is still a large surplus applicable to the reduction of the national debt, amounting to $104,393,625. It appears from Treasurer Wyman's annual report that the silver dollars continue to accumulate beyond the power of the Treasury to keep them moving. Out of a total of over $182,000,000 less than $40,000,000 are in circulation. There are held in the Treasury over $45,000,000 in excess of what are required for the redemption of certificates. The Treasurer recommends the withdrawal of three-cent pieces, of which three hundred thousand were returned to the Treasury last year.

Secretary Teller's Report Exhaustively Reviews the Indian question. He recommends an improvement in our system in dealing with educated Indians. He thinks that after they have been taught to labor they should no longer receive rations, but be aided by the Government to become self-supporting. The Secretary says: "One great difficulty met with is that when the young of both sexes return to the agency there is no remunerative employment for them. They lack capital to open and cultivate a farm, and if they have acquired a trade, they find no employment of that character. It is as necessary that some employment should be secured for them as it is to teach them to labor. Instead of rations, they should receive encouragement to labor by donations of stock, implements of agriculture, etc., and then be compelled to take care of themselves. All educated Indians should be citizens of the United States, and I suggest that those who shall complete the regular course at the several manual labor schools be given citizenship, without their incurring the risk of a forfeiture of their interest in either tribal lands or tribal funds." Five new boarding schools and twelve new day schools were added last year to those in successful operation. The Osages, it appears, are taking the lead in educational matters. Through their council they have made education compulsory. Every child of school age failing to make eight months of attendance in the year forfeits the year's annuity.

Important Testimony to the Value of the Civil Service Reform act is rendered by the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Teller says, in his annual report: "It was urged as an objection to it that the examinations would be of such technical character as to exclude from the public service all except those who have had the advantages of a liberal education. The experience of nearly one year and a half has demonstrated that these fears were groundless, and that the examinations have been conducted on a sound and business-like basis, calculated to secure efficient clerks for the various grades of the public service. The law has in a great measure relieved the department of the importunities of applicants and their friends for positions, and will, I think, when it is fully understood, save the heads of the departments much time heretofore lost in listening to appeals for positions when it was impossible to comply with such requests. I think the system a valuable one, and one that should have the hearty support of both executive and legislative departments of the Government." As the bill the Secretary eulogizes emanated from the Democratic party, it would appear to be approved by both the political parties, and it may consequently be hoped that its provisions will be observed and extended to higher grades of the service.

The Miserable Proteus Disaster was again the subject of discussion last week, owing to the public imputations on the two commanders by General Hazen. Commander Wildes, in reply to General Hazen, declares that the failure to leave provisions for Lieutenant Greely's party was the result of General Hazen's own orders, that it was in obedience to Hazen's orders that Beebe brought back to St. John's a shipload of supplies that might have been left on the spot where Greely's companions afterward starved, and that Hazen's own subordinates repeatedly urged him to permit the Proteus to land provisions at Cape Sabine on her way north, predicting that the vessel might be crushed, just as she was crushed a few months later. But Hazen determined that the vessel must be pushed northward at any cost, without stopping to deposit stores, and seemed to believe that if provision depots should be made at any point except at Littleton Island Greely's requests would be disregarded, although Greely had very carefully pointed out the necessity of making depots on the west side of the channel. Secretary Lincoln refers, in severe terms, to General Hazen's charges, which he considers "extraordinary in time and place, and hardly excusable even under whatever irritation may have been caused by the findings of the Proteus court of inquiry."

The Failure of a National Bank at Middletown, N. Y., caused some excitement last week. The entire capital and surplus of the bank are said to have disappeared. The president of the bank has for some time been assisting a large grain operator, and the advances made to him at length became so large that the Washington department interfered, and notified the directors that the law must be complied with. The president, however, continued his loans to the grain operator, but as he advanced irregularly on drafts, the account was apparently reduced. Early last week he disclosed the affair to the directors, who decided to suspend. The Government, it appears, had become dissatisfied with the management of the bank, and had decided not to extend its charter, which would have expired in May next. It is expected that depositors will not suffer, but an assesment on stockholders may have to be made.

A Mysterious Disease is Working Havoc in West Virginia, the western part of Virginia, and Eastern Kentucky. The centre of the region suffering is in the Cumberland Mountains. In West Virginia the affected district includes McDowell, Mercer and Logan counties; in Virginia, Dickinson County is the worst, and in Kentucky, while Harlan County is the chief sufferer, the epidemic extends to Letcher, Perry, Leslie, and Belle counties. Reports of visitors say the scenes of distress are terrible. All the people are poor mountaineers, most of them living in log houses of two rooms, occupied by from two to a dozen persons. In some instances the disease has swept off whole families, the last members to die being left unburied. There is much doubt as to the nature of the disease, the district being far from railroads and difficult of access. The descriptions published of the symptoms lead medical men to believe that the people are dying of mineral poisoning. There has been no rainfall since August 3d, the running streams are dried up, and the people have been drinking water from pools which, as the soil of the whole affected region is more or less impregnated with minerals, notably with iron and copper, probably held those metals in suspension. The disease is not contagious, but the well are barely able to attend to the sick, business is suspended, and the prevailing destitution renders the disease more generally fatal. It is hoped that help will be promptly rendered by the State governments.

The Death of Missionary Bishop Wiley, in China, is reported. A cable despatch, signed by the Rev. N. J. Plumb, from Foochow, received here on Nov. 22d, briefly stated that he was dead. The bishop was under sixty years of age, having been born March 29th, 1825. As a young man he chose the career of doctor of medicine, and studied at the University of New York. He received his diploma, and in 1849 settled at Pottsville, Pa. After only a year's practise, he abandoned his brilliant prospects to go out as a medical missionary to China. Failing health compelled his return after four years' labor, and he served in the home field the Methodist Episcopal Church under whose auspices he went to China. He was successful as preacher, professor, and editor, for he served in all those capacities. In 1872 he was raised to the bishopric, and in 1877 returned to China. Both there and in Japan his labors were much blessed.

Premier Macdonald, of Canada, is Receiving a warm welcome in England. On Nov. 26th the Marquis of Lorne presided at a banquet given in his honor. There was a large number of notable guests present. Lord Lorne, in proposing the health of the guest of the evening, said that Premier Macdonald is one of the most successful statesmen of the younger nations of the world, and expressed the hope that he would long be a partaker in the public life which he had adopted. Premier Macdonald, replying to the complimentary remarks of Lord Lorne, gave a review of the forty years of his public life in Canada, and said that, whether he was speaking in the backwoods or in the cities of the Dominion, the sentiment of loyalty to England was always welcomed by his hearers. The Dominion of Canada, he said, would of its own choice always remain in close connection with Great Britain; but it was obvious that there ought to be a closer connection and a system of offence and defence.

Renewed Activity among the Irish Secret societies has been observed during the past few weeks. In Dublin especially there are many signs of disaffection among the people of the city, and great activity of secret societies in recruiting their numbers. The nationalists make open boast of their great increase, and the Young Ireland societies are multiplying rapidly. Numerous public meetings are being held by the Young Ireland societies in the provinces, at which considerable display its made of the Irish, American, French and Boer flags. On Nov. 27th the house of an obnoxious landowner was partially destroyed by dynamite. The police were guarding the house when the explosion took place. No one was injured, but the boldness of the act has caused general alarm.

Further Rumors of Impending Revolt in India are published by Vanity Fair, an English journal, which quotes from private letters received from officials in India stating that there is a dangerous condition of affairs in that country. The feelings of the natives were never so excited against England as at the present time, and foreign emissaries are at work preparing them to make an explosion. Officers in high command have sent to England urgent demands for authority to form camps of refuge for women and children in order to be ready in case of a mutiny. The government has been warned that it is on the eve of a great trial. Students of prophecy long ago arrived at the conclusion that India would be liberated from British rule.

A Remarkable Series of Services is Reported from Paterson, N. J. Miss Laurie McLatchie, the Scottish evangelist, who had closed her services in that city, was induced to return there, at the urgent solicitation of the Prospect Street Church, where she was preaching each day last week. Large crowds gathered to hear her, and on Sunday a dense throng filled the church to excess. There has been a wonderful outpouring of the Spirit. Large numbers of conversions have taken place, some of them of an unusually interesting character. Among others, the Paterson Daily Guardian mentions that of the man whose marvellous escape from death, when a few days before he fell down an elevator shaft, made him a public character. One night, among the anxious seekers for salvation were a man and his wife, both of whom went away rejoicing. One young lady, whose Christian parents have labored and prayed for her conversion for years, was brought to Christ under Miss McLatchie's tender appeals. Some incidents of the mission were truly romantic. Having preached nine times in seven days, Miss McLatchie is this week taking a much-needed rest. On Sunday next she resumes her work in Dr. Moorhouse's Church, on Seventh Street, between Second and Third Avenues, New York.

Pastor Chiniquy was Mobbed and Prevented lecturing in Montreal on November 5th. The lecture was to have been delivered in Russell Hall; but before the hour appointed the hall was crowded by Roman Catholics, and a mob of two thousand gathered around the building. As soon as Pastor Chiniquy began to speak the audience refused to let him proceed, and the utmost confusion followed. Men stood on the seats and window sills, howling derisively whenever the speaker attempted to make himself heard. This was followed by "La Marseillaise," given in yelling chorus. Benches were now broken, and broken glass from the windows was soon scattered over the hall. Eventually the police cleared the hall and drove the mob from the back of the building, where carriages were brought, in which the lecturer and his friends escaped. They were followed by the howling roughs, who threw stones and threatened to kill Mr. Chiniquy. Happily, he made good his escape. No arrests were made.

A National Union of Primary Sabbath-School teachers has been founded with the object of encouraging teachers to form local unions whereever practicable. These primary unions are undenominational organizations of primary Sunday-school teachers, and other teachers of children, who may unite, meeting weekly, with the prime objects of mutual conference and help in their work, and the study of the international lesson with reference to teaching it to young children. The founders of the National Union are the primary teachers of Philadelphia, New York, Washington, and Albany, who have found their Primary Unions helpful to them in their work. Full particulars of the Union and its objects, with advice as to the formation of local Unions, may be obtained by writing to Mr. Frank Hamilton, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Robert Graham, the Hon. Secretary of the Church Temperance Society, said last week, in the course of an address on the progress of the Society, that since the society was organized, three years ago, Diocesan societies had been established in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Albany, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Utah, and Colorado. Mr. Graham said that the excess of the money paid in America for liquor over that paid for bread and meat was enormous, and proportionately greater than that paid for clothing and the other necessaries of life.

Noticing a Recent Meeting in One of the southern counties of Maryland, a Baltimore paper says: "The only speaker was Major George A. Hilton, of Washington. Others were expected, but did not arrive. When Major Hilton's arrival was announced some anti-temperance persons hoisted a demijohn to the top of the Cleveland and Hendricks flagpole." The indignation of the intelligent portion of a strong anti-Prohibition community was so great at the intended insult that an audience of over five hundred people gathered, and listened with thoughtful attention for an hour and a half to an address full of the Gospel of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, when, but for the hoisting of that demijohn, there would probably not have been one hundred people. Thus the efforts of enemies to thwart the proclaiming of the truth are turned against themselves (Ps. 76 : 10).

Cannibalism at Sea is the Subject of a Shocking story told by the survivors of a boat's crew which was lost at sea, rescued, and brought into Delaware Breakwater on November 24th. The pilot boat Turley sent out its skiff, on November 22d, to put a pilot on board an American line steamer. The pilot was safely put on board, and the three men left in the skiff turned it to row back to the Turley. The sea was rough and the night dark, and the skiff drifted out to sea, missing the Turley altogether. Sixty hours the three men were at sea with nothing to eat or drink. At last two of them drank sea water, and they went into delirium, and one died. The second man, Hanson, was so maddened that he tried to kill his shipmate, whose name was Bertram, and who had not drunk the salt water; but he failed, and fell upon the dead body of his other comrade, which he partially devoured. On Wednesday, November 26th, they were seen by a passing vessel and rescued. Bertram states that though he loathed the thought of eating the dead man's flesh, he should have done so if they had not been saved that morning. To such means will men resort to prolong their lives; yet when eternal life is offered them in the Gospel freely, without money and without price, comparatively few accept the offer (Rom. 6 : 23).

A Father Shot his Good Son in Mistake for his bad son in New York, on November 27th. The father states that he had two sons, Charles and Henry, and that Charles was a perpetual trouble to him. On the day of the shooting Charles applied to him for money, and threatened him with a carving-knife. He was alarmed, but managed to get rid of the young man by the gift of two dollars. Shortly afterward he returned intoxicated, and the father refused to give him more. Charles again produced the knife, and vowed he would cut his father's throat. Henry, who was in the room, interposed to protect his father, but the old man drew his pistol and, taking aim at Charles, fired. The ball, however, struck Henry over the right eyebrow, inflicting a serious, if not fatal, wound. The father immediately gave himself up to the police. He is almost demented by remorse. He says that his son Henry never gave him an hour's anxiety, and he was passionately fond of him. That he should have shot him causes him agonizing grief. It is not the first time the innocent has suffered for the guilty. Unhappily, in this case there is no advantage even for the guilty. When the pure and holy Saviour laid down His life for guilty men, it was not by accident or mistake, but that they through Him might be saved (1 Pet. 2 : 24).

A Silly Election Bet was Paid to the Amusement of Wall Street and the adjacent business quarters in New York on November 26th. A well-known citizen, shortly before the election, made an agreement in the nature of a bet with a prominent hotel proprietor. The bet he made was that if Cleveland were elected he would play a hand organ all through Nassau, Wall, and Broad streets, starting from the corner of Broadway and Maiden Lane; and if Blaine had been elected the hotel proprietor was to have made musical promenade of the same route. At the time appointed Broadway was almost blockaded by the multitude that bulged out from Maiden Lane. The steps of the business houses on both corners were crowded with men and not a few women; all the wagons and trucks that stopped in the street were instantly swarming with boys, so that traffic was diverted into other streets. The throng comprised well-dressed brokers and merchants, and clerks and salesmen from the banks and business houses. The man was a little scared when he saw how large a throng had gathered to witness his musical efforts, and his face turned pale and his legs trembled beneath him. The organ was brought, and the man put the strap over his shoulders and started down Maiden Lane, while the throng applauded in a continuous roar. He was preceded by a squad of policemen, who forced a passage for the organ. He ground out "Yankee Doodle," and the crowds howled and shouted frantically. Similar silly bets have been made and paid in other cities, in some cases noted merchants having undertaken to wheel the winner of a bet through the city in a wheelbarrow. It is strange that men should be so willing to humiliate themselves about the success or failure of a political candidate. The same courage is not found when there is need for some one to bear the reproach of religion. Yet the Saviour's claims dwarf into nothingness the claims of political champions, and He expects the sacrifice to be made (Matt. 10 : 32, 33).

A Puzzled Matrimonial Agent has Arrived in Philadelphia. He comes from Trenton County, Arizona. In reply to a question about his business, he said: "My business in Philadelphia is rather peculiar. In fact, I am almost at a loss how to proceed. You see, there is a scarcity of young women in Trenton County, and a lot of respectable young men called a meeting at St. John on October 15th, and deputies were selected to come East to secure wives for the subscribers to the association. I have the photographs of the members—thirty-one in all—and I also have letters of recommendation from the township officers. All I want now is to secure the young ladies. Their expenses to Arizona will be paid by the association immediately, or, if they prefer, they will be given the addresses of the members whom they prefer, and a correspondence can be opened. How to begin this undertaking is puzzling. I am afraid to advertise for fear I will not receive replies from the kind of young women that would suit. The society is composed of ranchmen, farmers, miners, civil and mining engineers, a hotel clerk, a druggist, and a lawyer. The young man will doubtless soon solve his difficulty. In the overcrowded Eastern cities there are many young ladies who would be willing to go to Arizona for a husband. Would that preachers who are inviting sinners to espouse themselves to Christ found their invitations as readily accepted as this emissary is likely to do (II Cor. 11 : 2)!

Two Children Lost in the Woods Caused anxiety throughout a whole Canadian village recently. The children, respectively eight and twelve years old, belonged to a farmer residing at St. Mathieu, in Remouski County, who sent them into the bush near his house to cut a few branches of cedar. Not returning home after an absence of five hours, the children, it was concluded, had lost their way in the woods, and the parents began a search for them, which they kept up without success until ten o'clock that night. Next day the whole village turned out to help, but without success. On the following morning four of the most experienced woodrangers and hunters of the place resumed the weary search, and about noon came upon the little wanderers, still full of life, but suffering terribly from hunger and cold. At the moment of their rescue the older of the two had placed his little brother in the hollow at the root of an old pine. It appears that, with the exception of the few hours they had lain down to sleep during the night on the cold ground, they had walked the whole time in the hope of extricating themselves from their perilous position. They had passed two days and two nights in the forest. It was natural for them to try to extricate themselves, but they probably made their condition worse by their efforts. It is so with sinners, who try to improve their state instead of at once seeking refuge in Jesus (Luke 17 : 33).

THE THRESHING-FLOOR OF ORNAN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"At that time when David saw that the Lord had answered him in the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there."—1 CHRONICLES 21 : 28.

"Then David said, This is the house of the Lord God, and this is the altar of the burnt offering for Israel."—1 CHRONICLES 22 : 1.

David Looking for a Site—The Indication Given—A Most Appropriate Spot—The Spiritual Inquiry—Where Shall God's Temple be?—I. No External Requisites—The Chosen Place—Unadorned Unecclesiastical Place—Where God has been Met—A Place of Ordinary Toil—It had to be Bought—II. A Type of the Spiritual Meeting-Place—A Place of Food—A Type of Affliction—The Place of Conviction and Fear—Where the Sign of Peace was—III. Use the Place—How to Build a Living Temple.

DAVID was for many years searching for a site for the great temple, which he purposed to build for Jehovah his God. It had been ordained that the sacrifices offered to the one God should be offered by all Israel upon one altar; but as yet the ark of the Lord was within curtains, near to David's palace, and the altar of burnt offering was situated at Gibeon. Where should the one altar be erected? Where should the ark find its permanent dwelling-place? David said, "Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed; I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids, until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob." Yet for a long time he received no indication as to the exact spot whereon the Lord's altar should be reared, save only that he was told that the Lord had chosen Zion and desired it for His habitation.

David watched, and waited, and prayed, and in due time he received the sign.

GOD KNEW THE SPOT,

and had consecrated it long before by His appearance unto Abraham. The other Sabbath-day, you remember, out text was "Jehovah-jireh,"* and we then learned that in the mount the Lord would be seen. Upon Mount Moriah, on or near that particular spot which had been named Jehovah-jireh, was the temple to be built. Abraham had there unsheathed the knife to slay his son. Wondrous type of the great Father offering up His Only-begotten for the sins of men! The scene of that grand transaction was to be the centre of worship for the chosen people. Where Abraham made the supreme sacrifice, there should his descendants present their offerings. Or if we look into the type and see God there presenting Jesus as a sacrifice for men, it was most suitable that man should forever sacrifice to God where God made a sacrifice for him.

As yet it was not known to David that this was the chosen place. Now it is indicated by memorable signs; the angel of justice stands above the spot; and his sword is sheathed there in answer to the cries of the afflicted king, according to the long-suffering mercy of God. Then David clearly saw the mind of the Lord, and said, "This is the house of Jehovah my God, and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel." Then he commenced at once with double speed to prepare the materials for the temple. Though he knew that he might not build it, since his hands had been stained with blood, yet he would do all that he could to help his son Solomon in the great enterprise.

This problem which David had at last worked out by the good hand of God upon him, is one which in a deep spiritual sense exercises our hearts full often. Where is it that man may meet with God? How is it that man may speak with his offended Lord and be reconciled to Him? Is there not some meeting-place where the sinner may express his repentance, and where mercy may grant full absolution? Many are saying, "Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!" Hearts touched by the Spirit of God are still seeking after God if haply they may find Him. In what condition, and by what means may man be at peace with God, and dread no longer the sword of His justice?

We may get some light from the type before us upon that question—

WHERE SHALL GOD'S TEMPLE BE?

How shall men be brought to it? We speak not at this time upon natural things, but upon the things of the Spirit; therefore let us pray the Holy Spirit to enlighten and instruct us, for only by His aid shall spiritual truth enter our hearts!

I. First, then, this truth is believed by you, though, alas! not by all men, that externally there is nothing in any place why God should there meet with men. The Lord chose the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite as the spot whereupon for many a day His holy worship should be openly celebrated according to the outward ceremonies of a typical dispensation. There the Temple was built, and for a thousand years it stood as the centre of Divine worship, so far as it was visibly presented according to His ordinance. What that mount may yet become we will not at this time consider. Prophets give us bright hints of what shall yet be even on Mount Zion, which has so long been trodden under foot of the adversary. But why was the threshing-floor of Ornan to be the meeting-place of David with his God, and the spot where prayer was to be heard?

Certainly it was a very simple and unadorned,

AN UNECCLESIASTICAL PLACE.

The threshing-floor of Ornan boasted no magnificence of size, or beauty of construction. There was just the rock, and I suppose a composition spread upon it of hard clay or cement, that the feet of the oxen might the better tread out the corn. That was all it was; yet when the Temple with all its glory crowned the spot, God was never more conspicuously present than on that bare, ungarnished threshing-floor. "Meet God in a barn!" saith one. Why not? Does that astonish you? God met Adam in a garden, Abraham under a tree, and Noah in an ark. There is less of man in the open field than in the cathedral, and where there is least of man there is at least an opportunity to find most of God. "Meet God on a threshing-floor!" Why not? It may be a thousand times more sacred than many a chancel; for there simple minds are likely to pay their homage in hearty truthfulness, while in the other the artificialness of the place may foster formality. A tasteful building may be a way of showing your pious regard for the Lord, and so far it may be justifiable and acceptable; but take care that you do not regard it as essential, or even important, or you will make an idol of it. No chisel of mason or hammer of carpenter can build a holy place. Without either of these a spot may be none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven.

Moreover, it was

not merely a floor, but a threshing-floor in present use, with oxen present, and all the implements of husbandry ready to hand. It was so ordinary and so every-day a place, that none could have been more so; as if the Lord would say to us, "I will meet you anywhere; I will be with you in the house and in the field; I will speak with you when you till the ground, when you thresh your corn, when you eat your bread." Every place is holy where a holy heart is found. This ought to gladden the solitude of godly men. God is with you, therefore be of good cheer. If you are on board ship, or if you are wandering in the woods, or are banished to the ends of the earth, or are shut out from the Sabbath assemblies of God's house, yet

"Where'er you seek Him He is found,
And every place is hallowed ground."

On the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite did God meet with David, and in your work-room, at your bench, or upon your bed, or behind the hedge, or in the corner of a railway carriage, the Lord will hear you, and commune with you.

My heart rejoices when I think that this was not only a very unadorned place, and one that was given up to common uses, but it was also in the possession of a Jebusite. The Jebusites were among the nations doomed for their iniquities; they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise; and this vast rock on which the Temple is to stand, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, belongs at first to one of the accursed seed of Canaan. Herein the Lord showeth that He is no respecter of persons; He would meet the king, not on the land of an Israelite, but on the threshing-floor of a Jebusite. The Jews wrapped themselves up within themselves and said, "The temple of the Lord; the temple of the Lord are we;" but the Lord seemed to rebuke their national pride by saying, "And your Temple is built upon the threshing-floor of a Jebusite." If they would but have remembered this, the Jews might in our Lord's day have been more tolerant of the conversion of the Gentiles to God.

Once more, there was one matter in reference to Ornan's threshing-floor which it would be well to mention; before it could be used with money. I frequently meet with impossibly spiritual people who hate the mention of money in connection with the worship of God. The clatter of a collection jars upon their sublime feelings. The mention of money in connection with the worship of God is more dreadful to them than it is to God Himself; for He saith, "Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money;" and again, "None shall appear before me empty." To these pious persons money saved and hoarded is abundantly pleasant; their only objection is to giving it. In this they somewhat differ from David, who paid to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight. Before he would offer a sacrifice he paid down fifty shekels of earnest money; for he said, "I will not offer burnt offerings unto Jehovah my God of that which doth cost me nothing." It is a very curious thing, is it not? that one man should show his spirituality by his liberality, and another should pretend to do it by the reverse method.

The highest act of adoration that was ever paid on earth was when that woman, whose name is to be mentioned wherever this Gospel is preached, emptied upon the head of our blessed Lord an alabaster box of precious nard. That gift was known to have cost her at least five hundred pence. It might have been sold for much, but the costliness of the perfume entered into the very essence of the act in the mind of the holy and grateful woman. The Lord Jesus Christ when He sat over against the treasury not only read the hearts of the givers, but he noticed the actual offering of the woman who dropped into the box two mites that made a farthing, which were all her living.

THE RATTLE OF THE COINS

did not take away anything from the heavenliness and the spirituality of that woman's worship. Far otherwise. The top of Moriah, where God appoints that His Temple should be builded, saw the weighing out of gold and silver, and was all the fitter for divine communion because thereof. Do not believe for a moment that visible grandeur is necessary to the place where God will meet with you. Go to your threshing-floor and pray; ay, while the unmuzzled oxen take their rest, bow your knee and cry to the Lord of the harvest, and you shall meet with God there among the straw and the grain. Fear not to draw nigh to God in these streets, but consecrate all space to the Lord your God. Study simplicity and plainness of worship.

II. But now, secondly, spiritually this threshing-floor of Ornan was of how God meets with men.

I think, first, its extreme simplicity enters into the essence of the type. So far from thinking that a threshing-floor was a bad place to pray in, if I look a little beneath the surface I think

* See CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 6th.

I can see the reason for it. Golden grain is being separated from the straw by the corn drag—whence came this corn? From Him who openeth His hand and supplieth the want of every living thing. Here, then, God meets me in the kindest way. Where can I meet Him better than where He gives me food? Where better a temple out of which the bread of eternal life shall come, than on a threshing-floor where the bread of the first life is to be gathered? The two things seem to meet right well together. The temporal and the eternal join hands in common consecration. That same prayer which teaches us to say, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed by thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," leads us on to cry, "Give us day by day our daily bread." There is a spiritual significance in the type.

Would it be fanciful if with a glance I indicated that the threshing-floor is the EXACT TYPE OF AFFLICTION?

Tribulation signifies threshing in the Latin, and the saints through much tribulation enter the kingdom. One of the titles of the people of God is "my threshing and the corn of my floor." Now it is well known that the Lord is with His people in their trials. When He smites with one hand He holds with the other. In the lion of trial we find the honey of communion. The temple of glory is built on the threshing-floor of affliction. I do not thrust forward this observation as though it were of great weight; but even if it be a fancy so far as the type is concerned, the thought conveys a truth in a pleasing manner.

But much more, this was the place where justice was most clearly manifest. Above Ornan's threshing-floor, in mid-air, stood a dreadful apparition. A bright and terrible figure, a mysterious servant of God, was beheld with a drawn sword in his hand, which he brandished over the guilty city of Jerusalem. Deaths were constant. The people fell as forest leaves in autumn. Then was it that David went out to meet with his God, and make confessions before Him. Oh, sirs, the lack of many of you is that you have never yet beheld sin in its consequences, sin in its guilt, sin in its doom. Men will not meet God till they see the angel with the drawn sword. They will trifle and play with sin, and neglect the invitation of God, and even doubt His existence, till conviction comes home to them, and they are made to feel that sin is an exceeding evil and bitter thing. Conviction of sin wrought by the Spirit of God is more powerful than argument. To feel that God must punish sin, that God will by no means clear the guilty, is the best thing to drive a man Godward. David saw the result of his own sin, and dreaded what would further come if, day after day, the Lord should visit him and his people with judgment. There he bows himself, and there the God of all grace meets with him.

Perhaps the point which brought David out into complete brokenness of heart was a clear view of the deadly

EFFECT OF HIS SIN UPON OTHERS.

Seventy thousand people had died of the black death already through his sin, and still the pestilence raged; this brought the matter home to his heart. Every ungodly man ought to reflect upon the mischief which he has caused to others by his evil life; his wife has been hindered from good things, his children have grown up without the fear of God, his companions with whom he has worked and traded are hardened in their wickedness by a sight of his wickedness; youthful minds have been seduced from virtue by his vice, simple hearts have been led into infidelity by his unbelief. Oh men, you know not what you do! You let fly sparks, but what the conflagration may have already been none of you can tell. This came home to David, and he stood aghast at it, crying to God about it, and pleading as for his life that the evil might be stayed.

Furthermore, that place where God met with David and made it to be His temple forever, was the place where sin was confessed. David's confession is very frank and full. David says, "Is it not I? Even I it is that have sinned." Go thou, sinner, to the Lord with thine own personal confession. Shut thine eye to thy fellow-man, and say, "Father, I have sinned." Cry with the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Make private personal confession, without comparing thyself with thy fellow-men, and the Lord has promised to forgive thee, and all those who confess their transgressions.

That confession also had within itself an admission of the justice of the punishment; for he says, "Let thine hand be on me, and on my father's house." He does not cavil against the sword of the Lord and its deadly blows. That repentance which questions the justice of God in the punishment of sin is a repentance that needs to be repented of; but when the penitent doth, as it were, lay his head upon the block, yield his neck to the rope, and give himself up to God, saying, "I have sinned," then mercy feels free to display itself.

But this is only the beginning of it; for Ornan's threshing-floor was then the place where sacrifice was offered and accepted. Hastily they piled the altar of unhewn stones; they brought up to it ox after ox that had been lately threshing out the corn; the blood flowed in plentiful streams, and the sacrifice was laid upon the wood. God meets with men not where the blood of bulls and of goats flows in rivers, but where the glorious person of His own dear incarnate Son is offered up once for all for guilty men.

CALVARY IS THE TRYSTING-PLACE between God and penitents. Now we have reached it. This is the site of the temple; this is the temple "not made with hands," once destroyed, but builded up in three days.

As soon as David had seen the sacrifice he had only one more sight to see, and that made the threshing-floor of Ornan more glorious than ever. He beheld the sign of peace. Above the threshing-floor stood the angel of the Lord; but what a change! The drawn sword, which threatened death to the city and to the nation, was suddenly thrust into its scabbard, and all was still. Not a soul more in Jerusalem should die of the pestilence. The sword of the Lord rested and was quiet. Oh, the joy of David's spirit when he saw this! What a solemn but joyous melting of heart he felt as his soul gushed forth in streams of gratitude! Learn from this that the point of full communion with God to-day is the place where we see the angel with the sheathed sword. Many of you cannot draw near to God, and I do not wonder at it, because you have not yet seen that sin was in very deed put away by the sacrifice of Jesus. You have seen the drawn sword, and that is something; but you have not yet beheld that sword sheathed, nor heard the voice of Jehovah saying, "It is enough." You cannot rest in the Lord and live in Him till you have seen the Sacrifice and its eternal results in peace with God. May God bring you there!

III. And now I am going to close by heartily exhorting you to USE THIS PLACE.

Brethren and sisters, if we have found out where to meet with God, then let us meet with Him continually. Do you feel guilty this morning? Is your sin heavy upon you? Do you see the sworded angel? Well, you have to meet God even there! Therefore, gird up your loins! "What garments shall I put on?" Put on sackcloth. I mean not literally; but while there is any guilt upon you come to God with lowliest penitence, mourning for sin, as David did, and the elders that were with him. You may not come now in the silken garments of your luxury, nor in the purple robes of your pride, nor in the mail of your hate. Put these away from you, and come with sackcloth and ashes, weeping for your transgressions, and God will meet with you; for He will meet with sinners who come to Him mourning because of their sin.

When you thus come, I want you to be quiet awhile. Stand still! Listen! Suppose you had been with those elders of Israel; what would you have heard? You would have heard pleading for His flock: "These sheep, what have they done? Let thine hand be on me, and on my father's house." But now David is dead and buried, and his sepulchre is in his own land; but another King of the house of David, one Jesus, is standing before the Lord pleading for mercy. While you are clothed in the sackcloth of your repentance, you may hear Him cry, "As for these sheep, let them live. Thou hast awakened the sword against me, their shepherd, therefore let my sheep be spared! Thine hand has been on me, therefore let these go their way!" Do you hear that intercession? Jesus is pleading in that fashion now. He is "able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them."

If you would come still nearer to God, do not forget the effect of the sacrifice and intercession in the sheathing of the sword of justice. Do not say, "I hope that the sword is sheathed;" it either is so, or it is not so. Do not be content with questionable hopes, but aim at certainties. Rest not till you obtain a solid assurance of your peace with God. If Jesus Christ was punished for your sin you cannot be punished for it; if He did bear your sin He did bear it, and there is an end of it; and if you have believed on Him you have the full proof in the word of God that you are justified before God. What more do you want than God's own word for it? and that word declares that you, as a believer, have eternal life and shall never perish, neither shall you come into condemnation.

And lastly, if this be so, and you realize it, go away and begin to build a temple. You say, "Do you want us to build a new place of worship?" No, I speak only of a spiritual house. Of course, build as many meeting-places as you can where people may come together to hear the word, for many are needed in this growing city, but the peculiar sort of building which I urge upon you is of the heart and spirit. Make your entire being for the living God. Begin now; the foundations are laid, you would not dream of building on any other; for "other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid." The divine Moriah of Christ's person, the sacred place of His sacrifice is the mount wherein God shall be seen. Jesus Christ has Himself become the foundation of your hope; go and build on Him. Set up the pillars of earnest supplication, and arch them over with lofty praises. Remember, your God "inhabiteth the praises of Israel." Build Him a house of praise, that He may dwell in you, make your bodies to be the temples of the Holy Ghost, and your spirits the priests that sacrifice therein. In acts of holiness, piety, charity, and love spend all your days. Let your houses be churches dedicated to His fear and love; and let their chambers be holy as the courts of the tabernacle in the wilderness.

Let each morning and evening have its sacrifice. Be yourself a priest at the altar. Let the garments of your daily toil be as vestments, your meals as sacraments; let your thoughts be psalms, your prayers incense, and your breath praise. Let every action be a priestly function, bringing glory unto the Lord from this day forth and forever. He that died for you reckons you to be dead to all things but Himself; and so it becometh you to be. "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price," and from this day forward your motto should be—"Thine entirely. Thine entirely, oh my God, I am!" Begin to build this living temple, and the Lord help you to complete it to His praise. A poor edifice it will be when you have finished it, compared with the Lord your God; but yet if you have labored sincerely and earnestly it will turn out to be compacted of gold and silver and precious stones, and it will be found in the day of Christ to honor and glory. Amen.

The Moody Homestead.

"I'm New John."

THE MOODY HOMESTEAD.

(See Illustration.)

Mr. D. L. Moody's early life has been often described, but its circumstances are so full of lessons of encouragement that the story cannot be told too often. It was in 1841 that the family removed to the little home on the mountains represented in the above illustration. The future world-renowned evangelist was then only four years old. He was born at Northfield, Mass., where his father, a stonemason, lived and labored. One day while the father was on his knees at prayer he was suddenly called away from earth, and the widow was left alone to struggle for a livelihood for herself and her young family. She went to live at the little farm on the mountain which her husband had bought, but had been unable wholly to free from the encumbrance of mortgage.

Mrs. Moody, in these trying circumstances, displayed true nobility of character. She was endowed by God with unusual strength, both of body and mind, and with a calm, unquestioning trust in the love of her divine Father, she bravely lifted her burden of poverty and toil, and carried it hopefully and cheerfully, until her little ones were able to help her, and at last to fill her hands with plenty as they had filled her heart with love and care. Although now seventy-eight years old, her black eyes are not dim nor her form bent; her face is kind and motherly. She resides in her son's house at Northfield.

Many incidents are related of Mr. Moody's precocity. As often happens with boys whose mothers are widows, he was eager to rush into the world of work at an early age. His ambition was to help his mother to earn a living, and she has often said, "He used to think himself a man when he was but a little boy."

He was once excusing himself to his mother, saying how hard it was to be a good boy, when she told him he must ask God to help him to be good. Not long after he announced it as his opinion that it didn't do any good to pray; he had tried it, and was just as bad a boy as ever. At this time he was only six years old; but being very anxious to help his mother, he hired himself to a neighboring farmer to drive the cows to and from their pasture on the mountain.

Once, when he was creeping under a heavy fence, it fell down upon him so that he could not get away. He struggled to extricate himself till he was exhausted, and then cried for help; but he was far from any house, and no one heard him. At last he got safe out; and this is the account he gave of his escape:

"I tried and tried, and I couldn't lift them awful heavy rails; then I hollered for help, but nobody came; and then I began to think I should have to die away up there on the mountain all alone. But I happened to think that, maybe, God would help me, and so I asked Him. After that I easily lifted the rails."

Dwight went through as many as a dozen terms at the little district schoolhouse, and his last term was in the winter of his seventeenth year. He was the leading spirit among the boys, and so much mischief did he lead them into, that at length the teacher was in despair, and threatened to expel him. At this his good mother was sorely grieved, and told him so. She directed him to go to the teacher, ask forgiveness for his bad conduct, and try to be a credit and a joy to his mother. This he did in all sincerity, and the rest of the term, for the first time in his life, he applied himself faithfully to study.

At the close of the term he finally quitted his mother's roof to go out into the world to begin life on his own account. His mother's prayers followed him, and who shall say how much the world owes to that poor widow's supplications?

"OLD JOHN IS DEAD—I AM NEW JOHN."

(See Illustration.)

Old John, the fish-seller of L——, was a remarkable character, but remarkably bad; in fact, so bad that neither God nor man could repair him, he must be made new, or be useless, worse than useless, lost forever. He was known in L—— as "drunken John, the fish-seller." One night he stumbled into a hall where the Gospel was being preached. In bewilderment there he sat, with his big Kilmarnock bonnet on his head. Before long he was surprised to see the speaker come along to where he was sitting; and putting his hand on his shoulder, he began to speak to him kindly. John shrank back, and pushed the hand off his shoulder. But the man of God, with the love of his Master, looked John full in the face; seeing his misery, wretchedness, and sin, his whole soul was moved with compassion for him. Putting his hand on his shoulder again, he just said, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The truth went right home to John's dark heart. "God," he thought, "God—God so loved—the world; then God must have loved poor drunken John of L——, for drunken and guilty as I am, still I am part of the world; there is no mistake about that."

His eyes were opened; he saw the wide arms of God's love embracing a lost world—embracing him. His heart was melted, large hot tears washed white gutters down his blackened face. He saw it all—how that God had loved him, and when the broken law demanded John's life, and for John to be punished, God's Son was punished, and died in his stead. Poor old John thus received that Son, whom God had given. He was saved. For "as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name."

John went away a new man. For God says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Full of joy and peace, he went home, at least to the miserable cellar which he called home. Such a home! We need not describe it.

On entering the wretched place, his wife and only son were in. Addressing her: "Sal, lass," he said, "I have been converted." They knew as little about conversion as he had known until that night, and so only muttered, "Drunk, as usual!" After a little time his wife remarked that it was bed-time. "Oh, but, Sal, lass," said John, "I've been converted, and before we go to bed we must pray!" "Well," thought Sal and her son, "this is a new thing;" but they at last agreed to kneel with John, if he would do the praying. Down on their knees they went, but now John was completely baffled. He never tried to pray before in his life. He knew nothing of prayer, but his heart was full with a new joy which struggled for expression. He soon remembered how he used to express his worldly joy, if ever he had any; so taking off his Kilmarnock bonnet, he gave it a swing round his head, and shouted, "Hurrah for Jesus." Another swing, and "Hurrah for Jesus"—a third, and again came "Hurrah for Jesus."

The news spread abroad that John was converted, and the women of L—— gathered round him in the street, some to buy his fish, but more to see what John was like, now that he was converted.

"Sure enough, there is a great change in him," said one. "He is not drunk," remarked another. "Not swearing as before," said a third. There was old John, with his face shining with joy, selling his fish, and telling to those who asked of his conversion. Thought many, "We'll watch him and see how long this will last." But it soon became too evident for any to doubt that John was a new man.

"Father," said his son one day, "father, if you are to keep on converted, it would be as well if we could get a better house." John said little, but shortly after, seeing a nice house to let in a respectable street, he went to the landlord and said, "You have a house to let in such a street, sir." "Yes, I have; who wants it?" "I want it." "You want it?" "Yes, I want it."

"Do you think I would let one of my respectable houses to you?" "You do not know who I am, sir." "Oh, yes; I know you too well!" "I think you are mistaken." "Oh! no; I am not mistaken; you are old drunken John, the fish-seller!" "Ah! sir, I thought you were mistaken. Old John is dead. I am new John, 'for God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' I have believed God, and have that everlasting life." Putting his hand in his pocket, he pulled out some notes, and said, "If you're afraid, sir, about your rent, I'll pay in advance."

This was too much for the landlord. John's words and actions went together. He got the house, and lived in it for long, telling to all around what great things the Lord had done for his soul.

A Message of Joy.

AN OLD WOMAN'S ANSWERED PRAYER.

(See Illustration.)

In a little cottage in the country an elderly woman sat reading. Her dress, like all around her, was scrupulously neat and clean. Poor as the furniture was, it was rubbed as bright as hands could make it, and everything that could bear a polish shone its best. It was afternoon; all the work had been "done up" hours ago, the little frugal mid-day meal had been eaten and cleared away, and good old Mrs. Clarkson put on her spectacles, and took down her Bible, and sat down to read.

Life had dealt gently with her. Her hair was as white as her snowy cap, but the seventy years she had seen had graven scarcely a wrinkle on her cheery old face, and her clearly cut features had all the strength of character they showed fifty years before.

Yet she had not been without her share of the world's troubles. They had come thick and fast upon her in her girlhood, when, before she was sixteen, she had stood by the graves of father and mother, and had seen the home of her childhood broken up.

The young girl knew not how she was to live, but she was not distressed. The Lord, she believed, would open a way for her. And He did. She was not proud, and when the family at the great house on the hill offered her a place in their kitchen, she forgot that she was a farmer's daughter, and above the condition of a hired help, and gladly accepted the offer.

Twenty years she served that family, seeing the babies grow up into stalwart youths and graceful maidens. They all loved her, and clung to her as though she were a sister. One lad, especially, whom she had nursed from his birth and, during a trying season, when his mother lay helpless, had watched through a dangerous illness, saving his life by her unceasing care and unremitting attention, loved her as though she had been a second mother. He was a man now, living far away on the Pacific shore, with children of his own, but she still called him her Edgar.

At the end of the twenty years she had married. Her husband, William Clarkson, was a good Christian man, and her married life had been peaceful and happy. Five and twenty years she and her husband had walked the narrow path, living frugally and working hard. Then he too died, leaving her, at the age of three-score, once again alone.

She had never ceased to pray for the conversion of the children over whom, in her young days, she had watched with tender solicitude. One only, Miss Edith, had so far, as she knew, given her heart to Christ. The others were, in spite of her prayers and her loving appeals, still of the world, worldly. It was for the conversion of her favorite boy, Edgar, that she longed with intense yearning. He was much in her thoughts that day. News had come that he was ill, and his mother, now an aged woman older than herself, had gone that long distance that she might see him before he died, for death seemed imminent when the news came.

As she sat, with her Bible open before her, her thoughts flew away to the sick man. When he was a boy she had hopes that the Lord had touched his heart. There was unusual intelligence about him, a quickness of perception and a frank, open disposition in which the seed of the truth seemed to find congenial soil. She had been disappointed, however, for school and college life seemed, like the thorns, to have choked the good seed, and he had given no evidence of desire for God. "Would to God," she said, aloud, "that this illness might bring him to the Saviour! O God, save my boy!"

She was lost in thought, and her spectacles were dim with a mist that came from her tearful eyes. But she saw the door open, and in walked Miss Edith, accompanied by a lad of some ten years, and with an open letter in her hand. She laid aside her spectacles, and, rising, placed a chair for her visitor with the old deference she always paid to one of that family.

"I could not rest a moment after getting this letter," said the young lady. "There is no one to rejoice with me as you can, and I came straight to you. Hear what my mother says. Edgar is a changed man. He has passed through a dark and anxious time, but he has found peace at last. He is very weak still, but his soul is strong in the Lord. He is full of joy and happiness. His express wish is that Mary—Mary Clarkson, his old nurse, should know of this. And he sends her his love and the assurance that it was her prayers and her entreaties and her simple faith that God blessed, after all those years, to his conversion. It appears he has never forgotten them, and in the time of backsliding and careless indifference they have been a constant reproach to him. He wants her to know that he has gone to his Father at last, and has been received with open arms."

The old lady bowed her head on her hands as she listened, and murmured, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

"No, no," said Miss Edith; "we cannot spare you yet; you must know your new friend. Put on your spectacles and look at my little escort."

The old woman dried her eyes, and did as she was bid. In a moment she had taken the boy to her arms and kissed him passionately. "This is my little Edgar come back again," she said.

"No," said Miss Edith, smiling at the old woman's agitation. "This is Edgar's son. He has come to us while his father recovers, for he is a noisy boy. But is he not the image of his father? Now, you must not spoil him as you will if you have your own way. But he shall come to see you often, and you must love him for his father's sake." Then, seeing that the kind old creature was completely overcome, Edith and her little nephew left her to pour out her thankfulness to the Hearer of prayer.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Bitter Tears.

Carl and Robert Waldron reached the house in which his child lived, and the overworked servant opened the door to them. They had been expecting Mr. Bramwell and the young lady for some time, she said. No, the young lady had not come back yet. She had been there all day, nursing little Miss Hester, but she had left her in the evening to go to Mr. Bramwell's chapel, promising to return as soon as she could. She had gone to the chapel, she was sure, for her own little sister had seen the young lady go in.

Carl and Robert looked at one another in mingled relief and wonder. They had traced Hester's movements up to the last half hour; for if she had gone into the chapel, no doubt she had remained there till the end of the service. To be separated from her by no more than half an hour seemed a small thing. She would be coming in soon; perhaps she had missed her way a little. They lingered on the doorstep, looking up the street, until the girl asked if they wished to see the child, who would be glad enough of a visit from Mr. Bramwell.

"Let me see her, Carl," said Robert, entreat-ingly; "she need know nothing about me. If you have any pity for me in this hour, let me see her."

Carl hesitated for a moment; yet how could he refuse? What right had he to keep him away from her, when her mother was dead? For he had understood from Robert's hurried explanation that Rose was already dead. He answered by a silent gesture to accompany him; and both of them followed the servant to the room where the child lay.

The little girl had been raised upon her pillows, and sat with an eager face turned toward the door, listening to their approaching footsteps. Carl was the first to enter, and Robert stayed behind, in the background, looking on with a new sorrow in his heart. The face, a small, refined, patrician face, which had lost the look of childhood, was that of his mother in a miniature portrait she had given to him when she was dying. He knew it well, for in his boyhood he had studied the miniature by heart. But the child was speaking, and he could not bear to lose a word she said. She belonged to him. If Rose were dead, there was no other being in the world who bore any relationship to this forlorn little creature.

"Hester has been here all day," she said; "the good, dear Hester that I'm named after. We love one another ever so! She said she'd come back with you, and stay all night with me. Why did you not bring her, Mr. Bramwell?"

"She will be here very soon," answered Carl.

"She says my mother is living with her in her house," continued Hester, in her plaintive and sweet voice; "and she knew my father, when she was a little girl like me. She loved him then, and he used to nurse her on his knees."

"Don't think about it, my little Hester," said Carl, soothingly.

"But I'm always thinking of it," she answered, "because if he hadn't died, we should all have lived together somewhere; and I should have had my holidays, like other children. They say there are worse off little girls in the streets; but they have all got homes, and mothers and fathers; and I have nobody, no home, and no father, and no one but my mother, who is so very poor she can scarcely ever come to see me. I sha'n't be sorry to die, if God pleases."

"Suppose your father had not died!" said Carl.

"Oh, how I would have loved him!" she cried, clasping her small hands together. "Perhaps he would have played with me sometimes! It would not have mattered then how poor we were, if we had only lived together. The other Hester said he used to be very fond of little children, and he would have been sure to have loved me the most. Hester cannot tell whether he will know I am his little girl in heaven."

Robert stood by and listened. Every word was full of heart-breaking sorrow to him; yet the calmness and tenderness of this little child soothed him. He leaned his arm against the door-post, and rested his head upon it, weeping bitterly. His child heard him, and turned eagerly again toward the door.

"There is somebody there," she said "and they are crying. Who is it, Mr. Bramwell? Don't leave them alone in the dark. Let them come in here."

It was no more than a step or two to her side, and Robert's failing feet trod them. He sank down beside her, as Hester had done in the morning, and hid his face in her pillow, while she laid her hand upon his head timidly, yet fondly.

"Don't cry," she said; "I'm not going to die just yet; and if I do die I shall go to heaven and have my holidays. I don't know who you are; but I don't like to see you crying for me."

"Kiss me, little Hetty," he sobbed; and she laid her lips shyly upon his cheek, while he threw his arm round her with a passionate clasp.

"Tell me," he said, "where you have been living all this time, my little girl?"

"I have been all my life long at school," she answered, pensively; "ever since I can remember. I belong to nobody."

"Nobody!" echoed Robert, in a voice as troubled as her own.

"Nobody, except my mother," she continued, "and she is very poor, and always full of trouble. The other Hester says she is going to take me away somewhere, and make me very, very happy. But it is too late now."

"Too late!" repeated Robert, dropping his head again upon the pillow. She lay still and exhausted, her arm resting upon his neck; and Carl did not break the silence. What could he say that would be better than this silence? It was Robert who first looked up, and spoke.

"But she does not come, Carl," he said, in a tone of undiminished anxiety. Carl was waiting, straining his ears to catch the sound of her voice in the house below. The time was fast getting on, and the night was drawing near. Could she have lost herself in the streets of London? Where too was John Morley, who had been missing since this time the night before? They were compelled to leave the child, inconsolable because Hester was not come back, and start afresh upon their vague search. They did not know where she had passed the last night; or whether she knew any one in London. There was no clew, no track. She had been near to them both only an hour or two ago, but they had not seen her. She might be close beside them still.

At an early hour the next morning Carl and Robert went again to the boarding-school to inquire if anything had been heard of Hester. Upon receiving an answer in the negative, they did not know what further steps to take. They sent a telegram to Grant, cautiously worded: "We have had no success. Is there any change or any news?" The answer returned in the name of Annie Grant, by which they became aware that she shared the secret, was, "No change here, and no news." It reached them soon after midday on Monday. After this they visited the two railway stations at which John Morley could have arrived, and made some cautious inquiries; but they could gain no explicit information. At present they could not resolve to set a detective to seek him out. While Rose continued in so precarious a state, they dare not let any clew to the criminal slip out of their own hands. They could not believe it possible that they had left London; for both John Morley and Hester would be as inexperienced as children, with regard to any journey, or any scheme of flight. Carl hoped every hour that they would be found at his lodgings; and they returned again and again to them to see if they had not arrived there.

On the Tuesday morning, Robert, who could no longer endure the suspense about Rose, determined to return to Little Aston, leaving Carl to continue his wary but close inquiries in London. He reached the little town in the afternoon, and though he dare not let himself be seen knocking at John Morley's door, which would have attracted the attention of the neighbors, he could not resist going past the house. It looked just as usual. The closed shutters of Rose's drawing-room were still closed; but what surprised and startled him the most was to see the shop open, as if John Morley were quietly pursuing his ordinary business. He crossed over quickly, and peered in through the windows, catching a glimpse of a withered face, which glared back upon him with tigerish eyes. The mystery was explained as soon as he reached Grant's house. Grant had resolved to keep the townspeople in the dark as long as possible, and upon Monday morning he had installed Lawson behind the counter, bidding him do his best there to meet the requirements of the few customers. It was generally supposed in the town that John Morley was suffering from a second attack of brain fever; which the people said accounted for his non-appearance, and for Grant's constant attendance at his house. Rose was still in danger; but there was a brighter hope now than there had been twelve hours before. It was growing more and more possible that she might rally from the shock, and partially recover; but the recovery could be only partial.

Robert went on home—to the home he had sauntered away from carelessly for an after-dinner stroll in the cool of the evening, on Saturday night. The prodigal whom Mr. Waldron had prepared for two years before, and who had disappointed him by his light-hearted gayety, was going back to his father's house now, feeling that he was no more worthy. The famine had made itself felt at last, and he knew that he had nothing but husks to eat. All the wealth and the honor, the graces and luxuries of his life hung ragged and threadbare about him. He yearned to see his father looking out for him, ready to have compassion upon him, and run and fall on his neck and kiss him. His heart was very full of repentance, and of a longing after some love which should not look for any worthiness in him. But his father was nowhere to be seen, and he avoided meeting his sister. He bade the servant tell Mr. Waldron, when he came in, that he was in the library; and then he went there, threw himself upon a sofa, and fell into a troubled sleep, full of dreams. When he opened his eyes again, his father was standing by him, with a face of painful anxiety. If Carl had been struck by the change in his aspect, his father was ten times more so. This was no longer his handsome, debonair son; but a weary and worn man, who had been beaten somewhere in the battle of life. Robert had groaned, and his face had been sadly pained in his sleep, and he had been about to awaken him from his disturbed slumbers, just as he opened his eyes and looked up. "Father!" he said; "father?"

"My boy, Robert," said Mr. Waldron, his hard features quivering, and his voice faltering, "what is it, my boy? Tell me everything. I am your father, an old man now, but I loved your mother with all my heart, and I carried you in my arms when you were a baby. You may tell me. I am not hard toward you. I can bear anything from you. There is nobody loves you as your old father does. Speak to me, Robert, as a man talks with his friend."

Robert had had no very fixed purpose of concealment from Mr. Waldron, though he had told Grant that they must not let him know of John Morley's crime; and now he could constrain himself no longer. He told him all, and his father listened, with a profound affection and compassion for him, which bound their hearts more closely the one to the other.

"You know everything now," he said, at the end; "what is to be done?"

"I am not so fearful for Hester as you are," said Mr. Waldron; "be sure that her father will do her no harm if he be mad, and I suppose he must be mad. Yet he was not mad when he attacked you, Robert; he was as sane as he had been for many years. If Hester was safe with him after that, she will be safe with him now."

"But where can they be hiding?" exclaimed Robert.

"We must find out," he answered. "Hester will go back to the school sooner or later to inquire after that little child. I know her well enough for that. Be comforted, my boy. All these things will work together for good to her, if not to you. You would be content with that?"

"Content! Yes," he said; "if Hester were safe and happy I could make myself content. Father, that little child will die!"

"No, no," exclaimed Mr. Waldron, "no, no. We will give her a fresh life, Robert." The rich man, who could buy anything, seemed to think even life might be had for money. "She must come here—not here with your sister, I did not mean that—but to Little Aston. Annie Grant would have her; yes, Annie would be like a mother to her, and I would give Grant a thousand pounds to make her strong again. She has your mother's face, you say? Oh, Robert, would to God I could own her as my grandchild!"

Mr. Waldron turned away and walked to the window, looking out on the terrace and the trim lawn, with its gorgeous flower-beds, where no child had ever played with the flowers. This little waif belonged to him, but he could have no pride in claiming her; yet he would make her life smooth and happy, God willing; she should know no shame or sorrow he could shield her from.

"We cannot own her," he said, at last; "for the child's own sake, she must never know, and no one else must know, her relationship to us. But she must be near to us, and we can care for her; but we shall always keep a distance between us, that the world may suspect nothing. I must consult with Grant and Annie about it all."

"The only Hester who will belong to me," said Robert, with a pang of passing bitterness. Yet he was comforted and strengthened by his confidence to his father. They walked together in the evening to Grant's house, and found him at home, worn out but triumphant. There was scarcely a doubt in his mind now that Rose would not die from the blow she had received; indirectly it might hasten her death, as her health was delicate, and her life had not been a strong one before, but she would certainly recover for a time. If they could only acquaint John Morley with this fact he might venture home again, and the affair could be hushed up with Mr. Waldron's connivance. But the mystery of John Morley's flight remained as dark as ever; and there was settling down upon it that vague feeling of a thing accomplished and done with, which is stamped upon all the events of the past.

Grant and Annie listened gladly to Mr. Waldron's proposal to receive little Hester into their house. The only difficulty would be with regard to Rose: but they decided that she must be kept in ignorance of the near neighborhood of her child, until she was strong enough to bear it, and to be willing to see her only in secret, lest the suspicions of the townspeople should be awakened. It was necessary to remove the child from school, and as soon as she could travel with safety Grant and Annie went up to London to fetch her. But at the first glance Grant's keen eyes discovered the truth. They might bring her down to Little Aston, and warm her in the sunshine of gladness and childish joys; but the chill of death was upon her, and the warmth had come too late to save her.

VANITY OF WORLDLY PLEASURE.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 14, Eccl. 2: 1-13. Golden Text, Ver. 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The True Destiny of Man—Appointed of God—For Man's Joy and Happiness—The Preacher's Sounding Line—Always a Vacuum—In Mirth—In Wine—In Building—Greatness without Happiness—Paul's State a Contrast—Two Kinds of Wisdom.

"THIS people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise" (Isa. 43: 21). "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son" (Rom. 8: 28). Such is, in good thought, the destiny of man. He is created to be the complement of God! It is inconceivable, but none the less true! And our loving God has formed in us a capacity for joy which can be filled with nothing short of Himself. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that

YOUR JOY MIGHT BE FULL"

(John 15: 11). "Ask and receive that your joy may be full" (John 16: 24). "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full" (1 John 1: 3, 4). If such is God's will for us, and such is the possibility, what then is the experience? Here is a witness who speaks for the early Christians when under trial; "Ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations. . . . Jesus, whom not having seen ye love; in whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

With what unutterable sadness sounds out the verdict of Solomon in ghastly contrast, "Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity" (Eccl. 1: 2)! What led this wisest of men to this conclusion? He had sunk his sounding line into all the depths of earthly pleasure apart from God, and had found them empty shallows; a vacuum still existed, and the unsatisfied spirit asked for something more, something which could fill its capacities. All earth's storehouses failed, and the hungry soul cried out still. Nothing answered to the measure of the need, for God had made the man's soul capable of being "filled with all the fulness of God" (Eph. 3: 19); and anything short of His fulness, in the heart which He had made for Himself, must leave only hopeless craving still.

Solomon's first attempt was to find satisfaction

IN "MIRTH."

To seek mirth, to make merriment is one thing. But it is quite another to be so full of the Lord's goodness that, like a happy child, one cannot but sing and speak merrily. One's heart, full of sunshine, cannot hide its joy, it bubbles over, and those around catch the contagion. Oh, how different from manufactured mirth, when one is expected to laugh at jokes which neither amuse nor are congenial! Solomon "said of laughter, It is mad; and of mirth, What doeth it?"

His next attempt was a dangerous one indeed. "I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine" (margin "to draw my flesh with wine"). Probably it is from sad personal experience that he says of wine, "It biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder;" it was perhaps the photograph of himself in delirium tremens which he drew (Prov. 23: 29–35). As he grew older his tastes changed, and he sought satisfaction in the gratification of the lust of the eyes. "I made me great works, I builded me houses." It was a taste far more solid than the others; there was much more in it to call forth the powers of his intellect; but this was only a comparative difference, the capacity for communion with God could not be filled thus;

HIS JOY WAS NOT FULL.

"I planted me vineyards, I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits; I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees." Talent for engineering as well as for architecture were developed; land surveying and gardening talents were in requisition. All which taste and riches could furnish gratified his eye, but instead of saying, "I am the happiest man under the sun, I have all that heart can wish for," his mournful cry is, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

All that state could add to him Solomon possessed. "I got me servants and maidens, and had servants born in mine house;" but all this dignity left him where it found him, only a superior kind of animal, unless, beyond and above all this, his soul held communion with God. Riches, too, of "silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings, and of the provinces," went to make up the grandeur and the apparent happiness of this royal cynic; but neither this nor the charm of music, which he indulged in to the full, filled up the void of an unfilled heart.

"SO I WAS GREAT" is his sad summing up of the story. Great, but miserable; great, but unsatisfied! "The least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." Earth's pleasures have never dared to emulate the heavenly, and among all the flaring advertisements of theatres and other amusements, none are so bold as to offer "joy unspeakable," none can assume to bestow a joy which is "full."

"So I was great." Yes, Solomon was great enough to see the littleness of his own greatness—great enough to weigh the reality of God-given wisdom against the transcience and unsatisfaction of things earthly. Solomon said, "I was great," but he might have added, "and miserable." Paul said, "I am nothing," and added, "Yet always rejoicing," for he had "the fulness of Him that filleth all in all." Solomon's account of his life-work is full of sadness: "Whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, I withheld not mine heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labor; and this was my position of all my labor. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labor that I had labored to do; and, behold, and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun." He went yet farther, and said, "Yea, I hated all my labor which I had taken under the sun; because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me." He hated that labor which he had rejoiced in, because he saw that his connection with it could only be temporary, and all that he had done in wisdom might be undone by the folly of his posterity.

ALL WAS VANITY

He went farther still, and said, "Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me; for all is vanity and vexation of spirit." Paul did not rejoice in his labor. Even when in speaking of the other disciples he says, "I labored more abundantly than they all;" he added, "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me" (1 Cor. 15: 10). Paul's rejoicing was not in himself, or in his own work; he rejoiced in the Lord always and taught others to do the same. Making no plans for himself, and initiating no work of himself, he was not disappointed when things turned out other than he had expected.

There could not be

than in these two men—Solomon, the man who had wisdom as a gift imparted to him, he taking the direction; and Paul, a man in whom wisdom dwelt, perfect wisdom, even Christ, "the wisdom of God," but who yielded himself to God's direction. Both naturally gifted men, both highly cultured, both men of mark in their own day, and throughout all subsequent time; and yet how different! The one a beacon of sadness, although the richest, most renowned king of his time; the other a very sunbeam of joy, sending light into hearts and homes all over the world to this very day, although only a persecuted prisoner!

Through all his investigation of the worth of earthly pleasure, Solomon never lost

HIS GIFT OF WISDOM.

Even when giving himself to wine, he says, "Yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom;" when speaking of his greatness, and that he increased more than all they who had been before him in Jerusalem, he adds, "Also my wisdom remained with me." And he says, "I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness and folly; for what can the man do that cometh after the king? even that which hath been already done. Then I saw that there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly (margin), as far as light exceedeth darkness." And yet even wisdom did not satisfy him. Solomon confessed, "In much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (Eccl. 1: 18). His very wisdom taught him that death comes alike upon all; and he found it hard that "a man whose labor is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not labored therein shall he leave it for his portion. . . . For what hath a man of all his labor, and of the vexation of his heart?" "Vanity and vexation of spirit." What hath a man of the work of God and the travail of His soul? Salvation and the Saviour, the indwelling God, in whose "presence is fulness of joy," and at whose "right hand there are pleasures forevermore" (Ps. 16: 11).

ASKING.

"If ye then being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children; how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" —ST. LUKE xi., 13.

O Heavenly Father, Thou hast told
Of a gift more precious than pearls and gold;
A gift that is free to every one,
Through Jesus Christ, thy only Son,
For His sake, give it to me.

O give it to me, for Jesus said
That a father giveth his children bread,
And how much more Thou wilt surely give
The gift by which the dead shall live?
For Christ's sake, give it to me.

I cannot see, and I want the sight;
I am in the dark, and I want the light;
I want to pray, and I don't know how;
O give me Thy Holy Spirit now!
For Christ's sake, give it to me.

Thou hast said it, I must believe
It is only "ask" and I shall receive;
If Thou said it, it must be true,
And there's nothing else for me to do!
For Christ's sake, give it to me.

So I come and ask, because my need
Is very great and real indeed.
On the strength of Thy Word I come and say
Oh, let Thy Word come true to-day!
For Christ's sake, give it to me!

Lord's Prayer

ILLUMINATED.—The only pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer ever made. The letters of the text are embellished with original designs of great beauty. Interspersed among these are illustrations of the greatest events of our Saviour's life, from the Nativity to the Ascension, viz.: Nativity, Childhood, Baptism, Sermon on the Mount, Transfiguration, Last Supper, Crucifixion, Resurrection and Ascension. These nine separate groups contain ninety-one heads and figures, and are truthful copies of the most wonderful and famous paintings of the old masters. The head and bust of our Saviour is quite large and placed in the centre. The size of the engraving is 12½x16 inches, printed on the best plate paper, 16x20 inches. I will send to any person for introduction, where I have no agent, one copy, with explanatory key, prepaid by mail, rolled safe in a tube, for 13 two-cent postage stamps, (26 cents). This is much less than cost. A magnificent present for any one. I hold myself responsible to this paper to send promptly as above.

TESTIMONIALS.—Mr. Delwin F. Brown's pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer is a work of marvellous power and beauty, and is one of the finest productions of its kind which have come from the graver in this century. After twenty years of persistent labor he has completed a masterpiece which cannot fail to secure the interested attention and study of all who love the pure and beautiful in Christian Art. No parent can purchase a more appropriate household ornament, or one which can exert a more refining influence upon the minds of his children. Its subtile and wonder-working power will be an abiding source of pleasure to all who shall take into living companionship such a silent but ever-speaking teacher.
A gem of inexpressible purity and matchless beauty, and of unequalled perfection.

THE ninth of November is observed regularly in London as a general holiday. On that day the Lord Mayor for the ensuing year is inaugurated with quaint and imposing ceremonies. He goes in state, accompanied by a splendid procession, from the ward of the city with which he is personally identified to the Palace of Justice, where the oath of office is administered to him, and thence to the residence provided by the city for the Lord Mayor for the time being. The pageant is the event of the year in London, and each Lord Mayor is ambitious to make his procession superior to those of all his predecessors. This year, the ninth of November falling on Sunday, the ceremony took place the following day, Monday, November 10th.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR

is George Swan Nottage. The English custom differs from our own in that the mayor is not elected directly by the people. The people elect the aldermen and councillors, and that body choose from among themselves one gentleman to hold the mayoralty for a year. There is seldom any contest, the custom being to select the alderman who has been the longest time in office without having been Lord Mayor.

The new Lord Mayor, whose portrait appears on the first page, is a Welshman. He was born in the county of Glamorganshire, in the year 1823. He is therefore now sixty-one years of age. He is descended from a popular family, the Nottages, of Nottage, in Glamorganshire, who afterward settled in Essex, in which county the new Lord Mayor spent his early youth. In 1851 he was married to Christiana, daughter of Mr. James Warner, and descended on her maternal side from another old family, the Leftwiches, of Cheshire. The Lord Mayor resides at South Kensington, and his family consists of a son and a daughter. The former, Mr. Charles G. Nottage, graduated at Cambridge in honors, and was afterward called to the bar in the Inner Temple. His daughter is married to Mr. Samuel Ernest Palmer, a partner in the well-known Reading firm of Huntley & Palmer, which does a large business with this country in crackers, or, as they call them, "biscuits."

Mr. Nottage was for many years engaged in the iron business, but he is best known as the founder of the which, with its agencies in various parts of the world, has developed itself into the largest concern of its kind. At Brighton the Lord Mayor is well known and deservedly popular for the great improvements he has made in the King's Road, by the erection of numerous handsome buildings, one of which—the Orleans Club—is familiar to all visitors. He is connected with several of the ancient companies of the city, is a member of the Spectaclemakers and Loriners' Companies, and is at the present time the master of the Carpenters' Company. For many years he has held the position of Chairman of the Visiting Justices of gaols. As a magistrate, his decisions have always been characterized by good judgment and sound common-sense, and he has published some able letters on the grand jury system, which have received considerable attention. He is in politics a Liberal, and a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

PRESENTATION TO THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

On October 24th, the usual ceremony of presenting the Lord Mayor-elect to the Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) to receive the Queen's approval of the choice of the Livery of the City of London, was observed with the usual forms at the Lord Chancellor's residence. On this occasion the Lord Chancellor thus stated his reasons for believing Mr. Nottage a suitable man for the office to which he was appointed:

"My Lord Mayor-elect, it gives me great pleasure to assure you that her Majesty entirely approves the choice that the citizens of London have made of a Chief Magistrate in your person. The facts that have been mentioned by the Recorder show that you have every antecedent qualification which man could desire to possess to carry on the honorable traditions of the city, and discharge the useful and important functions to which you are now called.

"Your good works in improving other cities make me confident that nothing will be wanting on your part for the improvement of the city of London, both in its moral aspect and in its external adornment. In the particular line which your own industrial occupations have taken, not only formerly, but recently, in the promotion of a great artistic establishment, I cannot but recognize one of the many instances of the way in which the inventions of our time have led to the enjoyment of mankind in this country and elsewhere. It is a pleasure to any man to contribute to such ends, whether by the occupation in which he is commercially interested or otherwise. I feel quite sure that in your mayoralty the city of London will maintain the reputation it has so honorably achieved in past years, especially by the efforts of your immediate predecessor and those who have gone before him. I have much pleasure in repeating her Majesty's approval of the choice of the citizens." The Lord Chancellor then shook hands with the Lord Mayor-elect, the Recorder, the sheriffs and aldermen, and others present, and the proceeding terminated.

THE HISTORICAL PROCESSION

this year was a departure from the ordinary custom, Mr. Nottage apparently being desirous of making it symbolical of national progress and present glory. First in order came a detachment of mounted police, then the mounted band of the Royal Artillery, the band of the Grenadier Guards, and a detachment of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, with two engines, each drawn by four horses, a feature in the procession which caused great cheering. To these succeeded the banners of ex-sheriffs and the band of the training-ship Warspite, the lads looking smart and well in their naval attire. The trades companies were duly represented by the chief members, who were seated in open carriages. Then followed the most interesting features, which were illustrative of national and civic history or tradition. Some of them are especially noteworthy. There was, for instance, a car, drawn by twelve ponies, with the immortal Dick Whittington beside the Highgate mile-post in the act of listening to Bow Bells, and in close proximity to a representative of

HIS FAMOUS CAT.

Then followed an admirable model of Bow Church as it was in A.D. 1400, with bell-ringers, and a banner bearing the well-known message the bells conveyed to the civic hero's ears. Finally came a counterfeit presentment of Sir Richard Whittington in all his civic dignity.

William the Conqueror was represented, and so was Richard Cœur de Lion, Henricus Fitz-Alwyne, the first Mayor of London, Richard II., and Queen Elizabeth, all beautifully mounted and carefully costumed after the manner of the habits in which they lived. Lord Mayor Walworth, of the time of Richard II., was represented standing over the slain Wat Tyler (see frontispiece). It was not a popular figure. It evoked groans and hisses, the spectators having become since that time less enamored with royalty. A pretty spectacle was the car, drawn by four horses, carrying a raised dais, upon which was a casket containing a fac-simile of

THE CITY'S FIRST CHARTER,

A.D. 1067, which was guarded by citizens with drawn swords. The City's Charter is in these words: "William the King friendly salutes William the Bishop and Godfrey the Portreve and all the burgesses within London, both French and English, and I declare that I grant you to be all law-worthy as you were in the days of King Edward; and I grant that every child shall be his father's heir, after his father's days; and I will not suffer any person to do you wrong. God keep you."

A Nile boat, similar to those sent out to the Soudan, was exhibited, properly manned. This boat was thirty feet long by six feet ten inches beam, and was specially constructed for the occasion under the superintendence of the Admiralty.

In this portion of the long procession there was a fine herd of camels, and by way of honorable recognition of the Anglo-Indian Empire a pageant of Eastern splendor was provided, which included elephants ridden by representatives of rajahs, and a car containing a picturesque group, surmounted by a figure symbolical of India (see frontispiece). Innumerable were the gorgeous banners of aldermen and other civic dignitaries that were displayed. The bands, too, playing popular tunes, were very numerous. The sheriffs rode in State carriages respectively drawn by four horses. Loud and hearty cheers greeted the appearance of the late Lord Mayor, and the Lord Mayor was also warmly welcomed as he came along in his splendid State carriage, drawn by six very fine horses. Finally, an escort of the Hussars ended a most imposing and interesting procession.

A MESSAGE FROM AMERICA.

As the procession passed the offices of the American Exchange in the Strand, all the bands struck up "Yankee Doodle," and the crowds on the sidewalk responded with cheers for the Stars and Stripes. A large portrait of Governor Cleveland, which was hung in front of the Exchange, also received a hearty round of cheers. A banner was displayed on which was inscribed:

"New York through its new Mayor says grace to the new Mayor of London."

This pun on the name of Mr. W. R. Grace, the new Mayor of New York, was well received, and New York City was honored with a burst of applause from the procession.

THE LIFE OF A LORD MAYOR of London differs so thoroughly from that of our mayors that some description of it may be interesting to our readers. His election is accompanied by several quaint and ancient forms. September the 29th is the appointed day. It is ushered in by a command from the chief magistrate about to retire from office, to the masters and wardens of the several companies in the city, summoning the liverymen to appear at Guildhall in their official dress; to go from thence to hear a sermon in a church selected for the purpose; then to return to Guildhall to select the Lord Mayor for the coming year. On the day in question the favored one who has occupied the city throne for a period of nearly twelve months mounts his chariot, and, attended by the sheriffs, proceeds to Guildhall. As soon as divine service has terminated, aldermen and liverymen, presided over by the Lord Mayor, assembled in the common hall, hear these words uttered in stentorian tones:

"OH YEZ! OH YEZ! OH YEZ!

(A corruption of the French oyez, hear ye.) You good men of the livery of the several companies of this city summoned to appear here this day, for the election of a fit and able person to be Lord Mayor of this city for the year ensuing, draw near, and give your attendance. God save the Queen!"

The assembly is then informed by the Recorder of the occasion of their meeting, and upon the termination of his address the aldermen retire to their court to consider whom they will recommend to the honor of the civic chair. This is quickly done on the principle of rotation in office, and the Lord Mayor-elect, with many an obeisance from the sword-bearer, is handed to his seat on the left hand of the retiring Lord Mayor. Thanks, of course, are proposed, and promises made; and after the historic gold chain has been placed around his neck, the Lord Mayor-elect is invited to a banquet at the Mansion House, which is given in his honor.

THE NEXT IMPORTANT DAY

is when his Lordship is sworn in. Before he can accept office, the chief magistrate has solemnly to swear that he will faithfully serve the Queen, and deal justly toward all, to strangers, to poor as well as rich—and, in a word, do all things well and lawfully that fall to his lot as Mayor to perform. This done, the aldermen meet for breakfast at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor's official residence; they then go in gorgeous procession to the Guildhall, to take part in the ceremony of the swearing in, and this being over, they return to the Mansion House to sit down to the farewell banquet of the retiring Lord Mayor, who surrenders his seat to the new chief magistrate, and sits on his left hand; then all the officials come forward, one after another, and make three profound bows. The late Lord Mayor gives up the insignia of office, is quietly an alderman again, and walks behind his favored successor.

On the day of inauguration, after being conducted, as already described, by the grand procession to his official residence, he holds to celebrate the commencement of his year of office. The great hall is splendidly illuminated, carpeted, and adorned with evergreens and flowers. At five o'clock the Lord Mayor, in a rich state gown and collar, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, who has her page and maids of honor, walks majestically into the Council Chamber, where the guests are to be received. Trumpeters, marshals, and sword-bearer precede them, and the aldermen, in their gayest costume, bring up the rear. The Lady Mayoress takes her seat on her throne, which is placed on a raised dais at the end of the Council Chamber, while the Lord Mayor remains standing to receive his guests. This part of the ceremony, which occupies about two hours, gives the visitors an opportunity of seeing the notabilities of the land, who are usually invited to the banquet. The members of the government, the foreign ambassadors, the judges, the Lord Chancellor and suite, with a great number of distinguished guests usually attend on the occasion, and it is to conduct the Lady Mayoress to her seat in the dining-hall when dinner is announced. The trumpeters cause the old building to resound with melody while the guests are taking their places; a band plays during the dinner, speeches are afterward made, carriages are ordered, the doors are closed, and Lord Mayor's day is over.

The Lord Mayor now takes up his abode in the Mansion House, with a year's work before him; work, and hard work, too, has he to accomplish during his period of office; so that few chief magistrates, unless blessed with sturdy health, ever leave the Mansion House as well as they entered it. There are the courts of aldermen to be presided over, with a patience that must submit now and then to bitter speeches, and with a firmness that will not brook dictation where right and justice are concerned. There are courts of common council to be attended—not the most peaceable and pleasant of assemblies. There are the sessions of the assize courts, which, as first commissioner, the Lord Mayor has always to open; and on such occasions there are refractory grand jurymen to be fined by him, and breakfasts and luncheons and dinners given and eaten. There are the sessions for the city of London also, and the Southwark sessions, demanding his presence; there are prisons to be visited, and their internal management strictly scrutinized.

There are the charities of the city of London to be encouraged and maintained. There is Christ's Hospital, commonly called the Blue Coat School, demanding his presence and his purse, especially on Easter Tuesday, when the boys all walk to the Mansion House, when the Grecians, or elder boys among them, are presented with twenty shillings each, monitors two and sixpence, other boys a shilling, each receiving, besides this bounty, a glass of wine and a bun. There is the festival of the Sons of the Clergy, to whose funds the Lord Mayor is expected handsomely to contribute. There is the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, at whose annual meeting the Lord Mayor must attend not, of course, without liberally subscribing. The poor Charity Children, when they meet in June, in St. Paul's, must see the Lord Mayor there. In a word, there is scarcely a Sunday throughout the year when his presence is not required in connection with some charitable institution or other. In addition, there is the daily sitting in the police courts, where the Mayor has to perform judicial duty, to dispose of offenders against the law, and these sittings sometimes last for more than four hours each. Then there is presiding over public meetings in all parts of London, the writing and the reading of innumerable letters, and attendance at levées and fashionable assemblies.

Last and not least (not least in importance, and not least in peril to the Lord Mayor himself), there are the great feasts and entertainments. At certain times, too, throughout the year, the Lord Mayor has to give innumerable grand banquets at the Mansion House. There is the first state-dinner, at which all the aldermen and their ladies attend. There is the grand dinner to her Majesty's Ministers, given soon after the meeting of Parliament. There is the grand Court of Wardmote dinner on Plough Monday. There is the Easter entertainment, at which the peers of the realm, cabinet ministers, judges, bishops, members of Parliament, with their speaker, attend in court dress. There is a dinner given to the judges, and another to the archbishop, bishops, and clergy, and many others.

These gorgeous and extravagant banquets have become proverbial for their costliness. An effort was once made to limit the expense by a law made to restrain the expense both of provisions and liveries; but the mayors, it seems, did not regard it, for in 1544 an Order of Council was issued to remind the citizens of their relapse into luxury. The Lord Mayor's feast given to the King and Queen and royal family in 1727, cost no less than $24,450. That given in 1761 to George III. and Queen Charlotte cost $34,490.

The dignity and power of the Lord Mayor as first city officer is very great. He becomes, when sworn in, the Queen's representative in the civil government of the city, and chief justice of the metropolis. The office is one of the most constant claims on the time of its holder, and such are the restraints of its duties during the year that whoever undertakes it usually arranges his commercial affairs so as to be able to withdraw his attention from them altogether and devote his whole time to the public service. A salary in some measure appropriate to the dignity of the office is annually allowed by the corporation, amounting to $40,000, beside the use of the magnificent Mansion House as a residence, and the splendid furniture and carriages which have been provided. In the case of liberal and hospitable Lord Mayors, this sum has been considerably below the actual expenditure, but with some it has been found sufficient, and a few have not nearly expended the amount voted for the support of the office.

THE OUTCAST RECLAIMED.

ALEXANDER STEPHEN was the son of poor but honest parents, who dwelt in a rural district in the north of Scotland. When a child his mother stored his memory with the precious truths of the Gospel, and offered up many a prayer that he might be spared to live and die in the Lord. He was obedient in childhood, but became wayward in youth. Bold and impetuous in disposition, he was always in trouble, and yet seldom pleased but when leading a riot or directing his boisterous companions in their follies and wickedness.

The quiet of a country parish was not an atmosphere which Alexander could bear when he reached his teens. He had heard of the sea and of ships; he had been told of battles and of "glory;" and his ardent spirit would no longer brook a shepherd's lonely life. To the grief of his parents the lad left home and went to sea. For a time he was in the merchant service; but being impressed, he gladly entered the British navy. Here, for a time, he was appalled by the wickedness of the service; but erelong, he became wicked himself. "The ship," he used to say, "was a hell upon earth, and

I WAS ONE OF HER FIENDS."

This was the truth. For forty long years he was tossed about from ship to ship, and during all the dangers to which he had been exposed, the battles in which he was engaged, and the sufferings which he experienced, God was not in all his thoughts. Drunkenness and insubordination were his chief crimes; and for these he had been flogged until his back was literally furrowed with stripes.

At length he abandoned the sea and returned to the north of Scotland. His native home was now desolate; all his relations were dead. He settled in a seaport town, and tried to eke out existence by chance employment. He was soon reduced to abject want, and had to be relieved from the parish funds. He now rented a miserable hovel in a poor locality; here he made broom besoms and hawked them when able to go about. When in the country he was the terror of one or two pious females, on whose paternal estate he gathered broom; for, though age and infirmities had broken his spirits, he was still a fearful blasphemer, and could scarcely speak without taking the Lord's name in vain.

But there was mercy and grace even for this outcast. In the room adjoining his wretched dwelling the Gospel was one Sunday evening faithfully and affectionately proclaimed. Alexander and a dozen more poor persons were present; they listened attentively to the message of salvation, and, for the most part, returned on the following Sunday to hear it again. Week by week, "to the poor the Gospel was preached" here, until a small congregation was gathered and a mission chapel built. In this little Bethel Alexander was a constant hearer; for a time he appeared to listen with a sort of stolid indifference, but by and by he became attentive, and ere long "the fruits of the Spirit" showed themselves in his life. Every one who knew Alexander was surprised at the change which had come over him; but he was studiously reserved, and would not readily disclose

THE SECRET WORKINGS OF HIS HEART.

One evening Alexander was absent when his name was called as a subscriber of a penny a week for a Bible. The minister concluded that he must be ill, and on inquiry he found that he had been struck by paralysis, and now lay on his death-bed. The limbs were dead already, but the faculties of reason were unimpaired. Thus, helpless, he was questioned earnestly and affectionately about the state of his soul, and then appeared the true value of a mother's teaching, and the all-conquering power of God's Word. "I have been a great sinner—a terrible sinner," said the old man, as he fixed his eyes on the minister; "but Christ is a great Saviour, and His blood cleanseth from all sin." "How have you come to know the blessed truth?" he was asked. 'I was taught it by my mother when a boy," he replied; adding, "for forty years all that I learned when a boy I had forgotten; but when I heard you preach in our little chapel, it all came up again in my mind." And then he expressed, in language of the most correct and intelligent character, his confidence in the love of God, and the mercy of God, and the freeness and fulness of His grace. Listening to the Gospel message, crediting its testimony, and conscience asserting its prerogative, his heart was opened, and thus he was enabled to "lay hold on eternal life." We saw him day by day as he lay on his poor and lonely bed; heard him recount days that were gone, and carried his dying message to the congregation.

BURDENS LIFTED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached on Sunday Morning, Nov. 30, 1884.*

DAVID was here taking his own medicine. If anybody had on him heavy weights, David had them, and yet out of his own experience he advises you and me as to the best way of getting rid of burdens. This is

A WORLD OF BURDEN-BEARING.

During the past few days tidings came from across the sea that Bishop Wiley, of the Methodist Church, in the discharge of his duty—going around the world—falls at his work at Foo Chow, China. A man full of the Holy Ghost was he, his name the synonym for all that is good, and kind, and gracious, and beneficent, and that entire denomination has a burden of mourning. Word comes to us from West Virginia and from Kentucky of a scourge sweeping off hundreds and thousands of people, and there is a burden of sorrow. Sorrow on the sea and sorrow on the land. Coming into the house of prayer there may be no sign of sadness or sorrow, but where is the man who has not a conflict? Where is the soul that has not a struggle? And there is not a day of all the year when my text is not gloriously appropriate, and there is never an audience assembled on the planet where the text is not gloriously appropriate: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

In the far East wells of water are so infrequent that when a man owns a well he has a property of very great value, and sometimes battles have been fought for the possession of one well of water; but there is one well that every man owns, a deep well, a perennial well, a well of tears. If a man has not a burden on this shoulder, he has a burden on the other shoulder.

The day I left home to look after myself and for myself, in the wagon my father sat driving, and he said that day something which has kept with me all my life: "De Witt, it is always safe to trust God. I have many a time come to a crisis of difficulty. You may know that, having been sick for fifteen years, it was no easy thing for me to support a family; but always God came to the rescue. I remember the time," he said, "when I didn't know what to do, and I saw a man on horseback riding up the farm lane, and he announced to me that I had been nominated for the most lucrative office in all the gift of the people of the county; and to that office I was elected, and God in that way met all my wants, and I tell you it is always safe to trust Him."

Oh, my friends, what we want is a practical religion! The religion people have is so high up you cannot reach it. I had a friend who entered the life of

AN EVANGELIST.

He gave up a lucrative business in Chicago, and he and his wife finally came to severe want. He told me that in the morning at prayers he said: "O Lord, thou knowest we have not a mouthful of food in the house! Help me, help us!" And he started out on the street, and a gentlemen met him and said: "Cole, I have been thinking of you for a good while. You know I am a flour merchant; if you won't be offended, I should like to send you a barrel of flour." He cast his burden on the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. Now, that is the kind of religion we want.

In the Straits of Magellan, I have been told, there is a place where whichever way a ship captain puts his ship he finds the wind against him, and there are men who all their lives have been running in the teeth of the wind, and which way to turn they do not know. Some of them may be here this morning, in this assemblage, and I address them face to face, not perfunctorily, but as one brother talks to another brother: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

I. There are a great many men who have

BUSINESS BURDENS.

When we see a man harried and perplexed and annoyed in business life, we are apt to say: "He ought not to have attempted to carry so much." Ah! that man may not be to blame at all. When a man plants a business he does not know what will be its outgrowths, what will be its roots, what will be its branches. There is many a man with keen foresight and large business faculty who has been flung into the dust by unforeseen circumstances springing upon him from ambush. When to buy, when to sell, when to trust and to what amount of credit, what will be the effect of this new invention of machinery, what will be the effect of that loss of crop, and a thousand other questions perplex business men until the hair is silvered and deep wrinkles are ploughed in the cheek; and the stocks go up by mountains and go down by valleys, and they are at their wits' ends, and stagger like drunken men.

There never has been a time when there have been such as now. It is hardware against hardware, books against books, chandlery against chandlery, imported article against imported article. A thousand stores in combat with another thousand stores. Never such advantage of light, never such variety of assortment, never so much splendor of show window, never so much adroitness of salesmen, never so much acuteness of advertising, and amid all these severities of rivalry in business, how many men break down! Oh, the burden on the shoulder! Oh, the burden on the heart!

You hear that it is avarice which drives these men of business through the street, and that is the commonly accepted idea. I do not believe a word of it. The vast multitude of these business men are

TOILING ON FOR OTHERS.

To educate their children, to put wing of protection over their households, to have something left so when they pass out of this life their wives and children will not have to go to the poorhouse—that is the way I translate this enenergy in the street and store—the vast majority of that energy.

GRIP, GOUGE & CO.

do not do all the business. Some of us remember when the Central America was coming home from California it was wrecked. President Arthur's father-in-law was the heroic captain of that ship, and went down with most of the passengers. Some of them got off into the lifeboats, but there was a young man returning from California who had a bag of gold in his hand; and as the last boat shoved off from the ship that was to go down, that young man shouted to a comrade in the boat, "Here, John, catch this gold; there are three thousand dollars; take it home to my old mother, it will make her comfortable in her last days." Grip, Gouge & Co. do not do all the business of the world.

Ah! my friend, do you say that God does not care anything about your worldly business? I tell you more about it than you do. He knows all your perplexities; He knows what mortgagee is about to foreclose; He knows what note you cannot pay; He knows what unsalable goods you have on your shelves; He knows all your trials, from the day you took hold of the first yard-stick down to that sale of the last yard of ribbon, and the God who helped David to be king, and who helped Daniel to be prime-minister, and who helped Havelock to be a soldier will help you to discharge all your duties. He is going to see you through. When loss comes, and you find your property going, just take this Book and put it down by your ledger, and read of the eternal possessions that will come to you through our Lord Jesus Christ. And when your business partner betrays you, and your friends turn against you, just take the insulting letter, put it down on the table, put your Bible beside the insulting letter, and then read of the friendship of Him who "sticketh closer than a brother."

A YOUNG ACCOUNTANT

in New York City got his accounts entangled. He knew he was honest, and yet he could not make his accounts come out right, and he toiled at them day and night until he was nearly frenzied. It seemed by those books that something had been misappropriated, and he knew before God he was honest. The last day came. He knew if he could not that day make his accounts come out right, he would go into disgrace and go into banishment from the business establishment. He went over there very early, before there was anybody in the place, and he knelt down at the desk and said: "Oh, Lord, Thou knowest I have tried to be honest, but I cannot make these things come out right! Help me today—help me this morning!" The young man arose, and hardly knowing why he did so opened a book that lay on the desk, and there was a leaf containing a line of figures which explained everything. In other words, he cast his burden upon the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. Young man, do you hear that?

Oh, yes, God has a sympathy with anybody that is in any kind of toil! He knows how heavy is the hod of bricks that the workman carries up the ladder of the wall; He hears the pickaxe of the miner down in the coal shaft. He knows how strong the tempest strikes the sailor at masthead; He sees the factory girl among the spindles, and knows how her arm aches; He sees the sewing woman in the fourth story, and knows how few pence she gets for making a garment; and louder than all the din and roar of the city comes the voice of a sympathetic God: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

BURDENS OF PERSECUTION.

II. Then there are a great many who have a weight of persecution and abuse upon them. Sometimes society gets a grudge against a man. All his motives are misinterpreted and his good deeds are depreciated. With more virtue than some of the honored and applauded, he runs only against raillery and sharp criticism. When a man begins to go down, he has not only the force of natural gravitation, but a hundred hands to help him in the precipitation. Men are persecuted for their virtues and their successes. Germanicus said he had just as many bitter antagonists as he had adornments. The character sometimes is so lustrous that the weak eyes of Envy and Jealousy cannot bear to look at it.

It was their integrity that put Joseph in the pit, and Daniel in the den, and Shadrach in the fire, and sent John the Evangelist to desolate Patmos, and Calvin to the castle of persecution, and John Huss to the stake, and Korah after Moses, and Saul after David, and Herod after Christ. Be sure if you have anything to do for church or state, and you attempt it with all your soul,

LIGHTNING WILL STRIKE YOU.

The world always has had a cross between two thieves for the one who comes to save. High and holy enterprise has always been followed by abuse. The most sublime tragedy of self-sacrifice has come to burlesque. The graceful gait of virtue is always followed by scoffing with grimace and travesty. The sweetest strain of poetry ever written has come to ridicule or parody, and as long as there are virtue r righteousness in the world, there will be something for iniquity to grin at. All along the line of the ages, and in all lands, the cry has been: "Not this man, but Barabbas. Now, Barabbas was a robber."

And what makes the persecutions of life worse, is that they come from people whom you have helped, from those to whom you loaned money or have started in business, or whom you rescued in some great crisis. I think it has been the history of all our lives—the most acrimonious assault has come from those whom we have benefited, whom we have helped, and that makes it all the harder to bear. A man is in danger of becoming cynical.

A clergyman of the Universalist Church went into a neighborhood for the establishment of a church of his denomination, and he was anxious to find some one of that denomination, and he was pointed to a certain house, and went there. He said to the man of the house: "I understand you are a Universalist; I want you to help me in the enterprise." "Well," said the man, "I am a Universalist, but I have a peculiar kind of Universalism." "What is that?" asked the minister. 'Well," replied the other, "I have been out in the world, and I have been cheated and slandered and outraged and abused until I believe in universal damnation!"

THE GREAT DANGER

is that men will become cynical and given to believe, as David was tempted to say, that all men are liars. Oh, my friends, do not let that be the effect upon your souls! If you cannot endure a little persecution, how do you think our fathers endured great persecution? Motley, in his Dutch Republic, tells us of Egmont, the martyr, who, condemned to be beheaded, unfastened his collar on the way to the scaffold; and when they asked him why he did that, he said: "So they will not be detained in their work; I want to be ready." Oh, how little we have to endure compared with those who have gone before us!

Now, if you have come across ill-treatment, let me tell you you are in excellent company—Christ and Luther and Galileo and Columbus and John Jay and Josiah Quincy and thousands of men and women, the best spirits of earth and heaven.

BUDGE NOT

one inch, though all hell wreak upon you its vengeance, and you be made a target for devils to shoot at. Do you not think Christ knows all about persecution? Was He not hissed at? Was He not struck on the cheek? Was He not pursued all the days of His life? Did they not expectorate upon Him? Or, to put it in Bible language, "They spit upon Him." And cannot He understand what persecution is? "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

BURDENS OF SICKNESS.

III. Then, there are others who carry great burdens of physical ailments. When sudden sickness has come, and fierce choleras and malignant fevers take the castles of life by storm, we appeal to God; but in these chronic ailments which wear out the strength day after day, and week after week, and year after year, how little resorting to God for solace! Then people depend upon their tonics and their plasters and their cordials rather than upon heavenly stimulants.

Oh, how few people there are completely well! Some of you, by dint of perseverance and care, have kept living to this time; but how you have had to war against physical ailments! Antediluvians, without medical college and infirmary and apothecary shop, multiplied their years by hundreds; but he who has gone through the gauntlet of disease in our time, and has come to seventy years of age, is a hero worthy of a palm.

The world seems to be

and you run against rheumatisms and consumptions and scrofulas and neuralgias and scores of old diseases baptized by new nomenclature. Oh, how heavy a burden sickness is! It takes the color out of the sky and the sparkle out of the wave and the sweetness out of the fruit and the lustre out of the night. When the limbs ache, when the respiration is painful, when the mouth is hot, when the ear roars with unhealthy obstructions, how hard it is to be patient and cheerful and assiduous!

"Cast thy burden upon the Lord." Does your head ache? His wore the thorn. Do your feet hurt? His were crushed of the spikes. Is your side painful? His was struck by the spear. Do you feel like giving way under the burden? His weakness gave way under a cross. While you are in every possible way to try to restore your physical vigor, you are to remember that more soothing than any anodyne, and more vitalizing than any stimulant, and more strengthening than any tonic is the prescription of the text: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

We hear a great deal of talk now about and some people say it cannot be done and it is a failure. I do not know but that the chief advance of the church is to be in that direction. Marvellous things come to me day by day which make me think that if the age of miracles is past, it is because the faith of miracles is past.

A prominent merchant of New York a few days ago said to a member of my family: "My mother wants her case mentioned to Mr. Talmage." This was the case. He said: "My mother had a dreadful abscess, from which she had suffered untold agonies, and all surgery had been exhausted upon her, and worse and worse she grew until we called in a few Christian friends and proceeded to pray about it. We commended her case to God, and the abscess began immediately to be cured. She is entirely well now, and without knife and without any surgery." So that case has come to me, and there are a score of other cases coming to our ears from all parts of the earth. Oh, ye who are sick, go to Christ! Oh, ye who are worn out with agonies of body, "cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee!"

IV. Another burden some have to carry is the BURDENS OF BEREAVEMENT.

Ah! these are the troubles that wear us out. If we lose our property, by additional industry perhaps we may bring back the estranged fortune; if we lose our good name, perhaps by reformation of morals we may achieve again reputation for integrity; but who will bring back the dear departed?

Alas! me for these empty cradles and these trunks of childish toys that will never be used again. Alas! me for the empty chair and the silence in the halls that will never echo again to those familiar footsteps. Alas! for the cry of widowhood and orphanage. What in the wilderness, what cities of the dead, what long black shadow from the wing of death, what eyes sunken with grief, what hands tremulous with bereavement, what instruments of music shut now because there are no fingers to play on them! Is there no relief for such souls? Ay, let that soul ride into the harbor of my text.

"The soul that in Jesus hath leaned for repose,
I will not, I will not desert to its foes;
That soul, though all hell shall endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

Now, the grave is brighter than the ancient tomb where the lights were perpetually kept burning. The scarred feet of Him who was "the resurrection and the life" are on the broken grave hillock, while the voices of angels ring down the sky at the coronation of another soul come home to glory.

V. Then there are many who carry the BURDEN OF SIN.

Ay, we all carry it until in the appointed way that burden is lifted. We need no Bible to prove that the whole race is ruined. What a spectacle it would be if we could tear off the mask of human defilement, or beat a drum that would bring up the whole army of the world's transgressions—the deception, the fraud and the rapine and the murder and the crime of all the centuries! Ay, if I could sound the trumpet of resurrection in the soul of the best men in this audience, and all the dead sins of the past should come up, we could not endure the sight. Sin, grim and dire, has put its clutch upon the immortal soul, and that clutch will never relax unless it be under the heel of Him who came to destroy the works of the devil.

Oh, to have a mountain of sin on the soul! Is there no way to have the burden moved? Oh, yes. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." The sinless one came to take the consequences of our sin! And I know He is in earnest. How do I know it? By the streaming temples and the streaming hands as He says, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Why will prodigals live on swines' husks when the robe and the ring and the father's welcome are ready? Why go wandering over the great Sahara Desert of your sin when you are invited to the gardens of God, the trees of life, and the fountains of living water? Why be houseless and homeless forever when you may become the sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty?

THE NEW "MORNING STAR."

THE children's missionary ship, the Morning Star, sailed on her first voyage on October 28th. A farewell service was held on board, at which the committee and secretaries of the American Board were present. The Rev. Dr. Alden gave a brief sketch of the three ships which have preceded this one and which bore the same name. Dr. Alden closed by presenting to Captain Bray an axe, which was forged expressly for the Morning Star by John Hamlin, of White Oak, Conn., the handle having been made by Egbert Coles, aged ninety-nine years. The Morning Star carried many gifts, one of which is a large life-boat, which is to be schooner-rigged and to be used in emergencies. It is the gift of eighteen young men of a Boston Sabbath-school.

A few days prior to her sailing a visit was paid to the ship by the Rev. John T. Magrath, who thus describes, in a communication to a contemporary, what he saw: "We soon climbed up the ladder, and, standing on the deck of the noble craft, were courteously received by the officer in charge.

"She is rigged as a barkentine, with yards on the foremast, while her lofty mainmast, which is constructed of iron, serves also as a smoke-stack. She is a sailing vessel supplied with what is known as a steam auxiliary. Her voyages will be made among the islands of those Southern seas where there are frequent and prolonged calms, and thus the two-bladed propeller will often be of great service, while it is so arranged as to offer no impediment when the ship is under sail.

"Descending the hatchway, we find the equipment between decks most convenient, comfortable, and ample. Amidships we look into the engine-room with its admirable system of machinery, and walking forward, we come first to the two commodious ward-rooms, well adapted to the use of the native missionaries and teachers as they are conveyed to their appointed stations in the different islands. Farther forward still are the quarters for the crew. Going aft, we are ushered into the main cabin. In the capacious hold of this good ship of nearly five hundred tons, divided into several water-tight compartments, will be abundant storage-room for the supplies needed from season to season at the various mission stations.

"The bow is adorned with the snow-white figure of a female missionary holding in her outstretched hand the volume of the Holy Scriptures, and with finger pointing to the message of life on its heavenly page—worthy representation indeed of the sublime mission in fulfilment of which the stately ship will ere long be ploughing her way through the waves of the Atlantic and Pacific."

THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES.

By John R. Caldwell.*

The Promise to Israel—The Scattering—Gentile Supremacy—Described in Daniel—The First Vision—The Great Image—The Interpretation—Continued Deterioration—The Fourth Kingdom—The Stone Falling—No Prediction of the Regeneration by Leavening—The End in Judgment—Development of Pride—Daniel's Own Vision—The Corresponding Number Four—Beasts Instead of Metals—The Fourth Carefully Described—The Correspondence in the Apocalypse—The Tendency of Nations.

PARALLEL with the period of Israel's captivity, scattering, and final tribulation, run what our Lord calls "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21 : 24). Of these much is written in the prophecies of Daniel, and to this book it is that Christ Himself refers, when speaking of the period of Israel's oppression under Gentile supremacy. (See Matt. 24 : 15.)

made to Israel under the law, and conditional upon their obedience, was that they should be "set on high above all the nations of the earth;" that in everything they should be manifestly a blessed people. All the people of the earth were to see that they were called by the name of the Lord; and to be afraid of them. They were to be the head, and not the tail; to be above only, and not beneath. (See Deut. 28 : 1–14.) But on account of their subsequent disobedience and utter apostasy from Jehovah, they forfeited all these blessings, and, instead thereof, the curses that follow in Deut. 28 have come upon them to the full.

It was not until after long trial, during the times of the Judges and of the Kings—after many warnings by prophets, many partial judgments and deliverances—that finally the threatened scattering and captivity took place, first of the ten tribes (see II Kings 15 : 29 and 18 : 9–12) and then of the remaining two—viz., Judah and Benjamin. (See II Kings 25 : 1, 2, and II Chron. 36 : 15–21.) "Thus was the wrath of the Lord kindled against His people, so that He abhorred His own inheritance. And He gave them into the hand of the heathen; so that they that hated them ruled over them" (Ps. 106 : 40, 41).

It is of this period of the supremacy of Gentile power, called by the Lord the times of the Gentiles, that the book of Daniel principally treats. We have there recorded each of which embraces the whole period, from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar to the second coming of the Lord Jesus to execute judgment upon the nations.

The first of these is that which was given in a dream to King Nebuchadnezzar himself (Dan. 2 : 31): "Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible. This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay" etc.

THE INTERPRETATION

that follows is plain and explicit. The head of gold represents Nebuchadnezzar himself. "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, strength, and glory. Thou art this head of gold."

After him was to arise another kingdom, inferior—the inferiority consisting probably in the fact that the dominion was less immediately conferred by God—represented by the silver, then a third represented by brass, and a fourth by iron, and lastly, the deterioration still continuing, this fourth kingdom assumes the form of a mixture of iron and clay. That these kingdoms were the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman, there can be no doubt—indeed, upon this all are agreed. (See Dan. 2 : 38; 5 : 28; 8 : 21; Luke 3.)

More details are given in the interpretation by Daniel as to

than any of the others. In the course of its duration it undergoes a change in its character, the clay being introduced in the feet and toes, and not before.

It is upon this fourth kingdom, in its final form, that the stone falls. The stone is one throughout Scripture, the same that, being rejected by the builders, is made the Head of the Corner, and which shall grind to powder all upon whom it shall fall. The end of Gentile supremacy is thus shown to be in judgment, by the setting up of "a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

It is thus that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ. Vainly do we search in Scripture for a prophecy that can in any degree justify the commonly received opinion, that a change will be effected, by the "leavening" (?) power of the Gospel, aided by education, science, political and sanitary reform, in the character of the kingdoms of this world. The boasted progress of the nineteenth century rather betrays, to the opened eye, that and blasphemy, of absence of natural affection, of fierce and high-minded assertion, each class of its own rights, that surely indicates the last days.

Nor is it without significance that in these nationalities of Europe which occupy the sphere of the ancient Roman empire, there should, at the present time, be such an accession of the socialist element, and even of that lower form of the lowest of all government—the communist, that has shown too plainly in France its hideous character. But as the purely autocratic form of government was typified by the Head of Gold, we may safely conclude that the lowest form of democratic government is typified by the clay. And how evident it is that the iron sway of Roman imperial authority is being broken up by the introduction of the democratic element—that the two have no cohesion, that the interests of the whole are sacrificed to the interests of the party. The kingdom is partly strong and partly broken already, and even thus shall it be when the Stone shall fall and make the whole as the chaff upon the summer threshing-floor.

Answering to the vision given to Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel has also a vision — embracing under —the same kingdoms and periods that to Nebuchadnezzar appeared as a magnificent image, of which himself was the head.

THE FIGURE OF FOUR BEASTS

There is nothing to the eye of faith that can please or attract, in all the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them. Satan might show them to the Lord Jesus, and offer them by way of temptation; but to Him and to every son of God with anointed eyes they are "great beasts," wild, untameable, cruel, and monstrous; and —the most dreadful and terrible and strong of all.

THE FOURTH IS DREADFUL

Of the fourth beast, as of the fourth section of the image, more detail is given than of the others. And it is in the days of this beast that the thrones are cast down, and the Ancient of days is seen sitting upon His throne. "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him: thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him; the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." (Read Dan. 7 : 1–23.)

Turning from Daniel to the book of Revelation, we find again the Gentile power represented by beasts. (See chaps. 13 and 17.) But here the first three beasts of the vision in Daniel have no place—they having passed away in the time when the book of Revelation was written.

Consequently in this book we have, with fuller details, that which answers to the fourth section of Nebuchadnezzar's image, and to the fourth beast in Daniel's vision: and here, as in those previous prophecies, judgment is executed upon the beast (which retains all its enmity to God up to the close of its existence upon earth), by the Lord Jesus Christ, in person, coming from heaven, accompanied by the saints, He being now "King of kings, and Lord of lords," and the saints—the armies, clothed in fine linen and associated with Him in all His judgment and victory. (See Rev. 19 : 11–21).

It is well to see beneath the garb of seemingly honest inquiry after truth, the real character of the governments of the present day, and their various political creeds. They are they all deny the Lordship of Christ; under the veil of liberty they are gradually, with one consent, becoming first tolerant of all religions, next sceptical of all, then infidel, and lastly, openly anti-Christian, intolerant toward truth, persecuting to the death God's witnesses, and worshipping the devil incarnate in the person of "the man of sin."

Such is the course of this world; already Satan is its god and prince, its religious and its political head. A Christian has no more to do with the world's politics than with the world's religion. His path is that of strangership here—like the Lord Himself—who walked apart from all the political questions of His day, disputing not the claims of Cæsar, nor contending for the emancipation of His nation, but looking for the joy that was set before Him at God's right hand.

A PERSECUTED CHRISTIAN SPANISH GIRL.

MRS. MOORE, a Christian lady who is working for the Master among the benighted peasantry of Spain, relates the following pathetic incident as an illustration of the difficulties encountered by Protestant evangelists in Spain:

"Christian friends in the land of freedom can hardly realize how their brethren here have to suffer for their belief. We often wonder there are so few converts, so little fruit comparatively. The short and unvarnished tale I have to tell will speak for itself.

"A young girl, who had been taught and trained by a Christian lady, was a short time ago taken very ill. She had apparently become indifferent to religion some time before this, and, being very pretty, her head had been turned, she had become full of the world and the things of the world, and it seemed for the time being that the good seed was choked by weeds. About a month ago we heard of her illness, and being a sister of our Spanish servant, who is an earnest Christian, I immediately went to see her. During the first part of her illness she fretted a good deal at having to be in bed in the intensely hot weather, and to suffer so terribly; but by and by came over her. I can hardly say when it was first perceptible. 'There were times when her agony was so great that her piercing cries reached the street. At those times it always consoled her to be prayed with, and seemed to calm her pain. As day after day passed, she grew weaker and the pain grew more intense.

"On Wednesday evening last, her sister came to fetch me, saying she was dying. We immediately sent for Signor Blanco, the pastor from Cadiz, who was that evening holding a prayer-meeting in the Mission House here. He came at once, and questioned the dying girl about her soul. To every question she replied that her trust was in Christ. He prayed very earnestly with her, asking God, if she were to die, to fit her for the great change, but whether living or dying to make her wholly His.

"Death was not so near as they had thought; a most painful night ensued. She wandered in her mind and fancied that priests were surrounding her. She would cry out, 'Oh, mamma, take away that "cura," he wants to make me confess!' She could hardly be brought to believe that there was none there. Next day (Thursday) she began to sink, but was glad to have the usual prayer, and then I sang her some hymns, and she fell into a short sleep. That day she said to her mother, 'Mamma, I can't tell you what joy I have in my soul!' It was evident to us all that God was working in her heart; her sweet patience and resignation proved it. Her care for others was touching. Often she would say to me when doing any little thing for her: 'Senorita, don't tire yourself.'

"On Friday morning I saw that she was though, as I entered, she turned and fixed her large eyes on mine and tried to move her hand toward me. The cold of death was on her as I took her wasted fingers in mine, and we prayed. It was chiefly ejaculatory prayer, for she was in great pain. By and by the pain subsided, and I repeated to her 'God so loved the world.' I said, 'He is very near you, His arms are around you.' She looked at me, and then fell into a soft sleep, broken now and then by a half sob. Gradually even that ceased, and, like an infant in its mother's arms, she breathed her last without even a sigh. The worn frame of the dear child (only fifteen) was laid back on her lowly bed, and we then knelt and gave God thanks 'who had given her the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' All the suffering and sorrow were over for her, but, alas! not for those who remained.

"We had intended taking measures to have her, if possible, buried in the English cemetery here, as there is as yet none for the native Protestants. This would have been difficult to manage, as it had been agreed by the Consul that none but British subjects should be admitted there. Still, we hoped to manage it somehow, and were taking the preliminary steps, when the girl's brothers came to say that they wished to have her interred in the Roman Catholic cemetery, as otherwise they would lose their work. This ended the matter, and we had therefore to leave things to them, but they did not anticipate the bitter sorrow they were bringing on themselves by their half-heartedness.

"Arrived at the gate of the cemetery, they were

they were not even allowed to leave the coffin in the dead-house, but were obliged to leave it in the road outside, and there for four hours, in the broiling sun, the broken-hearted relatives sat beside the coffin! Meanwhile a priest had been sent to the house to inquire into the matter. He asked who had been with her at the last, and if she had confessed and received absolution. He was told that an English lady had been with her, and immediately said, 'She died like a dog, and must be buried like one.' So a grave was dug in the prickly cactus hedges that border the cemetery, so that she might not contaminate holy ground, and the sorrowing brothers were not even allowed to see her remains committed to the dust.

"An English gentleman who sympathizes in God's work was there at the time, and he says he was quite overcome, it was such a sad sight. The whole populace was quite excited. 'It was all the Alcalde's doing,' they said. 'To-morrow he will be beating his breast at the "Miva," and to-day he is ordering the poor girl to be buried like a dog.' 'And what has she done?' asked a woman. 'Oh, she is a Protestant! She did not confess.' 'And what is confession? What does it do?' rejoined the former. 'Can you wonder,' said another, 'that there are revolutions when these things happen?' One friend, seeing that all sympathy was on one side, took the opportunity of saying a few words. 'For her,' he said, 'this does not matter; this is only her shell, she is with God.' He said more to the same purpose, trying to improve the occasion; at every sentence he was met with, 'That is true.' 'We agree with all you say.' Two civil guards and other officials were guarding the coffin; in the road near a crowd had gathered, and the indignation was universal.

"So there lies all that is mortal of Rafaela in the cactus hedge, by the road-side; there is nothing to show where her last resting-place is, but God will know where to find His child at the last day. The poor mother and all her family, worn out with watching and sorrow, were turned out of their dwelling and compelled to search for a fresh lodging."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

On the Top of a Tram Car.—Mr. Ferrie Said at a recent meeting: "While I was coming home in the car last night I noticed a little girl sitting with her father in the front seat on the top of the car. It seemed to be the first time she had occupied such an elevated position, for she looked rather frightened; but her father's arm was clasped firmly round her, and I saw that she trusted herself implicitly to his protecting care. That is just like me, I thought, conscious of my own weakness, yet leaning on my Heavenly Father's arm for protection."

A Prayer for Bread.—The Rev. Mr. Naismith relates: "During the persecutions in the time of the Covenanters, one of the outlawed ministers, with his wife and family, had been without food for days. In the midst of their trouble he remembered the text, 'If you ask anything in my name, I will do it.' And with a believing spirit they all knelt down and prayed for bread. While they were at prayer a loud knock was heard at the door, and, on its being opened, they saw a gentleman on horseback, with a large basket on his arm, which he handed in; and being asked from whom it came, he replied that he was not at liberty to tell, and rode off. When the basket was opened, it was found to contain a large supply of provisions, which would last them for some time. Thus it shall be with all of us if we ask anything of God. Firmly believing, we shall receive."

A Timely Text.—"I Remember Hearing Dr. Bonar tell a story of a lady who came to him several times in great distress about her soul. Many times she visited him, and each time the good doctor tried to show to her the way of life, but every time she went away without having seen the light. Again she came to him, but this time he told her he could do nothing more for her, but asked her to kneel down with him in prayer. She did so, but rose up seemingly nothing the better. Just as she was going out the doctor gave her this text, 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' 'What was that?' she said. The doctor repeated it again. 'I see it now,' she exclaimed; 'I always thought it was for the righteous Christ died.' And there and then she found the rest she had been looking for so long."

Three Young Men Warned.—Mr. Ferrie Relates: "About fifteen years ago, two companions and myself walked out to Butterbriggins. On the way back, being tired, we sat down to rest by the wayside. While we were sitting there a reverend-looking old gentleman happened to pass, and addressing us, he said, 'I see you are enjoying yourselves this fine day. You smoke, I see,' he then observed. My companions, who were smoking at the time, allowed that they did; I had not begun to smoke. 'You take a little beer,' he then said. We all allowed that we did, but that we only took it moderately. 'Well,' he said, 'for thirty years I have been a close observer of human nature, and I will tell you what will happen to one of you three. If you do not give up at once indulging in strong drink, you will be down in the gutter, and thence down to hell.'" Then the old man left us, and we only made light of his warning. Now, for the truth of the old gentleman's story. One of these young men attained to a high position, much higher than I have, or ever hope to attain to, but he lost it through this demon of strong drink. Several times he determined to amend, and the last time I saw him he had his foot again on the ladder which leads to success, but I very much fear he will not stand. The other—the last I heard of him was that he had been seen in a foreign town, ragged, wretched, shoeless, and with sunken, face and trembling limbs reaping the miserable harvest of the drunkard."

The Finger on the Verse.—The Rev. Mr. Ross says: "A girl lay very ill in bed. Her minister called to see her, but he found her sleeping. He quietly walked over the floor to the fireplace, for he did not wish to disturb her, and as he stood there he noticed that she had her Bible open, and her finger pointing to a verse. He thought, 'I wonder if she has put her finger to that verse intentionally, or if it is by accident.' Stepping over to her bedside, and bending over the open Bible, he looked at the verse, and read: 'Lord, remember me when Thou comest into thy kingdom.' He had made a slight noise upon the sanded floor, which disturbed the girl, and she woke up a little, and murmured, 'Lord, dear Lord Jesus, remember me, poor weak me, when Thou comest into thy kingdom.' He knew now that her finger being on that verse was not accident, but intentional. She lived long enough to give the most conclusive evidence that she belonged to Jesus, and then entered into His presence."

A Prize Taken at a Flower-Show.—Mr. Kennedy says: "A little girl had reared, in an old tea-pot, a beautiful geranium, which in richness and beauty outdid most of its kind. Many of the visitors took a great interest in the little girl, with her beautiful flower, and some asked her where she lived; and on being told that she lived in a back alley where there was not much sun, her questioner was very much surprised, and inquired how she managed to rear such a beautiful flower in a back alley. 'Well, I will tell you how I did it,' was the reply; 'I got up very early in the mornings and put my flower into the sun, and when the sun moved I moved my flower also, and you see I am fully rewarded for all my trouble.' No wonder she had such a beautiful flower, when she kept it continually in the bright rays of the sun. The sun's rays may be all around us, but we cannot see them unless we have our eyesight, and the rays of God's love may be all around us, but unless we see it with the eye of faith it will do us no good. If we keep ourselves in the rays of God's love, our lives will be beautiful indeed."

An Infidel Saved at the Eleventh Hour.— "Dr. Spencer, of London, was once told of an infidel who was dying, and he immediately said he would visit him. But his friend, who knew the man well, urged him to give up the idea, as it would be utterly useless, and he would only meet with insult and abuse. But the good doctor would not be dissuaded. 'Well,' said his friend, 'if you go say what you have to say quickly, and leave the house at once; give him no opportunity to insult you.' So he went, and approaching the man's bedside, and earnestly looking at him, said: 'Young man, God loves you,' and left the house. The man lay with the doctor's words ringing in his ears, and thought: 'God loves me; God loves me; it is impossible that God could love me. I have despised, hated—ay, and even denied His existence. No; I hate God, I cannot believe it.' But Dr. Spencer's words had sunk deep into the infidel's heart, and then he again thought, 'If there is a God it is impossible that He could love me after all I have done against Him.' And day after day the words still rang in his ears, 'Young man, God loves you.' Again he began to wonder if God could really love him, and if it were possible he could be saved at the eleventh hour. He asked his friends to send for Dr. Spencer; they did so, and when he arrived he told him that he could not get the few words he had spoken out of his mind; Dr. Spencer told him that by believing in Christ, the only begotten Son of God, he could be made clean. He accepted the Saviour, and at once unspeakable peace took possession of his soul, and he soon went out into the eternal world rejoicing in God."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Popular Vote for the Presidency is now officially reported by all the States. The total vote for the whole country is 10,046,073, an increase over 1880 of 827,822. Blaine's total vote is 4,847,659, a gain of 393,243 over that of Garfield. Cleveland's total vote is 4,913,901, a gain of 468,949 over that of Hancock. The votes for the Prohibition and the People's tickets are less in the aggregate than four years ago, when Weaver polled 308,578 and Dow 10,305. The vote of St. John this year rose to 150,633, while that of Butler sank to 133,880. Cleveland fell 218,261 short of an absolute majority, while Garfield lacked 311,000 votes of a majority. Garfield had a plurality of 9464 over Hancock on the vote of all the States. Cleveland's plurality over Blaine is 66,242.

President Arthur's Message to Congress is like his other State papers, an able, dignified, and thoughtful document. It is mainly devoted to a careful review and synopsis of the official reports, a report of the affairs of the State Department, and a summary of topics of national interest, to which he directs the attention of Congress. His recommendations are few, and he makes them with little show of argument, and as if he were chiefly anxious to clear himself of responsibility rather than with any expectation that his advice will be heeded. He concludes by reminding Congress that the message will probably be the last it will receive from him, and expressing in graceful words his thanks for the unfailing courtesy and harmonious co-operation with which he has been treated by the members of the national Legislature with whom he has been brought into personal and official intercourse.

A Treaty with the Republic of Nicaragua for the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama has been negotiated. This fact was communicated to the public for the first time in the President's message. The details of the treaty are not known as yet, but a general idea of its provisions may be obtained from the following paragraph, in which the President describes the treaty: "With the republic of Nicaragua a treaty has been concluded which authorizes the construction by the United States of a canal, railway, and telegraph line across the Nicaraguan territory. By the terms of this treaty sixty miles of the river San Juan, as well as Lake Nicaragua, an inland sea forty miles in width, are to constitute a part of the projected enterprise. This leaves for actual canal construction seventeen miles on the Pacific side and thirty-six miles on the Atlantic. To the United States, whose rich territory on the Pacific is, for the ordinary purposes of commerce, practically cut off from communication by water with the Atlantic ports, the political and commercial advantages of such a project can scarcely be overestimated." It has long been the opinion of our wisest statesmen that the United States ought to prevent any European government or corporation constructing a canal across the isthmus. A canal controlled by managers who claimed the protection of a European sovereign would be a source of humiliation and embarrassment to us, and might be used to the prejudice of our interests. As a canal must be cut at no distant time, President Arthur has acted wisely in securing for the United States the privilege of cutting it. The project will doubtless be opposed by England as an infraction of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but that treaty is already practically abrogated by the changes which have taken place since it was negotiated. If the treaty with Nicaragua is ratified by the Senate, important results are likely to follow, which will be beneficial to both the Atlantic and Pacific States.

The Irish Dynamiters are Recommended to the attention of Congress by the President. He reminds the members that the neutrality laws were enacted to cover open acts of hostility against nations with which we are at peace, but modern ingenuity has found means for evading the letter of the law while disregarding its spirit. He therefore recommends a revision of the law with a view of applying it to the prevention of the new mode of warfare. He says: "I see no reason why overt preparations in this country for the commission of criminal acts such as are here under consideration should not be alike punishable, whether such acts are intended to be committed in our own country or in a foreign country with which we are at peace. The prompt and thorough treatment of this question is one which intimately concerns the national honor."

The Recommendations of the President in relation to internal affairs include a change in the postal regulations. He advises that the unit of first-class postage be increased to one ounce. The change, he believes, would not involve a loss of revenue, while the convenience of the public would be consulted by allowing all letters under one ounce in weight to be mailed at two cents. Also that local postage be reduced to one cent. In financial matters he recommends the immediate suspension of the coinage of silver dollars and of the issuance of silver certificates, the withdrawal of $1 and $2 bills, and the redemption of trade dollars at a little more than their bullion value. He renews his recommendation that all internal revenue taxes be abolished save those on distilled spirits. He also calls attention to the urgent need of a national bankruptcy law, and of a revision of the naturalization laws.

The Failure of the Edmunds Anti-Polygamy law to check the spread of the evil is implied by the President in his remarks on the state of affairs in Utah. He says: "The report of the commissioners discloses the results of recent legislation looking to the prevention and punishment of polygamy in the Territory. I still believe that if that abominable practice can be suppressed by law it can only be by the most radical legislation consistent with the restraints of the Constitution. I again recommend, therefore, that Congress assume absolute political control of the Territory of Utah, and provide for the appointment of commissioners, with such governmental powers as in its judgment may justly and wisely be put into their hands."

In the Congo Conference Held in Berlin Some progress has been made in the direction of an amicable arrangement. Germany and France, however, continue to act together in opposition to the schemes of England, Italy, and Portugal. Mr. H. M. Stanley appears to believe that the German Government is in earnest in its colonization schemes. Speaking, on December 4th, at a banquet given in his honor, in Edinburgh, Mr. Stanley said that the German characteristic of persistency had directed their attention to Africa. Although he would gladly give what advice he could to England and America, yet he felt compelled to support that power which would take the matter in hand. He hoped that all nations would seize upon the advantages offered by the scheme which had been promoted by the Congo Conference, and trusted that England would not be satisfied until Africa enjoyed a liberty similar to that which prevails in England. He expressed the hope that the conference at Berlin would end as happily as it began. He stated that he was about to return to Berlin, where he hoped that his views upon matters pertaining to Africa would be carried out.

The British House of Lords Passed the Bill extending the franchise to the agricultural laborers on December 5th. The price of their compliance is not yet clearly understood by the cable reports. It is evident, however, from the statements made, that Mr. Gladstone's radical supporters believe that the concessions made to the Lords in the redistribution bill are unnecessarily large. An agitation against the bill has been commenced, but Mr. Gladstone's influence will probably secure its enactment. It does not increase, it is stated, the total number of members of the House of Commons, but the gerrymandering policy of the Conservatives will insure to them, if the bill becomes law, as large a proportion of the House as they now have.

Prince Bismarck has Suffered Another Defeat at the hands of the Reichstag. It is not expected that it will influence his policy, but is regarded as significant in that it shows the impossibility of governing the country through a parliament whose functions are little more than consultative. The defeat was connected with the ecclesiastical policy of the government. Dr. Windthorst introduced a motion to repeal the law empowering the government to expel or intern priests for illegally exercising their functions. It was vigorously resisted by Prince Bismarck, who said that the Reichstag could not conduct public business. "If the majority, consisting of the Conservatives, the Centre, with its adherents, the new German Liberals, the Volkspartei, and the Social Democrats had to reconstruct the government, the result would be a Ministry like that of England under Mr. Gladstone." His remark has given public offence in England.

A Rising of Anarchists is Apprehended in Paris. The radical and socialist circles are deeply agitated, and seditious pamphlets and posters are being actively distributed. The Republican leaders are denounced with a vigor and hatred never before shown to public men, even under Napoleon III. The French correspondent of the New York Times cables to his journal that in Paris the sentiment against the wasteful and foolish Chinese war is fierce among the working men, and the cry against the tax on bread comes at the moment when the public mind only needs such a cry to carry it away into violence. Should Paris escape the threatened bloodshed during the next few weeks, the surprise will be as great as the relief.

A Forcible Speech on the Advantages of federation was made to the distinguished company at the Lord Mayor's banquet by Sir John A. Macdonald, the Canadian Premier, who responded to the toast in honor of the visitors. Among other things, he said Canada was proud of the fact that she was no longer a cause of trouble and weakness to England. He looked forward to the time when some form of confederation would be brought about between England and Canada. If a great confederation should be made of England and all her colonies, he thought that any Power which should come into collision with England would be obliged to count on the resistance, not of England alone, but of all these auxiliary kingdoms as well.

A Denunciation of Immorality in England has been uttered by the Protestant Episcopal bishop of Chester, Dr. Maclagan, who has horrified society by a slashing sermon on the immorality which he said pervaded all classes in England. In the dwellings of the poor a most discreditable state of affairs was found, and the tide of morality was at its lowest ebb. This was largely due to the overcrowding of tenements, but vice was rampant where this excuse did not exist. In very high society, in London, impurity was not frowned down, but winked at, and even cajoled.

Miss Laurie McLatchie has Arranged to deliver a lecture on the Scotch Covenanters in Paterson, N. J., on December 15th. The lecture will be given in the Second Presbyterian Church. A prominent Scotch journal, describing this lecture, says: "Our town hall was filled by a highly appreciative audience to hear Miss McLatchie give her admirable lecture on the 'Scottish Covenanters.' The talented lady held her hearers spellbound for more than an hour, as she rehearsed, in glowing language, the thrilling and touching incidents embraced in the struggles of our ancestors for civil and religious liberty. The entire lecture was characterized by womanly tact, and marked by careful composition, while its great dramatic power was unquestionable and most effective. Her peroration on those who had so dearly bought the inestimable privileges which are now secured, was most glowing." Applications for her services, either as preacher or lecturer, will be forwarded to her if sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Temporary Home for Invalids has been established in Philadelphia since September last, and has been much blessed. It is called the Faith, Hope, and Charity Mission, and is intended to benefit those seeking healing in soul or body. The large number of applications for admission, and the contributions received, have encouraged its projectors to secure the entire building, of which they have hitherto occupied only a portion. As it is not a hospital, but only a temporary resting-place, friends can be accommodated for only a few days at a time. No charge is made for admission. Rev. W. F. Hazeltine, 443 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia, will receive applications, or donations in aid of the expenses of the mission.

The Temperance Question in Ohio is in a confused condition. The Scott law is declared unconstitutional, and some legislation, either through an amendment to the Constitution, or by an ingenious evasion of the clause prohibiting license, will be necessary. The Republicans passed the Scott law aided by the more respectable liquor-sellers. They are annoyed at its failure, for which, they say, the Democrats are responsible; but they are also irritated at the defeat of Mr. Blaine, which they think was due to the action of the Prohibitionists in running a separate national ticket. There is consequently an indisposition to render help to the Prohibitionists in having an amendment again submitted to the people. An amendment will be necessary before a license law can be enacted.

Five Years' Imprisonment and a Fine of a thousand dollars was the sentence passed upon a prisoner in a recent trial by Judge Cowing in the New York Court of General Sessions. The man had been convicted of engaging at an intelligence office a young German girl as chambermaid, when he really intended to ruin her. He took her to New Haven, where he led her to the woods and chloroformed her and assaulted her. The judge expressed the hope that the severity of the sentence would be a warning to many men, who lie in wait to decoy young girls into lives of shame, and he said that he knew many infamous houses were tenanted by girls who had been thus ruined. The case may also be a warning to young girls who come to the metropolis to seek situations and apply to intelligence offices.

Liquor-Selling in New York State will not be so profitable a business as formerly if the suits under the Civil Damages Act continue to increase at the rate of the last few months. In the inland counties of the State long lists of these causes are now awaiting trial. They are brought under the Civil Damages Act of 1873, which imposes a liability upon any one who gives or sells intoxicating liquors to a person who immediately afterward, in consequence of drunkenness, suffers an injury. In the suits where the plaintiffs are relatives of laboring men who met with violent deaths while drunk the sums sued for is generally $5000 or more. As a general thing, where the hotel or saloon man who sold the liquor is worth money he it is who is sued, but where there is any doubt the owners of the property are made the defendants. The farmers who generally compose the juries are, as a rule, religious men and total abstainers, and they give substantial damages when the case is clear.

An Ancient Precept was Cited by a Judge in court some time ago. Our judges frequently fortify their decisions by references to old English laws, but it is seldom that they go so far back in history as did the Chief Justice of his State who had to decide a certain divorce case. In giving judgment on an application for divorce by a woman, who claimed it on the ground that her husband wished her to go with him to live with his parents, the judge declared that the first legal precept applicable to the matter is recorded in Gen. 2 : 24, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife." The audience is said to have smiled, but nobody ventured to dispute the antiquity of the citation. The audience need not have smiled. If our judges always went to the Bible for guidance we should not see so many miscarriages of justice as we now witness. Legislators and lawyers have never found a more perfect model than the law of God (Ps. 19 : 7, 8).

Two Shipwrecked Crews have been Brought to New York by the steamer Santa Domingo. The vessels to which they belonged were, by a singular coincidence, wrecked on the same day near the same spot. They had sailed from Cape Hayti for Rotterdam, and in making the Caicos Passage, near the islands of that name in the Bahama group, they were carried by the current on the rocks, and were wrecked. Evidently the passage is a most dangerous one, which mariners will avoid in future, or enter only with extra precautions. In these matters men learn caution, though the moral wrecks which occur continually do not teach people to avoid currents that have through the ages been carrying souls to destruction (Rom. 2 : 3).

The Value of an Arm was Assessed by a jury at $7500 on December 2d. In 1880 a workman was employed in the Stewart Mills at Glenham. He was standing on a ladder in one of the mills, adjusting a belt, when the ladder broke, and his arm being caught in the machinery was torn from the socket at the shoulder. He sued the proprietors for $20,000 damages. In the opening, counsel for the plaintiff claimed that the plaintiff was directed by the superior officer to ascend the ladder to adjust the belt, and the ladder breaking he was precipitated upon a machine with the result named. The defence was that the workman's own carelessness contributed to the injury. The jury returned a verdict for $7500 for the plaintiff. The amount seems large, though it was not half what the plaintiff claimed, and what others would doubtless claim for the loss of a limb. It is strange that, with such an estimate of the value of a part of the body, the soul is so lightly esteemed that men do not seem to care whether they lose it or not (Mark 8 : 36, 37).

A Curious Matrimonial Scheme which Resulted in eleven weddings, was developed in South Carolina recently. The Charleston News states that at a recent wedding reception in South Carolina a young lawyer begged leave to offer a new scheme of matrimony, which he believed would be beneficial. He proposed "that one man in the company should be selected president; that this president should be duly sworn to keep entirely secret all communications that should be forwarded to him in his official department that night, and that each unmarried gentleman or lady should write his or her name on a piece of paper and under it the name of the person they wished to marry, then hand it to the president for inspection; and if any gentleman and lady had reciprocally chosen each other the president was to inform each of the result, and those who had not been reciprocal in their choice kept entirely secret." After the appointment of the president, communications were accordingly handed up to the chair, and it was found that twelve young ladies and gentlemen had made reciprocal choices. The News says eleven of the twelve matches have been solemnized, and the young gentlemen of eight couples of the eleven have declared that their diffidence was so great that they certainly should not have addressed their respective wives had they not been apprised in this curious way that the ladies were favorably disposed toward them. It sometimes happens with souls anxious for salvation that they are kept from peace by a similar lack of knowledge. When they realize that God desires their salvation they go to Him and find rest (Ezek. 33 : 11).

An Electric Scarf Pin has been Produced by an associate of Mr. Edison. He made the announcement last week that the holiday market will soon be stocked with a novelty in the way of a low-priced electric lamp, to be worn as a scarf-pin. The lamp is connected by a wire to a small pocket battery. A simple contrivance serves to turn on the electric current and produce a light of one candle power. The battery is compact and handy, and will give three hours' continuous current without replenishing. The ornament being novel and ingenious, it is probable that when placed in the market there will be a brisk demand for them by young men ambitious of shining in society. The appearance of illuminated men will be a curious sight, somewhat startling at first. There is, however, another kind of illumination which Christ enjoined His followers to give to the world. That should be lifelong, and not a temporary arrangement (Matt. 5 : 16).

Thirty Travellers in a Burning Car had a narrow escape from death on December 4th. They were in one of the cars of a train on the Kingston and Pembroke Railroad, in Canada. While the train was running at full speed a bottle of chemicals standing near the stove of the car exploded, and set the car on fire. The passengers rushed for the platform, and in trying to signal the engineer broke the bell-rope without ringing the bell. Between the passenger-car and the engine there were a number of platform cars, and it was with great difficulty that one of the passengers climbed over these and made their perilous situation known. Had the fire started in the front end of the car all communication with the engineer would have been cut off, and the passengers would either have been forced to jump from the train or have been roasted alive. The escape of all seemed miraculous. After their communication with the engineer was cut off, the passengers must have watched with no little anxiety the perilous journey of their emissary, who imperilled his life for their deliverance. It was not so when the whole race of man was in extremity, and communication with God seemed severed. Then the Deliverer came to them, not from them, and as He gave His life, men scoffed at Him (Isa. 59 : 16).

A Governor's Reminiscences of Drowning are related in a Bloomington journal. Governor Richard J. Oglesby, of Illinois, recently told a party of friends the circumstances. He said: "When I was a boy I was bathing with some friends and got beyond my depth and was unable to swim. I had heard that when a person in the water goes down the third time he drowns. I counted distinctly the number of times I sank, and when I started down the third time I said to myself, 'Here goes the third and last time; now I am dead.' Every event of my life passed before me with vivid distinctness, but without creating any peculiar feeling. I saw them go by as if they were a swift moving panorama. My consciousness suddenly departed, and it seemed to me that I died." He was rescued immediately after touching bottom the third time, and after working with him for nearly an hour life was restored. A similar experience has been described by others who have been near death by drowning. It suggests the thought that possibly the instantaneous presentation of the events of a lifetime may be analogous to what will take place at the last judgment, when the unsaved will stand before God self-condemned (Matt. 22 : 12).

MAY I?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"If I may."—MATTHEW 9 : 21.

The Sick Woman's Silent Doubt—The Versions of the Question—I. If I may be Allowed—No Scripture Forbids—The Nature of Christ Invites—His Infinite Power to Save—Coming no Injury to Him—A Direct Command—II. Can I?—Willing Nine Tenths of Believing—Believing a Simple Action—III. If I do Touch?

THE woman in the narrative was fully persuaded that if she did but touch our Lord's garment she would be made whole. What she had heard and seen concerning Jesus made her sure of His superabundant power to heal the sick. A touch would do it. Yea, even a touch of His clothes. Her one and only question was, might she touch Him? Could she touch Him? She would surely be healed if she could touch; but was this allowable? Was this possible? I know that multitudes of sin-sick men and women are vexed with this same question. Oh, that I could help them over the difficulty! May the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, aid me!

This poor diseased woman did not utter this "if" of hers with her lips. Perhaps if she had it might not have troubled her so much; for a usually eats right into the heart. You have heard of the Spartan boy who had hidden a fox in his bosom, and allowed it to eat into his vitals before he would own to it. Beware of having a doubt hidden away in your heart, gnawing and tearing. If you are even now suffering from "If I may, if I may," reveal the trouble to some tender Christian friend and you may soon escape from it.

But the sufferer now before us had the courage to put the question to a practical issue; she tried whether she might or not. She had the good sense, the grace-given wisdom, not to wait until she had solved that question in her mind, but she went and solved it, as a matter of fact, whether she might or not; she went and actually touched the hem of the garment of the Saviour, and she was made perfectly whole. Oh, that those I am now addressing would have the bravery and the earnestness to do the same! Oh, that they would put the disturbing question to a practical test at once! There can be but one result; for as many as touched Him were made perfectly whole.

Our Authorized Version may not be exactly correct in this passage; but I do not care whether it is or not, so far as my address is concerned; for it does not depend upon the accuracy of a text. I am quite satisfied to preach from it to-night; but there is another translation in the Revised Version, which I dare say is more accurate. I will preach from that when I have done with the first. This shall be our subject—"If I may;" or first, "if I may be allowed;" secondly, "if I may be enabled;" thirdly, "if I actually do." This last is the Revised Version: "If I do but touch the hem of His garment I shall be made whole."

I. First, take it as we have got it here:

"IF I MAY BE ALLOWED, or permitted, to touch the hem of His garment, I shall be made whole." That is your difficulty, is it?—whether you have liberty and warrant to come and trust Christ—whether you, such a sinner as you are, are permitted to repose your soul upon His great atonement and His finished work. Let me reason with you a little.

In the first place, you are quite sure of this—that there is nothing to forbid your coming and resting your guilty soul upon Christ. I shall defy you, if you will read all the Old and New Testament through, to put your finger upon a single verse in which God has said that you may not come and put your trust in Christ. It is written, "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." Does that exclude you? It is written, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." Does that shut you out? No, it includes you; it invites you; it encourages you. And I come again to what I have said—that nowhere in the word of God is it written that you will be cast out if you come, or that Jesus Christ will not remove your burden of sin if you come and lay it at His feet. Ah, no; a thousand passages of Scripture welcome you, but not one stands with a drawn sword to keep you back from the tree of life. Our heavenly Father sets His angels at the gates of His house to welcome all comers; but there are nor so much as a notice that trespassers must beware. Come and welcome. There is none to say you nay.

Further, do you not think that the very nature of the Lord Jesus Christ should forbid your raising a doubt about your being permitted to come and touch His garment's hem? Surely, if any one were to paint the Lord Jesus Christ as an ascetic, repelling with lofty pride the humbler folk who had never reached His dignity of consecration—if any were to paint Him as a Pharisee driving off publicans and sinners, or as an iceberg of righteousness chilling the sinful, it would be a foul slander upon His divine character. Little children are wonderful judges of character; they know intuitively who is kind. And so are loving women. They do not go through the processes of reasoning, but they come to a conclusion very soon as to a man's personal character. Now, the children came and clambered our Redeemer's knee, and the mothers brought their infants for His blessing. How can you dream that He will repel you? The women wept and bewailed Him; whoever might refuse Him they pitied Him, and therefore I am sure that He is not hard to move. Therefore I want you to feel sure of this—that there is nothing in the Saviour's character which can for a moment lead Him to discard you and to drive you from His presence. I pray you, then, take it for granted that to Him without fear of a rebuff. If He has power to heal you when you touch Him, rest assured that you may touch Him. You may believe; there is no question; for Jesus is too loving to refuse you. It will give the Lord Jesus joy to receive you. It is not possible that He should say you nay; it is not in His nature to spurn you from His presence.

Will you think, yet again, of the fulness of Christ's power to save, and make a little argument of it. Christ was so full of power to bless that the secret virtue even saturated His clothes. Well now, you often judge of a man's willingness to help by the power that he has. When a person has little to give he is bound to be economical in his giving. He must look at every penny before he gives it, if he has so few pence to spare. But when a nobleman has no limit to his estate you feel sure that he will freely give if his heart be generous and tender. The blessed Lord is so full of healing power that He cannot need to stint Himself as to the miracles of healing He shall work; and He must be, according to the goodness of his nature, delighted to overflow, glad to communicate to those who come. Your question is, "May I? May I?" I answer that question by this: there is nothing to forbid you; there is everything in the nature of Christ to encourage you; and there is such a fulness of mercy in Him that you cannot think that He can have the slightest motive for withholding His infinite grace.

Moreover, supppose you come to Christ as this woman came, and touch the hem of His garment,

YOU WILL NOT INJURE HIM.

You ought to hesitate in getting good to yourself if you would injure the person through whom you obtained that good. But you will not injure the Lord Jesus Christ. He perceived that virtue had gone out of Him, but He did not perceive it by any pain He felt; for rather do I believe that He perceived it by the pleasure which it caused Him. Something gave Him unusual joy. A faith-touch had reached Him through His clothes, and He rejoiced to respond by imparting healing virtue from Himself. You will not defile my Lord, O sinner, if you bring Him all your sin. He has done all His atoning work; do you not remember His victorious cry—"It is finished?" You cannot injure Him though all your injurious thoughts and words and speeches be laid upon Him. You will not be robbing Him of anything though your faith-touch should convey a life into yourself.

Let me tell you that if you come to Jesus and just trust Him to-night—only trust Him—you shall rather benefit Him than injure Him; for it is His heart's joy to forgive sinners. I think you need not keep on saying "If I may;" for these cheering reasons ought to convince you that you are fully warranted to trust in Him whom God has set forth to be a prince and a Saviour, to give repentance unto Israel, and remission of sins.

Might not this also help you? Others just like you have ventured to Him, and there has not been a case in which they have been refused. I thought, like you, when I was a child, that the gospel was a very wonderful thing, and free to everybody but myself. I should not have wondered at all if my brother and sisters as well as my father and mother had been saved; but, somehow, I could not get a hold of it myself. It was a precious thing, quite as much out of my reach as the Queen's diamonds. So I thought. My expectations of difficulty were all sweetly disappointed. I believed and found immediate rest unto my soul. Nobody ever bears a contrary witness. I challenge the universe to produce a man who was chased from Christ's door, or forbidden to find in Him a Saviour. I pray you, therefore, observe that, since others have come this way to life and peace, God has appointed it to be the common thoroughfare of grace. Poor guilty sinners! there is a mark set up,

"THIS WAY FOR SINNERS.

This way for the guilty. This way for the hungry. This way for the thirsty. This way for the lost. Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Why, surely, you need not say, "If I may."

But there is the point—believing in Jesus; and you look me in the face and cry, "But may I?" May you? Why, you are exhorted, invited, entreated so to do. Nor is this all. You are even commanded to do it. This is the commandment—that ye believe on Jesus, whom He has sent. This is the gospel, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." There is a command, with a threatening for disobedience. Shall anybody say, "May I" after that?

"If I may"—why, I think that this questioning ought to come to an end now. Will you not give it up? May the Holy Ghost show thee, poor sinner, that thou mayest now lay thy burden down at Jesus' feet, and be at once saved. Thou mayest believe. Thou hast full permission now to confess thy sin and to receive immediate pardon; see if it be not so. Cast thy guilty soul on Him, and rise forgiven and renewed, henceforth to live in fervent gratitude, a miracle of love.

II. But then there arises in other hearts this equally bitter question,

"BUT CAN I?

I know that I may if I can; but I cannot." This woman, seeing the press, might have said, "If I can touch the hem of His garment, I shall be made whole; but can I get at Him? Can a feeble person like myself force my way through the throng and touch Him?"

Now, that is the question I am going to answer. The will to believe in Christ is as much a work of grace as faith itself, and where the will is given and a strong desire, a measure of grace is already received, and with it the power to believe. Do you not know that the will to commit adultery is, according to Scripture, reckoned as adultery? "He hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Now, if the very thought of uncleanness and the will toward it is the thing itself, then a desire or will to believe contains within itself the major part of faith. I say not that it is all, but I do say this—that if the power of God has made a man will to believe, the greater work has been done, and his actually believing will follow in due course. That entire willingness to believe is nine tenths of believing.

I would have said to that woman, had I been there and known then what I know now, "Oh, woman, that faith of yours, that if you can but touch the hem of His garment you will be made whole, is a greater thing than the actual touch can be. It is not at present so operative, but it is a more singular product of grace. You have within you already the greater work of grace, and the less will follow. A thousand persons could press through the crowd and touch the hem of the Saviour's robe, but you are the only person in whom God has wrought the faith that a touch will make you whole. I might say of such a faith as that, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee;" and if thou art in that condition, there is a very great work done in thee already, and thou needest not doubt the possibility of thy touching the sacred vesture."

But mark this, faith in Christ is that anybody ever performs. It is the action of a child; indeed, it is the action of a new-born babe in grace. A new-born babe never performs an action that is very complicated. We say, "Oh, it is such a babyish thing!" meaning thereby that it is so small. Now, faith comes at the moment that the child is born into God's family; it is coeval with the new birth. One of the first signs and tokens of being born again is faith; therefore it must be a very, very simple thing. I venture to put it very plainly when I say that faith in Christ differeth in no respect from faith in anybody else, except as to the person upon whom that faith is set. Thou believest in thy mother; thou mayest in the same manner believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Thou believest in thy friend; it is the same act that thou hast to do toward thy higher and better friend. Thou believest the news that is commonly reported and printed in the daily journals; it is the same act which believes the Scripture, and the promise of God.

The reason why faith in the Lord Jesus is a superior act to faith in any one else lies in this fact—that it is a superior person whom thou believest in, and superior news that thou dost believe; and thy natural heart is more averse to believing in Jesus than in any one else.

THE FAITH OF A CHILD

in his father is almost always a wonderful faith; just the faith that we would ask for our Lord Jesus. Many children believe that there is no other man in the world so great and good, and right and kind and rich, and everything else as their father is. As the child never thinks where the bread and butter is to come from to-morrow morning, and it never enters its little head to fret about where it will get new socks when the present ones are worn out, so must you trust in Jesus Christ for everything you want between here and heaven—trust Him without asking questions. He can and will provide. Just give yourself up to Him entirely, as a child gives itself up to a parent's care, and feels itself to be at ease. Oh, what a simple act it is!—this act of faith. Just as a babe lies in its mother's bosom, unconscious of the thunderstorm, or of the rocking of the ship, quite safe and happy because it rests in the bosom of love; all fear and care laid aside because of that true heart which beats beneath; even so do thou just cast thyself altogether upon Christ, and that is all that thou hast to do. "But shall I not have to do many good works?" says one. You shall do as much as ever you like when you are once saved; but in this matter of your salvation you must fling all self-righteousness away as so much devilry that will ruin and injure you, and come simply to Christ, and Christ alone, and trust in Him.

"Oh," says one, "I think I see a little light! If I am enabled—if I do but get in Jesus, I shall be made whole." I will ask thee another question. Dost thou not know that thou art bound to believe in Christ—that it is due to Christ that He be believed in? I would not make extensive claims upon your faith for myself. Often have I said to friends who have told me that they could not believe in Christ, "Could you believe in me? If I were to tell you that I would do such and such things, would you believe it?" "Oh yes, sir!" "If any one were to say that he did not believe what I said, how would you feel?" "I should feel very indignant, for I feel that I can trust you; indeed, I cannot help trusting you." When I receive such confidence from one of my fellow-creatures, I feel that it is cruelly wrong for the same person to say, "I cannot trust Christ."

My own conviction is that a great many of you can, and that already, to a large extent, you do; only you are looking for signs and wonders which will never come. Why not exert that power a little farther? The Spirit of God has given to you a measure of faith; oh, believe more fully, more unreservedly! Why, I know that you shivered just now at the very thought of doubting Christ. You felt how unjust and wrong it was; there is latent in you already a faith in Him. "He that believeth not God hath made Him a liar." Would you make Christ a liar? Dear hearts, I know that you would not. Although you say that you dare not trust Him, yet you know that He is no liar, and you know that He is able to save you. What a strange state your mind has reached!

Still, if you think that there is something that prevents your having faith in Christ, though you know that if you had it you would be saved, I do earnestly entreat you not to stay contentedly for a single hour without a full, complete, and saving faith in Christ; for if you die unbelievers you are lost, and lost forever. Your only safety lies in believing in the Lord Jesus Christ with all your heart, and obeying His commandments. Therefore use what common-sense would suggest to you as the means for obtaining faith. If I were told in the vestry after service something by a true friend whose word I could not doubt, and yet if what he said seemed incredible, I should express to him a wish to believe it. I would not wish to imply for a moment that he was not truthful; but somehow I find it difficult to believe the remarkable statement that he made.

WHAT SHOULD I DO

in the case? If it was pressing that I should believe this statement, I should ask him, "How did you come by the information? Where did you hear or read it? What are the precise facts?" Perhaps the moment that he mentioned where he got it from I should conclude at once that the wonderful statement was unquestionably correct. Or if he said, "Well, I give it to you on my own authority; but if you want any further information, you can get it by reading such and such a document; here is the document"—why, I should read it directly. I should read with a good deal of happy prejudice in favor of my faithful friend. Anyhow, I should read it to see whether I could fully believe what he said, because I should be sure that he would not intentionallly deceive me.

Now, if there be anything in the teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ, or anything about Himself that you question, let me invite you to read over the four gospels again, especially the story of His crucifixion. That cross of His is a very wonderful thing, for not only does it save those who have faith in it, but it breeds faith in those who look at it.

"When I see Him wounded, bleeding,
Dying on th' accursed tree,
Then I feel my heart believing
That He suffered thus for me."

There is life in a look at Christ, because in the very considering of Christ there is the breeding of a living faith. We listen to the word, and faith cometh by hearing. We read the word, and picture the whole thing before our eyes, and we say, "Yes, I do believe it. I never saw it quite in this fashion before, but I now believe it, and I will risk my soul on it."

Now, dear hearts, if any of you who have never trusted Christ will trust Him to-night, if you perish I will perish with you! For, though I have known my Lord these five and thirty years, I of salvation than I had when I first came to Him. I had no merits of my own then, and I have none now. I have preached many sermons, offered many prayers, given much alms, brought many souls to Christ; but I place all that ever I have done under my feet, and desire, as far as it is good, to give to God the glory of it; but as far as it comes of myself, I would sink it in the sea. I am saved in Christ, by faith in Him; but confidence in myself is detestable to me. I dare believe in Jesus Christ as my all in all, but I am less than nothing before Him.

Come; we start fair, you see. If we start to-night, you and I will start on a level, with the same confidence in the same Saviour, the same blood to cleanse us, and the same power to save us, and we will meet in heaven. As surely as we meet at the cross, we will meet where the Saviour wears the crown. Oh, that you would trust Him now, and believe Him! "I have no good works," says one. Then for certain you cannot trust in them. You will be forced to trust in Jesus only. "Oh, but I have no good feelings!" I am glad to hear you say so. Then you are not tempted to trust in feelings, but will be drawn to trust wholly on your Lord. "Oh, but I feel so unfit!" Very well, then you cannot trust in your fitness, but must trust in Him alone. It is a blessing when spiritual poverty forces a man into the way of life.

III. Here I close with these words. This woman said in her heart,

"IF I DO TOUCH

the hem of His garment, I shall"—what? "I shall be made whole." It is not "If I may but touch I may be made whole." No; she had got over the may-be's in the first struggle. It is "If I may I shall." If you trust Christ you shall be made whole. If you do to-night actually repose yourself in Christ, as the Lord liveth, you must live and be saved. Unless this Bible is all a lie—unless Jesus was a rank impostor—unless the eternal God can change, you that come and trust yourself with Jesus must and shall be saved in the last great day.

"Bold shall I stand in that great day!"

for I shall tell the Lord of His own promise, and how He bade me trust Him; and if I am not saved then His word is broken, and that can never be. He is true.

Oh, it is this that some of you want to have done with—thinking, and talking, and considering, and hoping! You need now to come and trust, resting yourself fully and wholly on what Christ has done. He loved, and lived, and died that sinners might not die. He wrought a complete work, of which He said as He expired, "It is finished." There is nothing for you to add to it, nothing for you to bring with you to make that work complete; but you yourself, stripped naked of every hope, black, foul, guilty, abominable, the worst of the worst, have only to come and look up to those five wounds, and say, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit," and you shall be saved. It is done. "Thy sins which are many are forgiven thee. Go, and sin no more." Thou art His child. Go and live to the glory of thy Father; and may the peace of God that passeth all understanding be with thee forever and ever. Amen.

"Calculating Joe."

THE POLITICAL SHOEMAKER.

(See Illustration.)

THERE were not many politicians in his State more earnest and enthusiastic than Joe Dropmore, who kept a little shoe store, where he worked himself, employing no help. Joe very seldom made a pair of shoes, but he was generally fully employed in mending. He was very expert in this department, and could put on as neat a patch as any man in the trade.

His little shop where he worked all day was a favorite gossipping place for the local politicians. Joe was endowed with a very good memory, knew by name every officeholder in the State, and what his salary was. He could remember when every man's term expired, and long before the primaries met, could tell what nominations would have to be made. There was one subject, however, which his callers took care to avoid. Joe was always trying to lead up to it, and the inexperienced and unwary let him have his way; but his old acquaintances switched him off before he reached it. He had a scheme for liquidating the public debt which he was anxious to have Congress adopt. Once launched on this topic he could talk for hours, laying aside his work, which he never did when any other subject was discussed. He had a long array of figures, which he quoted from memory, always accurately and with surprising dexterity. This secured for him the soubriquet of "Calculating Joe."

In spite of his financial smartness, of which he was very proud, and in spite of the large sum of money he earned, Joe was very poor. Nearly all his money went at night in the saloon where the politicians met, and where much liquor was consumed. It was a joke against him that any man could drink as much as he chose and as long as he liked if he would listen the while to Joe's public debt scheme. Be that as it may, Joe was never any richer at the week's end than at its beginning, and would probably have died in the poorhouse if he had not reformed. But he had an illness, and he rose from his bed a new man. This is how the reformation came about, according to the account Joe himself gave of it:

One day, when all was silence in that little room, a conversation was carried on in the judgment chamber of the sick man's heart which no one knew anything about but the great God and Joe himself. "Well, Joe," conscience said, "what about your calculations now? Who was right? Why don't you go to the Lord Jesus Christ and ask Him to make a man of you?" "I'll set about reforming; but it won't do for me to reform in this state." "But," replied the inward monitor, "suppose you should die before you're fit to pray?"

A long, long pause, and then softly, like distant music, came stealing over poor Joe's weary heart and aching brain the memory of his childhood; of the time when his mother (dear, good mother!) used to take him on her knee and teach him to say, "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild;" and how he used to kneel by her side and say, "God bless mother and father, and sister and brother, and make me a good little boy, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

Poor Joseph! He closes his eyes and goes back, back. Can this unwieldly, blundering man have any link whatever with that soft, round-faced, curly-headed boy, spelling out in mother's Bible, "This is a faithful saying—"? He can see the patched cushion now on the old arm-chair, and the little table that held the great Bible. How mother used to polish it and let Joe help her! Could this hard, cold heart, full of calculations, have ever been the same with that warm, trusting nature of those days? Poor mother! would she know her son? Drops very soft and warm steal one after the other down Joe's bruised and swollen cheeks, and now, for the first time through two long hours, the silence in that little room is broken, "Oh, Lord Jesus Christ, thou knowest what a wicked sinner I am, thou knowest I once knew how to pray, but I don't now! Oh, teach me for my poor mother's sake! I am the chief of sinners; I never thought so before, but I see it now. Thou art my only hope! I come to thee."

ASKING MIRIAM'S FATHER.

'THERE'S Mr. Bradshaw," observed an elderly lady, whose appearance and dress denoted that she had seen poorer days and been accustomed to less luxurious surroundings than those then about her. She addressed a young man who was sitting uneasily in a chair opposite to her, nursing his hat in a most uncomfortable manner, such as a man wears when he is waiting for the dentist. "That's his step; he'll be in in a minute."

"You will say a good word for me, Mrs. Bradshaw, will you not? I am afraid my chances of success are not very bright."

"Don't you be down-hearted, Mr. Norman," said the good lady. "Bradshaw is sure to be a bit snappy at first—maybe he'll slop over considerable—but he soon cools off."

The young man heard a pair of substantial boots kicked off in the hall, and then their wearer made his way into the room where his wife and her young visitor were sitting. He had the look and manner of a man to whom prosperity had come late in life, and who was indebted to his own honest work for all he owned. A little proud, possibly, of his success, and a little self-confident, but, on the whole, a modest man, well aware that he had more money than refinement. "Mr. Norman, I believe," he said, by way of recognition of his visitor's presence. "Pleased to see you, sir. Not often I find my good lady entertaining a young gentleman when I come home."

"I went to your office, down-town, Mr. Bradshaw," said the young man, "but learning that you had gone home, I thought I would follow you, and it seems I preceded you."

"Yes; had to make a call on my way. Some matter of business?"

"Scarcely that," Mr. Norman said, "and yet, I suppose, there is a business aspect to it;" and he blushed and hesitated.

Mrs. Bradshaw came to his relief. "James," she said, "I know what Mr. Norman has come to see you about. The fact is, he has fallen in love with our Miriam, and he has done the straight thing by coming to ask your consent. There's no use beating about the bush; you understand it now. We're plain people," she added, turning to the blushing young man, "and we don't use roundabout ways."

Mr. Bradshaw rose from the seat in which he had thrown himself, and, planting his back against the mantel-piece, looked curiously at his wife. "I presume, Hannah," he said, "you've quietly settled this thing, and now all that remains is to talk the old man over."

"I've done nothing of the kind, James. I guess you'd ask my opinion, anyhow. My only daughter, too. But it is not for me to settle. I presume we both wish Miriam to be happy."

"Have you asked Miriam about this, young man?" he said, addressing Mr. Norman.

"No, sir. I thought the most honorable course was to speak to you first. If I am so happy as to gain your consent, I have strong hopes that Miss Bradshaw would receive my suit favorably."

"Oh, you have learned as much as that without asking her, have you? Well, I like your way of coming to me at the start. That's straightforward. But this is a serious matter. I'm very fond of my daughter. It is not every young man I should feel comfortable in intrusting with her future. You are pretty much a stranger to me, and I must think over it. Meanwhile, you won't mind my asking you a few questions?"

"No, sir; I quite understand that you will naturally be cautious in such a matter. Such a treasure as I know your daughter to be, is not likely to be given away lightly. I love her deeply, and if I am fortunate enough to win her for my wife, I would spare no exertion to render her life a happy one. I will be perfectly frank with you, and will answer your questions truthfully."

They were very searching questions that Mr. Bradshaw put to the young suitor. First, as to his habits; then as to his religious principles; and, finally, as to his ability to support a wife, to all of which the young man gave, as he promised, frank and truthful answers.

"Well," said the father, "as I told you, I shall consider. When I've made up my mind I'll let you know. I don't deny that I had looked higher for a husband for Miriam, but I won't say 'No' to you now. I've made my way in life. When I married I was poor enough—hadn't ten dollars left after I'd paid for the furniture. There's no reason why you shouldn't make a fortune, too, if you have grit in you. There are other things more important, though that isn't to be sneezed at. A man might do more for a wife at first than you can do. I'll talk it over with my wife, and I'm not ashamed to say we'll pray about it, for it's our habit to get light that way, and in a few days you'll hear from me one way or the other."

Mr. Norman accepted this speech as his dismissal for the present, and took leave of the worthy couple accordingly.

"I guess you've made up your mind already, Hannah?" Mr. Bradshaw said, when the door closed, and husband and wife were left alone.

"I haven't said so, James, but I think Miriam might do worse."

"Of course she might. Might marry a drunken chimney-sweep, or run away with a reprobate swindler. Girls are silly enough for anything nowadays. This seems a decent fellow, but I presume she might do better. Plenty of richer men might be glad of such a wife."

"And be ashamed of her family," put in the wife.

"They've no cause to be. We've made our money honestly, and that's more than some of 'em can say. However, there's no need to discuss that; the young man's better off than we were when we were married, and he seems to be an honest, steady fellow."

"He's a good young man, James. If you'd got religion when you were his age, we'd ha' been saved a pile o' trouble."

"That's so, Hannah, and I don't deny his being a Christian man has the most weight of all with me. It makes me feel safer in giving Miriam to him. But now, we'll pray about it, and then we'll have Miriam down. I suppose she's hiding up-stairs while this is over. I bet she know's all about it."

"Miriam and I have talked about him," the mother admitted.

Father and mother bent their knees together, asking God's guidance in the important matter; and then Miriam was called, and came in, conscious and blushing, to undergo her share of the ordeal. She was a quiet, good Christian girl, rather homely in appearance, her friends said; but when, a year afterward, she stood by her lover's side while the words were spoken that united them for life, the friends who saw them said she was beautiful. Mr. Norman looked down at her, and seemed to be of the same opinion.

"I presume you've settled this thing."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Doomed Life.

THERE was nothing to be gained by closing their eyes to the truth about the state of the little waif who was suffering for the sins of her father and mother. Her life had been one of cold neglect, sunless and joyless. No warmth of affection had come into her little life until Carl, with the sympathy religion instils into the heart, had gone to her and cheered her with his love. It was little he could do, seldom he could see her; but that little had been some relief to the dreary monotony of the child's life. Now, at last, when love and kindness were offered her, she was doomed to leave them. They had come too late. Two or three years ago the medical skill and tender nursing to be provided for her now might have saved her life, but the fatal disease could not be checked after being so long neglected. She must die, and, grievous as it was, there was no hope.

They carried her back with them with the utmost care; and Robert Waldron went in to see her the day after she had been received into her new home.

"I know you again," said little Hester, receiving his kiss with quaint shyness; "you came the night the other Hester left me. She never, never came back to me. I am come here to have my holidays, and grow strong again. Do you think that I shall ever be strong enough to go back to school?"

"Not to that school," answered Robert, taking her upon his knee, and pressing her face to his.

"I never want to learn any more lessons," she whispered, "never again."

"You shall never learn any more," he promised, "but you shall have a pony to ride."

"I should be afraid of a pony," she said, stirring with joyous agitation in his arms.

"Not if I walked by you, and held you very safe," he answered; "my little girl would not be afraid then."

"I'm not your little girl," she said, plaintively, "I'm nobody's little girl."

"But I love you, and you will soon love me," he answered.

"Yes," she said.

"You must love me more than anybody else, my little Hetty," said Robert, with a jealous desire to lay claim to the child's chief affection.

"Oh, I couldn't do that!" she answered, frankly; "I could never do that. I love the other Hester more, and Carl. I call him Carl now because he told me. He said Hester was the dearest name in all the world to him; and now he had lost the other Hester, I was to belong to him. I am to write to him very often, when I am well enough; and I shall begin my letters, 'My dear Carl.' What ought I to call you?"

He could not answer her, and he laid her down again upon the sofa, from which he had lifted her, arranging the cushions about her carefully, and with the most gentle hands. He came every day to see her; and so did Mr. Waldron, whose heart opened to her with the doting fondness of a grandfather. Very smooth and very soft was the path her little feet were treading, but it tended downward to the grave; though for some weeks no one knew it except Grant, who would not mar the slight consolation that came to Robert in this close attendance upon his little daughter.

One day, when the summer was finest, Robert took her with him to Aston Court, and the child's languid feet walked up and down the grassy length of the terrace with him. Mr. Waldron came up and took her away from him to show her the aviary; and he heard his name called by his sister's authoritative voice.

"Who is that child, Robert?" she inquired.

"You don't know?" he said, in an accent of incredulity.

"No; how should I?" she asked. "But her face reminds me of some one. Who did you say she was?"

"Rose Morley's child," he answered, in a hoarse whisper.

"Rose Morley's child!" she exclaimed; "but I never knew she had any child. I am sure nobody ever mentioned it to me. Wherever has she been all this time?"

"Sister," said Robert, "the child is mine."

Miss Waldron gazed into his face with an expression of bewilderment; then a faint and tardy blush tinged her cheek, and her eyelids fell. She began instantly to wonder what would be the most befitting course for her to adopt.

"Robert," she said, sternly, "your sin has indeed found you out! I hope you feel how vile a sinner you are! But I will act the part of a sister, a Christian sister, and take charge of that child of sin and shame, and see to her welfare for time and eternity. On condition, however, that you give her up to me entirely, and never see her again."

Miss Waldron ceased, with an air of self-commendation. She expected her brother to acknowledge her generosity thankfully; but he did not answer her immediately, and when he did, it was in broken and faltering sentences.

"I should like her to be happy," he said; "I wish her to be good. I want her to learn about God after a different fashion from my own learning. She must be with some one as merciful and tender as Christ was upon earth."

"And I?" gasped Miss Waldron.

"You are not that," he said; "you are nothing like that. God knows how utterly selfish my life has been; but not more than yours, not more selfish than yours in its good deeds. I don't believe you love anybody besides yourself. You know it. Whom have you loved? No; I could not give the care of the child to you."

Miss Waldron stared at him with stony eyes. It had never happened to her to have her piety questioned; she had never questioned it herself. And here was her unregenerate brother hinting with bare effrontery that she was not the favorite daughter of heaven.

"If any one is near to the very heart of Christ," continued Robert, "it is Hester. She is not forever brooding over her own soul; but she cares for others, she loves others. It is when I think she might have loved me, that I feel my sin has indeed found me out."

Miss Waldron would listen to him and his profane words no longer. She retired with unbending dignity to her room, where she locked herself in before giving way to her emotions. The only relief she could think of was to pour them out into the sympathizing heart of David Scott, whose deafness was such as to make writing the easiest mode of communicating the infinite varieties and minute shades of her inner life. The tears flowed down upon her paper, and impeded her progress; but she did not lay aside her pen until she had written sixteen pages, worthy of being published in her memoirs, when her life should be written for the benefit of unborn generations.

By-and by some inkling of the truth began to ooze out in Little Aston. Nobody suspected the existence of Rose, who was half living, half dying in the house, tended by the old Frenchwoman with singular fidelity; but it became generally believed that instead of John Morley being ill with fever, neither he nor Hester were dwelling in their own house. The sagacity of Little Aston was at no loss to account for their absence. It had been long known that John Morley was deeply involved in debt, and without doubt he was in hiding somewhere from his creditors. As soon as this report gained universal credence, Mr. Waldron came forward as the principal creditor, holding a mortgage upon the house, and undertook to satisfy all other claims, on condition that everything was left him. He closed up the shop, put the place into the joint guardianship of Lawson's mother and the poor woman to whom, it was well known, Hester had given a shelter in the out-buildings; and there, as far as the townspeople were concerned, the matter rested.

There were some points in the life inside the house which struck Grant as peculiar. He could hold very little conversation with madame, and he could not altogether account for her extraordinary and faithful attendance upon Rose all through the crisis of her illness and during the long and more tedious weeks of her convalescence. Madame could never be persuaded to leave her charge; and when she consented to take her necessary sleep, she would only lie down upon a bed she extemporized upon the floor, in one corner of the room. She insisted, with urgency, upon having chains placed upon the doors, even those inside the dwelling; yet when Grant proposed that Lawson should take up his quarters there, she shrugged her shoulders, and shook her head in vehement dissent. But as soon as Rose was able to speak, and to speak fluently to her in her own language, it was easier to understand madame's attachment to her; and in the course of a short time Grant's perplexity passed out of his mind.

It was some weeks before Rose seemed to awake to anything like consciousness of her own state and circumstances, and afterward she passed most of her time in a lethargic stupor. Possibly the blow she had suffered had in some manner injured her brain; but now and then her mind appeared to rouse itself from its torpor, with the keener vigilance and activity for its long slumber. She could give no information with regard to the evening when she was hurt, beyond saying that she had heard no sound and seen no one approach her before being struck by the stealthy blow; and that she instantly lost all consciousness. But she appeared willing to lie still in her listless debility, without asking any questions concerning her husband, in whose house she knew herself to be; and whenever she inquired after Hester, she was easily pacified with an evasive answer.

This mental languor, with its rare intervals of activity, lasted until she was well enough to leave her bed and sit up in Hester's little study. There was no need for her now to return to the old nursery. She saw no one but Grant and Lawson's mother. Mr. Waldron bade Grant feel no hesitation in supplying her with any luxury which could soften her hard lot; but Rose was indifferent to those luxuries, which had once seemed to her feeble and self-indulgent nature the chief good. In the gradual and partial recovery of her mind, she began to grow restless and unquiet, an excitement which Grant dreaded for her. It was Carl she wanted, she said, day after day, whenever she roused herself to take any notice of him; and after some delay, Grant sent for Carl.

For Carl, Hester's disappearance was the chief and most absorbing circumstance of all that had occurred in this concealed drama of life at Little Aston. He put numberless advertisements in the daily papers, so worded that if they met her eye she could not fail to understand them, and be touched by their anxiety and distress. He reproached himself with bitterness that he had not confessed his love to her, and if she had loved him, that he had not bound her to himself by a delicate and light yoke of duty which her conscience would have acknowledged. If she had been betrothed to him, his promised wife, she would, above all, have owned the allegiance and fealty of affection due to him. But he had left her free, or rather, knowing Hester as he did, he had made it impossible for her to fly to him, while he was yet dumb and gave no voice to his love for her.

He could not believe that she and her father had left London; and every woman's figure at all resembling Hester's stirred every fibre of his heart. He would see it afar off, hurry to get level with it, cast his eyes upon the face, with a wild and forlorn hope, and then turn away, or pass on with an indescribable heart-sinking. As day after day wore away, and week after week, bringing no news of Hester, he grew terrified, exasperated at the long suspense. A mournful, almost reckless, despondency took possession of him. His co-pastor, a man who had found his way into the tranquillity and serenity of old age, and his church, very busy with its own cares, said he was overtasking and irritating his brain; and when Grant's summons came for him to go down to Little Aston, his deacons advised him to take a holiday of two or three weeks.

It was three months now since John Morley had taken his flight from Little Aston, and no trace had been discovered of him. Carl entered the town with a feeling of despair, and, like Robert Waldron, went first to walk past the house before going up to Grant's home. It was dismal, silent; like a grave, only more empty than a grave. A mystery hung about it, and made it blacker than it was before. He saw Lawson, smaller, more shrivelled, more palsied, prowling about the pavement, and looking up to the closed windows as if seeking some mode of entrance. He called to him, in the subdued voice of one who fears to disturb a quiet place, and Lawson came close up to him, gazing with his keen but sunken eyes into his face. "Do you know everything?" he asked.

"Everything," answered Carl. "Where can Hester be, Lawson?"

"You love her?" he said, sharply.

"As I love my own soul!" exclaimed Carl, passionately. "I would save her from sorrow as I would save myself from sin."

"I know nothing about them," said Lawson, in a tone of surly and dogged temper; "but it's my notion that Robert Waldron knows. He's the devil."

He turned quickly round, and went as swiftly as his tottering limbs would carry him up the street; while Carl walked sadly away toward his sister's house.

His arrival had been anticipated all the day, for his sister and the child Hester had thought and talked of nothing else. Annie had put the finishing touches to his room with her own hands; and Hester had been carried there by Grant to place upon the dressing-table a pincushion upon which she had marked with pins the word "Carl." She had to be carried up and down-stairs now; and the pony, which had occasionally borne her quietly along the lanes and across Aston Court Park, had not been mounted for some days past, though it was brought to the door every morning, that she might look at it with her pensive and gentle smile. Yet the chill shadow of her formal and unnatural life was passing away, and her smile was gayer, and her weak laughter more ready. She was sitting restfully upon Robert Waldron's knee, with her head lying upon his shoulder, when Carl entered, and with a shrill yet feeble cry of delight, she stretched out both her arms to him.

'You love Carl best still," said Robert, mournfully, when she was transferred to his arms, and was looking up into his face with eyes of vivid and childish joy.

"He knew me first," said the child, "long and long before you knew me. I couldn't help loving him best. Have you found the other Hester yet, Carl?"

"Not yet," he answered, kissing the child's quivering mouth.

"I should like you to find her before I die," she said, with a long-drawn sigh of anxiety. "You won't be so sorry for me if you have her."

"There is no clue to them yet," said Robert, in a hopeless tone.

"I have a fancy," answered Carl, "that if I could see Hester's home again, some intimation might come to me—some inspiration, I may as well call it—to lead me to where she may be found. It is nothing but a superstition, but it is there in my mind."

"I will go with you to-morrow," said Robert.

Carl looked up steadily at him with an expression of surprise and inquiry. He did not know whether he had ever seen Rose since the time when he and Grant had been summoned by madame to her aid. Before the child, who was listening with eager curiosity, he could ask no question. Little Hester turned her earnest face also toward Robert.

"Is the other Hester's home near here?" she asked of him.

"Yes," he said.

"Then you know her?" she continued.

Robert nodded for his only reply.

"And you never spoke of her to me," she went on, reproachfully, "not when I told you all about her. You never said you knew her. I told you that she said my poor mother was gone to live with her, and you never told me it was somewhere near here. It was not kind to me. I might have seen my mother. O Carl, take me with you to-morrow to see my mother!"

She was too weak to cry aloud, but the silent tears ran down her cheeks, and she sobbed quietly to herself as she hid her face against Carl's breast. Robert could endure his own pain no longer. The child's preference for Carl—his own child—stung him to the quick; yet he controlled all token of his natural jealousy. He kissed the small thin palm which hung listlessly down by Hester's side, and pressed Carl's hand warmly. Then with a great grief and hunger in his heart he went out into the night, and walked home slowly through deep darkness. Every day seemed to bring its new weight of punishment upon him for that sin of his youth. His sister had often told him God punished sin, but he had not heeded. This punishment had come in a natural way. Every dart that pierced his soul could be accounted for without supernatural reasons, but it occurred to him now that possibly that was God's way of working. The whirlwind about his head was the legitimate fruit of the wind he had sown years ago.

THE CREATOR REMEMBERED.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 21, Eccl. 12. Golden Text, ver. 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Who is to be Remembered—The Significance of the Name—All Life Transmitted—Never Self-Produced—The Mistake of Moses—Learning after Forty Years—Daniel's Trial and Triumph—Job's Ordeal—Misunderstood by his Friends—Delivered in Submission—God's Purpose Regarding Man—The Appeal to the Young—Our Pentecost.

"REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." Not thy Redeemer, thy Sanctifier, thy Healer; here it is specially THY CREATOR.

The temptation of a young man is to feel strong and independent. The consciousness of power, of character, of individuality makes him feel that he must carry all before him, whether he is bent upon study, commerce, or Christian work. Remember thy Creator, young man, just now in the flush of youth and strength; remember that thou art not self-existing; all thou hast of life, strength, intellect, and force of character is given and sustained by thy Creator. And all is given thee for a purpose more great, more glorious than all thy dreams, but it cannot be accomplished until thou takest thy place as the creature, yielding thyself up to His transforming power. The Hebrew verb translated to create, means not only to bring into being, but also to transform and remodel what is created.

No power of man can produce life; it always comes from previous life. "In Him was life" (John 1 : 4). God is the source of all life, both physical and spiritual; of all power, all wisdom, all goodness. Generally it is only in middle age, or near the end of life, that the children of God come into a real, practical consciousness of their own nothingness, and learn how completely God is the Beginning and the Ending, the Author and Finisher of all things. "I know I am nothing" is often heard on the lips of young believers, and they think they mean it; but nothing does not make plans and put them into execution with might and main, and then get disappointed if they don't succeed.

Doubtless

was far more important in his own eyes when he conceived the idea of delivering his people from the bondage of Egypt by raising an insurrection and taking matters into his own hands, than when, forty years later, the Lord said to him, "Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt" (Ex. 3 : 10). In the first instance, he attempted to manage his people, but they resisted him, and said, "Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?" He took the command which God had not yet given him; he did not remember his Creator, and that the deliverance of his people must be as much a work of God's bringing about as was his own existence; that he must not take the initiative, but only work as God led him. In the latter case he saw that God must take the command, God must originate and work out His own purposes; and that he must be a willing, ready instrument, with a will surrendered to co-operate with God. Even for this he felt he was too small, and said, "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt" (Ex. 3 : 11)?

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. 3 : 6). This is but another way of putting, "Remember now thy Creator."

A VERY YOUNG MAN,

possessed of great intellectual powers, was carried captive, with some of his acquaintances, into Babylon. There educational advantages of the highest order were offered him, but he was dependent on the favor of a despot who might, for a little offence, take away his life. Probably Daniel had little opportunity of preaching the truth of God as far as he knew it, but he remembered his Creator in the days of his youth. A portion of the king's meat, which had probably been offered to idols, was appointed for the young students by royal command. It would have been easy for Daniel, if his religion had been only external, to satisfy his conscience in accepting the sumptuous fare provided as an act of obedience to the king whom God had, in his providence, set over him. But in thus acting Daniel would not have been remembering his Creator in the days of his youth, he would not have been acknowledging Him in all his ways.

God had created and gifted Daniel to be His witness in Babylon and in Persia; he was in the habit of communing much with God, and of referring all things to Him (Dan. 2 : 17–23; 6 : 10, 11), and as Daniel acknowledged Him, He directed his path. While He gave Daniel boldness to make a stand for his God, and to refuse the king's meat and wine, He made things easy by giving him favor in the eyes of Melzar, whom the king had set over the students. Again, when Nebuchadnezzar, in his tyrannical impatience, had ordered the wholesale massacre of all the wise men in Babylon, Daniel was not afraid to remember his Creator, and acknowledge Him to Arioch, the chief marshal of the Babylonish army, by boldly declaring that if time were given him to inquire of his God, he would make known the king's dream and the interpretation. Daniel took the true place of the creature, subject to God, but lovingly, gratefully, joyfully, working out his purposes.

It was just the lack of this in which kept him so long in the furnace. Conscious that he was "a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil," Job, when God permitted Satan to plague him with loss of property, with bereavement, loss of health, and, above all, loss of his reputation for godliness among his acquaintance, judged God as though He were an equal. The place of the creature in relation to the Creator is that of unqualified submission, unquestioning surrender. While Job kicked and struggled, reproached himself, his friends, and his God, things got worse and worse; the furnace only grew hotter; but when he laid his hand upon his mouth, as the vile one rather than the judge of God, then God spoke to him, revealing His greatness in creation. Then Job saw his sin and folly, he abhorred himself, and made way for the revelation of God's love to him, so that he was made an intercessor for the very friends who had condemned and trodden on him. Previously it was himself who was prominent in his eyes: his uprightness, his perfection, his faithfulness to God; now God was prominent; he saw his Creator, "Mine eye seeth Thee," and he could be trusted with a double portion of all he had before.

GOD'S PURPOSE

in creating man was to unite him to Himself, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one" (John 17 : 23). But, as rational, intelligent beings, we must co-operate with God in His purpose, and yield to the design of our Creator. This we can only do by yielding ourselves up to His working in every circumstance of our life, never taking the lead, but letting God lead us. When things turn out contrary to our expectations and wishes, if we remember our Creator, we put everything trustfully into His hands, recognizing Him as above all, and as always doing right. Our loving Father only puts us in the furnace in order to mould and transform; His work is not to destroy, that is the work of His great enemy.

But there are days of our life—if we live to old age—when we shall say, "I have no pleasure in them"—days when the period of service has expired. It is the young man who is called, in the outset of life, to yield his members as instruments of righteousness unto God. "While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor the clouds return after the rain." "Remember now thy Creator" while thine eyesight can serve His purpose as an instrument of the Holy Ghost for use in His temple. The eye of Peter, in the hand of the Holy Ghost, saw the lie of Ananias and Sapphira; the eye of Paul saw that the lame man at Lystra had faith to be healed.

"In the day when the keepers of the house [the hands] shall tremble." "By the hands of the Apostles," under the direction of the Holy Ghost, "were many signs and wonders wrought among the people" (Acts 5 : 12; 14 : 3; 19 : 11). Oh, it is sad when the hands are not completely surrendered until they have begun to tremble with age! "And the strong men [the legs] shall bow themselves." There are thousands of Christian workers who are so far surrendered to God that they live and work no more for the world but for God; and yet they make their own plans, and expect God to co-operate with them. They give vent to all the energy of their nature, and look to the Holy Ghost to come into and sustain that energy; and so they get up a work for God, get up meetings, missions, institutions—all of which are admirable in their way, and yet they are man's work for God, and not God's work by man.

THIS IS NOT PENTECOST.

God wants a people willing in the day of His power, willing to let Him take the lead, willing to be as weak in themselves as though the hands and feet already trembled with old age, that "the power of Christ" might rest upon them. "In the day when. . . the grinders [the teeth] cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened, and the doors shall be shut in the streets [the sense], when the sound of the grinding is low [loss of appetite], and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird [sleeplessness], and all the daughters of music [the voice] shall be brought low; also when they shall be afraid of that which is high [any ascent], and fears shall be in the way, and the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail; because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets." God never meant death to frighten men into conversion or sanctification. He says, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. . . or ever the silver cord [of spine and nerve] be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern [all this is beautifully descriptive of the cessation [of the action of the heart and other organs]. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

AMEN.

I cannot say,
Beneath the pressure of Life's care to-day,
I joy in these;
But I can say
That I had rather walk this rugged way,
If Him it please.

I cannot feel
That all is well, when dark'ning clouds conceal
The shining sun;
But then I know
God lives and loves; and say, since it is so,
Thy will be done.

I cannot speak
In happy tones; the tear-drops on my cheek
Show I am sad;
But I can speak
Of grace to suffer with submission meek,
Until made glad.

I do not see
Why God should e'en permit some things to be,
When he is Love;
But I can see
Though often dimly, through the mystery,
His hand above.

I may not try
To keep the hot tears back; but hush that sigh,
"It might have been;"
And try to still
Each rising murmur, and to God's sweet will Respond—AMEN.

THE world will never know how deeply it is indebted for its spiritual, moral, and material advancement to its women. Before the advent of Christianity woman was but the toy and slave of man. Where there is no Christianity she is still, for the most part, condemned to the same degraded lot. In Christian homes we know her worth, but we have yet to realize fully of how much she is capable outside the narrow home circle. That she has fulfilled nobly the duties of that circle we cannot deny. In the nursery alone, her influence has been abundantly blessed. Thousands of God's honored servants, and men who have attained eminence in secular life, have testified that all they have been able to accomplish is due, under God, to the prayers and counsels of their mothers. In the misery of the sick-chamber we bless her tender, compassionate ministrations, and when we are jaded and dispirited we go to her for encouragement and new strength. The time is fast approaching when, in wider spheres and in more honored places, her wisdom and love will achieve such success that none will hesitate to "give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates."

EMINENT WOMEN.

A host of brilliant examples might be adduced from our own national history, and from that of other lands, to show how nobly women have acquitted themselves in positions of prominence and grave responsibility, and in our own day there are women equally wise and heroic. How ably they can organize and conduct great movements the present generation has seen in the lives of Clara Barton, Frances E. Willard, and others. They have won the applause of the world, also, be it remembered, by their own womanly qualities. They have never unsexed themselves. The attributes which constitute the charm of woman in the domestic sphere—her deep compassion, her exquisite tenderness, and her unselfish devotion to others—are those with which in public life she has achieved her successes. The rough, fierce soldier lying shattered with wounds, writhing in agony on his hospital bed, who invoked a blessing on the head of Clara Barton, and the miserable drunkard, induced by Miss Willard's tender appeals to make another effort to reform, would tell us that no man could do for them what the love and pity of woman have done, and they at least have hailed the day when she stepped outside the domestic sphere.

FITNESS FOR PREACHING.

It is in another sphere, the greatest and best of all—that of religion—that the woman has become distinguished whose portrait this week appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As with her American sisters, it is the peculiarly feminine qualities which have been most conspicuous in her work. Audiences of rough, uncultured men, who rejected, with scorn and vituperation, the appeals of scholarly men, infidels who met argument with argument, blasphemers who turned from eloquent preachers with execrations or with ridicule, have been swayed and won to Christ by the pictures this woman has drawn of the love and tenderness of the Saviour. She has won her way to their hearts, not by torrents of indignation, not by lurid images of the flames and torments of hell, but by the sweet womanly pity for the fallen, the lost, the Satan-deceived, hopeless ones, who know not what they do. Akin to the infinite compassion of Him who, beholding the city, wept over it, has been that sympathetic pleading with which she has beckoned the weary sinner to the loving Saviour, and has melted the backslider, until, like Peter, he went out and wept bitterly.

PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

The hearer who listens to Miss McLatchie for the first time, is impressed at once by her voice. It is one of exceptional quality. Exceedingly soft and melodious, it is nevertheless strong and penetrating. When, as in relating some pathetic incident, it drops for a moment, the almost whisper is clearly heard by the largest congregation. The louder tones are never hoarse or harsh, but fill the building with an organ-like volume of sound. Each word is distinctly pronounced, and has its appropriate emphasis. Occasionally—scarcely more than once in fifty sentences—the speaker's nationality is revealed by the musical Scottish "burr," as the letter "R" hangs for an instant on the tongue; but otherwise there is nothing to distinguish her pronunciation from that of an educated American.

The style of her sermons is varied. Argument, clear and cogent, is interspersed with poetic imagery and pointed with apt illustration. There is an indescribable something which in America we recognize best as a magnetic manner, that attracts the sympathy of the hearer. He misses the boldness, the dogmatism, the manner which Mr. Lowell playfully calls the which he often sees in the pulpit and on the platform. Instead, there is womanly modesty, and an impression is conveyed of a previous struggle, in which natural shrinking from publicity has been overcome by a sense of duty and by a conviction that the message to be delivered is of overwhelming importance to those who listen. After a few minutes that passes away, and the speaker, losing herself in her subject, is eagerly presenting Christ, the Saviour of sinners, the Friend of the poor and the outcast, to the people. Then the eyes flash, the voice is raised, and animated gestures accompany the words, as fact is piled on fact, and entreaty follows invitation. Then the speaker is forgotten as she forgets herself, and the hearer is busy with the vital questions presented to him. It is only when his attention is surrendered back to him, that he realizes how he has been carried out and away and beyond himself by a woman's sermon. None are more ready than Miss McLatchie to ascribe to God all the glory, and to acknowledge that without the Holy Spirit to apply the word, all her efforts would be in vain; yet we know that God works by means, and we honor the instrument whom He has blessed to the conversion of a number which at the present time is reckoned by thousands.

THE FAMILY.

Emerson said, "We can never get away from our ancestors." Miss Laurie McLatchie has never had any desire to get away from hers, except so far as she could get still nearer to her Master. The family originally came from the town of Ayr, the birthplace of Robert Burns. Its representative in the last century removed to an estate of the Kilpatrick family, settling at Closeburn Mill, in Dumfriesshire, as miller and farmer. His grandson, who was Miss McLatchie's father, was, like his father and grandfather, a man of eminent piety.

He married into a family noted for piety and benevolence. His wife was a Miss Lorimer, whose father was distinguished throughout his county for his deeds of Christian kindness; and her mother a member of the Laurie family (which accounts for the evangelist's first name); equally remarkable for devotion and self-sacrifice. When the sorrowful time of the disruption came, which tried all hearts, the family went with those who "came out" for conscience' sake, accepting all the hardships that course involved. During the bleak winter of 1843–44, Mr. and Mrs. McLatchie worshipped with their fellow-members in the open air. Mr. McLatchie after the disruption became an elder of the Free Church, which office he held until the time of his death, which occurred in May, 1882, one year after he had laid his beloved wife in the tomb.

The way in which

of His servant for her work of usefulness was effected is extremely interesting. In the year 1871 Miss McLatchie was residing in London with her brother. From childhood she had received religious training, and had very early given her heart to the Saviour. In London, where there is so much Christian work to be done, she could not rest unemployed. She assisted Mrs. Ranyard, whose Bible-woman work among women, known as "the missing link," has been described in these columns. There she had the care of four Bible-women, and assisted in addressing women's meetings. During her occupation in that sphere Mrs. Ranyard received a letter from the celebrated philanthropist, Dr. Lyell, of Glasgow, asking her to send him an intelligent young lady to help him in his medical mission in that city. Mrs. Ranyard recommended Miss McLatchie, and in 1873 she went to Glasgow to enter upon her duties.

A better preparation for her future work she could not have had. Every afternoon, under Dr. Lyell's instruction, she learned to dispense medicines, until she became expert in the duty. The morning and evening of each day were devoted to visiting the destitute sick and dying persons who constituted Dr. Lyell's clientèle. Such scenes of misery as probably no other city in the world could furnish, the young Christian visitor witnessed during her visits. Men and women living in the most abject poverty, sick and dying, the good physician almost their only friend, some of them densely ignorant, sought light in their last moments, and were led by her into the path of peace.

IN THE HAVANNAH,

one of the filthiest tenement-houses in Glasgow, Miss McLatchie saw a sickening sight. She was sent for one broiling summer afternoon to visit a woman dying of dropsy. She went, and found the woman, who had been a nurse to a Scotch nobleman, and who still received a pension from him, dying in misery. Up three flights of stairs, in a room without a vestige of furniture, the woman lay upon the floor in the agonies of death. Her face was broken by the disease, and swarms of flies had gathered upon it, which she was too weak to brush away. A half drunken shoemaker, with whom she lived, sat on an upturned box mending shoes, and taking no notice of the dying woman. The visitor stooped to brush away the flies and to speak a few words to the sufferer. Under her head was a gin-bottle, which indicated the cause of her misery. At the first sentence of Christian comfort the shoemaker jumped from his seat, and with oaths and curses bade the visitor begone. He was an infidel, and swore that the name of Jesus should not be spoken in the room. In the storm of imprecations the woman breathed her last, and Miss McLatchie went sorrowfully away.

IN THE VENNELLS,

another noted tenement-house, a happier scene occurred. Miss McLatchie was visiting a Protestant family, the only one on the premises, when she heard of a Catholic lying in a dying state in the Vennell. The man was a drunkard, and profane and abusive to the last degree. In spite of warnings, Miss McLatchie resolved to see him, and went. She began to speak of Jesus, when the wife of the dying man seized her roughly by the arm.

Addressing the wife, Miss McLatchie said: "I was going to tell your husband, when you pulled me away, that when the Lord Jesus was dying there was a thief forgiven in his last moments. I was going to tell him that there was no need that he should go into the fire, but that he might be saved like the thief. I was only going to tell him how to be saved, and it could do him no harm." As she spoke the visitor turned to look at the dying man, and saw him sitting up in bed with eager, outstretched hands and glaring eyes. "Go on, my daughter," he said, "tell me more. I want to know more of that.

I am sure that is the right way." Miss McLatchie gladly sat down by him, and told him the story of the Cross. She had the happiness of seeing that man rejoice in believing.

A MEETING ON SHIPBOARD of an interesting character properly belongs to this period. Miss Jeanie McLatchie, a sister of the subject of this sketch, was crossing to America a year or two ago, when, after spending some time in her cabin, enduring the miseries of seasickness, she ventured on deck. She was accosted by the steward of the ship, who said: "I should like to shake hands with you. Some years ago I was in Glasgow, and was ill and alone in the great city. Your sister found me, visited me, secured me admission into a Christian institution, and cared for me until I recovered. I owe my conversion, under God, to your sister's goodness to me in that time of trial. Since Miss McLatchie has been in America several interesting meetings of a similar kind have occurred with herself, and a few days ago a gentleman called on Dr. Talmage, having heard of her speaking at the Tabernacle, and asked for her address, he, too, having been converted under her in Glasgow.

About the end of the year 1874 a lady whose ill-health precluded her from continuing the Christian work in which she was engaged begged Miss McLatchie to undertake preaching engagements. But that she declined. She could talk, but the idea of preaching at that time she shrank from. Her friends consulted with her pastor, and it was decided to take her by surprise. One Saturday her minister placed in her hands a printed poster announcing that Miss McLatchie would preach at Greenock on the following Monday night. It was a startling announcement to her, but after prayer and consideration she agreed to go.

THE FIRST SERMON

was one she is not likely ever to forget. Her timidity impelled her even to the last to a desire to evade the task. On her arrival she found the church crowded. The minister encouraged her by saying, "I see people here to-night who never go to any place of worship. You have an opportunity of preaching Christ to them. Forget the others; preach to them." That was sufficient; Miss McLatchie spoke for three quarters of an hour, and that night five souls were saved.

A second time Miss McLatchie was asked to visit Greenock, and on that occasion no less than fifty persons came to seek the Lord under deep conviction of sin. There can be no better indication of the Lord's will concerning duty than such living tokens of His blessing. So Miss McLatchie and her Christian friends regarded them, and she gladly consented to continue the work so happily commenced. Night after night the meetings were continued with increasing success.

It was not long before the Christians in Glasgow learned from the press what was going on at Greenock, and sought a similar blessing for their own city. A hall in the Salt Market—famous in Sir Walter Scott's stories—was already in use in Glasgow for evangelistic purposes. It was under the charge of H. A. Long, Esq., a popular politician and a member of the Board of Education. The hall held about six hundred people. Miss McLatchie was induced to speak there, and the room was crowded. A great work commenced, and she was persuaded to transfer her services entirely from Greenock to the larger city. She labored there through the summer of 1875, and as the winter approached the congregations became so large that the necessity for larger accommodation was imperative. The City Hall, the largest building in Glasgow, was engaged, and there, for seven months, Miss McLatchie preached to overflowing congregations. Among the most regular attendants were students from the University, among whom much good was done.

Glasgow is a busy centre of commerce, and among the audiences of the City Hall were many Christian merchants and business men from England and Ireland, who went away blessing God for the work they had witnessed. The tidings of the young lady-preacher's remarkable power, and the blessing with which God was owning her labors, spread, and requests began to pour in both from England and Ireland that she would visit large centres where populations as unmoved by ordinary Gospel effort as that in Glasgow were to be found. For a time the invitations were sparsely accepted, but finally Miss McLatchie, having regarded the results of these excursions as an indication of God's leading, and guided by the counsels of Christian friends, decided upon abandoning the work in Glasgow and taking up the work of an evangelist, trusting wholly to God for her support and guidance, and He has marvellously opened the way before her. During the nine years which have elapsed since then, she has preached in most of the great halls and public buildings in England—places rarely filled except when men of pre-eminent reputation, such as John Bright, W. E. Gladstone, Dr. Talmage, and John B. Gough have there addressed meetings. In all cases the local newspapers respectively reported that the numbers who were moved to hear her crowded the buildings to excess. Among the places visited were Frodsham, Middlesborough, Hull, Liverpool, Portsmouth, West Bromwich, Walsall, Newtown, Bristol, and many other important towns, where she spoke at the invitation of Christian friends, staying some times two or three weeks and sometimes longer, but always with the same unvarying results.

AN AMUSING PRAYER,

offered by a very rough but earnest Christian pitman, at a place called Gornall, may be quoted as a specimen of the feelings entertained about Miss McLatchie's work by her more humble friends. "Lord," said the man, "they prayed ten days in Jerusalem afore they got an answer, but we'n been a-tuggin' at it for two years. We used to have souls saved in t'ould chapel, but we mun ha' a foine new chapel, and we got it, and ped eight oonderd poond ($4000) for un. But we'n niver 'ed a soul saved in it this two year. We'n had all soorts o' praichers—local praichers, and reg'lar praichers, and travelling praichers—but they wur none of 'em any good. Seems to me when the chapel wur opened, the devil took front seat. But now, Lord, the woman's coom along and took him by scroof of his neck and turned him oot neck and crap." Then followed hearty thanks for the ejection the old man believed had been effected, and prayers for a continuance of the blessing.

AT BIRMINGHAM,

the metropolis of the Midland counties, she was asked to address Sunday gatherings of workingmen, and she did so, speaking in as many as four halls in the same morning. At the conclusion of her work in the city a grand united meeting was held in the town hall, a large building which is rarely filled save at some grand choral festival or when some political meeting is addressed by John Bright. The scene on the occasion of Miss McLatchie's services our artist has attempted to depict in the picture on the first page. It was a perfect ovation. Nearly an hour before the doors were opened an immense crowd gathered. Before the time of commencing the service the doors had to be closed, and a police force placed on guard, every seat and every spot of standing room being occupied. Thousands of people stood outside, to the close, and so eager was the throng desiring to say farewell to the popular lady, that a platoon of police was sent to pilot her carriage through the crowd.

In the fall of last year, at the urgent request of Christian people in the islands of

JERSEY AND GUERNSEY,

Miss McLatchie commenced a series of meetings there. They were eminently successful. After speaking a few times, the reports of her eloquence spread through the islands, and people came long distances and stood outside the doors of the building for hours in order to be among the first to enter when they were opened. The largest buildings in the islands were crowded to suffocation whenever she spoke, and the press, secular as well as religious, published reports of her sermons, and was unanimous in her praise.

At one of the largest meetings in Jersey a magnificent album, containing views of the island scenery, was presented to her, and in Guernsey, at another monster meeting, a costly gold bracelet, with a pendent heart, the significance of which was pointed out, and a breastpin to match, was offered her as a testimonial of affection and gratitude. Such an awakening had occurred during her visit as the islands had never before seen. Christian parents were rejoicing over children converted under her ministration; wives were thanking God for the conversion of their husbands; and in numberless homes, where religion had been never mentioned, songs of praise were going up to God.

Her lectures appear to have been equally popular there as elsewhere. A prominent Jersey newspaper says: "It does not necessarily follow that because a person is a good preacher he will be a good lecturer, or that a good lecturer will be a good preacher. On the contrary, we have known eminent lecturers to be indifferent preachers and eminent preachers to be poor lecturers. It is seldom that both qualities are combined in the same person as they are so wonderfully in Miss McLatchie, the gifted lady who has been among us during the past few weeks. Her lecture last night, on the Scotch Covenanters, was a grand poetical résumé of the noble struggle for liberty which was fought by the Scots."

The fruit of Miss McLatchie's labors generally has been remarkable for the power of reproduction with which God has blessed it. Several cases have come to our knowledge of men who are now preaching the Gospel, who date their conversion to the use, by the Holy Spirit, of Miss McLatchie's appeals. One of these is now the pastor of a Presbyterian church in Newfoundland. One of the most remarkable instances is that of Miss S. Seed, a lady who is now in China. She was engaged in literary and scholastic work in London, but being on a visit to her parents, who resided at Butterworth, she was induced to attend the special services Miss McLatchie was then conducting in that town. Ultimately she gave her heart to God. She immediately commenced Christian work, laboring among the anxious inquirers, and was much blessed in directing souls to the Saviour. Her energy and devotion were as remarkable as her success, and ultimately she decided on abandoning her lucrative profession and giving all her time and talents to the work of the Lord. After laboring for a time in various places in her native country, she was led to consider the claims of China. She eventually offered herself for service in that benighted land, and was accepted. She is now laboring at Chef-Foo.

Though Miss McLatchie's work in America is only just commencing, there is no lack of testimony to the appreciation of her many and varied gifts. We have space for only one brief extract from the letters we have received. The Rev. T. H. Landon, of Paterson, N. J., writes: "Miss McLatchie has just closed a series of successful services in this city. Though we were in the midst of the heat of the Presidential campaign, and political meetings and parades were being held every night, much good was accomplished in the stirring up of Christians to faith and good works. . . . The audiences were good and the interest very marked. There is reason to believe the end is not yet, but that, though Miss McLatchie's engagements call her elsewhere, her work for God here will remain and enlarge."

It will be of interest to mention that Miss McLatchie has made her mark as by the publication of a volume of poems, entitled "Stray Thoughts," which has had a large circulation, and for which another edition is now called.

The following poem extracted from its pages may fitly close this notice of the gifted lady:

THE ROSE OF SHARON.

"Is there no balm in Gilead's fields?
No healing balsam there?
Has Sharon's rose forgot to bloom,
And spread its fragrance rare?

"Have living waters ceased to flow?
Has cold their streams congealed?
And has the rich and fertile soil
Forgot its fruits to yield?

"Is there no loving One to heal
The torn and bleeding heart?
Is there no skill'd hand to extract
The poison-venomed dart?

"Is there no refuge from life's woes?
No covert from its heat?
No calm repose for weary souls,
Nor rest for tired feet?

"Is there no light to guide our steps
Along this dreary road?
And will this shivering, shipwrecked waif
Ere reach yon blest abode?

"Oh, yes! there's balm in Gilead still,
And a physician there,
And Sharon's fair and bleeding rose
Still breathes its perfume rare.

"There from the sacred fount of love
Still living waters flow,
And rich and ripe o'er all the land
The clustering viands grow.

"And you, ye weary, tired ones,
To Jesus come and rest;
He's still a shelter from the heat,
And covert from the blast.

"And brightly shines the morning star;
The darkness flees away;
Through Christ we'll surely win the prize,
And hail eternal day.

"Cheer up! Ere long the desert's passed;
Soon Jordan will be crossed;
And you and I be safe at home,
No more be tempest-tossed."

Alcoholic Beverages—A Vice that Includes all Others—The Gates Seldom Swing Outward—Dreary Alternatives—The Great Bulwark—A Besiegement of the Gates—A Christmas Night in a Farm-House—A Wanderer Restored.

You know about the gates of heaven. You have often heard them preached about. There are three to each point of the compass. On the north, three gates; on the south, three gates; on the east, three gates; on the west, three gates; and each gate is a solid pearl. Oh, gate of heaven, may we all get into it! But who shall describe the gates of hell spoken of in my text? These gates are burnished until in the gaslight. They are mighty, and set in sockets of deep and dreadful masonry. They are high, so that those who are in may not clamber over and get out. They are heavy, but they swing easily in to let those go in who are to be destroyed.

I remember, when the Franco-German war was going on, that I stood one day in Paris looking at the gates of the Tuileries, and I was so absorbed in the sculpturing at the top of the gates—the masonry and the bronze—that I forgot myself, and after awhile, looking down, I saw that there were officers of the law scrutinizing me, supposing, no doubt, I was a German, and looking at those gates for adverse purposes. But, my friends, we shall not stand looking at the outside of the gates of hell. I intend to tell you of both sides, and I shall tell you

WHAT THOSE GATES ARE MADE OF.

With the hammer of God's truth I shall pound on the brazen panels, and with the lantern of God's truth I shall flash a light upon the shining hinges.

I. Gate the first: impure literature. Anthony Comstock seized twenty tons of bad books, plates, and letter-press, and when Professor Cochran, of the Polytechnic Institute, poured the destructive acids on those plates, they smoked in the righteous annihilation. And yet a great deal of the bad literature of the day is not gripped of the law. It is strewn in your parlors; it is in your libraries. Some of your children read it at night after they have retired, the gas-burner swung as near as possible to their pillow.

Much of this literature goes under the title of

SCIENTIFIC INFORMATION.

A book-agent with one of these infernal books, glossed over with scientific nomenclature, went into an hotel and sold in one day a hundred copies, and sold them all to women! It is appalling that men and women who can get, through their family physician, all the useful information they may need, and without any contamination, should wade chin deep through such accursed literature under the plea of getting useful knowledge, and that printing-presses, hoping to be called decent, lend themselves to this infamy. Fathers and mothers, be not deceived by the title "medical works." Nine tenths of those books come hot from the lost world, though they may have on them the names of the publishing houses of New York and Philadelphia.

Then, there is all the

of the day flung over the land by the million. No one—mark this—no one systematically reads the average novelette of this day and keeps either integrity or virtue. The most of these novelettes are written by broken-down literary men for small compensation, on the principle that, having failed in literature elevated and pure, they hope to succeed in the tainted and the nasty. Oh, this is a wide gate of hell! Every panel is made out of a bad book or newspaper. Every hinge is the interjoined type of a corrupt printing-press. Every bolt or lock of that gate is made out of the plate of an unclean pictorial. In other words, there are a million men and women in the United States to-day reading themselves into hell!

When in your own beautiful city a prosperous family fell into ruins through the misdeeds of one of its members, the amazed mother said to the officer of the law, "Why, I never supposed there was anything wrong. I never thought there could be anything wrong." Then she sat weeping in silence for some time, and said, "Oh, I have got it now! I know, I know! I found in her bureau after she went away a bad book.

THAT'S WHAT SLEW HER!"

These leprous booksellers have gathered up the catalogues of all the male and female seminaries in the United States—catalogues containing the names and the residences of all the students, and circulars of death are sent to every one, without any exception. Can you imagine anything more dreadful? There is not a young person, male or female, or an old person, who has not had offered to him or her a bad book or a bad picture. Scour your house to find out whether there are any of these adders coiled on your parlor centre table, or coiled amid the toilet-set on the dressing-case. I adjure you before the sun goes down to explore your family libraries with an inexorable scrutiny. Remember that one bad book or bad picture may do the work for eternity. I want to arouse all your suspicions about novelettes. I want to put you on the watch against everything that may seem like surreptitious correspondence through the post-office. I want you to understand that impure literature is one of the broadest, highest, mightiest gates of the lost.

II. Gate the second:

THE DISSOLUTE DANCE.

You shall not divert me to the general subject of dancing. Whatever you may think about the parlor dance, or the methodic motion of the body to sounds of music in the family or the social circle, I am not now discussing that question. I want you to unite with me this morning in recognizing the fact that there is a dissolute dance. You know of what I speak. It is seen not only in the low haunts of death, but in elegant mansions. It is the first step to eternal ruin for a great multitude of both sexes.

You know, my friends, what postures and attitudes and figures are suggested of the devil. They who glide into the dissolute dance glide over an inclined plane, and the dance is swifter and swifter, wilder and wilder, until, with the speed of lightning, they whirl off the edges of a decent life into a fiery future. This gate of hell swings across the Axminster of many a fine parlor and across the ball-room of the summer watering-place. You have no right, my brother, my sister—you have no right to take an attitude to the sound of music which would be unbecoming in the absence of music.

III. Gate the third:

INDISCREET APPAREL.

The attire of woman for the last four or five years has been beautiful and graceful beyond anything I have known; but there are those that will always carry that which is right into the extraordinary and indiscreet. I charge Christian women neither by style of dress nor adjustment of apparel to become administrative of evil. Perhaps none else will dare to tell you, so I will tell you that there are multitudes of men who owe their eternal damnation to the boldness of womanly attire.

Show me the fashion-plates of any age between this and the time of Louis the Sixteenth, of France, and Henry the Eighth, of England, and I will tell you the type of morals or immorals of that age or that year. No exception to it. Modest apparel indicates a righteous people. Immodest apparel always indicates a contaminated and depraved society. You wonder that the city of Tyre was destroyed with such a terrible destruction. Have you ever seen

THE FASHION-PLATE OF TYRE?

I will show it to you: "Moreover, the Lord saith, because the daughters of Zion are haughty and walk with stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet, in that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the rings and nose-jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins" (Isaiah 3 : 16–22). That is the fashion-plate of ancient Tyre. And do you wonder that God in His indignation blotted out the city?

IV. Gate the fourth:

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE.

All the scenes of wickedness are under the enchantment of the wine-cup. That is what the waitresses carry on the platter. That is what glows on the table. That is what shines in illuminated gardens. That is what flushes the cheeks of the patrons who come in. That is what staggers the step of the patrons as they go out. Oh, the wine-cup is the pattern of impurity! The officers of the law tell us that nearly all the men who go into the shambles of death go in intoxicated, the mental and the spiritual abolished that the brute may triumph.

Tell me that a young man drinks, and I know the whole story. If he become a captive of the wine-cup, he will become a captive of all other vices, only give him time. No one ever knew drunkenness alone. That is a carrion-crow that and when you see that beak ahead, you may know the other beaks are coming. In other words, the wine-cup unbalances and dethrones one's better judgment, and leaves one the prey of all evil appetites that may choose to alight upon his soul.

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday; we therefore publish a remarkable sermon which he delivered some years ago, and for which inquiries are being made. —Ed.

There is not a place of any kind of sin in the United States to-day that does not find its chief abettor in the chalice of inebriety. There is either a drinking-bar before, or one behind, or one above, or one underneath. The officers of the law have said to me, "These people escape legal penalty because they are all licensed to sell liquor." Then I have said to myself, 'The courts that license the sale of strong drink license gambling-houses, license libertinism, license disease, license death, license all sufferings, all crimes, all despoliations, all disasters, all murders, all woe. It is the courts and the Legislature that are swinging wide open this grinding, creaky, stupendous gate of the lost."

But you say, "You have described these gates of hell and shown us how they swing in to allow the entrance of the doomed. Will you not, please, before you get through the sermon, tell us how these gates may swing out to allow the escape of the penitent?" I reply, but

VERY FEW ESCAPE.

Of the thousand that go in, nine hundred and ninety-nine perish. Suppose one of these wanderers should knock at your door, would you admit her? Suppose you knew where she came from, would you ask her to sit down at your dining-table? Would you ask her to become the governess of your children? Would you introduce her among your own acquaintance? Would you take the responsibility of pulling on the outside of the gate of hell while she pushed on the inside of that gate trying to get out? You would not—not one of a thousand of you that would dare to do it. You write beautiful poetry over her sorrows and weep over her misfortunes, but give her practical help you never will. There is not one person out of a thousand that will—there is not one out of five thousand that has come so near the heart of the Lord Jesus Christ as to dare to help one of these fallen souls.

But you say, "Are there no

WAYS OF ESCAPE

for the poor wanderers?" Oh, yes; three or four. The one way is the sewing-girl's garret, dingy, cold, hunger-blasted. But you say, "Is there no other way for her to escape?" Oh, yes. Another way is the street that leads to the East River, at midnight, the end of the city dock, the moon shining down on the water making it look so smooth she wonders if it is deep enough. It is. No boatman near enough to hear the plunge. No watchman near enough to pick her out before she sinks the third time. No other way? Yes. By the curve of the Hudson River Railroad, at the point where the engineer of the lightning express train cannot see a hundred yards ahead to the form that lies across the track. He may whistle "down brakes," but not soon enough to disappoint the one who seeks her death.

But you say, "Isn't God good, and won't He forgive?" Yes; but man will not, woman will not, society will not. The Church of God says it will, but it will not.

OUR WORK,

then, must be prevention rather than cure. Standing here telling this story to-day, it is not so much in the hope that I will persuade one who has dashed down a thousand feet over the rocks to crawl up again into life and light, but it is to alarm those who are coming too near the edges. Have you ever listened to hear the lamentation that rings up from those far depths?

"Once I was pure as the snow, but I fell,
Fell like a snowflake, from heaven to hell;
Fell, to be trampled as filth of the street,
Fell, to be scoffed at, and spit on, and beat.
Pleading, and cursing, and begging to die,
Selling my soul to whoever would buy;
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread,
Hating the living and fearing the dead."

But you say, "What can be the practical use of this sermon?" I say, much, every way. Those gates of hell are to be prostrated just as certainly as God and the Bible are true, but it will not be done until Christian men and women, quitting their prudery and squeamishness in this matter, rally the whole Christian sentiment of the church and assail these great evils of society. The Bible utters its denunciation in this direction again and again, and yet the piety of the day is such a namby-pamby sort of thing that you cannot even quote Scripture without making somebody restless. As long as this reigns in the Church of God, sin will laugh you to scorn. I do not know but that before the Church wakes up matters will get worse and worse, and that there will have to be one lamb sacrificed from each of the most carefully guarded folds, and the wave of uncleanness dash to the spire of the village church and the top of the cathedral pillar.

Prophets and patriarchs, and apostles and evangelists, and Christ Himself have thundered against these sins as against no other, and yet there are those who think we ought to take, when we speak of these subjects, a tone apologetic. I put my foot on all the conventional rhetoric on this subject, and I tell you plainly that unless you give up that sin your doom is sealed, and world without end you will be chased by the anathemas of an incensed God. I rally you under the cheerful prophecy of the text; I rally you to

of hell. We want in this besieging host no soft sentimentalists, but men who are willing to give and take hard knocks. The gates of Ghaza were carried off; the gates of Thebes were battered down; the gates of Babylon were destroyed, and the gates of hell are going to be prostrated.

The Christianized printing-press will be rolled up as the chief battering-ram. Then there will be a long list of aroused pulpits, which shall be assailing fortresses, and God's red-hot truth shall be the flying ammunition of the contest; and the sappers and the miners will lay the train under these foundations of sin, and at just the right time God, who leads on the fray, will cry, "Down with the gates!" and the explosion beneath will be answered by all the trumpets of God on high celebrating universal victory.

But there may be in this house one wanderer that would like to have a kind word calling homeward, and I cannot sit down until I have uttered that word. I have told you that society has no mercy. Did I hint, at an earlier point in this subject, that God will have mercy upon any wanderer who would like to come back to the heart of infinite love?

A COLD CHRISTMAS NIGHT

in a farm-house. Father comes in from the barn, knocks the snow from his shoes, and sits down by the fire. The mother sits at the stand, knitting. She says to him, "Do you remember it is the anniversary to-night?" The father is angered. He never wants any allusion to the fact that one had gone away, and the mere suggestion that it was the anniversary of that sad event made him quite rough, although the tears ran down his cheeks. The old house-dog, that had played with the wanderer when she was a child, comes up and puts his head on the old man's knee, but he roughly repulses the dog. He wants nothing to remind him of the anniversary day.

A cold winter night in a city church. It is Christmas night. They have been decorating the sanctuary.

A LOST WANDERER

of the street, with thin shawl about her, attracted by the warmth and light, comes in and sits near the door. The minister of religion is preaching of Him who was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, and the poor soul by the door said, "Why, that must mean me; 'mercy for the chief of sinners; bruised for our iniquities; wounded for our transgressions.'"

The music that night in the sanctuary brought back the old hymn which she used to sing when with father and mother she worshipped God in the village church. The service over, the minister went down the aisle. She said to him, "Were those words for me? 'Wounded for our transgressions.' Was that for me?" The man of God understood her not. He knew not how to comfort a shipwrecked soul, and he passed on and he passed out. The poor wanderer followed into the street.

"What are you doing here, Meg?" said the police. "What are you doing here to-night?" "Oh," she replied, "I was in to warm myself;" and then the rattling cough came, and she held to the railing until the paroxysm was over. She passed on down the street, falling from exhaustion; recovering herself again, until after a while she reached the outskirts of the city, and passed on into the country road. It seemed so familiar; she kept on the road, and she saw in the distance

A LIGHT IN THE WINDOW.

Ah! that light had been gleaming there every night since she went away. On that country road she passed until she came to the garden gate. She opened it and passed up the path where she played in childhood. She came to the steps and looked in at the fire on the hearth. Then she put her fingers to the latch. Oh, if that door had been locked she would have perished on the threshold, for she was near to death! But that door had not been locked since the time she went away. She pushed open the door. She went in and lay down on the hearth by the fire. The old house-dog growled as he saw her enter, but there was something in the voice he recognized, and he frisked about her until he almost pushed her down in his joy.

In the morning the mother came down, and she saw a bundle of rags on the hearth; but when the face was uplifted, she knew it, and it was no more old Meg of the street. Throwing her arms around the returned prodigal, she cried, "Oh, Maggie!" The child threw her arms around her mother's neck, and said, "Oh, mother!" and while they were embraced a rugged form towered above them. It was the father. The severity all gone out of his face, he stooped and took her up tenderly and carried her to mother's room, and laid her down on mother's bed, for she was dying. Then the lost one, looking up into her mother's face, said, "'Wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities!' Mother, do you think that means me?" "Oh, yes, my darling," said the mother. "If mother is so glad to get you back, don't you think God is glad to get you back?"

And there she lay dying, and all their dreams and all their prayers were filled with the words, "Wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities," until, just before the moment of her departure, her face lighted up, showing the pardon of God had dropped upon her soul. And there she slept away on the bosom of a pardoning Jesus. So the Lord took back one whom the world rejected.

An Irish Nationalist's Defence of Moody and Sankey.—The late Mr. Sullivan, the editor of the Irish Nation and a prominent Land Leaguer, paid a remarkable tribute to Messrs. Moody and Sankey, which he would not have been likely to pay to preachers of any other nationality. When they first visited Dublin a plot was formed to attack them. Mr. Sullivan heard of it, and, although himself a sincere Roman Catholic, he wrote a paragraph in the Nation, saying that it would be a disgrace to Ireland if these men, seeking to do good to the people, were exposed to insult and injury. He said that if such an attempt were made the assailants must pass over his body. He went to the place of meeting with full purpose to make good his offer of defence. But the paragraph in the Nation had been widely circulated, and the ruffians shrunk from the attack.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

By John R. Caldwell.*

Waiting for a Living Person—The Hour of Triumph—Not Death, but Resurrection, the Hope—The Resurrection not a Process—A Real Meeting Again—Certain Recognition.

The attitude enjoined upon us is to be "waiting," "watching," "hasting," "looking for" the Lord! Not merely for deliverance from foes, or for rest from toil and warfare, or for entrance into an inheritance, but for a living Person—for a known and trusted Friend—for Him whose love, stronger than death, was set upon us while yet we were alienated and enemies in our mind, who, having loved His own, loves them to the end, Jesus the same yesterday, to-day, and forever—the chiefest among ten thousand, the altogether lovely! To see Him as He is, to be like Him, to be with Him, to worship Him, to walk with Him, to serve Him, to hold unbroken communion with Him, to be the friends with whom He shall take sweet counsel, the partakers of His glory, the sharers of His dominion, forever and ever to be in the full enjoyment of what now is indeed true, but so feebly apprehended—"One Spirit" with the Lord, "members of the body of Christ."

BLESSED HOPE!

Let it once take hold of the heart, and surely as God hath spoken it, the result will follow—"He that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." But it has also pleased God to gather around this hour of expectation, as into an ineffable focus, every circumstance of joy and triumph of which the heart can conceive, every satisfaction for which it can yearn. He has withdrawn from it every terror, and circled it with a halo of grace and glory, so bright, so sweet, that indeed the only marvel is that it should ever fade from the vision.

And surely of the accompanying circumstances, the first in importance as well as order is the resurrection of the dead in Christ. "By one man sin entered, and death by sin" (Rom. 5 : 12). Everything within us by nature recoils from death and clings to life. "The wages of sin is death," and great as are the alleviations introduced by the gospel, so great that death is said to be abolished, and life and immortality brought to light, still it remains, the last enemy—an enemy though vanquished—the last humiliation that sin and Satan can bring to bear upon the redeemed, a monster instinctively abhorred, though robbed of its sting.

There has been a tendency in many minds to view death rather as a friend setting free the imprisoned soul; and one would not willingly deny any measure of truth there may be in this. Grace has indeed provided for those who fall asleep in Jesus. Little is said in the Word about the state or experience of the spirit separate from the body, but enough is said to hush every murmur and calm every doubt. It is to be absent from the body, and at home with the Lord; to exchange faith for sight, to rest from labor and suffering, to be with Christ, which is "far better." And such terms are very far from implying a state of unconsciousness, as some have said; rather do they convey ideas of unspeakable enjoyment in the conscious and visible presence of the Lord Jesus. Yet nothing is said concerning the disembodied spirit of activities in service or of glory; these, so far as we know from Scripture, are postponed to the hour of resurrection.

Resurrection is the prospect constantly held out to the believer, since Christ became the first-fruits of them that slept. The Spirit has labored to give abundant detail by many figures and illustrations of this victory of the Lord. Then and not till then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory." It is only in prospect of that hour that faith can sing, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

The salvation for which we wait, the redemption for which we groan, is not death, but resurrection. Death may, indeed, be our deliverance from a body of sin, but it is not the triumph of Christ; and the heart in sympathy with His thoughts and desires will long for the hour of His victory being completed, when of all that the Father hath given Him, it will be manifest that he has lost nothing—not even a hair of the head of one of His saints being left in the enemy's hand as a trophy (John 6 : 39; Luke 21 : 18).

It is not for us to know the times and the seasons (Acts 1 : 7), nor does it appear that any warning will be given of this resurrection hour. The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and summon from their graves "the dead in Christ."

The corruptible shall put on incorruption, by

but in answer to the voice of the Son of God. Often has the question been repeated, "How are the dead raised, and with what body do they come?" The divine answer is doubtless as plain as such a mystery could be made to our feeble understanding. "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain; but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him, and to every seed His own body." (1 Cor. 15 : 37, 38). That there is a connection between that which is sown and that which is raised is evident, for it is in their graves they shall hear, and from their graves they shall rise; but the nature and extent of that connection is a mystery at which reason has ever stumbled, but concerning which faith has no questions to ask. Suffice it that He who cannot lie has said it shall be done.

As for the rest of the dead, they rise not again till the thousand years be finished (Rev. 20 : 5). "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning" (Ps. 49 : 14). In due time they too shall rise, not in "the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14 : 14), not "unto the resurrection of life" (John 5 : 29), not as part of the "first resurrection," for blessed and holy is he that hath part in it; but "unto the resurrection of damnation," "unto shame and everlasting contempt," to stand for judgment, according to their works, before the great white throne, and to find their portion in the lake of fire, the second death. What a prospect!

Many are the religions and systems of theology that Satan has proposed to his deluded subjects, but none of them ever dared to enter the chamber of death with a ray of hope so bright as that which the gospel reveals. It is comfort indeed, real substantial comfort, that is offered to the sorrowing child of God. God has not said, Go thy way, be warmed, be fed, without giving what is needed. If He would comfort the heart of a sorrowing sister, He says, "Thy brother shall rise again;" and now to His mourning people it is, "Them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." The separation is but for a little while, there will be —an eternal reunion of the redeemed—a gathering unto Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life."

A REAL MEETING AGAIN

That Satan should so far have worked upon the credulity of the people of God, as to raise a doubt as to the mutual recognition of the saints in resurrection, is truly a marvel; but it is ever the enemy's way to spoil us of the comfort and blessing that are for us in the Word. Were Moses and Elias not recognizable on the mount of transfiguration? Is Paul not to know his children in the faith when he says, "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming" (1 Thess. 2 : 19)? Is the comfort of 1 Thess. 4 : 18, that a multitude of unknown persons shall be associated with us in the hour of His coming again? Shall we sit down in the kingdom with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and shall we not know them? Surely this is to wrest the Scripture, and abstract from the prospect the very sweetness and comfort it is intended to convey.

True, they will be "changed," and such a change! that which was sown in weakness shall be raised in power; that which was sown in corruption shall be raised in incorruption; that which was sown in dishonor shall be raised in glory; that which was sown a natural body shall be raised a spiritual body. Such was the transfiguration that passed upon the Lord Jesus (corruption excepted), between the hour when John beheld Him bleeding on the cross, and the day that he saw Him resplendent in heavenly glory, and fell at His feet as dead. How could John recognize Him as the same, or feel at home in the presence of such majesty? Yet it is here that He tenderly laid His right hand upon His prostrate servant, and assured him of His being the very same who was dead! It is enough. John's recognition of the Lord is as complete in Patmos as it was when, on the lake of Galilee, he said, "It is the Lord."

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS.

The Christmas number of the Book-Buyer is an unusually bright and elegant issue. The publishers have rendered it an excellent guide to purchasers of Christmas books by inserting, not only extracts from the books of the season, but beautifully executed illustrations as specimens of those contained in the volumes noticed. Its frontispiece is a full-page engraving of Ernest Hébert's picture, La Vièrge de la Délivrance, specially cut for this number. Fifty-seven pages of notes and reviews of the books of the season and an alphabetical list of publications make up a fund of information of value to all who have the good sense to give books as Christmas presents to their friends. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Price, 10 cents.

The Common-Sense Household Calendar forms a beautiful decoration for the wall, and should be useful to young housekeepers not too self-confident to accept advice. The card to which the calendar-pad is affixed bears a picture of "Marion Harland" in her library, and each daily slip contains an extract from the works of that popular writer. Issued by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons. Price, $1.

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT

for November and December, edited by Rev. Dr. Deems, contains at least three articles probably not surpassed in current periodical literature. Professor Noah K. Davis, of the University of Virginia, gives a closely reasoned paper on the question, "Am I Free?" Professor Willis J. Beecher, of Auburn Theological Seminary, writes a most scholarly article on "Historical vs. Critical Evidence." Those two were among the lectures delivered last summer before the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, at Richfield Springs. The editor reproduces Michael Faraday's admirable lecture on "Education," for which we thank him. It is difficult to obtain, and worth preserving. Another paper has a statement of the "Views of Certain Scientists," which is very timely and interesting. Every Christian minister should read Christian Thought. It would be a good Christmas present to your pastor, and although it would cost you only $2, it would be highly appreciated by him, and give him pleasure and profit for a whole year.

THE CHEMISTRY OF CREATION, by Robert Ellis, F.L.S., M.R.C.S., published by Messrs. Pott, Young & Co., New York, price, $1.20, is a new and revised edition of a work prepared for the London Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. It is a sketch of the chief chemical and physical phenomena of earth, air, and ocean, giving, in simple language, as free as possible from technical scientific terms, an explanation of the latest discoveries. Its object is thus admirably stated in the preface; "It is designed to be a companion of the lover of nature, to assist him to trace in the varied phenomena of creation the plan and action of Him who is perfect in knowledge and excellent in working."

INFIDEL OBJECTIONS

to the Scriptures Considered and Refuted, by the Rev. F. B. Whitmore, B.A., is the title of a work published by Messrs. Thomas Nelson & Sons. This book is written specially for young men who are liable to be assailed by infidels and sceptics, and the author endeavors not only to furnish them with a brief and concise proof of the truth of the Bible for their own satisfaction, but also with the means of dealing with the objections generally raised by infidels. Those objections are, as a rule, very plausible, and are often put so convincingly that the young believer is liable to be staggered by their apparent force. Mr. Whitmore shows them their inherent falsity and how to test such arguments so as to discover the weakness and contradiction underlying them. In these days, when the disciples of Ingersoll are to be found everywhere, a parent cannot place in his boy's hand a better protection for his faith. It shows him that his creed is reasonable, and teaches him how to defend it against the assaults of the enemy.

THE OLD-FASHIONED FAIRY BOOK,

by Mrs. Burton Harrison, published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, price, $2, will be the delight of every nursery in which it may be placed. Older and graver people may call these stories nonsense, but few frown upon them after they have watched the light in the tiny little faces turned so eagerly toward one who is reading them aloud for the general benefit. It is strange how they have appeared in every land and in all ages, and how their memory clings to us long after more serious matters have engrossed our attention. Mrs. Harrison has been exceedingly careful in the preparation of the stories, with the view of avoiding the evil, and inculcating moral lessons that will tend to strengthen the better dispositions of the little folks.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN,

by William O. Stoddard, published by Messrs. Fords, Howard & Hulbert, is a large volume of 508 pages, written by one who had exceptional opportunities of knowing well the subject of his biographical labors. The history of that terrible time of national trial has been written again and again, but generally the story has been one of battles and marches and life in the field. Mr. Stoddard takes a standpoint different from his predecessors. He was in President Lincoln's cabinet during those four sad years, and was brought into close and constant contact with the man on whom rested responsibilities such as never before were concentrated on one individual. How he acted, how he felt, what he desired and hoped for, Mr. Stoddard tells us in this book from his own personal knowledge. Lincoln as a man is the subject of his work, and he draws the portrait very faithfully, presenting in singular detail and with numerous anecdotes the personal characteristics of the President. There is less of eulogy in the book than one might expect in the writing of so intimate a friend. It is easy to see how deeply Mr. Stoddard respected and loved Mr. Lincoln; but his aim appears to have been not to surround him with a halo of false glory, but to paint his portrait faithfully, and to place him in the estimation of the people on a pedestal from which he cannot be taken down. Admitting his faults and his deficiencies, concealing no defect, but giving him credit for those high qualities which he knew him to possess, Mr. Stoddard's work, we venture to predict, will be read by all who desire to form an impartial estimate of the man and of the great national ordeal.

THE CREOLES OF LOUISIANA,

by George W. Cable, published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, price, $3.50, is a timely publication, now that New Orleans is the centre of public attention. Mr. Cable's romances have been widely read, and in them the Creoles play the most prominent part. He always writes charmingly, and shows a rare power of reproducing quaint forms of expression and painting character sketches. In this volume he leaves the sphere of romance, and writes sober history; but the history is as delightful as his romances. The history of New Orleans he sketches from the time of its founders, and it would be difficult to find a subject so full of quaint and curious incidents. The question is often asked, "Who are the Creoles?" and that question Mr. Cable answers at the outset. He then proceeds to the narration of the history of the city, with its many and strange vicissitudes, dwelling with delight on its picturesque episodes, which he describes with refinement as well as vigor. The volume abounds with excellent illustrations.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Idolatrous Business Man.—The Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson, speaking at a recent meeting on the great need every Christian has to pray against setting up an earthly idol in their heart, said: "I have heard of a man who, when he was asked which church he attended, replied: 'Oh, I love my business so well that I just go down and have a look through my premises every Sunday!' This man simply preferred his business to God. He was making an idol of it, and God hath said, 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me.'"

A Father's Prayer for his Son.—The Rev. Mr. Green relates: "There was a good man, an elder, in the north, who had a son. He was very anxious that his son should be brought to the Lord, and prayed almost continually for him. He did not live to see his conversion, but nevertheless he believed that the Lord would change his heart in His own good time and way. It was not until the grass was growing over the old man's grave that the Lord answered his prayer, and now that son is a bright shining light for the Lord. Oh, friends, take encouragement from this, for God will hear and answer earnest, faithful prayer offered in the name of Christ! A prayer presented in faith will go up like incense before His throne."

A Faithful Apprentice.—"When the late John Angell James was sent to Birmingham as an apprentice, he shared a room in his employer's house along with some other young men. When retiring to rest the first night he knelt down in the presence of his companions, and committed himself to the Lord's keeping. Such a thing had never been done in their presence before, and, with much shouting and laughter, they pelted him with boots, slippers, and other articles. But he went bravely on, unheeding their scoffs and jests, and in course of time God made him instrumental in leading all those companions to Christ; and we all know what a power for good as a minister of the Gospel he became in Birmingham."

"Dear Father, Come Home!"—"Five Years ago I was walking along one of the streets of our city, when I noticed a man with a little girl going into a rum-shop. I could see that she was pleading with her father to come home; but he was not paying much attention to her appeal, and was about to enter when I went between him and the door, and taking him by the arm asked him to go home, for I saw that he was the worse for drink already. At first he refused to go; but on my telling him I would accompany him he yielded to my urging. When we reached his home his wife was waiting anxiously for his return. It was one little room, with scarcely anything in it. The man was earning good wages, and might have had a comfortable, happy home; he had a loving wife and two little children, whom God had given him to take care of, and this was the way he was fulfilling his trust. He sacrificed home, wife, and children that he might gratify his passion for strong drink. It was Saturday, and the little girl had been sent out by her mother at two o'clock to bring her father home. For six hours that child had faithfully followed her father's footsteps, pleading with him to come home. The next day being Sunday, I took him to our mission hall, and there Jesus met and blessed him. He signed the pledge before leaving the meeting, and he has kept true to it ever since. His wife and children are now comfortable and happy, and he himself is a faithful worker for the Lord Jesus Christ."

Running Away from a Song.—A Christian gentleman narrates the following: "I remember the case of a young man who, when he gave himself up to the Lord, said: 'I am afraid my companions will not give me much peace.' The night following, when he left an evangelistic meeting, his companions were all waiting for him, and, whenever he made his appearance, they gathered around him, 'to try and laugh him out of it,' as they said. Walking into the middle of the road, with his companions closely following him, he began to sing, 'We will never mind the scoffs or the frowns of the world, for we've all got a cross to bear.' Before he had finished the verse he was alone; they had all taken flight from fear that the passers-by might think they were listening at an open-air meeting. The young soldier of the cross was now left to go home in peace, and God has since used him in leading many sinners to Christ. If we are faithful to Christ He will never leave us."

A Cowardly Harvestman.—A Laboring Man, soon after confessing Christ and joining a church, in a rural district, had occasion to leave his home for a few weeks to obtain work during harvest in an adjoining county. On returning home, he was congratulated by his fellow-Christians, who expressed their hope that he had been able to stand firm to his profession of Christ and the opposition and persecution to which they justly concluded he must have been subjected by the ungodly workmen with whom he had been compelled to labor. "Oh, no," he replied, "I had no persecution at all, for though I was working with them for five weeks, they never found me out." "So much the worse for you," they replied, "for if your light had shone before them, and you had borne a witness for Christ, they certainly would have found you out." There is ground for fear that this is the case with many professing Christians. The reason why they have no opposition from the world is because their light is under a bushel; hence they do not get "found out."

A Pleading Daughter.—Mrs. Vans, a Well-known Christian worker, relates: "I remember hearing of a man very much addicted to strong drink; he lived in a large house, with every comfort around him. He soon ruined himself, and one article after another of his household furniture was sold or pawned that he might indulge his craving for strong drink. This man had a little girl who loved Jesus very much. Every day before going to school she laid a little Testament on the table that her father might see it, and prayed God to touch her father's heart. One day his employer told him that he could not remain in his service any longer. Very, very miserable and down-hearted he went home. His little girl, quick to observe the slightest change in him, asked him what was the matter, and on hearing the cause of his grief, kneeling by his side and taking his hand in her little one, she said: 'O father, be sober, be sober!' 'It is of no use. I have tried again and again,' he said. He gently put his daughter from him, telling her to run away to school again. She obeyed at once with tears streaming down her cheeks, but before she went she laid out the little Testament as usual. On her way to school she prayed that her father would see his wickedness and that He would bring him to Himself. When she had gone her father felt that something, he knew not what, compelled him to lift and open that little book. He read a part of it, and then asked God to forgive his sins, and help him, for Jesus' sake. He soon got back to his nice house, and bit by bit his furniture."

per annum, payable in advance.

A Favor would be Conferred on the Manager and office-staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if subscribers whose terms expire at the end of the year would so far oblige them as to remit their renewals at once, instead of waiting for the new year. During the first few weeks of January there is always a very heavy influx of letters, which, in spite of special arrangements to deal with them, involves liability to mistake in making up the new lists. It would therefore be a convenience, facilitating the work and reducing the chances of delay and disappointment, if such of our subscribers as can conveniently do so would send in their subscriptions now. Those who send a new name with their own, as many are doing, are doubly welcome.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Decrease in the Tide of Immigration continues. The returns of arrivals in the month of November, issued last week, shows that there arrived in the principal customs districts of the United States 32,509 passengers, of whom 26,037 were immigrants, 4044 citizens of the United States, and 2428 aliens not intending to remain in the United States. The number of immigrants that arrived during the month of November, 1883, was 35,393. The number of immigrants that arrived during the eleven months ended November 30th, 1884, was 440, 361, as against 536,430 that arrived during the same period of last year. It is estimated on the basis that, apart from immigration, the population increases at the rate of two per cent every year that the present population of the United States is 57,680,300.

The New Treaty with Spain was Published last week. Its provisions have given rise to a feeling of disappointment, and its ratification by Congress is now considered doubtful. The remission of the duties on sugar from Cuba and Porto Rico will involve a loss to the Treasury of over twenty million dollars, which, it appears probable, would benefit the islands at the expense of our own citizens. The concessions made by Spain are not considered an equivalent, as wheat and flour exported from the United States will still be subject to heavy duties amounting to nearly three fourths of their value. Present indications are that unless further privileges are granted to American exporters, the treaty will not be ratified.

The Treaty with Nicaragua and the Project of a canal, which the treaty is intended to develop, is exciting the opposition of France as well as England. The French press protests against it on the ground of its affecting the interests of the canal M. De Lesseps is now constructing accross the Isthmus. The argument of the leading French holders of De Lesseps bonds is that the United States stood by and entered no protest when the work began at Panama, and undertook no plan of its own; that this apparent acquiescence on the part of the United States misled the great numbers who mainly for this reason invested in Panama bonds. They therefore claim that their own government should not stand still and see a numerous class of its citizens impoverished without making vigorous protest, even up to the point of interference. The English opposition is based on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which our Government considers obsolete.

The Gravity of the Present Condition of the workingmen forms the subject of editorial comment in all the daily newspapers. The New York Herald, which is not an alarmist journal, says: "A spirit of unrest is abroad among those who depend upon their daily labor for their bread, not only in the United States, but also in European nations. It is impossible to estimate closely how much labor is now without employment in this country; but if the iron and textile industries may be taken as standards, at least one half of the labor of the country employed in manufactures is idle, and a large proportion of the remainder is earning greatly reduced wages when compared with returns in former years. Agricultural labor is affected in a much less degree, but even there the effects of depression are felt. The Hocking Valley miners and the Norwalk hatters are only special and aggravated indications of a general condition; but the sober sense of these men will, we trust, keep them from riot and bloodshed."

The Prohibitionists of New Jersey Met in Conference at Trenton on December 11th, to decide on the future course of the party in that State. A letter of congratulation was read from Mr. St. John. It was decided to raise by subscription, a fund of $5,000, to be called the Prohibition pioneer fund. Resolutions were adopted, declaring the destructions of the liquor traffic has become a political issue of the greatest importance, affirming the necessity of continuing the Prohibition party, expressing confidence in St. John and gratitude for his efforts in the past, congratulating all persons, especially those in New Jersey, who voted the Prohibition ticket in November, indorsing the efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the submission of a Constitutional amendment relating to prohibition, and the securing of legislation providing for the scientific instruction of public school pupils as to the injuries the human system sustains through the use of alcohol, and calling upon Congress to restrict the importation of liquors.

The Law and Order League will Hold its annual meeting in New York on February 22d, 1885. All State and local leagues are requested to send delegates, the object being to secure a better enforcement of the laws for the restriction of the liquor traffic. It is desired to make February 22d a law and order day throughout the country. The local arrangements are placed in the hands of a committee composed of the Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby, the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott and Mr. Robert Graham. The executive committee has issued an address requesting ministers throughout the country to address their congregations on Washington's Birthday on the subject of a better enforcement of the restrictions placed by law on the liquor traffic, and "to unite with their people in prayer to Almighty God that the curse of drunkenness may be removed from the land."

Another Dynamite Explosion Startled London on Saturday last. About half past five o'clock in the evening a loud report was heard from the direction of London Bridge. There was immense excitement for a time, and the wildest reports were in circulation. Persons who were on the bridge at the time say that they heard a loud report and observed two flashes of light. Many panes of glass were broken in the buildings on both sides of the river for a long distance above and below the scene of the explosion. The latest account shows that the explosive missile was thrown from the bridge into the Thames, and that on striking the water it burst into flame, after which a loud explosion occurred. The explosion was heard ten miles outside of London. The only damage done, as far as can be ascertained, is the destruction of glass worth about $250 in the windows in the warehouses near the river; a number of lamp-posts twisted into fantastic shapes, and a few travellers knocked over. One pedestrian, who was probably nearest to the explosion, is said to have been slightly bruised by being violently thrown against the stone parapet of the bridge. Police experts estimate that, while the damage done was slight, at least fifty pounds of dynamite must have been used to cause an explosion so great as to smash windows on both sides of the river and put out gaslights for a space of at least a quarter of a mile.

A More Conciliatory Policy toward Ireland appears to have been adopted by the British Government. The new Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Campbell Bannerman, who succeeded Mr. Trevelyan two months ago, made a remarkable speech at Stirling on December 12th. Its significance is increased by the fact that this speech is his first public utterance of moment since his assumption of office. The secretary openly advocated a more liberal form of government for Ireland. He said that the great mistake made by the English in their treatment of Ireland lay in the fact that their policy was too obviously one of "benevolent condescension." The Irish, he contended, being a proud and sensitive people, resent this attitude of patronage, whereas if they were given the laws and institutions which their needs require, and to which the country is peculiarly adapted, they would become as loyal as the Scotch. It is thought that the new Secretary would not have spoken so emphatically if he had not previously received assurances of support from his colleagues.

The German Colonization Movement is Officially described in a book issued by the government. It is regarded as a rebuff, if not a menace, to England. The English press, Conservative and Liberal, comments upon it unfavorably. The St. James Gazette says that on the 4th of February, 1883, Prince Bismarck asked Lord Granville whether the British Foreign Office would protect German traders in Anglo-African settlements. Eighteen months afterward England begged German protection for Englishmen in Africa. The article concludes as follows: "So closes for the present the ignominious chapter of our colonial history. The rebuff, although galling to our pride, prejudicial to our prestige, and fatal to many of our interests, is thoroughly well deserved. The German Chancellor has treated us with frankness and even with forbearance. Everything which we have to deplore is due to Lord Granville's procrastination and indecision, which are now chronic." The Liberal journals are scarcely less emphatic in condemning the policy of the government.

The French Operations in Madagascar have been made the subject of inquiry in the Chambers. Admiral Galiber, for a long time French commander in Madagascar, in his deposition said that England had tried to bring about an understanding between France and the Hovas, but had failed, because the English residents in Madagascar, who were independent Methodists, refused to be influenced even by England, being permeated with the traditional English hatred of France. The Hovas, he said, would accept a French protectorate were it not for English influence. Ten thousand men, in his opinion, would suffice for an expedition to Antananarivo, the capital, but he did not counsel an expedition. The bad faith of the Hovas, he said, had rendered negotiations with them out of the question. The policy he approved was to occupy the important points on the coast with French troops and so convince the Hovas that the French were resolved to uphold their rights (?). If the Hovas saw that they would probably yield. The Methodists have undoubtedly opposed the infamous aggression of the French, knowing that their presence in Madagascar would not conduce to the prosperity of the island.

The Centennial Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was in session last week at Baltimore, Md. It is one hundred years since the Methodist Church was organized as an independent body, and Bishop Asbury, the first American bishop, was consecrated. Independent churches had existed before that date, but without union or organization. This conference is of special interest, because now, for the first time in forty years, about four millions of Methodist church members are represented in one assembly. Members of the church North, and of the church South; African Methodists and Canadian Methodists—nearly all the shades of opinion in the denomination having sent delegates.

The New Home of the Union Theological Seminary in New York was dedicated on December 9th. It is situated on Park Avenue, between Sixty-Ninth and Seventieth streets. The building, with its site, cost about $800,000. The four edifices of which it consists are of Gothic design, made of brick, trimmed with brown stone, and finished in the interior with solid oak and ash. Competent judges have expressed the opinion that few theological seminaries have appointments so complete. The 170 rooms in the dormitory are for the most part single, and are all well lighted and well ventilated. The same is true of the four large lecture rooms, the gymnasium, the library, and the rooms for the professors. The library, consisting of over 50,000 books, and as many pamphlets, is contained in the fire-proof building, to erect which Governor E. D. Morgan gave $50,000, and then set aside an equal amount to insure its permanent maintenance. Besides the gift of the chapel by Mr. Marquand, Morris K. Jesup gave $50,000 to build the lecture hall and D. Willis James contributed $100,000 for the dormitory. The assets of the institution on October 31st were $2,044,255.32.

A Jerry McAuley Mission for Detroit, Mich., was opened in that city on November 26th. It is an undenominational mission, established in a building which was formerly the Jefferson Avenue Methodist Church, and was purchased by Mr. Charles Funke for the mission, as was also the ground on which the church stands, at the corner of St. Aubins Avenue and Sherman Street. A singular incident is connected with the location of the church. Mr. H. O. Wills, one of its few leading projectors, was converted at midnight in an old house where the mission now stands. Mr. Wills takes pleasure in telling how "the Lord spoke to him and raised him up." The mission is to be open every night, and will be conducted on the same principles as the Cremorne Mission of New York; its promoters have made a special study of the late Jerry McAuley's plans. Ministers of all denominations assisted at the dedicatory services. About $500 is still needed to pay for furniture and sundry necessary expenses. Subscriptions toward it may be sent to Mr. H. O. Wills or Mr. Charles Funke, Detroit, Mich.

A School for Christian Workers will be opened at Springfield, Mass., on January 5th, 1885. Its main object is to train young men to be secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations, Sunday-school superintendents, and pastors' helpers in mission work, especially such as have been unable to pursue a collegiate and theological course. The school will supply a systematized course of study of Bible history and the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, with practice in Christian Associations and Sunday-schools and all branches of lay work, together with instruction in vocal music and gymnastics. It is expected that the course will occupy two years, the school year continuing from September to June. The school is to be strictly undenominational, and the students are expected to connect themselves with churches of their respective denominations in the city and to take active part in church work. The new school will have a faculty of six experienced clergymen in Springfield as teachers; and Mr. Moody, who is one of the trustees, is expected to lecture and give Bible-readings. Young men desirous of availing themselves of the facilities of this institution can obtain all necessary information as to expenses, etc., from the secretary, Rev. S. L. Merrill, and any who may be debarred by want of means from entering the school can receive pecuniary aid on presenting satisfactory testimonials of their worth and need.

A Mother's Premonition was Mentioned at an inquest at New Albany, Ind., recently. She stated that, having sent her son, ten years old, on an errand, she distinctly heard him shriek and moan about half an hour after he left the house. Her daughter said that at the time named, her mother called her and bade her go and look for the boy, for she had heard him cry, and was sure he was hurt. Her daughter looked around the house, but could not see the boy, and concluded that her mother had been mistaken. Shortly afterward the mangled body of the boy was brought home. At the very time the mother heard his shriek he had fallen under the wheels of a train of cars more than half a mile away. It was impossible that his scream could have been heard at his home, yet the mother, who could have known nothing of what was occurring, declared that she heard it. Scientists cannot explain the occurrence, nor those of which it is a type; yet they are bold enough to declare the impossibility that prayer, the cry of the agonized soul to its Heavenly Father, can be heard and answered (Luke 18 : 7, 8).

An Ingenious Attempt to Defraud was Detected at the mint recently. On December 10th a package purporting to contain gold grains was delivered there by express from Little Rock, Ark. The general appearance of the grains was much like that daily received, and they also bore successfully the acid test. Subsequently, a careful analysis was made to ascertain what the article really was and of what it was composed. The result was astonishing, revealing an ingenious device for the deception of parties dealing in gold bullion. The grains were found to be nothing more nor less than steel filings, and to give them the appearance of grains of the precious metal they were covered with fine gold, which was made to adhere by the use of a composition of turpentine. The church and the world are often similarly imposed upon. Hypocrites are often able to pick up a coating of cant phrases and wear a sanctimonious appearance, who are really base metal. Though the deception may succeed here, and for a time, ultimate detection is inevitable (Matt. 7 : 22, 23).

A Death through Pride is Reported from Dayton, Ohio. A man arrived in that city some months ago who had formerly been in an excellent position in the State. He sought employment, but for some time without success. He tried his hand at any kind of business where he could find an opportunity, and finally was compelled to shovel gravel to get a crust for his wife and seven children. He worked at this for a few days until one night he was brought home in a wagon unable to walk, yet not a word escaped him. He never left his bed after retiring, and three days later he was dead. An investigation of the affair established the fact that the man had actually starved to death after working until he could no longer stand. The family were without food for nearly two weeks, during which time they subsisted on a few dry crusts divided between the nine members of the family. The father was too proud, however, to make known his wants. His wife tells a horrible story of his death, saying that while he lay dying the children surrounded his couch and sobbed piteously for bread. When she finally sent for a physician the dying father was so far gone that he could not swallow. Not even the next-door neighbors knew that the family were suffering for the want of food. If the man would have humbled himself to ask the proper authorities for assistance, he need not have died. It is seldom that men are too proud to accept help in such an extremity, though in spiritual matters the case is only too common. One of the Christian worker's greatest difficulties is to persuade men who can never earn salvation to accept it as a free gift (Eph. 2 : 8, 9).

A Novel Application to the Police for Information was recently made in Brooklyn, N. Y. A young man requested them to find out who he is. He stated that he had been living for more than twelve years with a family in Massachusetts. He had supposed that he was one of the family, and had always called them respectively his mother and father, brothers and sisters. A few days before making his application to the police he had quarrelled bitterly with one of the young ladies, whom he had called his sister, and she taunted him with being a stranger in the family. Not understanding her words, he had asked an explanation of her mother, who told him he was not her son, but had been adopted when an infant. She did not know who were his mother and father, but believed that he had been stolen from a home in Brooklyn by wicked persons, with whom he had remained until she pitied him and adopted him. The police promptly commenced a search of their record of lost children in the hope of discovering his parents, whom he is naturally anxious to find. Whether he is successful or not, he will, it may be hoped, be directed to his Father in Heaven, who gives power to all who believe on Jesus to become sons of God (John 1 : 12).

The Treasured Tribute of a Monarch has been magnificently preserved by the desire of Mrs. Garfield. The Queen of England, on the occasion of President Garfield's funeral, sent a beautiful wreath to be laid on the casket containing his remains. Mrs. Garfield desired to preserve it as a memento, and it has been done for her by Englishmen in this country. The large wreath of calla lilies, preserved in wax, is enclosed in a heavy frame of English oak. The wood is taken from a tree that stood for 360 years and was cut down by the British at the battle of Waterloo to build a bridge. The frame is artistically engraved with oak leaves, except across the lower border, where roses are intertwined with hollyhocks. At the top of the frame are engraved a sword, a shield, and a Bible surmounted by the Garter. On the right is the United States coat of arms, and on the left is the British coat of arms. Below is a gold plate bearing the words the Queen wrote to the family of the late President. Many wreaths of flowers were sent at the same time, from other persons, but these are thus treasured and honored, and the words accompanying them preserved, because they came from a royal person. It is not so that the King of kings finds His gifts received. The world rejected His greatest Gift, and slights His word (Rom. 6 : 23).

A Claimant of Millions was Buried at the town's expense two weeks ago in Connecticut. His father was a ship owner who had four of his vessels seized and confiscated in a West Indian port during the wars of the coalition of European nations against Napoleon, early in this century. He inherited his father's spoliation claim, and devoted himself to prosecuting it. At the time of his death the principal and interest amounted to more than three million dollars He applied to every President from Van Buren to Arthur, to the leading officials at Washington, and induced several Congressmen to interest themselves in the affair, but without avail. The long-continued struggle beggared him, and the last eighteen years of his life were passed in the poorhouse, from which he kept up a continuous correspondence. It is remarkable that on the very day he was buried the U. S. Senate passed the bill referring the case to the Court of Claims. Had he lived but a few days longer he would have seen his long-deferred hope on the way to realization. It may be hoped that the disappointed old man, who died lamenting that he could not get justice in this world, had not neglected to claim the mercy of God offered to all who seek it, and that in the next world he received the inheritance reserved for the followers of Christ (1 Peter 1 : 4).

THE LION AND THE BEAR: TROPHIES HUNG UP.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear: and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. David said moreover, The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine."—1 Sam. 17: 36, 37.

David's Hallowed Life—His Reasoning—No Desire for Glory—Why he was Confident—How to be Davids—The Confidence of David—I. Grounded on Experience—The Experience to be Met—And Used—II. Comprised the Human and Divine—Two Lines of Rails—III. The Prominence of the Human—IV. Emphasis on the Divine—V. Relying on God's Immutability—VI. Confidence in the Sufficiency of God's Help.

David had lived with God. Throughout many a solitary day he had kept his father's flock among the lone hills of Judah, and had worshipped the Unseen but Ever-present Lord. He had grown into an adoring familiarity with the Most High, so that to him the name of the one only living and true God was a deep and solemn joy. As you may have spied far up among the ramparts of the mountains a solitary lake, whose one office it is to mirror the face of heaven, so had become the reflection of the light and glory of the Lord of hosts.

When David finds himself in the camp, and when he hears Goliath of Gath pouring forth his blasphemies against Jehovah, and defying Jehovah's people, he has no thought of having been mistaken in his former lofty adoration, he entertains no notion of adopting a lower style; but he inwardly burns with indignation against the infamous reviler. An insult against God cannot be allowed. This abominable blasphemer must be silenced. Somebody must put him down, and so dispose of him that none shall ever dare again to do the like. David inquires whether somebody or other is not going to batter the brazen champion. If any man in the camp will meet this huge man-mountain, David will not stand in his way; he is not so covetous of glory as to deprive a more deserving person of these huge materials for renown. But it is imperative that some hand should silence that hillock of proud flesh. It is driven in upon David's devout heart that this blasphemous mouth must be shut, and God's name and God's people must be clear of such a brutal enemy.

About the stilling of this enemy and avenger, David has no inquiry to make. It is going to be done, done soon, and done without any particular display. When he kept his sheep, and the lion came, David did not raise the question whether he could kill the lion; he killed him, and then the question was settled. When the bear came, and was about to rob him of one of his lambs, he did not say to himself, "Have I a call to kill that bear?" Not he; but he killed him, and then to do it. He feels within him at this moment, "If nobody else will deal with this Philistine difficulty, I must do so; for I cannot live and see God opposed." And so, yielding to the diviner impulses by which the truly great are led, David puts himself forward to stand in single combat with an enormous giant.

Observe a stripling set over against a son of Anak; but when you have made the observation, be sure to note that the stripling by no means asks your sympathy, or appeals to your pity. It sometimes happens that a tremor will come over a man when he feels that he has stepped out of the ranks, and come forward without any call from his fellow-men—when he feels that he has taken up Jehovah's quarrel, and constituted himself the champion of the Most High. If he is not quite sure about his commission, and if he is not quite sure that God is with him, he will soon repent his own temerity, and make an ignominious retreat. In David's case there is no flush of excitement, no fierce light of eyes lit up with a semi-madness. Evidently he is quite at home, and has the entire business well in hand.

He tells us why he is so bravely venturesome. It is well worth our while to see what made David so strong and confident; for, if it has never occurred to us hitherto, it may yet occur that we shall be called out to do some deed of daring for the Lord. Come, let us learn should a voice call us from among the sheepfolds. I wish that young men here would aspire to brave lives for the God of Israel. I would that for truth, and goodness, and the eternal glory, they would be ready to rise to the measure of their destined hour. Why should we all be mean men? Is there not room for a few downright devoted beings, who will lift their hand unto the Lord, and never go back? If self-sacrifice is wanted, let us make it. If some one is needed for a heathen land, or to bear testimony for truth in this almost apostate nation, let us cry, "Here am I! Send me!" God's David will not hang back through cowardly fear or dread of consequences, but will take up his place as God shall help him, and say, like Martin Luther, "I can do no other; so help me, O my God."

We shall see what made David so calm and self-possessed as to venture where nobody else would venture, and take up the gauntlet and dare to be the champion of the living God. O souls that dwell apart, and wear each one a lone star upon his brow, here are kindred flames for you!

Notice

THE CONFIDENCE OF DAVID.

He does not go to this battle with any kind of hesitation, calculation, or question of fear, but he is quite sure of the result, and proceeds about it with a quiet reserve of force. One would have thought that he himself was a colossal presence, and that the person to be assailed was some pigmy, for he talks with such calm assurance—"Let no man's heart fail him. Thy servant will fight with this uncircumcised Philistine." It would have been fearful brag if it had not been simple matter of fact.

I. The confidence of David, in the first place, was grounded upon his own personal experience. Beloved, if you would display strong confidence in God, firm, calm, steady, you must look in large measure to the experience you have had of the goodness and faithfulness of God. The Lord in mercy often keeps young beginners from those severe and heavy trials which befall the more advanced, because to them this fountain of strength—namely, a profound personal experience—is not yet accessible, except in rare instances. The young have not as yet obtained much experience of the things of God; but those who have been led onward in the divine life a certain distance have tried and proved the promises, and the promise-keeping power and faithfulness of God, and they can draw from this well with the highest results.

But, beloved, I would have you remember that experience does not come to people if they sit quite still. When David was young in years he was old in experience, because he had watched the hand of the Lord in its dealings with him. He had not been an idler among the hills, but a worshipper, a worker, a student, a practical, living man of God. You must go and if that experience is to bring you riches in both its hands. I mean this, David's experience was that God delivered him out of the jaw of the lion, but he went and fought that lion; by his own dauntless valor he took the lamb out of his mouth, and he laid hold upon his jaws, and rent him in pieces. David went forth to meet that experience. And the bear—that came to David, certainly; but then he did not sit still and watch the bear, and let it come and roar, and ravin, and then retreat as it liked; but he struggled with that bear, and he slew him, and thus he gained his experience by the active discharge of his duty as a shepherd. He did what he was called upon to do with holy daring, and in so doing he learned the faithfulness of God. Many men have lions and bears, but no experience. Be alive, and get something out of all that happens around you.

You younger Christian men and women, I do pray you be faithful to your God; and put your trust in Him. Try to do in your earliest days brave things, because in this manner you will be gaining and storing up an experience which in after days to attempt yet more for God. I long to see a better race than the present, and how shall that be prepared but among the brave and loyal-hearted youth of to-day? Do you not know the way in which God rewards His faithful servants here on earth? He does it usually by enabling them to do in the future something more than they have done before. You have fought in that battle. Take this as your reward—you shall fight again to-morrow. You have achieved a second victory? Take this as your guerdon—you shall be led to a still sterner fight. Oh, you who have frowned down the face of death, and have bearded destruction in its own den, you shall lead a second forlorn hope, and pluck victory from the bloody brows of battle. You shall be among the choice warriors of the King, first in every fray. Some, perhaps, may think this a small reward, but this shows that their hearts are not yet raised into the lordlier chivalry, nor sworn into the innermost love of the great King. When the heart is wholly given up to Christ, our one desire is that we may glorify Him.

Therefore, I would have you take care and

and kill your bears, that you may store up your experiences, and be able to kill your Philistines. If David had not killed the first lion and bear, he would not have been able to meet any other ferocious creatures. There is any quantity of them about; but no one but brave David had specially cultivated their acquaintance; I say there is plenty of the raw material of experience about, only people do not go in for it. These evil creatures are up and down, all over the place, lions of one kind and bears of another, tearing or roaring, howling or hugging, drawing down or tossing up—in every way trying to destroy us; and if you be a born hunter, you shall have ages of experience within the next twelve months. Take care that you do it. Do not become constant idlers, and then talk about Christian experience.

Oh, for true, deep, rich experience! Some of you need it badly enough. What kind of experience will some professors have when they come to be sixty or seventy years of age? They never labored in the Sunday-school to teach a child, never stood up to preach Christ, never penetrated a lodging-house, nor entered a midnight-meeting to try and find out a wanderer for Jesus. These have no experience; they are hollow as drums. They have done nothing; their spiritual life has been a blank. If a sharp trial should come to them, upon what experience could they fall back? They are soldiers who have never smelt powder! Warriors who faint at the sight of blood! How shall they win eternal victory, who till this hour have taken their ease, and declined the labor and the danger of the war?

I charge you, therefore, my beloved brethren and sisters, who know the Lord, be up and in earnest to slay your lions and your bears, that you may learn how to kill your Philistines—that is to say, serve God with all your heart, and patiently bear the cross for His name's sake, so that when the time shall come for you to stand as a lone man for Christ, you may do it gloriously, and may bring honor to your divine leader.

II. You will notice, secondly, that in his confidence there is a blending of the human with the divine. Observe; "Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear, and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them." That is the human. "David said moreover, The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." That is the divine side of it. In God's word the car of truth runs on two rails of parallel statement. A great many people want to pull up one of the rails. They will not accept two sets of truth. "Predestination and free agency do not agree," so the modern Solomons assert. Who said, "they do not agree?" They do agree as fully as two rails on the tram line; but some narrow spirits must set aside either the one or the other, they cannot accept both. This has long been but in practice it is ease itself. So here the practical action of the believer, throwing his whole might into his Master's service, perfectly well agrees with his falling back upon the working of God, and knowing that it is God that worketh all things for him. David's slaying of the lion and the bear and the Philistine is clear; but God's delivering him out of the jaw of the lion, and the paw of the bear, and the hand of the Philistine, is equally clear. Make it plain to your own self. I believe that, when I preach, I ought to prepare and study my sermon as if its success altogether depended upon me, but that, when I am thus thoroughly furnished, I am to trust in God as much as if I had done nothing at all.

The same view should be taken of your life and of your service for God. Work as if you were to be saved by your works; and then trust Christ only, since it is only by faith in Him that you are capable of a single good work. Work for God with all your might, as if you did it all; but then always remember that "it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure." How is that Philistine to be killed? "By God," says one. True; but not without David. "By David," says another. Yes, but not without God. Put the Lord on the march with David, and you put the Philistines into untimely graves. When David moves to the fight, God being with him, off comes Goliath's head. Nor champions' heads, nor demons' helmets can stand against the man of God. "The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge."

THE HUMAN SIDE.

III. Thirdly, I want you to notice in David's confidence that he had so practically observed the service of the human side that he speaks of it first. Concerning his experience, David says first, "Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear." In fact, he begins not with what God did, but with what he did himself. Hear him: "Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock: and I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth; and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him, and slew him." David speaks of the human side first, because Saul had said to him, "Thou art not able to go against this Philistine." In effect he replied, "Hear what I did, and see whether I am not able to meet the case." Sometimes when the question is asked, "Is this possible?" let the Lord's anointed one say, "Ay, for I have done it myself." In a slothful church—a church that has no faith in God—and there are many such—the question is asked, "Can this be done—done by such poor creatures as we are?" It is not an ill thing if one who has had experience of the Lord's power bears a bold testimony, and says, "This can be done, for in days gone by I did the like."

What is wanted, is to give facts and dates, and get into the region of reality. David put the human into the very forefront. I wish you would remember this when you hear the hooting at our working for the Lord. The lazy-bones of our orthodox churches cry, "God will do His own work;" and then they look out the softest pillow they can find, and put it under their heads, and say, "The eternal purposes will be carried out; God will be glorified." That is all very fine talk, but it can be used with the most mischievous design. You can make opium out of it, which will lull you into a deep and dreadful slumber, and prevent your being of any kind of use at all. God delivers David and Israel, and slays Goliath; but David is also there in full force, and nothing is done without his sling and stone. Every man has his own place to fill. Fill yours. There is something for you to do. By God's grace do it.

THE DIVINE SIDE.

IV. But now again, although David thus speaks of the human first, yet he speaks of the divine most. "No," say you; "he does not speak of the divine most: there are several verses about the human, and we have only one upon the divine." Listen! All the points which David makes concerning the human are about the divine too; for when a man who has faith in God speaks, if he says, "I did this, I did that," it is but another and sometimes a braver way of saying that God did it. It may sometimes be more practically useful to believers to hear of what God did by you than to hear abstractly of what God has done by His own bare arm. It redounds more to God's glory that He has wrought acts of grace by such poor creatures as we are than if He had wrought them by seraphim and cherubim. Not without men doth God aim at His highest glory, or else they would not have been created; but in and by men will the Lord be great to the ends of the earth.

V. Now, I want to go a little farther, and show that David's confidence rested mainly in the immutability of God, the divine Worker. He says: "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." In the divine character there are usual features and ordinary lines of action. God has "ways." He does not behave in one manner to-day, and in another to-morrow, but His tones and methods are fixed. Our we know what to expect from Him, for He has revealed to us "the way of the Lord." All through the Bible you read of God's way. Therefore, when certain events happen we know where they will end. From experience of the past we gather prophecies of the future, and we foretell things to come.

Let me show you a few objects in conjunction, and let us take observations. See! Before my mind's eye there pass a lion and a believing man; God gives that believing man victory over the lion. Study the second picture—a bear and a beliving man; God helps that believing man to get the victory over the bear. God, who is the same to-day as yesterday, will be the same to-morrow. A third picture is before me—a huge giant, and the same beliving man; well, God will give him victory over the Philistine. I am sure of it. It is the way of Him. I want you, my dear brother, to feel that if God has blessed you in the past He will bless you still. You were helped; you can never forget it; you were helped right through. It was in your life, and you were wonderfully carried over it; does not this fact fill you with hope? There came another somewhat different trial, as different from the former trouble as a bear may be from a lion; but you were again helped—very remarkably helped. You have not forgotten it; you cannot forget it, though your hair be gray. Are not such encouragements very many and very sweet? Why, I can furnish my whole house with the bears' skins and lions' skins. We serve an immutable God. We change a thousand times a day, but He changes never. Our pilgrimage leads us along a good old way; our chart and our compass are the same as those of our youth; and the divine consolation, upon which alone we rely, is in every respect unaltered and unalterable. Hear Jehovah speak; "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed."

VI. This leads me to close by observing that David's confidence also proceeded upon his firm conviction that the immutable God being with him, he himself would be sufficient for the present emergency. Now, you see, I bring the man in again, but it is that you may think of God all the more.

WE WANT IMMUTABILITY

applied to ourselves, or we are not comforted. It is a very easy thing to say, "Yes, God is unchangeable;" and then we turn round and say, "God is glorious, but I am such a poor creature." Yes, and you were such a poor creature when you slew the lion; and just such a poor creature when you slew the bear. If you are just such a poor creature still, it is probable that by just such a poor creature God is going to get to Himself one more victory to the glory of His grace.

Does it ever come over you who are getting into years to tremble at times? to tremble involuntarily, with a sore sense of utter nothingness? Your trembling is partly physical weakness, and partly mental weariness; you say, "For what God has helped me to do, to His name be praise!" But you go on to inquire, "Can I continue under so great a pressure? Shall I do this present deed, and bear this present burden which my Lord has laid upon me?" Why, dear friend, of course you will. What you have done before you will do again; and greater things than these will you do. I want you to unite with David in a sense of personal capacity for all the outlying future. Not only say, "The Lord that delivered me will deliver me," but say also, "Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear, and thy servant can slay this Philistine too. Yes, I killed the beasts, and in God's name I will kill the champion."

"Ah, you do not know my trouble, dear sir!" No, my dear friend, and you do not know mine, and I am not going to tell you. It would not comfort you if I told you my distresses; and it certainly would not comfort me if you told me all your ailings and moanings and sighings. I expect that we have each to suffer that could have been appointed us. If any good is to come of the rod, it will be a rod that is handled by the Lord in His own way; not under the direction of our daily folly, but under the guidance of His infinite wisdom and prudence. He knows where each one of us requires to come under discipline. He knows the specific nature of each believer, even as a careful vine-dresser understands the peculiarity of each of his vines. In the season of pruning the Great Husbandman knows which branch wants cutting off. You cry, "Not so, Lord. Here is a branch lower down; if I must be pruned, cut that off." The Lord is going to spare that shoot, for it is a fruit-bearing one; but the other which you like so much would only run to wood, and so He is going to cut it away. Afflictions sent us according to our own desires would not be afflictions, but amusements. The bastinado applied by the culprit himself would not amount to much.

I do not know for whom my message at this hour may be specially meant. It comes to me ruggedly, but with a good deal of impressiveness. I have an inward conviction that there are some who hear it, or may read it, to whom it is sent—children of God who are placed in positions where it is incumbent upon them to stand out, and bear open witness for the truth. There is little doing for the Master; everybody is cowardly and backward. Awake, ye brave! Speak out, speak out, and silence the foe! Like packs of hounds the proud thinkers mouth it against the Lord; but a single fearless voice will quiet the whole kennel of them. Come to the front of the fight, ye that are truly men, and the Lord will be with you. Remember how He has helped you in times past, and let the God of your salvation be your God for ever and ever.

A London Street as it was in the Reign of Elizabeth.

LONDON THREE CENTURIES AGO.

(See Illustration.)

A POPULAR resort for Londoners during the past season was the International Health Exhibition, or, as they familiarly called it, "the Healtheries." Primarily it was intended as a means of practical education in sanitary matters, but the project finally assumed a somewhat extended application of the idea. It took in everything connected with food, clothing and habitation. As one journal said before it was opened, "Visitors will be able to inspect the process by which jams and candles, soaps and hats, soda-water, mustard, and lace are respectively produced from the appropriate materials. What may be called the Ladies' Department will comprise a display of dress such as probably has never yet been collected in any one place before in the history of our planet. Modern male and female habiliments will shine forth in all their natural pre-eminence side by side with the strange attire of our forefathers, even as far back as the early Saxon period. In one portion of the gigantic area set apart for the summer lounge of London, eggs will be ripening into chickens under the fostering care of a patent incubator. There are to be dwellings, sanitary and unsanitary, from Dr. Richardson's ideal mansion, in which the inmates are to sleep in the basement and cook in the attics, to an Esquimaux hut or a farm laborer's cottage, in which the family perform all the functions of existence in an unventilated room ten feet square. There will be schools with benches and gymnasium ingenious enough to charm the habitual truant, and workshops of model completeness. Case after case will be filled with everything good to eat and drink, and a great many articles which come under neither category. Finally, there will be such a melange of amusement, instruction, and novelty as has rarely been witnessed before in any city on the face of the terrestrial globe."

Among the exhibitions in the Dwellings' Department was a reproduction of a street such as existed in London before the great fire of 1666. It was reproduced from old pictures and plans found in the museums, and was the subject of much interest. Our illustration on this page represents a part of the street, and gives an idea of how the city must have looked in the time of Queen Elizabeth and her immediate successors. The narrow thoroughfare and the overhanging upper floors caused visitors to congratulate themselves on the progress made in the building art, and to wonder how their ancestors could have lived in structures so inconvenient. These self-congratulations caused a journalist to suggest grimly that in order to make the picture complete, though less flattering to the present generation, it would be well to reproduce a Whitechapel court, inmates and all, supplied with the open drains, foul air, and all-abounding dirt which made such a locality the favorite home of small-pox and the plague.

AFTER THE CHOLERA AT SPEZIA.

THE good that comes out of evil is beginning to appear in some of the cholera-stricken cities of Italy. Especially in Spezia, where Mr. E. Clarke's mission is located, (a picture of which appeared in this journal on November 17th, 1881,) have there been results which may lead to a blessing for the poor bereaved ones. A Gospel worker, who recently visited the city, writes: "The cholera seems to have awakened a spirit of inquiry into Gospel truth. I found it quite easy to broach the subject of religion to any one, and no difficulty in the way of conversation with private individuals in Genoa, where I gave away a number of Testaments, after having had a talk' and called attention to some of the chief verses.

"The citizens of Spezia have behaved nobly. The mayor was away when the plague broke out. He came back, and personally attented to the sick, hand to hand with the two evangelical ministers. The mayor, Sig. Raffaelo de Nobile, was a stanch Catholic, but in that hour of calamity religious walls fell down. He took the cholera, and died in a few hours. One of the aldermen was at once elected in his place, and he has worked with the same zeal as his predecessor.

"Spezia is blessed with two great workers—Mr. Philipini and Mr. Clarke. Each has about six hundred children in their day schools. These have been closed by the authorities, on account of cholera, but re-open next week. The present mayor has handed over any orphans of Catholic parents that Mr. Clarke and Mr. Philipini would adopt. Mr. Clarke has taken twelve, and has placed them among the families of believers. Mr. Philipini, who has a wife and two children, has taken six into his own house. The priests in the place are rampant, but now helpless. Mr. Philipini has daily to refuse more scholars, for want of room and means. He has taken the six orphans on his own responsibility, and is going to trust to Jesus for means to support them, having only his small pay. With twelve hundred in evangelical schools, Spezia's future looks brighter than that of any other Italian city."

AMOS RILEY'S REFUGE.

CLINK! Clink! Clink-a-clink! The clatter of the hammer on the anvil in Amos Riley's smithy sounded cheerily, and the sparks flew around under the sturdy blows. The passer-by thought the spectacle one suggestive of honest industry and cheerful contentment. A glance at the blacksmith's face, however, was not confirmatory of the suggestion. It was an honest, intelligent face, expressive of determination and firmness, which possibly on occasion and in a wrong cause might deserve to be called obstinacy. But to-day, as the man brings his hammer down with the full force of his muscular strength, there is more anger and sullen resentment in his look than any other expression. He has little to say to his help, who moves warily about the shop, careful that no negligence or clumsiness on his part shall give his employer an opportunity of finding fault. It is stormy weather in the shop, and the man is not anxious to be the one to "draw the lightning."

PRAYER.
"All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing ye shall receive." — Matt. xxi. 22.
"Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full"—John xvi. 24.
Genesis xxiv.
Matt. vi.

Amos Riley Directed.

Three hours ago Amos Riley went to the bank to pay in some money he received yesterday, and found, to his amazement, the doors closed, and a paper fixed thereon, announcing that the directors, for causes explained, had found it necessary to suspend. Riley was not the man to stand staring with the crowd beginning to gather at the doors and the ominous notice thereon. There were many there ready to pity him, and abuse the bank managers, but he wanted no pity. It was not his way to talk or listen to others talking in the presence of a great calamity. He felt a great lump in his throat, and there was a spark of fire in his eye as he turned away, but he spoke no word, and went quietly back to his shop and set himself to work. He was dazed, and scarcely knew what work he was doing; but he went about it mechanically, and with no lack of his usual dexterity. If anything had gone wrong, he would have stormed and raved with anger out of all proportion to the annoyance, and would have felt relieved by explosion. But all went smoothly, and there was no excuse the most exacting boss could make, for complaint. So he worked on in gloomy silence, the fierce blows of the hammer he wielded, alone showing the strong passion working within.

He was not disturbed without reason. Nearly a thousand dollars of his were in that bank. It was all he had saved since he began to work for himself, two years ago. In a few days it was to have been paid to the builder who was putting up a snug little cottage for him, and Amos would have had the satisfaction of living under his own roof. Any man might be excused feeling badly at seeing the whole fruit of two years' labor swept away, especially when the payment promised next week could not be met. No wonder Amos was gloomy.

The steam-whistle of the factory sounded, and Amos, flinging down his hammer in acknowledgment that dinner-time had come, shut the door of his shop and went home. He had no appetite, but he would eat his dinner as usual, or his wife would want to know what was the matter, and he could not bear to talk yet, even to her, of his misfortune. She was a godly woman, while Amos made no profession of religion; but she was not blessed with much sense, having a tendency to utter dull platitudes in times of trouble, and to upbraid Amos with his godlessness at unsuitable seasons. She had, however, done one wise thing; she had let the New Testament speak.

Amos went, as usual, to the wash-stand to remove from his hands the honest dirt of his trade before sitting down to his dinner. Right before him, hanging from a roller, were a few sheets of paper on which were printed scripture texts. His wife had seen them in a religious book-store, and expended a few cents in the purchase. As he washed his hands, Amos read, "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive;" and again, "Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." His wife stood close behind him as he read, watching him anxiously. Amos was conscious of her presence, but he paid no heed to it. The words of promise and encouragement were falling with soothing effect on his perturbed spirit.

It was not often that he bent his knees in prayer. Now he began to think it might have been better for him if he had prayed more. It was not too late to begin, and in the presence of his trouble, and of his embarrassment about his engagement next week, there was need enough. He dried his hands, and went into his bedroom, shutting the door after him, in a way that warned his wife against intrusion. There he bowed his head in prayer. He never remembered what it was he prayed for, but it seemed to him as if he carried his burden of misery and his anxiety into the presence of God, and left it there. He said but little during his meal, though he was, his wife thought, kinder to her than usual. Then he went back to his work, relieved, but depressed still.

The unfinished cottage must be sold, he told the builder that night. The money was gone, and it might be years before he could save another thousand dollars.

"Don't you be foolish, Amos," was the reply. "I'll let you off that payment next week. I got paid yesterday for two houses I finished last week, and I'm pretty flush just now. I can give you a few months, and likely enough you'll get more than you think out of the bank."

That was a relief, for Amos could not endure to lose the cottage about which he had thought so much, and he thanked his friend heartily. That night he prayed again, and, somehow, words of thankfulness mingled with his prayer. Of course, he thought the builder's indulgence was not an answer to his prayer, because it was due to his having received money that was paid before he took his trouble to God, but his burden was relieved, and he was thankful.

The next morning he turned eagerly to his newspaper to see the account of the bank failure. It was hopeful. The bank was surely solvent, but unwise management had produced a deficiency of ready money. A few months in which to realize the securities, and all depositors would be paid in full. Amos went to his room and prayed again. He did not think his prayers had been answered, because they could have had no influence on past events; but, somehow, he felt thankful, and as he had made God his confidant in his trouble, he went to Him with his thankfulness.

From that time forward Amos was a man of prayer. He did not philosophize about how prayer could be answered, but he knew by experience that there was no better way of meeting trouble than to take it to God. He began to pray for spiritual blessings, and as he prayed in faith he received them, as all do who so pray. He read his Bible, and gained more light, until, one happy day, he realized almost by a flash that he was a Christian man, for was he not walking daily with God, trusting Christ for salvation, and trying to live in the light of Christ's teaching, loving Him and worshipping Him with all his heart? The new house, when Amos moved into it, having the builder's receipt in his pocket, was consecrated by prayer, which from that day forward was regularly offered morning and evening.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

On the Track.

Carl and Robert went down to John Morley's house with Grant, when he called to pay Rose his professional visit. While he prepared her gently for the excitement of seeing Carl, the latter accompanied Robert through every other part of the house. Madame was with them, and availed herself of the opportunity to give her tongue play. Her son, she told them, had had an access of his malady since last night, and had taken an unusually strong dose of opium, the effects of which had not worked off. His attic was unoccupied, and there was now no trace of work in it. Hester's seat was still in its place in the broad dormer window; but it was covered with dust, as was also the binding-press. A press-pin lay in one corner, as if it had been flung there hastily; it was rusty, but when Carl stooped to pick it up, a singular revulsion, possible to a sensitive temperament like his, caused him to shrink from touching it. His face was white when he turned away, and he hastened to quit the work-room.

Down-stairs the old Frenchwoman had cleaned and put everything into a cold desolate order, altogether unlike the warm living displacement and disarrangement of a house which has inmates. Carl looked about him with a chill sense of disquiet and disappointment. He felt that he should gain no hint of Hester from these rooms, empty, swept, and garnished. It had been a superstition—one of those superstitions which are apt to follow closely in the track of a passionate love; and though he half laughed at himself, he gave it up with reluctance.

By the time they had gone through all the deserted rooms, Rose was ready to receive Carl. He found her calm almost to apathy, until, as if she suddenly recollected why she had wished to see him, she began to speak about her child. Then Carl, who had been warned by Grant to avert from her as far as possible any extreme agitation, judged it to be best to tell her the whole truth at once.

"She is here, in Little Aston," he said, in a tone of singular sweetness, which soothed her feverish disquietude; "my sister Annie has charge of her, and I am come from her this morning to you. If you will only control yourself, there is no reason why she should not come here to see you."

"At Little Aston!" murmured Rose; "here, close to me! Oh, how good you are! My little Hetty! I hunger and thirst to see her. Sometimes I am not quite sure which little Hetty it is. Are you sure, quite sure, that I have been a very sinful woman, and that I am not a silly, giddy girl like I used to be? Which am I, Carl?"

He was silent, looking at her with grave, pitiful eyes; and Rose turned her face away from him. "I know," she said with a sigh; "yet I think the sinful woman is nearer to God than the giddy girl was. Will you let Hetty come to me to-day?"

"She shall certainly come," answered Carl, gently; "but I must tell you something about her. The world would be very cold and cruel for your little girl."

"Oh, I know!" she cried. "My darling! my poor darling! And it is I who have done it! And I can do nothing to take away that shame. Oh, what shall I do? Carl, is there any help for a wrong like this?"

"Yes," he said; "God can repair this wrong. He is about to do it. But there is only one way by which a wrong like this can be set right. The world would be too cold and cruel for her, and He is about to take her out of the world."

"She is going to die!" said Rose, quietly, closing her weary eyes, and leaning back against the pillows which supported her. She lay quite still and silent for some minutes, and a few tears stole slowly down her cheeks. Then she spoke again, eagerly.

"She must come here at once, my poor little darling!" she said. "Nobody could tend her and love her as I will. She is my own, Carl. See, I will have the little bed Hester used to sleep in put up in the drawing-room. It is a large room, and the sun shines upon it most of the day. It used to be such a pleasant room! I am quite strong enough to nurse my own child, though I am going to die too, not very long hence. Oh, how good God is! How He puts things right! And you are good to me, too, dear Carl. What should I have done without you? What would have become of me and my poor little Hetty? O Carl, Carl, how very good you are to me!"

She broke into vehement sobs, though she tried to smile, while she caressed his hand with her own, and would have raised it to her lips.

"Hush!" said Carl; "hush! You must not excite yourself. Hester shall come."

"The poor child!" said Rose, softly to herself. "Oh, nobody knows what her life has been! I am glad she is going home to God. Why, I only saw her twice till she was six years old; and since then I could count the days she has been with me. That is not like other children, who are always with their mother; and nobody can love a child as its own mother does. My love! my darling! I wonder if she is much altered. She was always very small and delicate, and she never had any childish ways about her; but how could she, living always in a school with strangers? Shall I be strong enough to nurse her on my lap, Carl? Will Mr. Grant only let me have her sometimes just for a minute on my own lap? If you will let me lean on your arm, I could show you at once how nice the drawing-room would be for her.

She spoke so urgently that Carl did not know how to refuse her. He raised her from her chair, and put his arm round her to support her, her new deep joy lending her strength. The drawing-room, like the rest of the house, had been put to rights; and, except the faded color of the furniture, there remained no traces of the dust accumulated during the many years it had been closed. The shutters toward the street were not opened, but the window looking upon a little garden admitted the autumn sunshine freely. Rose directed her feeble steps toward it.

"Here," she said, "the bed shall stand, where it is bright and pleasant; and the room is large; she can walk about in it well, when she is too ill to go out of doors. O Carl, you don't know how proud and happy I was when I was getting this room ready!"

She spoke in an accent of such poignant anguish, that Carl could scarcely keep back his tears. But this memory of the past was gone from her in an instant; and remembering that there would be much to do to prepare the place for her child to die in, she hurried him away, telling him that he must bring her little Hester there before the night closed.

Robert was waiting for him in John Morley's parlor, still in conversation with Madame Lawson, who seemed unable to part with milord Waldron. She arrested them even at the door, to give utterance to a last speech, which Carl could not understand.

"Be of good heart, milord," she said; "the little one will come back. Ah, how I miss her! She could speak French like a Frenchwoman. She was so sweet, so gentle, so sage! Like a little angel of the good God. There is nobody to talk to me now of Burgundy and my little town Ecquemonville. She would talk to me for hours of monsieur the curé, and monsieur the doctor, and my friend, the widow Limet. She knew the place like what you call a map; for I built it for her one day with books—a big book for the church, and the town-hall, and the house of the mayor, and little books for the smaller houses. Here was the place, and there the market, and yonder the fountain. Oh, the little one knew it very well! She knew all our patois, milord, as if she had been born there. I used to call her my little daughter of Burgundy, and I said to her each day, 'Go, go, my cherished one, my angel; the sun shines there as it shines never in this bad country.' But I have no one to talk to me of Burgundy now."

Robert started, and turned to look at Carl, who was waiting impatiently to get away, and whose careworn face remained blank. The inspiration had come, but not to Carl. It was to Robert that the old Frenchwoman's words gave a clue which appeared likely to lead him to the discovery of the fugitives. If Hester and John Morley had left England, a conclusion which had become almost a conviction with him, what place would they be more likely to choose for concealment than this distant, unknown, yet to Hester, familiar town in Burgundy? If they had been in London, or even in Paris, argued Robert, they could not have failed to see the English papers; and if Carl's numerous advertisements had escaped them, they must have known from the absence of all news concerning any murder at Little Aston, that in some way or other John Morley's crime had missed the ordinary results. He could come to no other conclusion than that they had fled to some region beyond the circulation of any news from England; and the small insignificant town of Ecquemonville would be precisely such a place. It was there Hester would be found. This little town, hidden among the vineyards of Burgundy, busy with its own small interests, with no frequent communication with the rest of the world, and quickly adopting a stranger into its own narrow circle—Hester must be there. The old selfishness—a selfishness which he had been victoriously trampling under his feet for the last three months—rose up again strong and mighty. He would find Hester himself, saying nothing to Carl of this new, faint hope. Hester should owe to him all the help and consolation she could receive in her peculiar position of desolation and distress.

At Grant's door he stopped, declining to go in; for already his heart burned with a passionate desire to be upon the road, at the end of which he expected to find Hester. There was not even a vague hope within him that he should ever win her. He knew that upon the path he had to travel through life there was a point where the cross stood, upon which must be crucified his lost love, his lost hope. But he could not relinquish the sweetness of finding Hester himself alone; it might be the last sweetness and joy he should taste in all his intercourse with her. His love for her, deepened and purified by all these later sorrows, must never seek satisfaction, except the satisfaction to which he had always been a stranger—that of surrendering itself, and consenting to be sacrificed to the happiness of the beloved one. But it was coming gradually to this in Robert's spirit; and with set face and heart he travelled toward the threatening cross, only asking to gather one little flower at its foot.

"I am going away for a day or two, Carl," he said, pressing his hand convulsively; "I shall be back soon. Take care of my little Hetty. She will not miss me now you are here."

He hurried home and wrote a short note to his father, saying that he was going away upon business, for he did not wish to subject himself to any questioning; and with very little other preparation he set out by the first train on his journey to Burgundy.

The man whom he was seeking and whom he had so deeply injured was meanwhile living the life of a child newly liberated from school. John Morley was in the condition of a man who has been dwelling underground for so long a period that he has almost forgotten the glory of the upper world. For him, in his gloomy and abandoned home, there had been no sweet influences of sunshine and breeze, no change of season, no opening of leaf-buds, no soft, starry fall of snow. He had obstinately closed his senses to all the healing agencies of nature, and with almost greater obstinacy he had steeled himself against the tender energy of religion. He had been voluntarily sojourning in "a land of darkness, as darkness itself, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness."

Perhaps the first thing necessary for him was to reawaken his sensibility toward outer influences. Grant had from the first recognized this necessity, and had urged him to take a long walk daily in the beautiful neighborhood surrounding Little Aston. But John Morley had not the moral courage and strength to break out of the dungeon where he was kept by Giant Despair. It was needful that the angels should lay hold upon him and bring him forth, and set him without the gates.

He was free then at last. He had come up from the depths. The wonderful sunshine of Burgundy dazzled him, but he felt its warmth and its light penetrate to the very core of his heart. The great fountain of life sent electric currents through all his numbed veins. He could not think at first—he was too bewildered. It was enough to stand by and look on with newly-opened eyes at the moving panorama surrounding him. Everything was new to him, and removed him by its novelty from the sorrowful memories of his old life.

He scarcely spent an hour in-doors from early in the morning until the last bell rung at ten o'clock, when all the inhabitants of Ecquemonville thought it the right thing to retire peacefully into their own chambers. When he was weary of gazing up into the marvellous blue of the sky, he turned his rapt attention to the vineyards, where the grapes were deepening every day into a more purple tint. In the boulevards of the little town, which was almost deserted by the people, he spent every noontide in the shadow of its green aisle, with the trees growing thickly on each side, and only opening here and there to give a glimpse of the shining waters of the river lapping against their deep-struck roots. As the fierce heat of the sun declined, he would return to the streets, where the inhabitants turned out of their dwellings in the cool of the evening to chatter and gossip, or flirt with all the gayety and light-heartedness of the people of a warm climate.

He was never tired of watching the groups which gathered on the pavements before the doors of the houses, who saluted him as he passed to and fro, with the grace and politeness of their country—a politeness which he acknowledged with a strange smile upon his face. He could not understand a word they said, but this only added to the charm. Was he indeed the same sorrow-stricken man, whose dishonor had been upon every tongue, and who had had to shrink from the glance of every eye? He did not even ask himself this question; he was too full of the novelty of the present moment.

Beside all this, he would come in at meal-times with a wholesome, hearty appetite for the dainties the widow Limet provided for him and Hester. The widow Limet was put upon her mettle. She believed firmly that the English lived solely upon raw beefsteak and strong ale; and now that she had two of these benighted barbarians under her roof, she was fired with an ardent resolution to show them the mysteries and marvels of French cooking. Such friandises, such omelettes, such soups, such gâteaux she placed upon the table, as would have made a gourmand's mouth water. She regretted sorely that it was not the season for the delicate vineyard snails, which were sold for a penny a-piece, even in the economical town of Ecquemonville, that she might have set a ragoût of them before monsieur and mademoiselle. For the honor of their country her neighbors picked out the finest of their fruit for the foreigners, and presented it in lavish profusion.

From his first meal in the morning, consisting of a bowl of rich milk, into which was poured a cupful of the very essence of coffee, with a dainty new-baked roll added to it, to his dinner at seven o'clock, with its four or five courses and generous wines, John Morley was fed upon the choicest of food. Diet makes a marvellous difference in a man's spiritual condition; and Hester, with her wise, observant eyes, learned some lessons in Ecquemonville which she would have failed to gather from the ascetic fare and lenten nutriment of their former mode of life.

GOD'S WORKING.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 28, John 5 : 17, 36; 17 : 4. Golden Text, Phil. 2 : 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

God's Work for Man—In Creation—In Re-creation—God's Workshop—Holiness Produced—The Working Power—To Us-ward—Co-operation by Believing—No Supervision Required—Subjection of All that is Given up—When the Body is Quickened—How Christ Worked—When to Co-operate.

"MY Father worketh hitherto, and I work." God at work! God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, all taking part! What in this vast universe demands and receives the concentrated working of almightiness? Man. God's work in creation was to make man in His image, after His likeness (Gen. 1 : 26, 29); His work in re-creation is to bring man into union with Himself. This is God's undertaking, not man's; this is for God, not man, to bring about. Man can no more conform himself to the image of God than he can create himself, and yet how many there are who work themselves up, discipline themselves, manage themselves, set themselves to certain courses of self-examination, prayer, and Bible study, in order to attain union with Christ! How many set themselves to a course of imitating Him in action, themselves undertaking a transformation which only the life of Christ within can accomplish!

"IT IS GOD WHICH WORKETH."

Where, then, is God's workshop? In us. "It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure;" "His working, which worketh in me mightily" (Col. 1 : 29). "The Word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe" (1 Thess. 2 : 13). Before any child of God conceives the desire, or the possibility, of being conformed to, and united with, Christ, it has become the purpose of God for him, and God reveals it to him that he may co-operate in this great and glorious design. God wants me to be holy, God wants me to be like Himself, God wants me to be one with Him! How unspeakably glorious this is! But more. God undertakes to make me holy, God undertakes to make me like Himself, God undertakes to unite me entirely to Himself! Oh, it is stupendous, and yet true! But this is nothing compared to the glorious truth, God is now at work making me holy, like Himself, one with Him! And yet more, the very power by which He does this is the power which raised Jesus from the dead! Paul prays for the Ephesians "that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him; the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under His feet" (Eph. 1 : 17–22). The which raised Jesus from the dead, when the weight of a world's sin had crushed Him down, is the very power which works in us to make us holy, to make us like Christ, to unite us to Him. That very same exceeding greatness of His power is silently working, hour after hour, on our behalf—working in every incident which happens, utilizing every circumstance to bring about the purposes of God in me. That working of the might of His power is directed against sin in me, against self in me, against sickness in me. It is not a question of what I am, or what I can do, but of what God is and what He can do. God reveals to me a sin not known before to be sin. By what power of mine shall I be wholly and forever delivered from that which my spiritual sensibilities were too dull even to recognize as sin? All my resources fail before the greatness of the task. But the might of the power of Omnipotence! this will suffice; and this is engaged on my behalf.

"But," say some, "I do not see God working in me, I do not find that such results are produced." The exceeding greatness of His power is

"TO US-WARD WHO BELIEVE."

"What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? . . . This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent" (John 6 : 28, 29). Our co-operation with God consists in our believing in His working. Trust the unseen but sure working of God in everything which you really commit to Him by faith; trust Him to work without your superintendence, supervision, or meddling. He is equal to the task He undertakes. "Ye are complete in Him. . . . Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation [or working] of God, who hath raised Him from the dead" (Col. 2 : 10–12). Thus, if we recognize God's working, and trust His working, we learn to cease from our own works, and do only what He directs us to do.

The power which raised Him from the dead raises us out of temptation as we trust to it; the power which set Him at God's right hand sets us on God's side of everything just as we trust the Holy Ghost, who is the active agent carrying out this power. Just as the working of that mighty power set Jesus above all principality and might, so as we trust His working we find Him raising us above the power and might of the devil, above habits of sin, above external and social influences, above the spiritual atmosphere in which we are placed. In Him we are above all, He in us is above all. That power which "put all things under His feet" worketh in us. Let us trust Him, and we shall find all which is subject to Him beneath our feet, we shall be risen with Christ above it, "through faith of the [working] God, who hath raised Him from the dead." This resurrection power

TOUCHES BODY AS WELL AS SOUL.

"If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. 8 : 11). When does the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus dwell in us? Now, if we receive Him. When, then, shall our mortal bodies be quickened by His indwelling? Now, if we have the faith of the working of God. Our loving God does not confine His working to the soul; Jesus said of the man born blind "that the works of God should be made manifest in him. I must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work" (John 9 : 3, 4). And again, "The works which the Father hath given me to finish (confessedly works of healing as well as salvation), the same works that I do bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me." Again, in the book of Job, when God had sent Elihu to declare to Job the way of healing, and to explain His purpose in sickness, we read, "Lo, all these things worketh God oftentimes with man" (Job 33 : 29).

Paul speaks of our being "workers together with Him" (II Cor. 6 : 1); but this can be only by receptivity, as the tool answers to the hand which uses it, as the vessel receives the water which flows into it. We are created to entertain God, to serve the purpose of God, to respond to and correspond with God. It was when our beloved Lord had completed His work of manifesting God, and expressing God in man, that He could say to His Father, "I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do." He, as man, was a worker together with God, receiving both command and power from above; doing nothing of Himself, but all things as one anointed by the Holy Ghost. As His follower, the Apostle Paul also was a worker together with God. He thus expresses it when writing of God's "promise in Christ by the Gospel; whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by

THE EFFECTUAL WORKING OF HIS POWER"

(Eph. 3 : 6, 7). No energy of Paul's, no zeal of his own—nothing but the working of God made him really to be a minister of the Gospel. Even when speaking of the intensity of his work, he said: "I also labor, striving [agonizing] according to His working, which worketh in me mightily" (Col. 1 : 29).

The question will arise, "How, then, am I to insure the working of God in me? And how am I to know when to co-operate with God?" In the first place, let us appreciate God's working. We shall find it is in operation now; "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," both in the present tense; "It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure." While I am writing, while you are reading, God is at work. His delicate hand is guiding, transforming, manipulating, as hour after hour passes by, and circumstance after circumstance arises. We may be as as we are of the motion of the earth or the planets, but steadily and surely it is going on unless we, by attempting to work upon our own souls, hinder the great Workman, by interfering with his tools. How may we further the work? Further Omnipotence? We cannot, except by joyous reception of His blessed hand in loving, restful trust. What can so much inspire our courage as to know that the resources of the God of the universe are at work to make us holy! The affairs of kingdoms, as well as individuals, are made subservient to God's special work of forming and educating a bride for His Son. "Let thy work appear unto thy servants, thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands, establish Thou it" (Ps. 90 : 16, 17).

"WHOM HAVING NOT SEEN, YE LOVE."
(1 PETER, 1 : 8.)

Saviour, my feet have never trod with Thine
The "solitary place,"
My eyes have never seen, in human form,
Thy manifested grace;
My hands have never touched Thy garment's hem,
With faith's unuttered plea,
Nor has Thou tarried, when the day was spent,
And broken bread with me :—

But, Lord, my rescued feet are steadfast set Upon the King's highway,
And though as yet I may not see Thy face,
I follow on each day;
My waiting eyes are unto Thee, dear Lord,
In whom I live and move,
Whose love, believed in, is the fullest joy
That earth or heaven can prove.

The needs-be of Thy ways may not be clear
To my imperfect sight:
Love trusts Thee wholly, where it cannot trace,
And knows that all is right.
It is enough for me by faith to stay
My hidden life on Thee,
And in the secret of Thy covenant
To rest implicitly.

I know that Thou art gone to beautify
A place in Heaven for me,
And when Thou comest to take Thy children home,
I shall be like to Thee.
Then shall I wake, and see Thee eye to eye,
Whom now, unseen, I love;
Faith's darkly visioned glass exchanged at last
For rapturous sight above.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND—Will the 144,000 (Rev., vii., 4, and xiv., 1) of all the tribes of the children of Israel, be the only ones, which body will be changed from mortal to immortality and become like the first-born Jesus (Rom., viii., 29), and dwell here upon earth 1,000 years? Answer—It says in Isai., ii., 19: Many for fear will run into caves and rocks of the earth—these their bodies will become immortal at the end of the seventh thousand years (called the millennium); their glory will be like Enoch and Elijah, inferior to the glory of the 144,000 families (man and wife counted as one)—Enoch and Elijah being two witnesses of the immortality of the mortal body.—Gen., v., 24; II., Kings, ii., 11. We live in the time that all these living under the sun will walk with the second child (Eccles., iv., 15); this second child being the Comforter, Holy Ghost, which the Lord promised to send, to teach, prepare, and afterward to dwell in them (John, xiv., 16, 17, 26; I. Corin., vi., 19). Books (two kinds) containing this doctrine will be sent, by mail, for 12 cents each. Address J. WIELE, 143 North Sixth Street, Brooklyn N. Y. The Late CAPTAIN WILLIAM T. BATE, the Christian Seaman—Scenes in his Life.

THE LATE CAPTAIN WILLIAM BATE, R.N.,

The Intrepid Christian Naval Commander.

Preparation for Professional Life—Five Years on the Coast of Africa—Among the Breakers at the Island of Ascension—A Dive among Sharks—His Conversion—Wounded at Canton—Conducts a Perilous Survey—A Prayer Inscribed on a Beam—Seized with Small-Pox at Hong-Kong — Chased by Pirates — Two Chinese Women Saved from Drowning—Bombardment of Canton—Heroic Tour of Inspection—Heads a Storming Party—His Death—Eulogium by the Bishop of Hong-Kong.

THE favorite accusation made against religion by its opponents is that it renders the Christian weak and effeminate, sapping the elements of manliness in his nature. The falsity of the charge has been often demonstrated, and never more conspicuously than in our Civil War, when the bravest officers and soldiers on both sides were men of eminent Christian character. A brilliant example to the same purpose is furnished by the life, recently published, of an officer in the British navy, whose portrait appears on the preceding page.

William Bate was born in London, about the year 1820. His father and mother were God-fearing people, who sought to lead their son to Christ from his childhood. He lost his mother by death when he was only eight years old. After receiving an ordinary elementary education, as he was destined for a sea-life, William was sent to the Royal Naval College, attended at that time by some sixty or seventy naval cadets. "During his two years' residence there," says an intimate friend, "he was remarkable for the exuberance of his animal spirits, and was always among the foremost in all active boys' sports, and in practical jokes played off upon the dockyard shipwrights or other mechanics." He was equally energetic in his studies, as is testified by another friend, who writes: "Whatever he undertook he threw his whole heart into it—he was a whole man to it for the time. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, with his energy of character, he should have been a leader in fun and in mischief; indeed he was more than once on the point of being expelled."

ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.

His first home afloat was the flag-ship of the rear-admiral; and his destination was the coast of Africa and the Cape. Five years the young "mid" spent on that station, his generous, frank, unselfish temperament marking "Billy Bate" out as the general favorite on all of the four ships to which he was successively appointed.

A brave, fearless boy, he oftentimes faced dangers before which less resolute spirits would have quailed. An eye-witness mentions one occasion on which, with four seamen, he ventured in a sea unusually high even for that coast, notorious for its high seas, to row from the ship to the shore. (See frontispiece.) He says: "We observed a boat coming from the Admiral's ship, and making for the land. Who could be the daring adventurer, thus to tempt the perils of the deep? A glass was instantly in request; and, with no little anxiety, we watched the progress of the boat, tossed by the foaming, raging waves, as they threatened each moment to overwhelm her. Happily she reached the shore in safety; and who should be the first to land but our joyous young friend, William Bate, who thus eclipsed his previous feats of recklessness."

Another incident occurred in those waters which still further proved the dauntless spirit of the young man. One day his ship was cruising in the Bight of Benin; and, as she swept along at eight knots an hour, suddenly a shout was heard, "A man overboard!" The place was known to be infested by sharks; and, just before, some had been seen prowling about the ship. A paleness gathered on some faces, as the man was seen struggling in the waves; but, in a few moments, Bate was in the waves at his side, holding him up while a boat was lowered for his rescue. He succeeded in keeping him above water until the boat reached them, when both, nearly exhausted, were rescued.

HIS CONVERSION.

The death of his beloved father, in 1840, when William was about twenty years of age, was blessed by the Holy Spirit to his conversion, and he at once took his stand for Christ as his Saviour, a step demanding more courage when made on board ship than in almost any other place that could be named. The step, however, was made, and it had its influence on others, some of whom, though believers, had not openly acknowledged Christ, and others who were not yet converted, but who, mainly through his efforts, were brought to the Saviour. He was then acting as mate of the Blenheim, a line-of-battle ship of seventy-four guns. In the fore-cockpit of this vessel was a little cabin, dark and narrow and out of the way, in which for eight months a small knot of gunroom-officers gathered night after night to pray together and to study the Scriptures.

BLUE-JACKETS' HEIGHT.

An occasion erelong arose to test the sincerity of his Christian faith and hope. England was at war with China, and the Blenheim had been lying some weeks off Canton, when one morning all hands were ordered to "prepare to assault the town." It is situated on a plain, which is swept on two sides by the river, and in the rear are several hills, the highest of which is called White Cloud Mountain. On the hills were forts occupied by Tartar soldiers, whose guns commanded the town. The command was given to take the forts. The sailors, led by Bate, landed; and, running at the double-quick, they were soon scaling the heights. Bate was among the first to reach the first fort; and, just as he had reached the summit, he was struck below the chin by a ball. Instantly his chest was covered with blood, and it was thought the wonnd was mortal. But the gallant fellow pushed on, pistol in hand; and the next moment his pistol was struck by another ball, which cut it in two. After a sharp struggle the British force gained possession of the forts, since known as the "Blue-jackets' Height." Bate afterward remarked, when his valor was mentioned, that in the battle his faith supported him. He said: "I knew in whom I believed, and was sure that if I fell I should be received into heaven."

A SURVEY IN CHINA WATERS.

His gallantry on that occasion was rewarded by promotion to a lieutenancy; and, in a few months afterward he was raised to the rank of commander. His first duty in that capacity was to conduct a survey in the China waters. At once he proceeded overland, and took the command of the Royalist, the vessel destined for this service. The survey was one of peculiar danger, owing to the treacherous character of the coast, the dilapidated state of the Royalist, and the inefficiency of the crew. It was, however, ably executed to the satisfaction of the government.

A PRAYER INSCRIBED ON A BEAM.

A few months after the completion of the survey Bate went to Hong-Kong for repairs, and met an intimate friend, Captain Collinson, who was there in the Enterprise, on his way to the Arctic Seas. "I had the pleasure on that occasion," Captain Collinson says, "of spending six weeks with him. We sailed for Behring's Straits on the 1st of April, and he accompanied me outside the harbor some distance. A few days afterward, happening to look up, I found something written on the beam overhead in the cabin. On examination, I deciphered it thus: 'Numb. 6 : 24–26; April 1st, 1851. W. T. B.'* I need not say that the inscription remained intact. And, four years afterward, I had the gratification of showing it to him at Sheerness, and of telling him that his prayer had been heard."

SEIZED WITH SMALL-POX.

In the spring of 1852, as the Royalist lay off Hong-Kong undergoing repairs, the small-pox broke out on board, to the great consternation of the ship's company. The first seized was the clerk; and, to prevent the infection spreading among the crew, the captain actually had him removed into his own cabin! He had scarcely recovered, when Bate himself caught the disease, and desired to be taken on shore to hospital. "The men," says an eye-witness, "were most of them in tears as our beloved Commander was put into the boat; for he had every appearance of having it severely." To their great joy their forebodings were not realized. In a few weeks Captain Bate was well enough to return to his duties.

Scarcely had he again reached the scene of his labors, when an incident occurred which he used to regard as one of his most marvellous escapes. One evening the captain and a small party of men were out in the captain's boat, called the gig, and having completed their work were returning to the ship, when they were who had been hidden among the mangrove bushes. All the ammunition had become damp, and the only hope lay in the speed with which they could row. "The seven prahms full of desperate pirates," Captain Bate said afterward, "gained upon us. They were gradually stealing on the wearied crew, and, with fierce shouts and yells, were making sure of their prey, when, most opportunely, the Royalist hove in sight. This caused them to put about; and they were quickly hidden among the islets." And he added, with a peculiar emphasis: "Always live so, in the sight of God, that, when death approaches, you can look Him calmly in the face; then there is nothing to fear."

TWO CHINESE WOMEN SAVED.

Having paid a short visit home, he was again sent to the Canton River, China, upon the duties of his profession. One evening, during a very severe storm of heavy rain, thunder, and lightning, while sitting in his cabin, he heard cries of distress. Immediately he rushed on deck, and a gleam of lightning showed that it proceeded from two Chinese women, whose boat had upset, and who were being carried by the force of the current down the river. Instantly he gave orders for his boat to be lowered, and, himself proceeding to the rescue, succeeded in saving them from a watery grave. His kindness did not end there, but he took the poor creatures to his ship, fed and clothed them, and afterward restored them to their homes. (See frontispiece.)

It was Captain Bate's misfortune to be carried by his duties into scenes of bloodshed from which, as a Christian man, he would naturally have desired to be absent. However, he was not the man to draw back where duty called, and he was determined, as far as in him lay, that his religious profession should not be stained by any imputation of lack of courage. The trouble which he was called upon to redress on behalf of his country arose out of the treachery of the Chinese, who had committed an

OUTRAGE ON THE FLAG.

Early one morning in October, 1856, as a lorcha, bearing the British flag, was lying quietly at anchor off Canton, she was boarded by a Chinese officer and a party of soldiers, who seized twelve of her crew, bound and carried them away, and hauled down the Union Jack. The outrage was promptly brought to the notice of Yeh, the imperial commissioner, by the British consul, who required that the twelve men should be returned by the same officer who had carried them off, that an apology should be made, and an assurance given that the flag should in future be respected. Eventually the twelve prisoners were sent back, but not in the public manner demanded, and all appearance of an apology was refused. It then became necessary, in order that the Chinese might learn that they could not insult foreign powers with impunity, to administer punishment, or no foreign vessel would be safe in Chinese waters. The first step was to seize an imperial junk; but Yeh gave no sign o

* The words are: "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee! The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace!"

yielding. Then two steam-frigates were ordered to Canton, still without any result. And, at last, it was resolved, in order to enforce redress, to seize the defences of the city of Canton, experience of the Chinese character having proved that moderation is considered by the officials only as an evidence of weakness.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

Accordingly, the whole force proceeded toward the city, capturing, on their way, several forts. The Viceroy Yeh still obstinately refusing reparation, a body of marines was landed to seize "Dutch Folly"—a fort with fifty guns, on a small island opposite the city—which was taken; and another body of troops occupied the streets in the rear of the town.

Once more an appeal was made to the Governor, now with the additional demand that all foreigners should have the same free access to the native authorities and to the city as was enjoyed under treaty at the other four ports. Yeh replied by issuing, under his own seal, and by publicly placarding a proclamation offering a reward of thirty dollars for the head of every Englishman. Nothing remained possible then but a bombardment of the town.

A HEROIC TOUR.

Within the old city, surrounded by a high wall, was a large space of ground called the Yamun (or High Commissioner's Compound), and containing his Excellency's residence. Upon this a fire was opened, and steadily kept up, from midday till sunset. The object now was to open a clear passage to the city wall; and all the next day two 32-pounder guns maintained a raking fire, till at length, toward evening, partly through the aid of the conflagration of a large mass of houses in the line of attack, the wall opened to the view.

That night, amid the stillness, an officer went from the ships to the shore to reconnoitre. The Chinese were prowling about in every direction; but the stranger, with his life in his hand, quietly surveyed the position, and returned at daybreak to report "the practicability of a breach." It was Commander Bate who performed this hazardous duty.

THE STORMING OF CANTON.

In the course of the morning a storming party was formed, and Bate volunteered to lead it in person. He put himself at the head of the attacking party, and marched to the walls. He was a pace or two ahead of his men, and as he mounted the breach he snatched a flag from the hands of a Chinaman and waved it with a cheer. (See frontispiece.) In a few moments the whole party was on the parapet in possession of the wall. The parapet bristled with loaded guns; but the "braves" fled—the gate was blown to pieces by a couple of charges of gunpowder—the main body of the assailants entered—and the day was ended by a visit of inspection by the Admiral to "the house and premises of the High Commissioner," the whole force retiring at sunset. The object of the assault, which was to convince Yeh that they had power to enter the city, had been fully accomplished.

THE DEATH OF THE CAPTAIN.

The Chinese, however, still refused to perform the duties to which they had pledged themselves, and it was therefore ordered that a second assault should be made on Canton, and that this time the city should be held until the Chinese gave pledges of good faith. It was on this second attack that Captain Bate was killed. A testimony to his valor and the excellence of his Christian character was given by his superior officer. "Our success," said the Admiral, in his official dispatch, "has been damped by a great calamity, in the death of Captain William Thornton Bate. The sad event has thrown a gloom over the whole force." "Men spoke of him," wrote one of his lieutenants, "with faltering tongues and swimming eyes. The loss was felt—felt by all, by men and officers, by the highest and the lowest." "I was with him," wrote Mr. Wade, the Chinese Secretary, "a minute before he was shot. Every one admits our success dearly purchased at such a cost. No man was more loved and appreciated, from the Admiral down."

"Captain Bate," said the Hong-Kong Register, "as usual, ever forward where duty called, was himself placing the scaling ladders, when he was shot from the wall through the stomach." (See illustration.) "He died as he had lived, a true Christian hero, with the sounds of victory ringing in his ears."

"When I found the Captain was gone," says his coxswain, "the four of us carried him to a fort which we had taken, and laid him down. I remained by him till two in the afternoon, when a party of blue-jackets came from the city to carry him to the landing-place, and a body of marines to guard us. I and my boat's crew had to carry him over hills and valleys; we were all very tired; we got on board that night at eleven; we hoisted him, and then put him down in the cabin."

His noble countenance seemed to beam, even in death, with a certain heavenly halo. "Not a feature," says his lieutenant, "showed sign or symptom of mortal agony; the calm, serene expression seemed an indication of the peace within when his spirit, released from its trammels, had found rest from its labors in the presence of his God and Saviour."

EULOGIUM BY THE BISHOP OF HONG-KONG.

At sunset, on the closing day of 1857, his remains were committed to the grave in the cemetery at Hong-Kong. He was not forty years of age. On the following Sunday, in St. John's Cathedral, the Bishop gave expression to the grief which was weighing on so many hearts. "The loss which we have sustained," he said, "is the loss of no common man. Private intercourse of the most confidential kind, during an intimate acquaintance of more than twelve years, revealed to me in no common measure the excellent qualities of the friend in whose death, not only the service, but the whole foreign community in China, have experienced a heavy calamity. It is a blessed solace, amid the more than ordinary mourning caused by this melancholy event, to be privileged to cherish the confidence of that state of glorious immortality into which our departed friend has entered. He fell in the service of his Queen and country. He has been taken early to his reward. He has received from the King of kings the highest promotion which a glorified spirit can receive. He is now singing the new song in the courts of paradise. He is now with that Saviour whom he long served on earth. He has departed and is with Christ, which is far better."

SCENES IN AN EGYPTIAN MISSION.

A RECENT letter from Miss M. L. Whately, whose portrait and a picture of her mission school in Egypt appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 30th, 1882, gives some interesting details concerning the class of patients and the difficulties of the work connected with the medical mission she has established in that miserable land. The following extracts from her letter will be of interest:

"It is not easy to give a clear idea of the 'dispensary' work here. It is varied, for one thing, in the attendance, more than I should think was the case in any other medical mission, and when our patients happen to be of quite the lowest class, their ways are primitive to a degree that excites a smile even in me, who am so long accustomed to Egyptians; at other times it will chance we have quite a bevy of women robed in black silk, denoting citizens' wives, poor, perhaps, but holding a certain station of respectability, or at any rate of citizenship, as opposed to country peasants, or to 'dwellers in huts,' as the lower class of people are often designated. Then again, another day a troop of negresses come in, and we seem in Soudan for awhile, with the black faces all around us. Among the men, the turbaned laborer, or artisan, is sometimes seated beside a shabby Greek in dirty European garb, or a wretched creature all rags, who leads a nondescript street life.

"No less varied is the work than the people; some days it seems as if a bad spirit was among them, and every attempt at reading is put down, while at others interest is at once excited. I will just give a few specimens from this week's experiences.

"Monday, October 13th. A full room this morning, more women than men, and a whole troop of horribly dirty ragged children, who were improving the shining hour by racing in and out of the reception-rooms, and beating one another when a leg, head, or arm came within reach. Several women, instead of sitting on benches, preferred the stone floor, and sat crouched upon it, each with a baby, except two old granddames, who came on their own account, with no such appendages. Strangely enough, all were new-comers except one little woman of Syrian extraction, whom I dread to see, as she is totally callous and uninterested herself in Scripture, and her baby keeps up a series of tricks, causing her to trot up and down among the patients all the time in spite of my frequent requests that she would sit still.

"Friday. We had a good day to-day. I went in feeling just a little dispirited, having toiled all the week nearly with but little of lively interest even on the best days. I found only three women and a few children, it being yet rather early (and a misty morning makes them late). I began talking about their eyes, and got them interested, and then proposed reading a story about a blind man; first explaining that one born blind was not, like themselves, amenable more or less to doctors' skill, etc. We had a delightful quiet. I read the whole of the ninth of St. John, and to listeners really and heartily interested; they leaned forward to listen, and attended to the simple explanation and application, which, of course, followed, and then one of them got up and kissed my shoulder (a mark of affectionate respect in the East), saying, 'You have told us good to-day; I wish to hear more of this book.'

"The chief listener of the party, a poor bleareyed woman with a blue kerchief bound over the weak eye, laid her hand on her little boy when he began to chatter, and actually quieted him and sent him to play with the others, while I read another passage. She promised to come to the meeting of women. But so many promise and then are frightened off by bigoted neighbors or husbands, that I can never confidently reckon on it from their first word.

"They all three expressed interest beyond common, and two of them also showed gratitude, not only for the doctor's care, but 'for those sweet words. The third was unmoved, but listened fairly too. I was interested to find the husband of this woman and his old mother also present; they came in while I was reading. The whole family, two children being included, had an affection of the eyes. The father had lost one, but the doctor hopes to save the other. They all expressed gratitude, and seemed well inclined to listen to the Scripture. I watched the group going down the steps, the man a fine figure with a gibbeh (or cloth garment with flowing skirt) of purple color, faded indeed, but very picturesque, and the two little boys in orange cotton kaptans, and the two women in their dark robes and veils, all going down in a string, and while watching them, poor things, I prayed that both the bodily eyes might be healed, and the eyes of the soul opened by God's mercy.

"I give you these few little details, just to bring some of my poor friends before your mental vision as it were; one can pray better sometimes if one has an idea of the persons, and we do so greatly need the help of Christians' prayers. The work is hard, the difficulties many, and the instruments weak and few. Do pray for us and for these poor people."

Out of the green grass of the far South, I step into the snowbanks of this morning. From where the thermometer was at seventy, and we plucked the roses out of the open gardens, into this climate, which now hovers about zero, what a contrast! And yet not more of

than in the life of the hero of my text. Now down, now up. A change of seventy degrees in one day—ay, in one hour. You cannot keep a good man down. God has decreed for him a certain point of elevation. He will bring him to that, though it cost Him a thousand worlds. You sometimes find men fearful they will not be properly appreciated. Every man comes to be valued at just what he is worth. You cannot write him up, and you cannot write him down. These facts are powerfully illustrated in my subject.

It would be an insult to suppose that you were not all familiar with the life of Joseph. How his jealous brothers threw him into a pit, but seeing a caravan of Arabian merchants trudging along on their camels, with spices and gums that loaded the air with aroma, sold their brother to these merchants, who carried him down into Egypt; Joseph there sold to Potiphar, a man of influence and office. How by his integrity he raised himself to high position in the realm, until, under the false charge of a vile wretch, he was hurled into the penitentiary. How in prison he commanded respect and confidence. How by the interpretation of Pharaoh's dream he was freed and became the chief man in the realm,

THE BISMARCK OF HIS CENTURY.

How in time of famine Joseph had the control of a munificent storehouse, which he had filled during seven years of plenty. How when his brothers, who had thrown him into the pit and sold him into captivity, applied for corn, he sent them home with the beasts of burden borne down under the heft of the corn sacks. How the sin against their brother, which had so long been hidden, came out at last, and was returned by that brother's forgiveness and kindness, the only revenge he took.

You see, in the first place, that the world is compelled to honor Christian character. Potiphar was only a man of the world, yet in his estimation, until all the affairs of that great house were committed to his charge. From this servant no honor or confidence was withheld. When Joseph was in prison he soon won the heart of the keeper, and though placed there for being a scoundrel, he soon convinced the jailer that he was an innocent and trustworthy man; and released from close confinement, he became general superintendent of prison affairs. Wherever Joseph was placed, whether a servant in the house of Potiphar, or a prisoner in the penitentiary, he became the first man everywhere, and is an illustration of the truth I lay down, that the world is compelled to honor Christian character.

There are those who affect to despise a religious life. They speak of it as a system of phlebotamy, by which the man is bled of all his courage and nobility. They say he has bemeaned himself. They pretend to have no more confidence in him since his conversion than before his conversion. But all this is hypocrisy. There is a great deal of hypocrisy in the church, and there is a great deal of hypocrisy outside the church. It is impossible for any man not to admire and confide in a man who shows that he has really become a child of God, and is what he professes to be. You cannot despise a Son of the Lord God Almighty.

NOT HYPOCRISY.

Of course we have no admiration for the sham of religion. I was at Little Rock, Arkansas, a few days ago, a few hours after the ruffians had gone into the railtrain and demanded that the passengers throw up their arms, and then these ruffians took the pocketbooks. And Satan comes and suggests to a man that he throw up his arms in hypocritical prayer and hypocritical pretension, and then steals his soul. For the mere pretension of religion we have abhorrence. Redwald, the King, after his baptism, had an altar of Christian sacrifice and an altar for sacrifice to devils; and there are many men now attempting the same thing—half a heart for God, and half a heart for the world—and it is a dead failure, and it is a caricature of religion, and the only successful assault ever made on Christianity is the inconsistency of its professors.

You may have a contempt for pretension to religion, but when you behold the excellency of Jesus Christ come out in the life of one of His disciples, all that there is good and noble in your soul rises up into admiration, and you cannot help it. Though that man be as far beneath you in estate as the Egyptian slave of whom we are discoursing was beneath his rulers, by an irrevocable law of your nature Potiphar and Pharaoh will always esteem Joseph. When Eudoxia, the Empress, threatened Chrysostom with death, and he made this reply, "Tell the empress I fear nothing but sin," such a scene as that compels the admiration of the world.

There was something in Agrippa and Felix which demanded their respect for Paul, the rebel against government. I doubt not they would willingly have yielded their office and dignity for a thousandth part of that which beamed in the eye and beat in the heart of that unconquerable apostle. Paul did not cower before Felix: Felix cowered before Paul. The infidel and worldling are compelled to honor in their hearts, although they may not eulogize with their lips, a Christian firm in persecution, cheerful in poverty, trustful in losses, triumphant in death. I find Christian men in all professions and occupations, and I find them respected and honored and successful. John Frederick Oberlin alleviating ignorance and distress; Howard passing from dungeon to lazaretto, with healing for the body and the soul; Elizabeth Fry coming to the profligacy of Newgate Prison to shake down its obduracy, as the angel came to the prison at Philippi, driving open the doors and snapping loose the chain, as well as the lives of thousands of followers of Jesus who have devoted themselves to the temporal and spiritual welfare of the race, are monuments of the Christian religions that shall not crumble while the world lasts.

A man said to me in the cars:

"WHAT IS RELIGION?

Judging from the character of many professors of religion, I do not admire religion." I said: "Now, suppose we went to an artist in the city of Rome, and while in his gallery asked him, 'What is the art of painting?' would he take us out in a low alley and show us the mere daub of a pretender at painting? or would he take us up into the corridors and show us the Rubens and the Raphaels and the Michael Angelos? When we asked him, 'What is the art of painting!' he would point to the works of these great masters, and say, 'That is painting!' Now, you propose to find the mere caricatures of religion, to seek after that which is the mere pretension of a holy life, and you call that religion. I point you to the magnificent men and women whom this Gospel has blessed and lifted and crowned. Look at the masterpieces of divine grace, if you want to know what religion is."

We learn also from this story of Joseph, that the result of PERSECUTION IS ELEVATING.

Had it not been for his being sold into Egyptian bondage by his malicious brothers, and his false imprisonment, Joseph never would have became governor. Everybody accepts the promise, "Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," but they do not realize the fact that this principle applies to worldly as well as spiritual success. It is true in all departments. Men rise to high official position through misrepresentation. The assault of the public—public abuse—is all that some of our public men have had to rely upon for their elevation. It has brought to them what talent and executive force could not have achieved.

Many of those who are making great effort for place and power will never succeed, just because they are not of enough importance to abuse. It is the nature of men—that is, of all generous and reasonable men—to gather about those who are persecuted and defend them, and they are apt to forget the faults of those who are the subjects of attack while attempting to drive back the slanderers. Persecution is elevation.

Helen Sturk, the Scotch martyr, standing with her husband at the place of execution, said: "Husband, let us rejoice to-day; we have lived together a great many happy years; this is the happiest time of all our life; you see we are to be happy together forever. Be brave, now, be brave! I will not say 'Good-night' to you, for we shall soon be in the kingdom of our Father together."

PERSECUTION SHOWS THE HEROES

and the heroines. I go into another department, and I find that those great denominations of Christians which have been most abused have spread the most rapidly. No good man was ever more violently maltreated than John Wesley—belied and caricatured and slandered until one day he stood in a pulpit in London, and a man arose in the audience and said: "You were drunk last night;" and John Wesley said: "Thank God, the whole catalogue is now complete; I had been charged with everything but that!" His followers were hooted at and maligned and called by every detestable name that infernal ingenuity could invent; but the hotter the persecution, the more rapidly they spread, until you know what a great host they have become, and what a tremendous force for God and the truth they are wielding all the world over. I do not wonder they celebrate their centennial in Baltimore.

It was persecution that gave Scotland to Presbyterianism. It was persecution that gave our land first to civil liberty and afterward to religious freedom. Yea, I might go further back and say it was persecution that gave the world the great salvation of the Gospel. The ribald mockery, the hungering and thirsting, the unjust charge, the ignominious death, when all the force of hell's fury was hurled against the cross, was the indication of that religion which is yet to be the earth's deliverance and our eternal salvation.

The State has sometimes said to the Church, "Come, take my hand and I will help you." What has been the result? The Church has gone back, and it has lost its estate of holiness, and it has become ineffective. At other times, the State said to the Church: "I will crush you." What has been the result?

AFTER THE STORMS

have spent their fury, the Church, so far from having lost any of its force, has increased, and is worth infinitely more after the assault than before. Read all history, and you will find that true. The Church is far more indebted to the opposition of civil government than to its approval. The fires of the stake have only been the torches which Christ held in His hand, by the light of which the Church has marched to her present glorious position. In the sound of racks and implements of torture I hear the rumbling of the wheels of the Gospel chariot. The scaffolds of maltreatment have been the stairs by which the Church mounted.

EXPOSURE CERTAIN.

Learn also from our subject, that sins will come to exposure. Long, long ago had those brothers sold Joseph into Egypt. They had made the old father believe that his favorite child was dead. They had suppressed the crime, and it was a profound secret, well kept by the brothers. But suddenly the secret is out. The old father hears that his son is in Egypt, having been sold there by the malice of his own brothers. How their cheeks must have burned and their hearts sunk at the flaming out of this long-suppressed crime! The smallest iniquity has a thousand foes, and they will blab out exposure.

Saul was sent to destroy the Canaanites, their sheep, and their oxen; but when he got down there among the pastures he saw some fine sheep and oxen too fat to kill, so he thought he would steal them. Nobody would know it. He drove these stolen sheep and oxen toward home, but stopped to report to the prophet how he had executed his mission, when in the distance the sheep began to bleat and the oxen to bellow. The secret was out, and Samuel said to the blushing and confused Saul: "What meaneth the bleating of sheep that I hear and the lowing of the cattle?" Ah, my hearer, you cannot keep an iniquity still! At just the wrong time the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow.

Achan cannot steal the Babylonish garments without being stoned to death, nor Arnold betray his country without having his neck stretched. Look over the police arrests. These thieves, these burglars, these counterfeiters, these highwaymen, these assassins, they all thought they could bury their iniquity so deep down it would never come to resurrection; but there was some shoe that answered to the print in the soil, some false keys found in their possession, some bloody knife that whispered of the death, and the public indignation and the anathema of outraged law hurled them into the dungeon or hoisted them on the gallows.

Francis I., King of France, stood counselling with his officers how he could take his army into Italy, when Ameril, the fool of the court, leaped out from a corner of the room, and said: "'You had better be consulting how you will get your army back." And it was found that Francis I., and not Ameril, was the fool. Instead of consulting as to the best way of getting into sin, you had better consult as to whether you will be able to get out of it. If the world does not expose you, you will tell it yourself. There is an awful power in

AN AROUSED CONSCIENCE.

A highwayman plunged out upon Whitefield as he rode along on horseback, a sack of money on the horse—money that he had raised for orphan-asylums—and the highwayman put his hand on the gold, and Whitefield turned to him and said: "Touch that if you dare—that belongs to the Lord Jesus Christ!" And the ruffian slunk into the forest. Conscience! Conscience! The ruffian had a pistol, but Whitefield shook at him the finger of doom. Do not think you can hide any great and protracted sin in your heart, my brother. In an unguarded moment it will slip off the lip, or some slight action may for the moment set ajar this door that you wanted to keep closed. But suppose that in this life you hide it, and you get along with this transgression burning on your heart, as a ship on fire within for days hinders the flames from bursting out by keeping down the hatches, yet at last, in the judgment, that iniquity will blaze out before God and the universe.

Learn also from this subject that there is an inseparable

CONNECTION BETWEEN ALL EVENTS,

however remote. The universe is only one thought of God. Those things which seemed fragmentary and isolated are only different parts of that great thought. How far apart seem those two events: Joseph sold to the Arabian merchants and his rulership of Egypt, yet you see in what a mysterious way God connected the two into one plan, so the events are linked together.

You who are aged men look back and group together a thousand things in your life that once seemed isolated. One undivided chain of events reaches from the garden of Eden to the cross of Calvary, and thus up to the kingdom of heaven. There is a relation between the smallest insect that hums in the summer air and the archangel on his throne. God can trace a direct ancestral line from the bluejay that next spring will build its nest in the tree behind the house to some one of that flock of birds which, when Noah hoisted the ark's window, with a whirr and dash of bright wings went out to sing over Mount Ararat. The tulips that will bloom in the garden next spring are this moment being nursed by the snowflakes. The furthest star on one side of the universe could not look toward the furthest star on the other side of the universe, and say: "You are no relation to me," for from that bright orb a voice of light would ring across the heavens, responding, "Yes, yes, we are sisters."

Nothing in God's universe swings at loose-ends. Accidents are only God's way of turning a leaf in the book of His eternal decrees. From our cradle to our grave there is a path all marked out. Each event in our life is connected with every other event in our life. Our losses may be the most direct road to our gain. Our defeats and our victories are twin brothers. The whole direction of your life was changed by something which at the time seemed to you trifling, while some occurrence which seemed tremendous affected you but little.

God's plans are magnificent beyond all comprehension. He moulds us and turns us and directs us, and we know it not. Thousands of years are to Him as the flight of a shuttle. The most terrific occurrence does not make God tremble, and the most triumphant achievement does not lift Him into rapture. That one great thought of God goes on through the centuries, and nations rise and fall, and eras pass, and the world changes, but God still keeps the undivided mastery, linking event to event and century to century. To God they are all one event, one history, one plan, one development, one system. Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! It was last Tuesday, at New Orleans, in the Exposition Rooms, when a telegram was sent to the President of the United States at Washington, and we waited some fifteen or twenty minutes, and then the President's answer came back, and then the presiding officer waved his handkerchief, and the signal was sent to Washington that we were ready to have the machinery of the exposition started, and the President put his finger on the electric button, and instantly the great Corlies wheel began to move—rumbling, rumbling, rolling, rolling. It was overwhelming, and twenty thousand people clapped and shouted. Just one finger at Washington started that vast machinery, hundreds and hundreds of miles away. And I thought then, as I think now, that men sometimes touch influences that respond in the far distance—forty years from now, fifty years from now, one thousand years from now, a million years from now. One touch sounding through the ages!

We learn also from this story

THE PROPRIETY OF LAYING UP for the future. During the seven years of plenty Joseph prepared for the famine, and when it came he had a crowded storehouse. The life of most men in a worldly respect is divided into years of plenty and famine. It is seldom any man passes through life without at least seven years of plenty. During those seven years your business bears a rich harvest. You hardly know where all the money comes from, it comes so fast. Every bargain you make seems to turn into gold. You contract few bad debts. You are astonished with large dividends. You invest more and more capital. You wonder how men can be content with a small business, gathering in only a few hundred dollars, while you reap thousands. Those are the seven years of plenty. Now Joseph has time to for to almost every man there do come seven years of famine. You will be sick, you will be unfortunate, you will be defrauded; there will be hard times, you will be disappointed, and if you have no storehouse upon which to fall back, you may be famine-struck.

We have no admiration for this denying one's self all personal comfort and luxury for the mere pleasure of hoarding up; this grasping—grasping for the mere pleasure of seeing how large a pile you can get, this always being poor because as soon as a dollar comes in it is sent out to see if it can find another dollar so it can carry it home on its back. We have a contempt for all those things, but there is an intelligent and noble-minded forecast which we love to see in men who have families and kindred depending upon them for the blessings of education and home.

God sends us to the insects for a lesson, which, while they do not stint themselves in the present, do not forget their duty to forestall the future. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise; which, having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." Now, there are money. One of these is to put it in stock and deposit it in bank, and invest it on bond and mortgage. The other way to lay up money is giving it away. He is the safest who makes both of these God's investments. There are in the house this morning men who, if they should lose every dollar they have in the world would be millionaires for eternity. They made the spiritual investment; but the man who devotes none of his gains to the cause of Christ, and looks only for his own comfort and luxury, is not safe, I care not how the money is invested. He acts as the roses if they should say, "I will hold my breathing, and no one shall have a snatch of fragrance from me until next week; then I will set all the garden afloat with aroma." Of course, the roses refusing to breathe die.

But, above all, lay up

TREASURES IN HEAVEN.

They never depreciate in value. They never are at a discount. They are always available. You may feel safe now with your one or two thousand, or ten or twenty thousand dollars' income; but what will such an income be worth after you are dead? Others will get it. Perhaps some of them will quarrel about it before you are buried. They will be so impatient to get hold of the will. They will think you should be buried one day sooner than you are buried. They will be right glad when you are dead. They are only waiting for you to die. What, then, will all your earthly accumulations be worth? If you gathered it all in your bosom, and walked up with it to heaven's gate, it would not purchase your admission. Or, if allowed to enter, it could not buy you a crown or a robe, and the poorest saint in heaven would look down at you and say, "Where did that pauper come from?" May we all have treasures in heaven! Amen.

The Violation of the Sabbath Appears to have worked its own retribution in the iron trade. Referring to the recent shutting down of so many furnaces, the Observer remarks that they have suspended on account of overproduction of iron, the supply exceeding the demand, and that if these furnaces had kept the Sabbath day holy by resting on it, according to the commandment, they would now all be running and have enough to do for six days every week. It is not a safe business that is unnecessarily pursued on Sunday.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Parricide's Story.—Mr. McFarlane Relates: "About seven years ago I became acquainted with the Chaplain of the Northern Police Office in Glasgow. One day while he was showing me through the cells and various rooms, he opened the door of one cell, and there sat a sad-looking young man; he was there for the murder of his stepfather. When I spoke to him, he told me this story: 'When I was very young I left my home, and lived a careless, wicked life. The other night I returned home very much the worse for drink, and in a quarrel with my stepfather I threw him down-stairs. He died from the effects of the fall; and now I am here awaiting my trial;' and then he said, 'Oh, I would stay here for years if at the end of that time I had the least hope of getting a pardon!' But he knew he had not one good thing to recommend him, and had no hope of mercy. Oh, friends, there is a Judge who does not ask you to wait for years, nor even hours, before you can obtain your pardon! He is offering you even now a free pardon through His Son Jesus Christ, if you will but come and accept it."

A Runaway Girl's Return.—"I Heard of a young girl who left her home, and was soon led into the paths of sin. Some time afterward she had a great longing to return home, but fear kept her back. At length she made up her mind to go, and try if her mother would receive her again; and after a long weary walk she found herself standing at her mother's door, trembling and frightened. Poor child! if she only knew how her mother was longing and praying for her return, she would not have been so timid. It was a late hour, and she knew the household would be all at rest for the night. She was just about to knock when she thought she would try the latch, and when she tried it it yielded to her touch at once, and quickly entering she went toward her mother's bedside! and looking for a moment at her sleeping mother, she threw her arms around her neck and asked her if she could forgive her. She was at once in her mother's tender embrace. After the greeting was over the girl said: 'But why is the door unbarred at so late an hour?' 'My poor child,' replied her mother, 'the door has never been barred since you left. I could not think of my child returning and getting the door barred against her.' Oh, friends, any of you who have wandered away from God, and gone into the paths of sin, do not stand trembling and faltering before Him, but just go to Him at once, asking Him to forgive you for His Son's sake! He is longing and waiting for your return, and you will be clasped in His loving embrace. God's door is never barred against any one."

A Wicked Consumptive Saved.—Mr. J. G. Forbes says: "In the northern district of Glasgow a young disciple of the Lord was going from house to house delivering hand-bills one Sunday. While he was walking up one of these streets, he thought he heard some one calling, and on turning round he saw a woman beckoning him, and, as she approached him, said, 'Will you come in and speak to a man? He is dying, and in dreadful agony about his soul.' The young man came and asked me to go, as he, being a convert, had not much experience in the work, and was, therefore, rather timid at undertaking so solemn a duty. I went and saw the wreck of what once had been a strong, healthy man, but was now sinking fast in consumption brought on by his own evil life. When I spoke to him he said, 'Oh, I am an awful sinner; I am afraid to die; do you think I shall get better?' But I knew that he never would, and so did not give encouragement in that way, but urged him to make his peace with God. For some time he was in utter darkness, but at last the light of the Gospel began to dawn on his mind, and as I continued speaking to him he found rest in believing in the only begotten Son of God. As he passed through the dark valley of the shadow of death he was heard to murmur, 'Jesus! Jesus! Jesus!' and his soul thus passed away peacefully."

THE CHANGE ON LIVING SAINTS.

By John R. Caldwell.

The Change on the Living—The Foreshadowings—The Lesson of the Transfiguration—Without Publicity.

To the saints who shall be alive on the earth at the coming of the Lord, no precedence shall be given. They shall not prevent (or go before) those who shall have fallen asleep (1 Thess. 4 : 15). But immediately following the resurrection of the dead in Christ the marvellous "change" shall be wrought upon all the living saints which shall instantaneously fit them for their place with the resurrection company in the glory of the heavens.

As the corruption of the grave shall be exchanged for incorruption, so the mortality of the living shall be exchanged for immortality.

THE TWO COMPANIES

transfigured and fashioned like unto the body of the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ (Phil. 3 : 21) shall form one great assembly or "gathering together unto Him" (II Thess. 2 : 1). It would seem as though the resurrection of the dead, the changing of the living saints and their being caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, would all be the work of a moment, or like the twinkling of an eye.

Blessed, glorious moment, when the patience of Christ shall have its perfect work, when the long-restrained affections of our Lord and Saviour—now constantly and wisely bent on blessing us rather than on enjoying us—shall find its full, unhindered outburst, and lavish on the long-loved, and cherished, and disciplined purchase of His blood, the treasures of glory and of grace.

What an answer there is in the rapidity of this transaction to the murmur of unbelief, "My Lord delayeth His coming." Is it not as though the Lord Jesus awaited the very moment appointed by the Father with eager expectation, then to descend with a shout, swift as the lightning flash to fulfil the cherished purpose of His heart, and receive His people to Himself?

It has ever been God's way to give of His great purposes. Thus were the person and work of Christ foreshown in many types, from the days of Adam and Abel down to the rending of the veil of the temple. So also was resurrection foreshadowed, with earnests and pledges, both in Old Testament times by Enoch and Elijah, and in New Testament times by the Lord Himself, as we have seen in three distinct instances.

Nor has He left us without an earnest of this further triumph—the transfiguring and taking up of the saints at His coming. It was but fifty-seven years after the grave had been dug for our first father, Adam, the solemn sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," having at length been carried into effect, and fifty-eight years before the second recorded death, viz., that of Seth (Abel being excepted), that God chose to give a memorable pledge of the immortality that should be brought to light through the gospel. "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him" (Heb. 11 : 5). Thus, according to his faith, he was translated, taken away without tasting death, to be a witness in the heavens, and to all ages an earnest and a pledge of the coming victory of the Son of God.

So was it with Elijah—by a whirlwind taken up into heaven—another faithful one, in another time of universal apostasy, honored by passing, without the humiliation of the grave, from earth to heaven.

Nor is it without signification for us that the Lord Himself ascended thus from Olivet, in the presence of His disciples, until a cloud received Him out of their sight.

And as to the transfiguration scene recorded by three of the evangelists, we have Peter's inspired commentary declaring that it was really a foreshadowing of the same august occasion (II Peter 1 : 16). There on the mount transfigured—the glory that had been veiled outshining with brightness above the sun—was seen the Lord Himself, and with Him Moses and Elias—the one a dead one raised, the other translated without having tasted death—thus, as it were, representing the whole scene of His appearing, and the gathering to Himself of the sleeping and the living saints. Moses and Elias were in glory along with Christ, and their converse with Him was of that which was nearest His heart and theirs—the decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem.

Not one of the foregoing instances in which the translation of the saints is foreshadowed was public. It is said, "Enoch was not found," as though he had been sought for by those who missed him; and this proves unquestionably that the world did not witness his translation. Elijah was only seen by Elisha—the fifty who "went to view" saw nothing, and instituted a search, lest, perchance, he might be found upon some mountain. The Lord Jesus, when transfigured, was seen only by the chosen three; and when He ascended up to heaven, it was in the presence and view of saints only.

True, there will be the shout of the Lord Jesus, the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God; but it by no means follows that such sounds will be understood or even heard by the world. On the road to Damascus, those who journeyed with Saul "saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but heard not the voice of Him that spake to him" (Acts 22 : 9). So when the voice came from heaven to the Lord Jesus, they who stood by said "it thundered;" they heard a sound, but its import they knew not.

It is not well to dogmatize on such subjects; but from what may thus be gathered from Scripture, it does seem as though, according to all analogy, the gathering of the saints to meet the Lord in the air would not be of that public character that will form a conspicuous element in the appearing of the Lord in glory with His saints to judgment.

A GIRL STOLEN BY GYPSIES.

MR. GEORGE SMITH, whose Christian work among canal boatmen and gypsies has been frequently mentioned in these columns, thus describes an incident of his labor:

"Connected with one of the gypsy camps of ragamuffins, I noticed in the distance a tall, thin, unwashed, and emaciated girl of about fourteen winters—it had been nearly all winter with her. The upper part of her thin frame of skin and bones was dressed in a few shreds of rags, and these were not sufficient to cover her bare, dirty bosom, which looked almost the bosom of a skeleton; and on her feet were odd and worn-out, cast-off drawing-room shoes, quite equal to the sad emergency of letting as much mud and water upon her soles as they were to keep the poor lost creature 'high and dry' out of the muddy surroundings. She moved among the gypsies with a most downcast and haggard look of despair upon her face.

"The poor girl had fine Grecian features, with long, black, flowing hair, but it was matted together with dirt and filth. With her arms uplifted, and her hands buried scratchingly deep in her hair, she turned to look in the direction where I lay. This was no sooner done than a flash of hope lighting up her thin face with smiles through her tears, she started to run toward me as fast as she could, calling out, 'My father! My father! My father!'

"Before I had time to turn round she was at my side, and had planted a kiss upon my cheek. For a moment I was dumbfounded. I said to the lost posh gypsy child, 'What is it you want, my dear? I am not your father.' At this reply she looked wild and almost like a maniac, and said, with her face buried in her hands, 'I thought you was my father who had come to fetch me out from among the gypsies.' And then she looked again into my face and said,

'Arn't you my father? my father was so much like you. He had white hair like you. Arn't you my father? I wish I could see my mother. Will she come for me?' I asked her to sit down by my side, and to tell me who she was. She came a little nearer, and began to tell me how it was she came to be among the gypsies. I will give her tale as she related it to me:

"'When I was a little girl about four years old, I remember my mother sending me for some milk to a house where they sold it; and while I was going down the street some dark ragged women—the same you saw me with—asked me to go down to the bottom of the street to look at some fine things, and on the way they gave me a penny and some apples and a little doll. After walking a long way we did not get to the bottom of the street, but we got among a lot of children living under a cart cover by the side of the hedge. They asked me to sit by the fire that was on the ground. I said I wanted to go to my mother. It was getting dark, and I began to cry. They kept saying that they would take me to my mother, and at night they all got into a cart, and said they were taking me home to see my mother, father, brothers, and sisters. We went a long way, and the way they took me was strange to me, and I have not seen my mother and father since.'

"The girl began to cry, and said, 'My father used to take me to school and chapel on Sundays, and they did sing such nice hymns. I have seen father and mother cry lots of times. Father used to say his prayers every night and morning. They don't say prayers where I live now. Will you take me to my father and mother? When will you take me? Take me now, and I will give you everything I have in the world. Please don't go and leave me, and I will give you twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty kisses. I will give you hundreds if you will take me to my mother and father. Will you take me, please, sir?'

"I told the poor little creature that I could not take her, but that I would send three or four gentlemen for her shortly. At this she began to sob out loudly, 'Take me! take me! don't leave me here!' I advised her to pray to God for deliverance, for there seemed to be none from earth; and with her eyes turned up to heaven she repeated the words which, I suppose, she must have learned before she was stolen in the school she spoke of:

"'Lord! hear my prayer and listen to my cries,
Let not Thy gracious eye my tears despise.'

To which I said, Amen!"

A MIDNIGHT SERVICE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 4, Acts 20 : 1-16. Golden Text, Heb. 10 : 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul Working Under Direct Guidance—Leaves Ephesus—The Work Proceeds without Him—Three Months in Macedonia—His Companions—Luke's Functions—The Stay at Troas—Paul's Heart Full—The Midnight Gathering—Nights of Prayer—Not Always Prevailing—Self-Righteous Motives—The Fall of Eutychus—Meetings Disturbed—The Opportunity Used.

AFTER the uproar at Ephesus, Paul, always guided by God, left Ephesus. "What a cowardly thing to do?" some would say. "Why not stay and fight it out?" Paul worked under the immediate direction of God. The same Guide who bid him remain in Corinth (Acts. 18 : 9, 10), led him to leave Ephesus. "The servant of Christ must not strive," is the standing rule for Christians. (II Tim. 2 : 24). "When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another," (Matt. 10 : 23) is the Lord's direction, unless He Himself should make an exception to it. The Lord can subdue opposition to His truth; self-defence will never do it. Accordingly, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia. Probably the silversmiths thought they would have a good time of it when Paul was gone: some of the disciples may have thought they could not get on without him. But the Lord was of maintaining His own cause and manifesting to the worldly mob of Ephesus that man had no power to put out the life of God, which had entered into their city. The epistle to the Ephesians, written five years later, is ample evidence that the votaries of Diana had made no headway against "the saints and the faithful in Christ Jesus," for whom Paul ceased not to give thanks after he heard of their "faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints." (Eph. 1 : 15, 16).

Paul passed some time in Macedonia, where he gave the churches much exhortation during a three months' stay. The Jews, however, could not leave him alone, they could not tolerate one in whom the power of God's Spirit was a reproach to them. Paul, therefore, instead of sailing for Syria, purposed to return through Macedonia.

A BAND OF EAGER CONVERTS, gathered from different countries, and who had left all for Jesus, accompanied him. "Sopater of Berea" was one, a representative of the little church there which searched the Scriptures daily, and so found the Lord. Aristarchus, who followed Paul to Jerusalem, and from thence on his sea-voyage, and even to his prison in Rome (Acts 27 : 2; Col. 4 : 10), was another, with his friend Secundus. Gaius of Derbe, who seems to have been another than the Macedonian Gaius (Acts 19 : 29); and the Gaius who was Paul's host, and "of the whole church" (Rom. 16 : 23), and whom Paul baptized (1 Cor. 1 : 14). Timothy, his "own son in the faith" (1 Tim. 1 : 2), than whom he had "no man likeminded" (Phil. 2 : 20), was another. Tychicus, "a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord" (Eph. 6 : 21; Col. 4 : 7), whose nationality does not appear, was yet another; one who was a willing messenger to the churches, taking his life in his hand (II Tim. 4 : 12; Tit. 3 : 12). Trophinus an Ephesian (Acts 21 : 29), was the last of the number. He was with Paul in Jerusalem, and probably wanted to accompany him to Rome, as well as Aristarchus, and thus would have been imprisoned and hindered from preaching the Gospel. Perhaps this was the reason God allowed him to remain at Miletum sick, when Paul and his other followers went on to Rome (II Tim. 3 : 20). Constant intercourse with Paul, and the near view of his life, must have been made a great blessing to these students in the school of the Holy Ghost. Just saved from heathenism, God permitted them the acquaintance and companionship of a man full of the Holy Ghost, and deeply versed in Scripture. Those who possess an apostolic spirit, such as the late Rev. R. Aitken, of Pendeen, always attract around them a band of young disciples, who learn much more from their walk with God and the life of Christ in them, than even from their teaching.

Paul's little company went on to Troas, while their leader went through his beloved Philippi, from whence "after the days of unleavened bread he, and Luke, who writes the account, sailed for Troas also. Some have suggested that Luke travelled with Paul as his private physician, but internal evidence from the Acts of the Apostles would go rather to prove that he was the transcribing witness of God's healings, through Paul, at Iconium (Acts 14 : 3), at Lystra (ver. 8–10), at Philippi (Acts 16 : 16–18), at Ephesus (Acts 19 : 11, 12) and at Melita (Acts 28 : 8, 9).

Paul and his little band remained at Troas seven days. Sunday, the last day of his stay, "when the disciples came together to break bread," the dear old missionary's heart was full. Here were representatives of churches which God had used him to found in different cities of Asia and of Europe. This was the port from which he had first sailed for Europe. Here abundant proofs of his ministry were to be found. 'Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12 : 34). Paul's heart was so abundant that he "continued his speech until midnight." We do not know at what hour he commenced it. But this we are sure of, that this was an extempore, and not an arranged midnight service. There are many views abroad about midnight services and

ALL-NIGHT MEETINGS.

Our blessed Lord, before He chose His disciples, went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God" (Luke 6 : 12). The prayers of Jesus, whether by night or day, must prevail; and one may well conceive that He must have longed often for the hours when He could be alone and undistracted with His Father. Again, we read of all-night prayer in the case of Balaam, which did not answer, for all his prayer did not change the stubborn will which was full of self-seeking, and loved "the wages of unrighteousness" (II Pet. 2 : 15). Samuel, too, "cried unto the Lord all night" for Saul (1 Sam. 15 : 11), but in vain, because the Lord had rejected Saul. We gather from these things that meeting for an all night of prayer with the idea that by denying ourselves customary rest, we are going to put a pressure upon our God which will force Him to yield to our demands, is altogether a false position. Our loving God waiteth to be gracious, it is His joy to be inquired of. He entreats us to ask and receive, that our joy may be full, and He has told us that our joy shall be full when His joy is in us.

Sometimes we fear there is a great deal of attraction for young, ardent, enthusiastic souls in an all night of prayer; it is something they can do, sleep is something they can renounce for the Lord. But often self-righteousness and self-dependence are encouraged by any

DOING OF OUR OWN.

When our God so occupies us, that we cannot sleep, so fills us that we cannot eat, then a midnight watch is His order, and may be exceedingly blessed and fruitful. In the times of persecution, the night meetings of those who dared not meet by day, were full of the presence of the Lord, not because they were by night, but because the very stress of circumstances brought out the faith and love of the disciples.

'There were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together," and very probably there was not much fresh air. One of their number succumbed to the sleep which the long sitting and close atmosphere induced. The place was crammed, and, being a youth, he had clambered to a window on "the third loft;" from which we see how densely packed the place must have been. The enemy generally so arranges it that a serious interruption to a meeting shall occur just at the time when the greatest power of God is upon the people. There must have been a power of God present to have kept this crowded audience hour after hour together, and no doubt Satan planned that the death of Eutychus should damp, distract, and discourage every spirit. The poor young man fell from his perch, and was taken up dead. "O what a misfortune!" some may have said. "How sad! how shocking!" But Paul did not say so. He was in the habit of rejoicing in infirmities, that the power of Christ might rest upon him, and of taking for the same cause. Here was a glorious opportunity for the power of Christ to rest upon him. He went down, fell on the young man, and embraced him, saying, "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him." This made a break in the proceedings, and the dear old preacher had a chance to take food. But the torrent which was in him was not yet spent. When he had broken bread and eaten, and "talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed. And they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted." Thus ended this impromptu all-night meeting. The immediate issues of it are not told, but we doubt not there was much to tell. Paul continued his journey afoot as far as Assos, going overland, perhaps for more quiet to commune with God, and then when his friends met him, he took ship with them for Mitylene.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the previous Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.
Notes on Foreign Topics.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance.

A Favor would be Conferred on the Manager and office-staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if subscribers whose terms expire at the end of the year would so far oblige them as to remit their renewals at once, instead of waiting for the new year. During the first few weeks of January there is always a very heavy influx of letters, which, in spite of special arrangements to deal with them, involves liability to mistake in making up the new lists. It would therefore be a convenience, facilitating the work and reducing the chances of delay and disappointment, if such of our subscribers as can conveniently do so would send in their subscriptions now. Those who send a new name with their own, as many are doing, are doubly welcome.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Bill for the Admission of Dakota as a State was passed by the Senate on December 16th. It provides for a division of the Territory on the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, the part north of the line to remain a Territory, under the name of Lincoln, the people of the southern portion to hold a convention and adopt a constitution not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which proceedings and constitution shall be reported and submitted to the President of the United States by the Governor of the Territory, whereupon the President shall, by proclamation, declare the new State admitted to the Union. The vote for admission was a strict party vote, the minority being all Democrats.

The Treaty with Nicaragua for the Construction of the canal, has been the chief subject of political interest during the past week. Imperfect and incorrect reports of the conditions of the treaty having been published, which were liable to mislead the people, the full text of the treaty was last Thursday given to the press. From this it appears to be a departure from our traditions of a very serious character, which will demand thoughtful consideration on the part of Congress before it is ratified. By the terms of the treaty the Government of the United States undertakes to guarantee the inviolability of the territory of Nicaragua against foreign enemies, to construct the canal, and to lend to Nicaragua four million dollars at three per cent interest, for the purpose of internal improvements connected with the canal. The strip of territory ceded to the United States is to be two and a half miles in width, inclusive of the canal, which will run through its centre. In time of peace the strip will be under the civil control of Nicaragua, and residents upon it will continue to be citizens of that government. The United States are to have two thirds of the canal tolls and a controlling vote in the board of directors. The cost of construction is estimated at $100,000,000. In addition to the question of the policy of the project, is that affecting our national honor. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty with England, by which we bound ourselves not to construct the canal, has never been formally abrogated. Our Government has long considered itself free from the obligations of the treaty, inasmuch as the circumstances with which it dealt have radically changed since it was signed. It is, however, important that we do not appear to be careless of treaty obligations, and therefore it may be hoped the consent of England to its abrogation will be obtained.

The Accusations against Ex-Governor St. John, of having received payment from the Democrats toward the expenses of the campaign, having been widely circulated, we are asked to publish the following explicit denial from his pen: "I have no personal acquaintance with either Mr. Cleveland or Mr. Hendricks, or any member of the National Democratic Committee. Nor did I ever have any transaction, communication, or understanding, either directly or indirectly, with either of said gentlemen, or any member of said committee, or any person claiming to act for or in any way to represent the Democratic party, either State or National, in relation to the campaign just closed, or any other subject whatever. Nor did the Democratic party, so far as I know, ever attempt to communicate with me."

The Exposition at New Orleans was Opened, with appropriate ceremonies, on December 16th. Dr. Talmage offered the dedicatory prayer. The President, who was unable to leave Washington, opened the exposition by an ingenious application of electricity. The speech of Mr. Richardson, the President of the Exposition, presenting the building to the Government, was sent over the wires to President Arthur, who, seated in the White House with his cabinet, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, and a committee from each House of Congress, sent back his address of acceptance and congratulation. Being informed that all was ready, he telegraphed his declaration that the exposition was duly open, and, pressing a button, sent the current of electricity which set in motion the machinery in the exposition, a thousand miles away. It is believed that nearly twenty thousand persons were present in the exposition to witness the opening ceremonies. The reports show that the exposition will be one of the most complete and successful ever held. There has now been spent by the managers on the buildings and in other ways over $2,100,000; adding to that State appropriations and subscriptions, the amount will reach $2,500,000. Two shiploads of foreign exhibits arrived in the harbor after the opening. The workmen are engaged day and night in perfecting the arrangements, which by New Year's are expected to be complete.

A Terribly Fatal Fire Occurred in Brooklyn on December 18th, when the large Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, in which seven hundred and eighty-nine children were sheltered, was completely destroyed. The fire started about three in the afternoon, in the boiler-room, and, owing to the construction of the building, which was without fire-proof dividing doors, it soon spread to every part. It was at first supposed that all the children were saved, but one after another was missed, and eventually, when the ruins were dug over, it was found that no less than twenty-one children and one teacher had perished in the flames. Sixty-six children are yet to be accounted for, many of whom, it is feared, must have died. The loss of life appears to have occurred in the infirmary, to which there were no fire-escapes, and it cannot be ascertained from the books how many inmates were there when the fire broke out.

The Attention of the English Public during the past week has been engrossed by foreign complications. The press correspondents cable reports of general uneasiness, and discontent with the conduct of the government. The German Government has seized a portion of New Guinea, and is said to be contemplating the annexation of Zululand. She is also suspected of fomenting hostility among the Boers toward the English colony. Russian advances in Afghanistan have also alarmed the people for the safety of India. These and other apprehensions have taken hold of the people on what appears to be slender cause. It is remarkable that Mr. Gladstone and the Liberals have never succeeded in conducting the foreign policy of the country in a way satisfactory with the people, although, as a rule, their domestic policy has been beneficial.

The Perpetrators of the Dynamite Outrage on London Bridge were not discovered last week, though large rewards have been offered for their detection. A party of three men are suspected. They were observed on the day of the explosion taking a boat, which they rowed in the direction of the bridge. One of them carried a bag, which he handled with extreme care. An examination of the bridge at low water showed that the explosive had been nailed to the abutment of the bridge. One of the stones has several large fissures in it, but the stability of the bridge was not affected. The guards at the Houses of Parliament have been doubled, and other precautions taken.

A Dash Across the Desert is Contemplated by General Wolseley, who has charge of the expedition for the relief of General Gordon. The numerous accidents attending the navigation of the Nile, and the necessity for prompt measures, if there is to be any hope of saving General Gordon, have led to this decision. The route across the desert will save some hundreds of miles, but would involve much labor and suffering to the troops. General Wolseley reports that he and his army could cross the desert in sixteen days.

The Congo Conference in Berlin Continues its deliberations. In the course of a recent letter from Mr. Henry M. Stanley, he points out the urgent necessity of settling the neutralization of the Congo country, of determining definitely its frontier, and of bringing about a general recognition of the African International Association before the Conference now in session at Berlin shall have concluded its labors. If these problems shall not be settled he thinks the Congo will only prove a tempting bait to France and Portugal. He thinks that England should propose to Germany that inasmuch as the association cannot make war, therefore war shall not be made against the association. If the Conference disbands before these great questions shall have been settled, then farewell to the Congo basin and a long good-night to its development.

The Trial of Reinsdorf and his Fellow-Conspirators, for being concerned in the plot to kill the Emperor of Germany, revealed the spirit now animating the anarchists of Europe. When Reinsdorf was asked if he had anything more to say in his defence, he dwelt upon the unhappy and degraded position of the workmen of Germany, and denounced in bold terms police supervision. He declared that had he ten heads he would gladly sacrifice them all for the cause. The grave, he said, was the best place for a persecuted proletariat like himself. In reply to the question whether he pleaded guilty or not guilty, he drew himself up to his full height and answered: "I have nothing further to say. Deal with me as you please." He admitted that his object was to kill the Emperor.

The Prohibition Party in England are Dissatisfied with the policy of the government. At a meeting recently held a member of Parliament, Mr. Benjamin Whitworth, M. P., declared his readiness to join any number of members of Parliament in refusing to support the Premier unless he changed his attitude on the subject of Temperance legislation. A resolution was moved by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and seconded by Canon Wilberforce, protesting against the continuance of laws sanctioning the injustice, folly, and cruelty of thrusting into or maintaining within any locality, contrary to the will of the inhabitants, a system essentially evil. Anything like truce or quarter is evidently far from the minds of Prohibitionists in relation to the drink traffic.

The Topics for the Week of Prayer Commencing January 4th, as arranged by the Evangelical Alliance, are the following: Sunday, January 4th—Sermons: The good fight of faith. Monday, January 5th—Thanksgiving and Praise. Tuesday, January 6th—Humiliation and Confession. Wednesday, January 7th—Prayer for the Church of Christ. Thursday, January 8th—Prayer for families and instructors of youth. Friday, January 9th—Prayer for the Nations. Saturday, January 10th—Prayer for Missions, Home and Foreign. Sunday, January 11th—Sermons: Waiting for the Lord's appearing.

Mr. Moody is Continuing the Christian workers' conventions, and has, it is stated, abandoned for the present the intention of holding evangelistic services in Chicago. His present arrangements embrace the holding of conventions of three days each in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Cincinnati, and Richmond.

The Appeal of the American Missionary Association for funds, to which we recent'y called attention, has been responded to so promptly and generously that the debt, which two months since threatened to reach $50,000, has been reduced to $13,785.86. This is a source of sincere gratification, and it is hoped that this comparatively small remainder will be wiped out. The next year's work should not be hindered by a single dollar of indebtedness. The total receipts the last year have been $287,594. The donations were $223,034, against $186,200 the previous year; but the legacies fell off from $126,366 for 1883 to $64,559 for 1884.

The Cause of Temperance is being Actively pressed forward among the colored people of the South. Mr. Stearns, the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, states that a missionary of the society has been attending meetings of colored clergymen. In a meeting in Georgia fifteen colored Methodist preachers, within a few days, have pledged themselves to preach the cause and the motto of the society. Through the preachers, the society hopes to accomplish a grand Southern work. It has been asked to arrange for a week's meeting in New Orleans during the exposition.

The African Missionary Expedition, under the conduct of Bishop William Taylor, is pushing forward its preparations for departure. It is expected that all the forty missionary members of the expedition will be ready to sail before the close of January. A friend of the project has just given $1000 toward the purchase of mission property at St. Paul de Loanda, their port of entry. Others wishing to add to this fund may send it direct to Bishop Taylor, or to Richard Grant, 181 Hudson Street. The widow of Bishop Matthew Simpson has given $50 toward purchasing a tent on which her late husband's name shall be painted. Any one wishing to contribute building material or breadstuffs, from a tin of crackers to a barrel of flour, may address it: "For William Taylor's African Expedition, per James Scott, 239 West Street, New York," forwarding a memorandum of what they send to Richard Grant, 181 Hudson Street. Bishop Taylor has received a letter from President Arthur to the chiefs of the countries through which he will pass on his journey across Africa, to be used by him as a passport and fraternal greeting to the rulers of the various tribes.

A Seceder from Mormonism has Published an open letter stating the reasons which have led to his act. The writer signs himself Scott Anderson and states that he was an English convert to Mormonism from which he withdraws after five years' experience. During his residence in Utah he was shocked beyond measure to find that "Adam is our God," that blood-atonement is an orthodox doctrine, and that without marrying "at least three wives" no one can rise and reign. Such hypocrisy and profanity and foul speech as prevail among the leaders he never dreamed possible. Ben Hogan, the converted pugilist, who labored in Utah during last summer informs us that Mormonism is growing in power and extending itself rapidly into other States. His personal observations lead him reluctantly to the belief that it can never be extirpated otherwise than by the sword. No legislative enactments, however stringent, will, he thinks, remove the evil.

The Validity of Marriage Certificates, Such as are issued by New York clergymen, was the subject of public discussion last week. The question was raised by a lawyer, who declared that a certificate he had seen issued recently was of no value in law. As thousands of such certificates are carefully preserved by ladies in the State, the statement caused some disquietude. A series of interviews with other lawyers, however, being published, the matter was put in its proper light, and the uneasiness was allayed. It was stated that marriage certificates are only valuable as evidence, and that the validity of a marriage is in no wise affected by them, but depends on the marriage itself. The precise value of the marriage certificates is now understood, and is not likely to be overestimated in future. It would be well if as much could be said of other certificates, especially those of church membership, on which, it may be feared, some holders depend too much. The important question of real union with Christ is not proved by church-membership (I Cor. 11 : 28).

An Investor's Efforts were Happily Thwarted by a remarkable series of accidents, recently. The trustee of an orphan young lady had in his hands a sum of $3750 belonging to her. He decided to invest it in the purchase of thirty shares in the Bank of Middletown, Conn. Having procured a certified cheque for the amount, he wrote to his broker, enclosing the cheque directing the purchase. He drove to the post-office, but arriving late at night he made a mistake in the darkness, and mailed the wrong envelope. The letter he intended to mail remained in his pocket several days without his noticing it. When he found out his mistake, he drove out at once to mail it, but meeting some friends on his way, he was persuaded to turn back with them and postpone his journey to the post-office until the next day. The next day he was busy and could not go. The following day he went, but on his arrival, found that the letter had been lost or stolen from his pocket. He stopped the payment of that cheque, and procured another, with which, two days afterward, he again went to the post-office. Before mailing it, however, he heard the terrible news of the failure of the bank which he had thought was absolutely secure. Then he did not know how to be sufficiently thankful for the accidents which before had exasperated him. The time will come when many of us will learn that our "misfortunes" were often blessings in disguise (Rom. 8 : 28).

A Curious Retribution has Overtaken a lady in a village in New York State. Twenty-three years ago she was the joy of her doting father and mother, who almost idolized her, and indulged her every caprice. Her affections were sought by a young man from Europe, whose character was so bad that her parents refused to accept him as their son-in-law. The girl, who was under twenty years of age, eloped with him, forgetting all the love and tenderness of her parents, who some time afterward died broken-hearted. The worthless fellow ill-used her and deserted her. She found that the marriage had been a pretence, and that she was not bound to him. She resisted temptations to the vicious career, which is generally the sequel of such an experience, and was successful in obtaining a situation as a domestic servant. While thus earning her livelihood, an honest and prosperous farmer made her acquaintance, and eventually married her. Last summer a stranger came to the neighborhood in which they lived, in whom, to her horror, she recognized the man who had deceived her so cruelly. He looked but little older, though she had changed so much that, as she gladly observed, he did not recognize her. The fellow's morals had not improved by the lapse of time, and he succeeded in inducing the only daughter of the woman to elope with him, as he had persuaded herself to do twenty years before. She is now drinking to the bitter dregs the cup she placed at her own mother's lips, and her remorse is intolerable. We forbear to publish the names of the parties, but the facts are vouched for by reliable persons. It is seldom that a retribution so romantic and so terrible is recorded (Gal. 6 : 7).

A Futile Attempt to Raise a House was made in Hoboken, N. J., last week. The occupier's family having increased, he persuaded his landlord to elevate the house another story. A house-mover was employed, who succeeded in raising it several feet. On Thursday he and his assistant crawled underneath to adjust the blocks, when the building slipped and fell upon them. One of the men was killed, but the other, having happily been at a spot where the beams protected him, escaped with a slight injury. The house-mover, it is stated, had not had much experience, and failed to take the precautions usually adopted in the hazardous work of lifting a house from its foundations. The dangers of such an undertaking are generally recognized in respect to houses, but they seem to be often forgotten in the matter of character. Men who rise in the world, either by wealth or culture, too often become separated from Christ, the only sure foundation, and have a disastrous fall (Eph. 2 : 20).

Poisonous Candies have been Detected in the markets. Last week Dr. Cyrus Edson, by direction of the Health Board, examined certain manufactories of candies. He reported that of the sixty-four establishments inspected, in thirteen chrome yellow was used to produce candies of that color. Five firms of the thirteen used chrome green, red lead, vermilion, and Prussian blue to produce cheap effects. Three firms used burnt umber to imitate chocolate color. One firm used the arsenical aniline fuschine to produce a red tint. All these pigments, except Prussian blue and burnt umber, are poisons. The fuschine is the most dangerous. Several thousands of pounds of candies thus colored were seized and destroyed. The manufacturers are to be prosecuted. There is no doubt that they were either ignorant of the qualities of the poisons used, or were careless as to the effects produced, except the one of attractive appearance. Much indignation has been aroused by the discovery, parents being naturally exasperated by the danger to which their children are exposed. It would be well if an inspection of literary confectionery were made. Many books very widely circulated are made attractive by sensational matter of the most poisonous character (II Tim 2 : 16).

A Haunting Reprimand has Resulted in the madness and death of a railroad employé in Connecticut. He was a switchman on the Naugatuck Road. Some weeks ago, owing to his negligence in leaving a switch open, a train was derailed and traffic interrupted for three hours. The switchman was discharged with the mild reprimand from the superintendent, "You ought to be more careful." The words haunted the man, and continually rang in his ears, and to make matters worse the employés of the road began to pester him with the remark: "You ought to be more careful." One day at dinner he dropped and broke a cup, and, without thinking to offend, his wife said: "You ought to be more careful," whereupon he sprang upon her and gave her a savage beating. From that time until the day of his death, on December 18th, he was a raving maniac, tending switches, twisting brakes, and waving frantic signals, and for the last few days of his life the constant attendance of three men was necessary to restrain him. Teachers and preachers who in large numbers are laboring to convince the world that there is no truth in the "old-fashioned doctrine" of eternal punishment, appear to forget that, as this incident exemplifies, man is so constituted that remorse and mental torture have power to produce a hell, if there were no external punishment (Matt. 8 : 12).

THE ROAD TO HONOR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Them that honor me I will honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed."—I SAMUEL, 2 : 30.

OUR chickens generally come home to roost. Our thoughts of other men become other men's thoughts of us. According as we measure out to our fellows, so do they measure back into our bosoms, for good or for evil. So especially, in reference to the Lord Himself, the God of justice sooner or later causes a man to reap his own sowing, and gather his own scattering. See how the Lord keeps touch with His friends and foes, and pays them in their own coin—"Them that honor me I will honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed."

A man's life is often its own echo. He sinned, and he suffered after the likeness of his sin : you may see the sin in the punishment, as you see to-day the foot-mark of the Egyptian dog in the brick which he trod upon when it was yet in the soft clay. The man sinned again, for it is the nature of sin to repeat itself and grow into habit : and behold, another sorrow was born in the likeness of that other sin. Thus the man lived in the present, and formed his future life by one and the same act. He spoke, and the echoes spoke to him in the years following. So does life repeat itself ; so does the seed develop the flower, and the flower again produce the seed. It is an endless chain ; for the thing that has been is the thing which shall be. A man may live to see of all his old sins marching past him, robed in the sackcloth and ashes wherein justice dooms them to be arrayed. So is it also with our joys. God gives us joy after the similitude of our service. Godly fear fills her garden with many flowers, and her house with music of divers kinds, and the Lord appoints to her that she shall live of her ministry, and that her oxen shall eat of the good corn which they tread out for others. When we have been faithful to God, he is ever faithful to us, and sends us a full reward. If we walk contrary to him, he will walk contrary to us ; but if we delight ourselves in him, he will delight himself in us to do us good. There is good-will to men of good will, and evil shall slay those whose lives are evil.

If you wish to see this

how many instances rise before you! Enoch walks with God because God pleases him, and then we find that he pleases God. Noah obediently rests the issues of his life upon the truth of God, and God gives him rest. Abraham was famous for trusting God, and it is wonderful how God trusted him. The Lord seemed to put his honor as well as his oracles into the guardianship and custody of Abraham. "Shall I," saith God, "hide this thing that I will do from Abraham, my friend?" Oh, no. God unbosoms his heart to Abraham, for Abraham has unbosomed his heart to God.

See, on the other hand, Jacob. He is a good man and true, and I like not to speak of the failings of the faithful. There is a Ham-like propensity in some to point out the nakedness of God's saints ; but it is much better to go backward and cover them with the garment of love. Yet we cannot help seeing that Jacob was not so in harmony with God as he should have been, and therefore his life lacked the majestic serenity which attended Abraham's. He begins life by bargaining and by cheating his brother ; and all his life long he was bargained with and cheated beyond his heart's content. His cunning came home to him : what he was to Esau, Laban was to him. Yet, as he wrestled with the angel in mighty prayer, the Lord gave him the wrestler's name of honor, and as he trusted in the Lord even in his saddest estate, the Lord preserved him even to the end.

As an instance on the other side, take Moses. He would not be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter ; but gave up all prospect of a kingdom in Egypt. But what did he get? He became a greater king than any Pharaoh. He led through the wilderness a nation compared with which the Egyptians are mere barbarians. He had all the rank and dignity that could fall to the greatest ruler of his age or of any other age ; and his honor after death is to this day infinitely beyond that of all the Pharaohs rolled into one. Moses is an imperial name : among them that are born of woman, whose fame is greater? He is no loser now : he honored God and he was honored.

Take David, on the other side, and see how his transgressions came home to him. I will not speak of the better character of David just now, though that would abundantly illustrate how God repays his faithful ones : but, when he sinned, the sorrows that embittered the latter end of his life were the reflection of his own offences. One is struck with the family likeness between David's sins and sorrows. Remember the names of Absalom and Adonijah, and you cannot forget the lust and the falsehood of him to whom these young men were both sons and punishments.

Very striking, as an instance of

is the case of Adoni-bezek. When they cut off his thumbs and his great toes, so that he might lose all power to draw the bowstring, and all power, indeed, to go to battle at all, because he could not stand safely in the conflict, he confessed that three-score-and-ten kings to whom he had done the same thing had picked up crumbs under his table. It was his own remark that as he had done God had requited him. Samuel, when he smote Agag, told him that, as his sword had made women childless, so should the sword of the Lord that day make his mother childless by slaying him. Most memorable of all is the instance of Haman and his gallows, fifty cubits high. See how he swings thereon. He built the gibbet for Mordecai. Ah, no ; he built it for himself. Thus are deeds reflected upon those who do them ; thus do the cruel fall into the pits which their own hands have digged. Malice uses a sort of providential boomerang. The man flings it with all his force at the foe, and it comes back to him ; not into his hand that he may use it again, but across his brow to smite him even to the dust. Take heed what ye put into the measure that ye mete out to others, and especially to God ; for "with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." "Them that honor Me I will honor, and they that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed."

I. And, first, we will speak upon upon us all, but especially upon God's people, of honoring the Lord.

THE DUTY INCUMBENT

As we are God's creatures, we are bound to honor God. I shall not stay, dear friends, to enter into any argument upon a subject which commends itself to every conscience. If your hearts are right, you feel that to honor God is your joy. I know that you love to glorify Him. His praise is viewed by you not only as a duty, but as a privilege, and a delight. Oh for more of the power of the Holy Ghost, that we may glorify God by His own Spirit!

Just notice how we ought to honor him, and consider wherein this duty lies. We should honor Him by confessing His deity : I mean the deity of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The Athanasian Creed is too long, and it enters too much into details ; but, in the essence of it, it is most solemn truth ; and, though I should not dare to say that the man who did not believe every word of it would "without doubt, perish everlastingly," yet I should feel great trembling for myself if I could not from the depths of my heart subscribe to the blessed doctrine of the Trinity in Unity : one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

Let us further honor God by acknowledging His rule. This is more difficult by far, to most minds. Let it be to you and to me that whatever the Lord forbids we will loathe, and whatever God commands we will follow after. He is our supreme Lord, and we would not wish even to breathe apart from Him. It is rebellion against Him even to begin to reckon whether obedience will be profitable or not. What greater profit can you desire than to do His will? Next to that, let me add a very important thing. Let us honor the holiness of God, and the justice of God, and the mercy of God, by repentance whenever we feel that we have done wrong. Do not hesitate, ye guilty ones, to do this. You can make no reparation for the wrong you have done ; but the very least thing, and at the same time the very greatest thing you can do, is to say, "I have sinned and done this evil in thy sight, but O most gracious God be merciful to me a sinner." Thus may the sinner give honor unto God.

But, oh, beloved, if you have rejoiced in pardoning love, I would press upon you to honor God by acknowledging the wisdom of His teaching, and by a teachableness which accepts His doctrine. I am afraid that many ministers are training men to set aside faith, and to live by carnal reason. This is flat and His Christ. Faith, to me, means this : whatever God says in His Word I believe ; and if I do not understand the fulness of its meaning, I wait for further light, knowing that it must be true if God has said it. But now men judge the Scriptures instead of being judged of the Scriptures. Their own consciousness is to be "the judge that ends the strife," and this part of Scripture is put aside, and that is lifted into undue prominence, according as human judgment questions or approves. This must not be. We live not by thinking, but by believing ; as it is written, "The just shall live by faith." We live, not by excogitating fresh ideas of what God ought to be, and original conceptions of what God ought to do, but by looking into the Book and believing the fact.

We honor God when we believe Holy Scripture to be inspired—infallibly inspired ; and, taking it as such, say, "It is not mine to question it, or to argue against it, but simply to accept it." It is to me the delight of my life to admit into my very soul great master truths which I am unable to compass, and yet receive into myself by affection and humble reverence. I cannot comprehend the truth by my understanding, but I apprehend it by my faith, and thus it becomes mine. To love is to understand ; at least, it is so to me.

Further, we honor God's love by in Him. You honor God, you that scarcely know where to-morrow's bread shall come from, when, having said, "Give us this day our daily bread," you work for it and bless His name that you have work to do. You that suffer sickness, but patiently yield yourselves up to the divine will, believing that even your pains are for your good, and that all is for the best—you are honoring God by trusting His love. Unbelief dishonors Him ; but a simple childlike confidence pays homage to Him, as true and as acceptable as the song of Cherubim and Seraphim. Trust God about domestic cares, and bodily pains, and daily frets, and you most truly honor Him.

And, lastly, upon this point, we also honor God, dear friends, when we confess His goodness by patiently enduring His will, and especially by rejoicing in it. It is such an honoring of God when we take great delight in Him. Pulling long faces, pining over our troubles, and whining over our fears—this does not honor God. But in the midst of darkness and gloom still to say, "The Lord is good, and His mercy endureth forever, therefore will I sing unto the Lord as long as I live"—this is to honor the Lord, and to all who thus praise Him the promise of our text is made, "Them that honor Me, I will honor."

II. Now this brings me, secondly, to notice upon our daily life of this habit of honoring God.

A man who honors God, does this practically; it is no form or farce with him, but a deep practical reality. He does it often by consulting with God. What shall I do? Here are two ways that may be equally right or equally wrong. I do not know which to take. The answer is, "Bring hither the ephod." I like that old Scotchman's word, when he was puzzled about a matter of duty and wanted to end the debate—"Reach me yon Bible. That settles all." Go to your knees, and cry to God in prayer, and crooked things shall be made straight. Be willing to be guided and you shall be guided. If you blunder on in your self-sufficiency, you will soon be in a slough; but if you will wait upon God, your steps shall be ordered of the Lord. We honor God by taking counsel of Him.

We honor God in our daily life when we confess Him. It is comparatively a small matter to confess Christ before the church, though I have known some of you rather frightened of doing that. Some are almost afraid to come and talk to me about their own salvation. If anybody is afraid of me, he must be a great goose, I am sure, for there is nothing in me that should frighten anybody. I am too glad and too delighted to see anybody about his soul to be frightful to any one. If you go to see any of the elders, you will find them more tender still. At any rate, do not be afraid of them. But is to confess Christ before the world. For the merchant, for instance, to stand up for that which is good and right when he is in a web of false trading, and surrounded by unscrupulous dealers—this is honoring the Lord. For the workman in the shop, when the men are making fun of every holy thing, to say, "Well, now, I believe in all that, and if you want to laugh at anybody you may laugh at me, for I am on the Lord's side"—this is honoring God. But the tendency is to sneak away and remain quite quiet. Christ seems to have nobody to speak up for Him. Is it really so? Is that dark hour being repeated, "Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled?" Everybody will speak up for the devil. You can hear them in the street far into the night; but as to Christ, how many are there to give Him a good word in this time of rebuke? The bulk of religious professors are cowards. Let it not be so with you.

Sometimes you can honor Christ by some distinct service that you can do for Him, or by some special obedience to His will. I know times wherein there are great temptations put in the way of men. Now, mind that you honor God at such times by an unhesitating allegiance. There is wealth apparently to be had for the putting out of your hand; only you could not do it with a clean conscience. Now, honor God, and be bravely poor rather than be shamefully rich. "Get thee behind me, Satan," must be ready in the trial hour. You have an opportunity of making a great change in your position in life; but, at the same time, you would be deprived of opportunities of usefulness, both of giving and of getting good—then let your choice be made promptly.

I have always admired the example of

who was told that a certain city on the Continent would excellently suit his business. "But," he asked, "is there a synagogue there?" and when they said that there was no synagogue, he preferred to stay in another place, that he might worship God, though he would do less business. I do not know that this is often the case among Jews any more than it is among Gentiles; and, I am sorry to say that I know many Gentiles to whom God's worship is no consideration whatever—they would go to the bottomless pit if they could make large profits. It does not matter where they go, or what becomes of them, so long as gain can warm the palms of their hands. Say to yourself, young man, in the very beginning of life, "I will serve God. If I can make money, very well; but my first object is to honor God. If I can gain a competence, if I can have sufficient to retire upon in my old age, I will be very thankful; but I am going to do right and to serve God as long as I live, come wealth or come poverty, come honor or come shame." You are the man that God will honor; I am sure of it.

Then you can honor God with your substance when He gives it to you. I will not say much about this; but all through Scripture it is laid down as one mark of a child of God that he holds what he has as a steward, and that he uses it for the promotion of the kingdom of God, and the helping of the poor and the needy.

But, alas! there are many, I grieve to say, who do not seem to care about honoring God at all. And what is the influence of this upon their lives? Two or three words only upon this

SORROWFUL BUSINESS.

The influence of this upon their lives, is, that they do not care to know anything about God, and His Christ, and His Spirit, and His Gospel, and His way of salvation. So, if they have a Bible they look at it now and then, but they never seriously read it—never sit down to study it—never turn to God in prayer that they may be instructed in the inner meaning of the Word. They live much the same as they would live if God were dead. It would not make any very great difference to them if there were no God and no Saviour, for they so utterly forget Jehovah and His Anointed. They do not take the trouble to go across the street to hear about Him whom they call Redeemer. If there were a lecture upon geology—if there were a great gathering upon politics and the extension of the franchise, they would be there; but as to serving God—well, they do not seem to think that there is any weight in His claims or importance in His will.

They show in their lives that they do not honor God, because they attach no importance to anything that He commands or forbids, or to His grand purposes of grace for our fallen race. Whether men are saved or lost does not matter to them. Whether Christ died or did not die is no concern of theirs. Those wonderful things which hold angels spell-bound with admiration, have no attraction for these men, for whom they ought to have every attraction. Christ dies for men, and yet men pass by and say, "It is nothing to us." These are not only the baser and more thoughtless sort, but persons of intellect and culture do the same.

In a word, friends, if we do not honor God we shall not make God our guiding star; we shall not make His glory to be but we shall live to get money—to get money by fair means or foul, cost what it may. What a Gradgrind a man becomes when he forgets God, and only remembers gold. Oh, the wretches there are who do not care how many poor people are starved, so long as they can make a larger profit: into their little miserable souls it never enters that it is a shame to starve the needle-woman or the worker of any kind, by putting them to a killing toil in order to earn the scantiest of food.

Some make ambition their guiding star, and when this is the case they do not care what they say in the House of Commons or elsewhere, so long as they can keep themselves before the public. They make a speech to-day which they contradict to-morrow; they blurt out of their mouths the first thing that comes into their heads, whether it be mischievous or beneficial. Be it false or be it true, it is no odds to them so long as their speech will catch the ear. Only for themselves do many politicians live. And so with other men besides.

III. Now mark—and this is the last point—of all this. "Them that honor me I will honor."

Is not this a grand reward? It is not, "They that honor me shall be honored," but "Them that honor Me, I will honor." Does God honor men? He promises to do so. Compared with the honor which the Lord is able to give, there is no honor which is worth naming in the same day. When God honors a man, the glory is glory indeed. One of the French kings gave to a conquering general some $2500 a year, or thereabouts, for a wonderful deed of prowess, but the soldier told the king that he would have preferred the gold cross. I do not think I should have had such preference for a bauble; but honor is a precious commodity. To get honor from God is very different from getting it from a king. It was said of Alexander that, of two nobles who had served him well, he gave to one ten thousand talents, and to the other a kiss; and he that had the money envied him who received the kiss. Honor from God—favor from God—this is a high reward, which cannot be weighed against ten thousand worlds, and all the glory thereof. "Them that honor me I will honor."

The man who honors God shall be honored in his own heart by peace of conscience—honored in his own spirit by the conviction that it must be wisdom to be right and true and honest, and that it can never be under any circumstances right to do wrong, or wise to break a divine command.

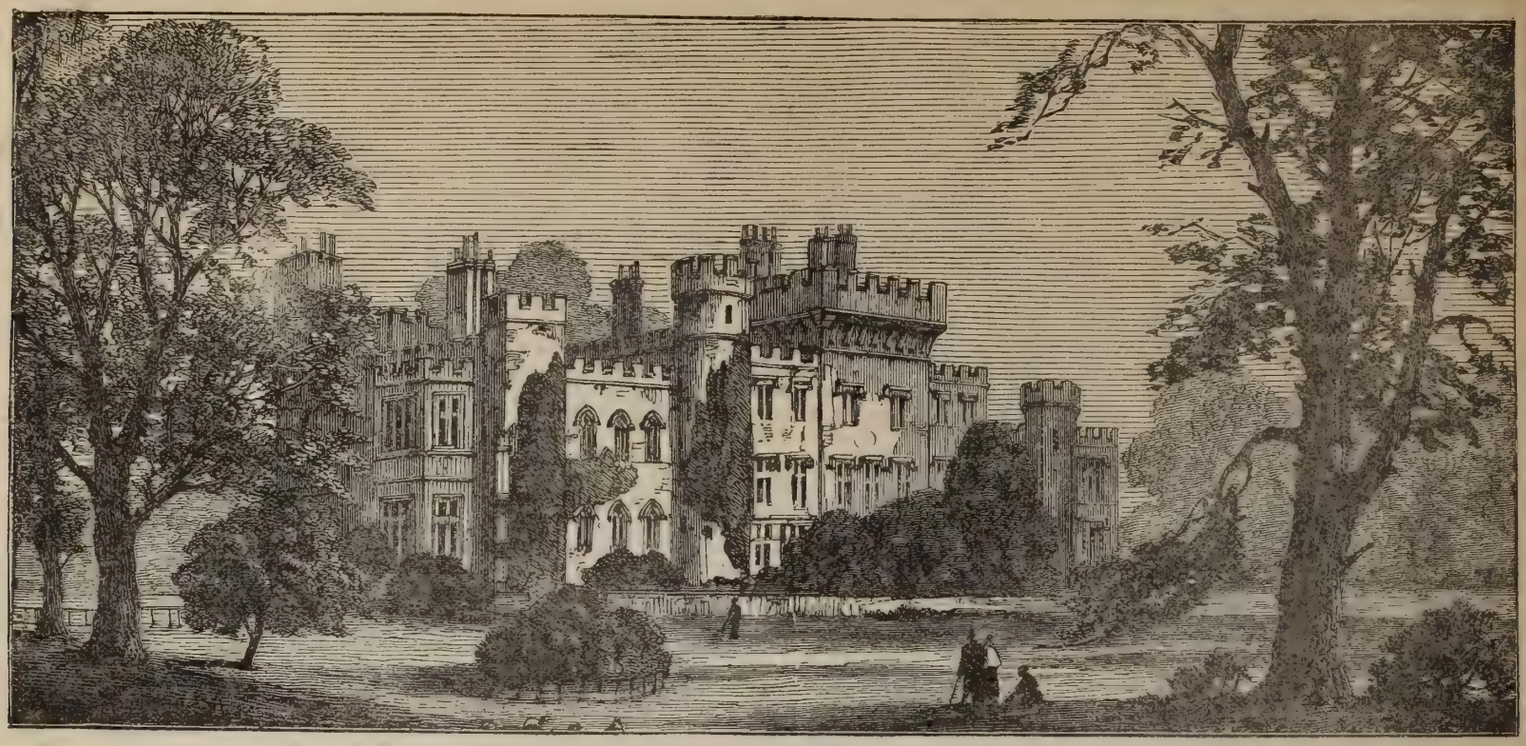
Such a man honoring his God among his brethren shall be honored of God in the church. And in the world it shall be the same. I do not believe that a man truly serves God without in the long run winning the esteem of his fellow-citizens. They burned such men of old, but when they burned them, they still honored them; for all over this nation, when Popery was in its prime and saints were persecuted, the country people sat at their firesides and they talked of holy Master Taylor, or godly old Latimer, who had suffered for Christ's sake. Brethren, you will be honored in your turn as those men are honored to-day, if, when the worst comes to the worst you are found faithful as they were. Therefore stand to your guns. Stand to your guns if you die there, for

THE LORD IS COMING.

I see the banner, I mark the white horse, I hear the Captain's voice. The trumpet rings out, "Behold, He cometh!" Honored shall that man be who stands with loins girt in his place in the battle, in the day when the Captain is saluted as Conqueror all along the line.

What will become of the sneaking coward in the day of Christ's appearing? Where will the fearful stand, who did not dare to wear the name of Christ for fear of being laughed at? Where will the false-hearted be when the Lord Jesus flames forth in His majesty? Then shall they ask the rocks to cover them, and the mountains to fall upon them to hide them from His face. Dastards that they were, they shall not know where to fly.

"Who is on the Lord's side?" Who that has not been on His side will enlist to-night? How is the enlisting to be managed? It is to be done as all enlisting is done. In our army they enlist a man by making him take a shilling. You are not enlisted by giving anything, but by receiving the King's money. Take Christ by faith. Receive Him. Stretch out your hand. He shall be the earnest-money to you of the great reward that God will give His saints in the day of His glory, when He shall honor them and make them to "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." God bless you, and may we meet at the right hand of the throne in the coming of the Lord. Amen.



Hawarden Castle, Wales; the Residence of Mr. Gladstone.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1884.

THE year now near its close has been one of uneasiness, financial disturbance, and violent political agitation at home, and of calamity and pestilence abroad. That God has preserved us from the epidemic which ravaged Southern Europe and averted the political crisis which at one time seemed to impend, is matter for special gratitude to the Giver of all mercies.

POLITICAL.

The event which, above all others, will render this year conspicuous in our national history is the election of a Democratic President after nearly a quarter of a century of Republican administration. The causes which led to that event are as remarkable as the event itself. It was evident early in the year that if, as was probable, Mr. Blaine's friends succeeded in securing his nomination, the campaign would be one of intense personal rancor. His eminent talents and his magnetic personality inspired his friends with an enthusiasm seldom evinced toward any political leader, while his enemies, especially those of his own party, were more resolute and implacable than a candidate usually has. The campaign assumed precisely the shape that was expected. National questions were overshadowed by the issue of the moral character of the candidates. New York proved to be the pivotal State, and it was in New York that the conflict was the most bitter. After several days of doubt, during which both parties claimed the State, and angry threats were uttered, the official count gave the State to Cleveland by a plurality of 1149 votes, and the thirty-six votes of New York in the Electoral College sufficed to elect Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency by a majority of thirty-seven. Momentous as the change is, it is possible to overrate its significance. It would be an error to infer that it signifies a change in the principles of the people. The successful candidate owes his election to the votes and influence of men who have been, and still are, opponents of the party to which he belongs. The fact that in the next Congress the House will show a reduced Democratic majority confirms the belief that to personal rather than political causes is due the Democratic success. There are evidences that the bitter feelings engendered by the election will not be easily or speedily allayed.

SOCIAL.

The year has been a trying one for the people in business matters. The panic in Wall Street in May shook the financial institutions throughout the country, and but for the wise and prompt action of the bankers in arranging for mutual assistance it would have had still more disastrous results than actually occurred. Meanwhile the characteristics of the time are disquieting, and sagacious observers are uneasy. The rich are becoming richer and more luxurious, while the poor are becoming poorer and less able to obtain the necessaries of life. It is useless congratulating ourselves on our national prosperity when people are making shirts at the rate of thirty cents a dozen and crowds of men are eagerly seeking work at starvation prices. Unless the wealthy classes awake to a sense of their duties, and selfishness and greed cease to have unlimited exercise, there will be trouble, beside which the riots in the Hocking Valley in September will be insignificant.

Among the important events of the year was the rescue of Lieutenant Greely and five men, all who were left of the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition. The other nineteen brave men perished, the victims of official incapacity. The floods in the Ohio Valley in the spring were unusually heavy and disastrous to life and property, while the help rendered from all sections of the country showed that the generous instincts of the people were still active. The riots in Cincinnati, in March, were a startling protest against the outrages of justice which had been frequent in the city for a long time before. There was, nevertheless, a strange significance in the sight of thousands of men rioting, fighting, and burning public buildings on the plea that justice was not being properly administered. A novel experience for citizens of the Atlantic coast was the earthquake which shook that section—happily without disastrous consequences—on Sunday, August 10th. To our Southern friends the opening of the grand International Exposition in New Orleans will, we sincerely hope, render this year memorable as the commencement of a new era of prosperity. Among the of the year, a few deserve brief notice. The wreck of the City of Columbus, with the loss of ninety-seven lives, occurred on January 18th. The vessel was on her way to Savannah from Boston, and was driven ashore at Gay Head, and became a complete wreck. In February came the terrible tornadoes in the South and South-west, destroying life and property. On March 13th the country was thrilled by news of the colliery disaster at the Pocahontas Mine, in Virginia, in which one hundred and fifty men lost their lives. In the wreck of the Daniel Steinmann on the coast of Nova Scotia, on April 3d, one hundred and twenty lives were lost, and on April 18th the State of Florida went down, in collision at sea, with one hundred and thirty-five persons on board. The wreck of the Amsterdam on August 3d, and the burning of the Maasdam on October 23d, are other items in the long and ghastly catalogue of the year's disasters.

the terrible cholera epidemic has given the year a mournful record. It showed itself at Toulon, in France, in June, and thence spread to Marseilles and Arles. Before the close of July it had made over a thousand victims. During August it appeared in Spain and Italy, where, especially in Naples, the mortality was appalling. On September 9th, in Naples alone, three hundred and sixty-five persons died from cholera.

England and France have each had a war upon their hands, in which there is little glory to be gained, and much loss of life and treasure is inevitable. England sent General Gordon to pacify the Soudan, where the rising of the Mahdi was producing anarchy. General Gordon arrived in Khartoum on February 16th, and since that time his safety has been the cause of constant anxiety. He has been surrounded by the Mahdi's army, and his communications with home cut off. A large force under Sir Garnet Wolseley is now endeavoring to rescue him. France, after completing the conquest of Tonquin, negotiated a treaty with China which, owing to a misunderstanding or to treachery, was broken within a few days. Open war between the two countries is still threatened, though negotiations, with a view to a peaceable settlement of the dispite, are being carried on.

Ireland continued through the year a source of embarrassment to the English Government. The malcontents developed a change of tactics which made England instead of Ireland the scene of operations. Three times during the year explosions by dynamite were effected, happily without loss of life, but with considerable destruction of property. There was also an attempt made to destroy the Parliament Building at Quebec, on October 11th, which is supposed to have been the work of Irishmen. England, like America, had the novel experience of an earthquake. On April 22d several cities were shaken up, and buildings more or less damaged.

THE OBITUARY list of the year is a heavy one on both sides the Atlantic. In America we have lost, in public life, Secretary Folger, Hon. W. H. Hunt, Senator H. B. Anthony, Wendell Phillips, Thomas G. Appleton, Professors Ezra Abbot and Arnold H. Guyot, and Dr. Willard Parker; in Christian labor, Bishops B. Smith, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Matthew Simpson, George F. Pierce, H. H. Kavanaugh, and Isaac W. Wiley, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Revs. John Lord Taylor, D.D., John S. Inskip, and Mr. John F. Slater.

In Europe, among the names of those death has removed, are the famous Edward Lasker, the leader of German Liberals; Mr. Fawcett, the blind statesman; Sir H. Bartle Frere, Prince Leopold, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Brunswick, Midhat Pasha, Eugene Rouher; and in India the noted advanced thinker, Keshub Chunder Sen.

The Result of a Philanthropic Effort.

HAWARDEN CASTLE.

MR. GLADSTONE, the Premier of England, resides, when Parliament is not in session, at Hawarden Castle, a picture of which appears on the preceding page. Though controlling the patronage of the country, and giving lucrative offices to others, he is comparatively a poor man, and a few years ago his private financial embarrassment was the subject of general gossip. The salary attached to his office is $25,000 a year; but as the Premier is expected to entertain extensively, few men who have held the office have been able to save anything from it.

Hawarden Castle belongs to Mr. Gladstone's eldest son, to whom it was bequeathed by his maternal grandfather, Sir Stephen Glynne, whose daughter, Catherine, Mr. Gladstone married in 1839. It is situated in Flintshire, Wales, and it is surrounded by a large park, where the statesman can enjoy his favorite relaxation of felling trees.

DODSON'S CART.

(See Illustration on this page.)

"IT'S no use, sir, there's no show for me." The words were spoken in a dreary, hopeless tone, outside the wails of a prison. The man who uttered them had been "doing" ten days for a drunken spree, in which he had indulged in some rough horse play which had procured him an interview with a judge. A philanthropist, whose name thousands have reason to bless, met him as he came out of prison, and addressed some words to him that brought tears to his eyes and the despairing words to his lips.

"If you had a show, as you call it, would you use it? Think of your wife and your three children. I know you love them."

"That I do, sir. But what use is it? There's no way of getting on, and I am glad to get drunk and forget our hard lot. I ought never to have got married."

"You should be ashamed to say so. You ought to be proud of your wife and children, and thank God for them. But you have not answered my question. If you had a chance in life, would you make the best of it?"

"Ay, that I would, sir," said poor Dodson.

"Then you shall have it. I shall want you to sign the pledge and to give me your word to do your best to get on, and I'll help you. You are too good a man to go to ruin."

Not many days afterward Dodson, with his wife and children, were living in a neat little house in the country, away from the city, the temptations of which had proved too strong for him. He was the owner of a horse and covered wagon, and was known in the neighborhood as the new expressman. That was the chance his good friend promised him, and Dodson was making the most of it, as he had agreed to do. It was not very profitable at first, but as people found him trustworthy and obliging, business came to him, and he soon prospered. His good friend rode over to see him one morning, and as he watched Dodson setting out on his journey, saying good-by for the day to his wife and children, and contrasted his bright, cheerful face with the face he had seen that morning outside the prison walls, he thanked God, who had given him the means and the disposition to save one who was ready to perish.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Good News from Home.

THE life of the two fugitives in the little French village passed along peacefully, and, as has been said, with a strange charm for one of them. John Morley seemed to grow younger as he watched the new life about him. His shop and his books and his money difficulties forgotten, he was like a boy enjoying a long vacation among the pleasantest scenes and surroundings.

But none of these outer things had the same influence over Hester. Her mind had not been suffering from a long malady, and could not therefore enjoy the almost sensuous pleasure of the change which was bringing health to her father. She was devoted to him; but, in spite of her devotion, her heart clung with bitter strength to the love of her own country, the love of old familiar places, the love, scarcely acknowledged, of Carl. She did not think willingly of the last. They were separated by a miserable and irrevocable destiny. At times she was almost glad that no stronger tie bound them together than mere friendship—a friendship, also, more implied than professed. If he had loved her, her duty would have been divided: but now it belonged solely to her father.

What the final end of their present strange life would be, she could not by any effort foresee. Not a whisper reached them from that far-off place where all her years had been passed Could it be possible that the course of events was going on as usual in Little Aston, which for her was as the buried cities of ancient times? Were the streets there still? Was her old home—the only home she had ever known—yet standing in its dark northern corner, where the sun never shone upon it? Was the chapel open Sunday after Sunday; and did the church bells chime as they were wont to do?

Hester's favorite place for indulging in these mournful questionings was the cool, lofty, solemn interior of the fine old church of Ecquemonville. She chose a chair for herself, where she was half hidden by a pillar; and there she sat, hour after hour, letting all the pageantry of Catholic ceremonials pass before her, but paying no heed to it. She heard the organs answering to one another in grand volumes of sound, which made her tremble, but she never asked herself why it was so. The worshippers respected the pale young Englishwoman, whose ascetic, saint-like beauty was in harmony with their own worship. No one spoke to her; a few offered her the holy water on the tips of their fingers as she passed in and out, and felt repaid by the sudden light in her gray eyes as she recognized the courtesy. She was adopted by them with a silent adoption; and the curé, a venerable old man, who had no intention of making a convert of her, regarded her with a profound interest, which only waited for an opportunity to shape itself into language.

The vintage came, with its deepened mirth and hilarity; and John Morley's force and energy had returned to him almost as if he had never wasted them in morbid brooding; but Hester's silent longings were growing day by day more enfeebling. The fine balance of health was disturbed by her ceaseless conjectures as to both past and future. She had never renewed her conversation with her father about the circumstances of the night preceding their hurried flight from England. Rose was dead; and amid her other troubled thoughts, it seemed very nearly a relief to think of her as one who has made the final escape from the evils of life.

But she could not be sure that her father's hand was not guilty of her death. He had said it was not so; but his reason had been so shaken at the time, that she could not trust implicitly to his word or memory. She could not yet gather courage to question him again. But who could be guilty, if not he? It would be impossible to return to England, for their flight had fixed the crime upon him. If they ever set foot again in their native land, he would be called upon to expiate the death of Rose, either as a murderer or a madman. Oh, the exile; the terrible banishment! A home-sickness laid its chilly hand upon her; and she felt that no life, however bright or joyous, could wean her from the yearning to see her own people, and hear her own language once again.

Long before reaching Ecquemonville, Robert Waldron knew his quest was successful. The driver of the diligence, to whom it seemed an extraordinary thing to have another Englishman as a passenger in so short a time after the arrival of John Morley and Hester, informed him that two of his compatriots had made Ecquemonville their residence since the beginning of June. On being questioned, he described them as a man, with very white hair and seemingly of great age; and a young lady, his daughter, very pretty, very amiable, and very sad. Robert could not doubt that these were the two he was seeking; and his heart throbbed, as it had not done for some time past, with a feeling of satisfaction and happiness. Every step of the road brought him nearer to Hester, to whom he was carrying glad tidings. Whatever she had thought of her father's deed, it must be an infinite relief to her to hear that he had again escaped being guilty of a dark and cardinal sin. The way home was open to them; they could return to it at any hour they pleased. He could not fail to be welcome, with such consolation as this.

Hester was sitting at the window, with her arms resting on the sill, looking listlessly down upon the dull street and market-square, which seemed stamped ineffaceably upon her brain. The diligence came in, and she saw the group of laundresses round the fountain pause as usual at their work, and the loungers throng round the conveyance, hiding the only traveller who descended from it. She was very heart-sick this afternoon; and all this was nothing to her except one more scene in the shifting panorama of the streets. But an hour afterward, as she still sat there, silent, spiritless, half broken-hearted, the stranger appeared on the uneven pavement below, coming swiftly toward her, with upraised face, and eyes fastened upon her.

Hester caught convulsively at the window-sill, and leaned forward with a fascinated and incredulous gaze. Her father was in the room behind her, reading the only English book in their possession, a New Testament which she had carried from little Hester's bedroom to Carl's chapel; and here, in the street below, close at the door, was Robert Waldron who had seen her, knew her, and was hastening toward her.

Hester laid her head down upon the hands which grasped the window-sill, and felt an overwhelming, unutterable tremor of suspense. She could neither stir nor speak to give warning to her father; a vain warning it would have been, for already Robert's foot was upon the winding staircase which led up to their room. A cry only broke from her benumbed lips; but it was so smothered, that her father did not hear it. Step by step, each one adding to the intense strain upon her, came the approaching tread; and seemed to tarry at the door as if to lengthen out her anguish. She heard her father lay his book down, and knew that he was looking up to see who was coming. Then the door opened, and they stood face to face.

John Morley and Robert Waldron stood face to face, both alike stricken dumb. It was so long since they had seen one another thus directly, and so many changes had passed over both, that they recognized each other more by intuition than by positive recollection. There was so much also to be uttered by each of them that speech seemed altogether insufficient and powerless. They looked into one another's eyes, and no other gaze read the changeful, lamentable story of the past, as it flitted across their memories, and looked out in mournful glances at each other's face. Hester did not dare to lift her head, and look at them. She was waiting shrinkingly, to catch the first word.

"You have pursued and found me!" cried John Morley at last, in a voice which sounded clearly and coldly through the room, and fell in icy tones upon her ear.

"God forbid that I should harm you!" said Robert Waldron, in tremulous accents. "I come as your friend."

"Do you know what you have done for me?" asked John Morley again, after a long pause, as if both had exhausted themselves in the utterance of the first few words. "Let me tell you what you have done. I loved Rose as I never loved Hester's mother. I loved her with infatuation; with idolatry; against the voice of my conscience, against the voice of the church, against the inward voice of God. I knew she would bring no strength, no real joy to me, yet I loved her. I loved as Adam loved Eve, when he bartered paradise and righteousness for her. You never loved her one half, one tenth as much."

"I never loved her at all," muttered Robert, unconscious of his own words.

"She might have learned to love me," he continued, mournfully, "she would at least have remained faithful to me, if you had not come between us. Because she was very fair to look upon, and facile to temptation, you tempted her, and I lost her. Yet you say you never loved her!"

"I was no better than a boy," answered Robert, urging the plea that had often soothed himself.

"A boy!" exclaimed John Morley, with a lifetime of agony in his voice; "a boy! and Rose gave me up for you! Yet I know not which love was the greater sin, yours or mine. I lavished upon her an inordinate love. We both wronged the feeble creature by our passion, you and I."

"If it be possible for you to forgive me," cried Robert, "forgive me now."

"Forgive you!" he repeated; "ay, I have forgiven you both. God knows I forgave her before I found that she was dead."

"She is not dead," said Robert, in a hoarse voice, which almost failed him. Low as it was, it reached Hester's ear, and she turned quickly round to see his face. How changed he was! how little like the gay, self-pleased handsome man she had last seen! He was looking at her father, almost unconscious of her presence, and his expression was one of poignant shame and remorse.

"Not dead!" echoed John Morley. "I laid her down, as gently as I could, upon her own little sofa, in her own room; but I tell you she was dead."

"We found her there," answered Robert. "Lawson's mother called Grant and me in, and she lay there like one dead; but there was life yet, and she is living now."

"Come here to me, Hester," cried John Morley; "let me hold your hand."

In an instant she was at his side, her arm about his neck, and her lips pressed again and again to his face. She could not speak at first, in her sudden excess of gladness. Rose was not dead, not murdered; and she saw clearly how free they were once more to return to England, to go back to Little Aston, to enter the old home again. She laid her head upon her father's shoulder, and sobbed. "Thank God!"

"How can it be?" said John Morley, in a tone of almost incredulous wonder.

"I will tell you," answered Robert, hurriedly; "the blow had just missed its most fatal aim, as it had done with me. You had barely failed to kill her, as you missed murdering me two years ago."

"Me!" cried John Morley. "I desired to injure neither of you. "I never lifted up my hand against one or the other."

Robert Waldron made no answer; he was scarcely surprised at John Morley's denial; but Hester looked up into her father's face, and spoke entreatingly.

"Let us speak openly to one another now," she urged. "You remember the stranger whom Grant brought into our house almost dead, about two years ago. Oh, you knew who it was, and who had struck that frightful blow? It was Robert Waldron, father. Did you know it was Robert Waldron?"

"Stop," he answered, raising his hand to his head; "let me think all this over a little while."

They waited for a minute or two in unbroken silence, hearing the distant chatter of the laundresses about the fountain, and the tattoo of a drum being beaten at a great distance off. Hester had sunk down on her knees beside her father, and rested her head against his arm. She could hardly endure the suspense, but she controlled herself; while Robert stood by, patient and immovable, willing to give John Morley what time he chose to collect his thoughts.

"I dare not think of it for long, even now," he said, his face, which had taken a hue of health, growing pale once more; "but listen to me, and I will speak as I would speak before God. I never knew till this moment that you had been under my roof. It was well I did not know. You had promised faithfully that you would never enter the street where I dwelt."

"I broke that promise," said Robert, as John Morley paused.

"It never came into my mind that you could break a solemn promise like that; the only penalty I demanded from you. I wished you no harm; I only wished to be left to my sorrow and dishonor. How Rose came there I do not know to this day. I believed Hester was gone to London to see her dying; and at first a superstition came across me. I could not help supposing that her spirit had come back to the home she had so cruelly and shamefully abandoned. How could Rose be there in the body?"

"Father," said Hester, "she was the poor creature we gave shelter to in the old nursery. She came to me one night as I left the chapel, poor, homeless, very ill, without hope in the world; and I remembered the promise you made me take long ago, before you married her, that I would be as her very own child to her. Don't you recollect? What else could I do for her?"

"Recollect!" said John Morley; "ay, I recollect. I understand it all now."

"I did right!" she murmured.

"Right!" he repeated, laying his hand fondly on her head; "you are always right, my daughter."

"We will talk about it at another time," he continued, after a brief silence. "It is too painful for me still. You say that she is alive, that no murder has been committed at all. Where is she now?"

"She is at home," answered Robert, and John Morley shook a little at the words; "we could not move her then, nor yet. She is still very feeble. What would you have had us do with her, when she was on the point of death?"

"That is enough," he said; "leave us now."

Robert looked sadly from him to Hester, and from Hester to him again. They were occupied with one another, and could spare no thought for him. Whatever they had to say to each other, whatever resolves and plans they might make, they wished to do it in his absence. He felt a vehement yearning to touch Hester's hand, to see her look at him once more, and to hear her speak to him; but she was clinging to her father, looking into his face, and speaking to him broken words of gladness. He found that he had no right there any longer, though he had been the messenger of the glad tidings; and with a quiet farewell, which scarcely fell upon their inattentive ears, he left them alone with one another and their new joy.

"BELLS ACROSS THE SNOW."

[The ancient church of Linton, Herefordshire, England, has five very sweet-toned bells. In the winter of 1874-5, there was much snow on the ground, during which time these bells were heard wonderfully clear, and even more melodious than at other times, by the brother of Miss Havergal, who is the incumbent of an adjoining parish. This circumstance was alluded to in a letter to his sister, who was so impressed with the idea of "Bells Across the Snow," that she at once wrote the well-known lines.]

O Christmas, merry Christmas!
Is it really come again?
With its memories and greetings,
With its joy and with its pain.
There's a minor in the carol,
And a shadow in the light,
And a spray of cypress twining
With the holly wreath to-night.
And the hush is never broken
By the laughter light and low,
As we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

O Christmas, merry Christmas!
'Tis not so very long
Since other voices blended
With the carol and the song!
If we could but hear them singing,
As they are singing now—
If we could but see the radiance
Of the crown on each dear brow;
There would be no sigh to smother,
No hidden tear to flow,
As we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

O Christmas, merry Christmas!
This never more can be;
We cannot bring again the days
Of our unshadowed glee.
But Christmas, happy Christmas,
Sweet herald of good-will,
With holy songs of glory
Brings holy gladness still.
For peace and hope may brighten,
And patient love may glow,
As we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

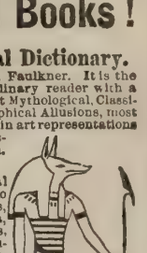
New and Useful Books!

A Classical and Mythological Dictionary.

A new work for popular use. By H. C. Faulkner. It is the design of this volume to provide the ordinary reader with a brief and concise explanation of the ancient Mythological, Classical, Biographical Historical, and Geographical Allusions, most frequently met with in English Literature, in art representations of Classical Deities and Heroes, in newspaper discussions, and in ordinary speech.

70 Illustrations.



Anubis.

Brief accounts are given of all the classical heroes mentioned in ancient history; also of all Mythological Deities, such as Achilles, Adonis, Ammon, Anubis, Apollo, Atalanta, Atlas, Bacchus, Brahma, Buddha, Cerberus, Charon, Cupid, Dagon, Diana, Durga, Esculapius, Euterpe, Hebe, Helena, Hercules, Indra, Isis, Juno, Jupiter, Krishna, Mars, Medusa, Mercury, Minerva, Moloch, Niobe, Orpheus, Osiris, Pan, Pluto, Psyche, Saturn, Sybil, Sirens, Terpsichore, Thalia, Thor, Thoth, Varuna, Venus, Vesta, Vishnu, Vulcan, Yama, and hundreds of others. A handbook for popular use—convenient, comprehensive, clear, concise, correct—and written in popular language. Very useful to every one who wishes to understand these subjects. Cloth. Price 50 cents.

Lord's Prayer

ILLUMINATED.—The only pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer ever made. The letters of the text are embellished with original designs of great beauty. Interspersed among these are illustrations of the greatest events of our Saviour's life, from the Nativity to the Ascension, viz.: Nativity, Childhood, Baptism, Sermon on the Mount, Transfiguration, Last Supper, Crucifixion, Resurrection and Ascension. These nine separate groups contain ninety-one heads and figures, and are truthful copies of the most wonderful and famous paintings of the old masters. The head and bust of our Saviour is quite large and placed in the centre. The size of the engraving is 12½x16 inches, printed on the best plate paper, 16x20 inches. I will send promptly to any person for introduction, where I have no agent, one or more copies, with explanatory key, prepaid by mail, rolled safe in a tube, for 13 two-cent postage-stamps each. A magnificent present for any one. The special attention of Ministers, Parents, Superintendents and Sabbath-school Teachers is requested. Agents wanted. Address DELWIN F. BROWN, P. O. Box 3061, New York, N. Y.

TESTIMONIALS.—Mr. Delwin F. Brown's pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer is a work of marvellous power and beauty, and is one of the finest productions of its kind which have come from the graver in this century. After twenty years of persistent labor he has completed a masterpiece which cannot fail to secure the interested attention and study of all who love the pure and beautiful in Christian Art. No parent can purchase a more appropriate household ornament, or one which can exert a more refining influence upon the minds of his children. Its subtle and wonder-working power will be an abiding source of pleasure to all who shall take into living companionship such a silent but ever-speaking teacher. A gem of inexpressible purity and matchless beauty, and of unequalled perfection.

From the New York Christian Advocate.

THE LORD'S PRAYER ILLUMINATED.—We have before us the most exquisitely designed and superbly executed picture of the Lord's Prayer ever issued. It is one of the most magnificent pure line steel plate engravings ever made in this country, if not in the world, engraved by artists possessing the highest skill in the bank-note fraternity, at an expense of over $15,000, and in every respect equal to finest bank-note work.

Unparalleled Offer.

A $4 PERIODICAL FOR $1.50.

100,000 Cyclopædias Given Away.

Every subscriber to the American Agriculturist, OLD OR NEW, English or German, whose subscription for 1885 is immediately forwarded us, together with the price, $1.50 per year, and 15 cents extra for postage on Cyclopædia—making $1.65 in all—will receive the American Agriculturist for all of 1885, and be presented with the American Agriculturist Family Cyclopædia, (just out). 700 Pages and over 1,000 Engravings. Strongly bound in cloth, black and gold.

Vol. 8th, Tenth Census, just issued, says: "The American Agriculturist is especially worthy of mention, because of the remarkable success that has attended the unique and untiring efforts of its proprietors to increase and extend its circulation, which at one time reached a point undoubtedly higher than was ever before attained by a journal of its class. Its contents are duplicated every month for a German edition, which also circulates widely." Probably no government publication ever before went out of its way, unsolicited, to bestow such flattering notices upon a journal published by private individuals.

Send three two-cent stamps, or six cents, for mailing you, post-paid, a specimen copy of the American Agriculturist, an elegant forty-page Premium List, with 200 illustrations, and specimen pages of the Family Cyclopædia. Canvassers wanted Everywhere.

ELLS ACROSS THE SNOW."

ancient church of Linton, Herefordshire, Engas five very sweet-toned bells. In the winter 5, there was much snow on the ground, during time these bells were heard wonderfully clear, n more melodious than at other times, by the of Miss Havergal, who is the Incumbent of ining parish. This circumstance was alluded letter to his sister, who was so impressed with a of "Bells Across the Snow," that she at once he well-known lines.]

Christmas, merry Christmas!
Is it really come again?
With its memories and greetings,
With its joy and with its pain.
There's a minor in the carol,
And a shadow in the light,
nd a spray of cypress twining
With the holly wreath to-night.
nd the hush is never broken
By the laughter light and low,
s we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

Christmas, merry Christmas!
'Tis not so very long
ince other voices blended
With the carol and the song!
we could but hear them singing,
As they are singing now—
we could but see the radiance
Of the crown on each dear brow;
here would be no sigh to smother,
No hidden tear to flow,
s we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

Christmas, merry Christmas!
This never more can be;
Ve cannot bring again the days
Of our unshadowed glee.
ut Christmas, happy Christmas,
Sweet herald of good-will,
Vith holy songs of glory
Brings holy gladness still.
or peace and hope may brighten,
And patient love may glow,
s we listen in the starlight
To the "bells across the snow!"

New and Useful Books!

A Classical and Mythological Dictionary.

A new work for popular use. By H. C. Faulkner. It is the design of this volume to provide the ordinary reader with a brief and concise explanation of the ancient Mythological, Classical, Biographical Historical, and Geographical Allusions, most frequently met with in English Literature, in art representations of Classical Deities and Heroes, in newspaper discussions, and in ordinary speech.

70 Illustrations.

Brief accounts are given of all the classical heroes mentioned in ancient history; also of all Mythological Deities, such as Achilles, Adonis, Ammon, Anubis, Apollo, Atalanta, Atlas, Bacchus, Brahma, Buddha, Cerberus, Charon, Cupid, Dagon, Diana, Durga, Esculapius, Euterpe, Hebe, Helena, Hercules, Indra, Isis, Juno, Jupiter, Krishna, Mars, Medusa, Mercury, Minerva, Moloch, Niobe, Orpheus, Osiris, Pan, Pluto, Psyche, Saturn, Sybil, Sirens, Terpsichore, Thalia, Thor, Thoth, Varuna, Venus, Vesta, Vishnu, Vulcan, Yama, and hundreds of others. A handbook for popular use—convenient, comprehensive, clear, concise, correct—and written in popular language. Very useful to every one who wishes to understand these subjects. Cloth. Price 50 cents.

Anubis.

Lord's Prayer

ILLUMINATED.—The only pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer ever made. The letters of the text are embellished with original designs of great beauty. Interspersed among these are illustrations of the greatest events of our Saviour's life, from the Nativity to the Ascension, viz.: Nativity, Childhood, Baptism, Sermon on the Mount, Transfiguration, Last Supper, Crucifixion, Resurrection and Ascension. These nine separate groups contain ninety-one heads and figures, and are truthful copies of the most wonderful and famous paintings of the old masters. The head and bust of our Saviour is quite large and placed in the centre. The size of the engraving is 12½x16 inches, printed on the best plate paper, 16x22 inches. I will send promptly to any person for introduction, where I have no agent, one or more copies, with explanatory key, prepaid by mail, rolled safe in a tube, for 15 two-cent postage-stamps each. A magnificent present for any one. The special attention of Ministers, Parents, Superintendents and Sabbath-school Teachers is requested. Agents wanted. Address DELWIN F. BROWN, P. O. Box 3061, New York, N. Y.

TESTIMONIALS.—Mr. Delwin F. Brown's pure line steel-plate engraving of the Lord's Prayer is a work of marvellous power and beauty, and is one of the finest productions of its kind which have come from the graver in this century. After twenty years of persistent labor he has completed a masterpiece which cannot fail to secure the interested attention and study of all who love the pure and beautiful in Christian Art. No parent can purchase a more appropriate household ornament, or one which can exert a more refining influence upon the minds of his children. Its subtle and wonder-working power will be an abiding source of pleasure to all who shall take into living companionship such a silent but ever-speaking teacher. A gem of inexpressible purity and matchless beauty, and of unequalled perfection.

From the New York Christian Advocate.

THE LORD'S PRAYER ILLUMINATED.—We have before us the most exquisitely designed and superbly executed picture of the Lord's Prayer ever issued. It is one of the most magnificent pure line steel plate engravings ever made in this country, if not in the world, engraved by artists possessing the highest skill in the bank-note fraternity, at an expense of over $15,000, and in every respect equal to finest bank-note work.

Unparalleled Offer.

100,000 Cyclopædias Given Away.

Every subscriber to the American Agriculturist, OLD OR NEW, English or German, whose subscription for 1885 is immediately forwarded us, together with the price, $1.50 per year, and 15 cents extra for postage on Cyclopædia—making $1.65 in all—will receive the American Agriculturist for all of 1885, and be presented with the American Agriculturist Family Cyclopædia, (just out). 700 Pages and over 1,000 Engravings. Strongly bound in cloth, black and gold.

Vol. 8th, Tenth Census, just issued, says: "The American Agriculturist is especially worthy of mention, because of the remarkable success that has attended the unique and untiring efforts of its proprietors to increase and extend its circulation, which at one time reached a point undoubtedly higher than was ever before attained by a journal of its class. Its contents are duplicated every month for a German edition, which also circulates widely." Probably no government publication ever before went out of its way, unsolicited, to bestow such flattering notices upon a journal published by private individuals.

Send three two-cent stamps, or six cents, for mailing you, post-paid, a specimen copy of the American Agriculturist, an elegant forty-page Premium List, with 200 illustrations, and specimen pages of the Family Cyclopædia. Canvassers wanted Everywhere.
